An interesting point is made in Williams v. Spurr, 24 Mich. 335, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 17, which held that it did not constitute fraud entitling the vendor of real estate to avoid a conveyance thereof, for the purchaser to fail to disclose the fact that certain indications of iron upon the property, with reference to which both parties were familiar, had been carefully analyzed and sufficiently developed by him to enable him to determine that the land possessed great value because of the existence of this mineral, he having expert knowledge along this line, an advantage not possessed by the vendor. The court reasoned that the purchaser had a perfect right, under the circumstances, to make use of his superior and scientific acquisitions, which were his own property, and not that of the vendor, and the latter had no right or claim to profit by the better opinion the purchaser might thereby be enabled to form. The

B, of which he knows B to be ignorant, should contract to purchase that estate, the contract would be good, although B should be left in ignorance of the existence of the mine.

The law assumes that the owner has better opportunities than anyone else to know all the material facts concerning his own property, and is thus able under all ordinary circumstances to protect his own interests.

Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 903; Robins v. Hope, 57 Cal. 493.

A vendor is presumed to know the condition of his own property, and does not occupy so favorable a position as regards statements made in negotiating a trade as the vendee, and, even in the case of a vendee, statements made to him as to value and quality are usually treated as matter of court suggested, however, that had the purchaser been employed by the vendor to make an examination for his benefit, or had he stood in any fiduciary relation to him, or had the vendor been ignorant of any show of iron upon the lands, the case might have been different. But said that, under the circumstances, the purchaser was not only at liberty to conceal from the vendor any opinion he might have formed as to the value of the ores, but any discoveries he might have made, so long as he did nothing to prevent the vendor from making any examination he might choose to make, or from adopting his own course to obtain such information as he might choose to obtain at his own expense and in his own way.

8. Interest of vendor.

Misrepresentations to the owner of real estate as to the extent of his interest therein, he being ignorant with reference thereto, and the purchaser having knowledge thereof, constitute actionable fraud, where relied upon by the vendor. Wilson v. Nichols, 72 Conn. 173, 43 Atl. 1052; Hays v. Meyers, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 832, 17 L. R.A. (N.S.) 284, 107 S. W. 287; Obney v. Obney, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 116. And see Morgan v. Dinges, supra.

Thus, a purchaser of the interest of certain heirs in the real estate of their ancestors, who misrepresents to them the amount of such estate, he being informed with reference thereto, and they being ignorant of the facts and relying upon his representations in regard thereto, commits a fraud entitling them to maintain an action at law for damages. Wilson v. Nichols, supra.

So, it constitutes fraud entitling the remainderman of real estate to rescind his conveyance thereof, for the purchaser, with knowledge that the life tenant was on his death bed, in reply to the remainderman's query as to the health of the life tenant, to give a misleading answer which tended to create the impression in the mind of the remainderman that the life tenant was in ordinary good health. Hays v. Meyers, supra.

And see, to the same effect, Obney v. Obney, supra. In this case, however, the purchaser falsely represented to the remainderman that the life tenant was hale and hearty.

And see Faxon v. Baldwin, 136 Iowa, 519, 114 N. W. 40, which held it to amount to fraud invalidating a conveyance of land, for the purchaser, with knowledge that the vendor was mistaken as to the extent of her interest in the real estate she was selling, to conceal from her the true facts affecting her interest, and thereby obtain same at much less than its true value. The case, however, is disposed of on the theory of the concealment of quantity rather than facts affecting value.

4. Miscellaneous.

A misrepresentation of the value of standing timber by a purchaser thereof constitutes fraud entitling the vendor to a rescission of the conveyance, where the former, by artifice and a promise of fair dealing induces the latter to refrain from making a personal investigation of the value of the timber. Garr v. Alden, 139 Mich. 440, 102 N. W. 950.

It constitutes fraud entitling the vendor of standing timber to rescind a contract for its sale, where the purchaser, after having negotiated for its purchase, either by the acre or in gross, measured the timber, and at the time of the contract, upon inquiry of the vendor, assured him that he had not made a full measurement, but, in so far as he had, he had found the timber in quantity to be substantially as estimated by the vendor, where as a matter of fact he had made a complete measurement, and found the timber in quantity to be about double the estimate of the vendor. Prescott v. Wright, 4 Gray, 461.

A trustee to sell real estate, who purchases it himself without informing the owner that he had already sold it to another at a much higher price, is guilty of a fraud which will entitle the vendor to a opinion, so as not to entitle him to any remedy therefor on a charge of fraud.

rescission of the conveyance, to the extent of holding the vendee for the amount he actually received for the property. Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Bro. Ch. 400, affirmed in 4 Bro. P. C. 258.

A purchaser of land commits a fraud upon the vendor which entitles him to rescind a conveyance thereof, where he induces the vendor to sell at a valuation to be appraised by four individuals, two each to be chosen by the vendor and the vendee, where the vendee chooses as one of the appraisers a person secretly his partner in the purchase, who conceals this fact, and uses his position as appraiser to secure the appraisal of the property at much less than its real value. Haywood v. Marsh, 6 Yerg. 39.

c. Failure to disclose.

Although not necessary to the decision, in considering this subject in Mitchell v. McDougall, 62 Ill. 498, the court remarked that where two parties between whom there existed no fiduciary relation "are treating for an estate, and the purchaser knows from surface indications or otherwise, by actual boring, there is a valuable mine upon the land, the purchaser is not bound to disclose that fact to the owner, for the means of information on the subject were as accessible to the owner of the land as to the purchaser.

In Smith v. Beatty, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 456, 40 Am. Dec. 435, the court refused to set aside a lease of land for mineral purposes, on the ground that the lessee had committed a fraud upon the lessor in procuring the lease with knowledge on his part of the existence upon the land of a valuable gold mine, which fact he did not disclose to the lessor.

The mere fact that the vendee of real estate knew that there was sand chrome on the vendor's land, of which fact the vendor was ignorant, and which he did not disclose, is no ground for impugning the validity of the conveyance, although it would be otherwise had the purchaser of the land, during the negotiations for the purchase, wilfully made any misstatement concerning a material fact, thereby misleading the plaintiff and inducing him to sell at a lower price than he otherwise would. Harris v. Tyson, 24 Pa. 347, 64 Am. Dec. 661, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 634.

But see Williams v. Beazley, 3 J. J. Marsh, 578, wherein, after referring to the general doctrine that mere silence by a purchaser of real estate as to some fact within his knowledge enhancing the value thereof did not constitute fraud, the court remarked that this doctrine would not justify the purchaser in withholding from the seller knowledge of any recent discovery of valuable mines of which he was informed, and of which the seller was ignorant. This doctrine was, however, not applied in that case, as it was disposed of upon another question.

In Perkins v. M'Gavock, Cooke (Tenn.) 416, the court denied relief to a party to a partition of lands, who sought relief therefrom on the ground that he had agreed to the division under the mistaken belief that a valuable spring on the property was included in the portion taken by him, which belief was induced by the acts and conduct of the defendant. The complainant, however, failed to show that the defendant knew that the spring would not be included within the lines of the property set off to complainant, or that he made any representations to that effect, and it appeared that both parties surveyed the property together, and hence one had as good an opportunity to judge of the lines thereof as had the other. The court remarked that had there been proof that defendant knew the spring would fall within his lines, and concealed this knowledge from the complainant at the time the partition was made, the complainant would have been entitled to relief; and the doctrine was asserted that "each party to a contract is bound to disclose to the other all he may know respecting the subject-matter, materially affecting a correct view of it, unless common observation would have furnished the information; not disclosing facts within the knowledge of one, and not the other, would in equity be esteemed a concealment which is both immoral and unjust."

No legal or moral obligation rests upon a purchaser of real estate to inform the seller that there is talk, or even a prospect, of a railroad coming upon or near the land, although he knows that such fact would greatly enhance the value of the land, and hence the vendor is not entitled to rescind the conveyance on the theory that the concealment of this fact constituted a fraud upon him. Burt v. Mason, 97 Mich. 127, 56 N. W. 365.

That purchasers of land were agents and in the employ of a railroad, by virtue of which fact they had knowledge that a railroad would be constructed so near the property purchased as to greatly enhance its value, which information they did not disclose to the vendor, does not constitute a fraud upon their part which will entitle the vendor to damages. Boyd v. Leith, (Tex. Civ. App.) 50 S. W. 618.

A vendee of real estate is entitled in ejectment to enforce his contract for the purchase thereof, and it is no defense that, at the time he secured the contract he knew that a large manufacturing plant intended to locate near the property, thereby greatly enhancing its value, and concealed this fact from the vendor. Guaranty, Safe Deposit, & T. Co. v. Liebold, 207 Pa. 399, 56 Atl. 951. To the same effect is Standard Steel Car Co. v. Stamm, 207 Pa. 418, 56 Atl. 954.

A vendor of real estate is not entitled to rescind a conveyance thereof on the ground of fraud practised upon her by the vendee, where the only fraud alleged was the fact that she did not know her property was rapidly increasing in value by reason of improvements in a near by city, which fact the vendee had knowledge of and concealed from her, since whatever moral or ethical duty may have rested on the vendee to furnish the vendor such information, except in special instances where a confidential relation exists, he is under no legal obligation to do so. Ordinarily, a purchaser having superior judgment of

II. Where purchaser seeks specific performance.

There is much conflict of opinion as to the distinction between the rights of the vendor and vendee where either party is seeking a rescission of a contract for the conveyance of real estate, or damages for fraud in procuring such a contract, and where the relief sought is the specific performance of the contract.

The rule generally prevails that, in order to rescind a contract for the sale of real estate, or to recover damages for fraudulent representations in procuring same, the party seeking such relief must allege and prove all the elements which constitute the fraud. In many jurisdictions, however, it has been asserted that this rule does not apply to actions for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate, and it is said that such actions are equitable in their nature and appeal to the discretion of a court of equity, and the court will not exercise its discretionary powers to compel a specific performance where the contract is at all tainted with fraud, or is unfair, or there has been a concealment of facts, together with an inadequate consideration. On the other hand, in other jurisdictions the rule prevails that it requires the same degree of proof of fraud as a defense to an action for the specific performance of a contract as is necessary for affirmative relief by way of rescission. While in still other jurisdictions a rule is asserted not as rigorous supra; 1 Bigelow, Fr. 436; Zilke v. Woodley, supra.

Haselton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The oratrix in this cause, a resident of Worcester, Massachusetts, sets out in her bill as amended that, at a time named, she was the owner in fee simple of a farm in Randolph, in this state; that she purchased the farm for the use of a relative, and had herself never been in Randolph, and had never seen the farm, and was ignorant of its true value; that there was and is an undeveloped and valuable granite quarry in and under the pasture of the farm, but that at the time named she had no knowledge of such quarry. She further sets out that at the time in question, which was October 22, 1908, the defendant Beedle called upon her in Worcester, and stated that he desired to buy the pasture men-as the latter rule, and not as liberal as the former.

It is not the purpose of this note to discuss these different rules, although cases are included which involve the right of a purchaser of real estate to the specific performance of his contract of purchase, as affected by fraudulent representations or concealment by him of facts affecting the value thereof.

In Livingston v. Peru Iron Co. 2 Paige, 390, this distinction was made, and it was said that the simple suppression by the buyer of a fact materially enhancing the value of the property is not sufficient to set aside the sale on the ground of fraud, but that the rule is different where the purchaser applies to a court of equity to enforce the specific performance of an agreement, as in such a case a court will not enforce a specific performance of the contract if the complainant has intentionally concealed a material fact from the adverse party, the disclosure of which would have prevented the making of the agreement.

In Clitherall v. Ogilvie, 1 Desauss. Eq. 250, misrepresentations as to value, where made by a purchaser of real estate who was familiar with the land, and was a man of experience, were held sufficient to justify the court in refusing to enforce a contract for sale made by the seller in reliance upon such representations, where the seller was a young man inexperienced, and had just reached his majority.

To the same effect is Bowman v. Irons, 2 Bibb, 78, 4 Am. Dec. 686, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 312, wherein the court refused specifically to enforce a contract for the sale of land, where the purchaser concealed from the vendor the fact that there was salt water upon the land, which fact greatly enhanced its value, the property at the time of the contract for its sale, by reason of this fact, being actually worth £600 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) to £1,000, whereas it was supposed to have been worth only about £100.

A purchaser of real estate living near it and possessing knowledge of its value superior to that of the vendor, who lives in another state, a considerable distance therefrom, who makes misstatements of its value and of facts affecting its value to the vendor, and thereby secures a contract for a conveyance of the property at a price much less than its value, commits a fraud upon the vendor entitling him successfully to defend a suit by the purchaser for the specific enforcement of the contract. Swimm v. Bush, 23 Mich. 99.

So, in Merritt v. Wassenich, 49 Fed. 785, the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate was denied the purchaser where his agent, in procuring the contract, had made false representations to the vendor as to conditions existing which would affect the value of the property, and also as to the value of the property itself, the agent residing in the locality of the property, while the vendor resided at a considerable distance therefrom.

And in Kelley v. Sheldon, 8 Wis. 258, the court refused specifically to enforce, in behalf of the purchaser, a contract for the sale of real estate, where the vendor resided a considerable distance therefrom, and the purchaser visited the land before buying, and at the time of the purchase misrepresented the value thereof and the value of land in that vicinity.

But specific performance will not be defeated because a purchaser of land knew that a railroad had been constructed in the vicinity of the land, and he did not inform the vendor of that fact, the latter being ignorant thereof, even though the construction of the railroad added to the value of the land. Whitted v. Fuquay, 127 N. C. 68, 37 S. W. 141. A. G. S.

tioned, and that she told him that she did not know the value of the pasture apart from the farm; that thereupon the defendant Beedle told her that the pasture was poor and of comparatively little value; that it adjoined some land that belonged to him, and that the only way of access to the pasture was over his land, and that it annoyed him and his family to have his land gone over for such access, and that that was the only reason why he desired to purchase the pasture. The oratrix alleges that she thereupon asked Mr. Beedle to consult with one Thayer, who was her attorney, and that Mr. Beedle thereupon called upon Thayer and represented that the pasture was worth not more than $400, and that he was familiar with the value of lands in Randolph; that he repeated to Thayer, as his sole reason for wishing to buy the pasture, the reason which he had given to the oratrix; that Beedle further represented to Thayer that he had no plan or scheme in regard to the purchase of the land other than he had stated, and that he represented to the attorney that the fair value of the entire farm was $4,000.

The oratrix alleges that the defendant Beedle acted in partnership with the defendant Thomas in the purchase of the farm, and in the negotiations in respect thereto, and that in those regards he was the agent of the defendant Thomas; that he made the representations stated in behalf of himself and of the defendant Thomas; and the oratrix further alleges that the defendants knew of the existence of the granite quarry, and knew that she was ignorant of its existence, that the representations made as above stated were false, and were known to the defendants to be false, and were fraudulently made for the purpose of inducing her to sell the farm to the defendants at a price much less than its true value, and for the purpose of inducing her to forbear inquiry as to the existence and value of the granite quarry, and as to the value of the farm as affected thereby; that the pasture was not, as represented, of little value, $400, but $15,000; that the reason of the desired purchase was not that given, but that the existence of the quarry was such reason, and that the defendants had a plan or scheme in regard to the purchase of the land, which was to develop the quarry, or to sell the farm at a great price by reason of the quarry, and that $4,000, was not the fair value of the farm, but that it was of much greater value, of the value of $20,000. The oratrix further alleges that she relied upon the representations made to her and her attorney, and that, in reliance thereon, and not otherwise, on the day named she gave the defendant Beedle an option to purchase the entire farm for $4,000, and that about a month thereafter, at the request of the defendant Beedle, and in reliance upon the representations already set forth, she deeded the farm to the defendants. The oratrix alleges that, in reliance upon the representations made, as stated, she was induced to forbear, and did forbear, inquiry as to the real value of the farm, and as to the existence or value of the quarry, and that she would not have sold the farm as she did if she had known of the existence of the quarry. The oratrix tenders the defendants the purchase price of the farm, and prays that they may be ordered to reconvey the farm free of encumbrance, upon payment to them of the purchase price. Other prayers appropriate to the special relief sought are made, and the bill contains a prayer for general relief. The defendants answering, deny the material allegations of the bill, and incorporate into their answer a demurrer to the bill. The case was heard on the demurrer, and, after allowing amendments, the court of chancery sustained the demurrer, adjudged the bill insufficient, and decreed that it be dismissed, with costs to the defendants. The oratrix appealed. Some of the allegations of the bill are made on information and belief, but there is a distinction between such allegations and allegations of information and belief merely, and the averments on information and belief are of things which may properly be pleaded in that way. So, the recitals hereinbefore made are to be taken as true. Watkins v. Childs, 80 Vt. 99, 66 Atl. 805, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1123; Quinn v. Valiquette, 80 Vt. 434, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 962, 68 Atl. 515.

In an early Pennsylvania case cited by the defendants, it is said that "concealment on the part of the vendee is a novel objection." But the question presented has, in its various aspects, been discussed for many centuries. Cicero puts the case of one who buys for a trifle gold which the seller, in his ignorance, supposed to be brass, and he moots similar questions regarding sales of personal property and of real estate as well. But we pass over the discussions of the ethical writers and the civilians,—discussions which are in some cases luminous and in others obscure. It has long been settled in common-law jurisdictions that, in general, the mere failure of a buyer to disclose something extrinsic or intrinsic to the thing bought, known to him, and not known to the seller, is not in legal sense fraud. Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Bro. Ch. 420; Harris v. Tyson, 24 Pa. 347, 64 Am. Dec. 661, 14 Mor.

Min. Rep. 634; Smith v. Beatty, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 456, 40 Am. Dec. 435.

In Laidlaw v. Organ, 2 Wheat. 178, 4 L. ed. 214, it appeared that in February, 1815, the defendant got, through private sources, news of our treaty of peace with England, of which the plaintiffs were ignorant, and that, without disclosing the news, the defendant bought of the plaintiffs 111 hogshead of tobacco, the price of which was greatly enhanced by news of the peace. It appeared that the plaintiffs inquired, in the course of the transaction, if there was any news calculated to enhance the value of tobacco, and that no reply was made to their inquiry. In the district court it was held, as matter of law, that there could be no recovery. Chief Justice Marshall in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court said: "The question in this case is whether the intelligence of extrinsic circumstances which might influence the price of the commodity, and which was exclusively within the knowledge of the vendee, ought to have been communicated by him to the vendor. The court is of opinion that he was not bound to communicate it. It would be difficult to circumscribe the contrary doctrine within proper limits where the means of intelligence are equally accessible to both parties. But, at the same time, each party must take care not to say or do anything tending to impose upon the other." In accordance with these views the court held that in the circumstances disclosed it was a question of fact whether any imposition was practised by the vendee upon the vendor, and so the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded. This case arose in Louisiana, and in view of the eminence of the reporter, the fact should be noted that he puts at the head of the case the designation "local law." But the opinion of the court is based on no principles peculiar to the civil law there prevailing, and indeed makes no reference to the civil law. The reversal in that case was, in view of the silence of the party benefited by the contract, an extreme course. It is so commented on in Lapish v. Wells, 6 Me. 188, and in Bayard v. Shunk, 1 Watts & S. 92, 37 Am. Dec. 441.

In Paddock v. Strobridge, 29 Vt. 470, there is a dictum by Chief Judge Redfield to the effect that the disposition of the case was unwarranted. The Paddock Case, however, fully recognizes the doctrine of negative deceit, and that there is a wide field for the application of the principle that in some circumstances the suppression of a truth may be equivalent to the assertion of a falsehood. It may be noted that we have it upon unimpeachable authority that Judge Redfield's opinion in Paddock v. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Strobridge, supra, was prepared by way of dissent, and that by mistake it happened to get printed as the opinion of the court. R. Dig. 125, Vt. Dig. Advance Sheets, 445. However, this court has since referred to the case as a leading one in this state. Maynard v. Maynard, 49 Vt. 297, 300. In Etting v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat. 59, 6 L. ed. 419, a case which went to the Supreme Court from the circuit court of Maryland, Laidlaw v. Organ, supra, was cited in argument, and the effect of the concealment or suppression of material facts by one party to a contract was the main question under discussion; but, as the justices were equally divided in regard to the aspect of the question presented in the case, the opinion contributes nothing to the subject, and the case is of interest chiefly for the abstract of the arguments of counsel, of Mr. Webster and Mr. Taney on the one side, and of Mr. Wirt and Mr. Emmett on the other. Laidlaw v. Organ had to do with extrinsic circumstances affecting the market value of the thing purchased. The matter of something intrinsic in the thing itself is here involved, and in a case decided a few years later than Laidlaw v. Organ, Lord Eldon, in a carefully considered case, gave expression to the law here applicable. He said: "If an estate is offered for sale, and I treat for it knowing that there is a mine under it, and the other party makes no inquiry, I am not bound to give him any information of it; he acts for himself, and exercises his own sense and knowledge. But a very little is sufficient to affect the application of that principle. If a word, if a single word, be dropped which tends to mislead the vendor, that principle will not be allowed to operate." Turner v. Harvey, Jacob, 169, 178.

In Walters v. Morgan, 3 De G. F. & J. 718, Lord Chancellor Campbell expressed his full concurrence in the doctrine of Turner v. Harvey, and said that not only a single word but "a nod or a wink or a shake, of the head, or a smile from the purchaser," might defeat the application of the principle that mere reticence on the part of a purchaser does not in law amount to fraud. In Livingston v. Peru Iron Co. 2 Paige, 390, Chancellor Walworth expresses his approval of what was said by Lord Eldon in Turner v. Harvey, and applies the doctrine in the case before him, which was this: One of the defendants had found out that there was a valuable mine on lands of Livingston, which were remote from the latter's residence. Thereupon, he represented to Livingston that the land was of no value except for a sheep pasture. By these representations Livingston was thrown off his guard, and contracted to sell the premises in question at the usual price of pasture land in the region where it was located, and did not inquire as to its true value, although he had an agent near the premises. It was held that the purchaser was guilty of fraudulent deception which equity would take notice of and act upon. The case, however, turned upon another point. The doctrine with respect to the legal duty of a vendee to refrain from deceitful statements with respect to the property of the vendor is firmly maintained in well-considered cases. Haygarth v. Wearing, L. R. 12 Eq. 320; Mountain v. Day, 91 Minn. 249, 97 N. W. 883. In the latter case the syllabus by the court is this: "An action will lie for fraudulent representations made by the prospective purchaser of land as to its value and condition; the land being at a distance from the place of purchase, and the vendor being ignorant as to its condition and value, and relying upon the truthfulness of such representations."

We have thus far referred to no cases in which a confidential relation existed, but only to cases in which it was deemed that the parties dealt at arm's length. In Mallory v. Leach, 35 Vt. 156, 82 Am. Dec. 625, it appeared that the defendant desired to purchase certain stock of the plaintiff, a woman, that he knew that she was ignorant of its value, and that, for the purpose of getting her stock at less than its value, he told her a half truth of a damaging character about the stock, and suppressed facts which necessarily qualified the effect of what he did disclose, and that so he succeeded in purchasing the stock at a price much less than its true value. It was held by the supreme court that there were confidential relations between the parties, and that, in view of such relations, the course of the defendant was fraudulent and actionable. It is difficult to say from the charge of Judge Pierpoint, who tried the case below, and whose charge was sustained, that the existence of confidential relations, in any proper sense, was made essential to recovery by the plaintiff, and the opinion of the supreme court, written by Judge Aldis, contains a dictum in accordance with which recovery might have been had irrespective of the existence of a confidential relation. Bigelow in his work on Frauds (vol. 1, pp. 504, 505) states this case in his text without reference to the evidence of a confidential relation, but in a note refers to that matter, and says: "The result must have been the same without that."

Unfairness and fraud may be collected from a variety of circumstances, and it is ordinarily enough to establish fraud that a vendee has actively attempted to ensnare, and has in fact ensnared, the vendor into the making of an unconscionable contract. Where concealment of an essential thing is effected by an industrious course of misleading and deceptive talk or conduct, there is fraud against which equity will relieve. The law distinguishes between passive concealment and active concealment. Where one has full information, and represents that he has, if he discloses a part of his information only, and by words or conduct leads the one with whom he contracts to believe that he has made a full disclosure, and does this with intent to deceive and overreach, and to prevent investigation, he is guilty of fraud against which equity will relieve, if his words and conduct, in consequence of reliance upon them bring about the result which he desires. The jurisdiction of courts of equity to relieve against active and effective fraud is so essential to the administration of justice therein that such courts often, indeed to use the language of Chief Justice Crew, as reported by Sir William Jones, will "take hold of a twig or twine thread to uphold it." We have in this state several cases to the effect that, even where there is no confidential relation, one party to a sale may, without direct misrepresentation, be guilty of fraud by means of words or acts calculated and intended to produce a false impression, and which do in fact deceive and induce the sale. Howard v. Gould, 28 Vt. 523, 67 Am. Dec. 728; Graham v. Stiles, 38 Vt. 578; Chamberlin v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 247, 257, 9 Atl. 832.

In the case before us the positive representation mainly relied upon as fraudulent related to value. Such a representation is ordinarily a matter of opinion, and is not deemed fraudulent. But it may be otherwise. If it is made as an assertion of fact, and with the purpose that it shall be so received, and it is so received, it may amount to a fraud. A statement of value may be of such a character, may be so made and intended, and so received, as to constitute fundamental misrepresentation. Belka v. Allen, 82 Vt. 456, 74 Atl. 91; Stone v. Robie, 66 Vt. 245, 29 Atl. 257; Howard v. Edgell, 17 Vt. 9; Brown v. Sawyer, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 130; Hetland v. Bilstad, 140 Iowa, 411, 118 N. W. 422; 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 922. Here some of the allegations are that the defendant Beedle represented that the pasture in question was worth no more than $400, and the entire farm not more than $4,000, that he lived near the land in question, and represented that he knew the value of lands in that vicinity, whereas in fact the so-called pasture, the thing coveted, was worth thirty or forty times the value stated, because of the undeveloped granite quarry of which the defendants had knowledge, and of which the oratrix, who had never seen the farm, was, to the knowledge of the defendants ignorant. The bill, too, sets out that the representations as to value, accompanied with false representations as to the accessibility of the land and the object of the purchase, calculated to allay suspicion and to ward off inquiry and investigation; and here the statements of value, put forth as based on knowledge and accompanied with the talk set forth at length in the earlier part of this opinion, were fraudulent representations. They were calculated and intended to impose upon the oratrix, and to enforce the conviction that what was in fact a valuable tract of quarry land was a mere pasture, and a poor pasture at that, and to lead the oratrix into selling something which she did not know she was selling.

Pollock in his work on Contracts, after treating of misrepresentation and fraud in ordinary cases of sales, adds: "All this proceeds on the supposition that the vendor's property and title are best known to himself, as almost always is the case. But the position of the parties may be reversed. A person who has become the owner of a property he knows very little about may sell it to a person well acquainted with it, and in that case a material misrepresentation by the purchaser makes the contract, and even an executed conveyance pursuant to it, voidable at the vendor's option." Williston's Wald's Pollock on Contracts, 670. The case cited as authority for this proposition is one in which the false representations of the purchaser related to the question of value.

It is urged in behalf of the defendant that it does not appear from the allegations of the bill how the oratrix was in any way hindered or prevented from ascertaining the existence of the quarry and the value of the pasture and the farm. The allegation in the bill is that the oratrix was induced to forbear inquiry in those respects, and the bill sets out with sufficient particularity how she was so induced.

It is further urged that since the conveyance was made in pursuance of an option, and since the oratrix forbore investigation in the interval between the option and the deed, she is in no position to maintain the bill. But the bill alleges that the same fraudulent representations and active concealment on which the oratrix relied in giving the option, and which induced her to give the option, were relied on by her in giving the deed, and induced her to forbear investigation before so doing.

It is made a ground of demurrer that the bill is inconsistent in that it alleges both that the granite quarry is of great value, and also that it is undeveloped; and it is said that there can be no such thing as an undeveloped quarry of great value, and that the court should take judicial notice that such is the fact; and Webster's definition of a quarry, to the effect that a quarry is a place whence stone is taken, is quoted. But in the bill the word "quarry" is modified by the word "undeveloped," and the phrase "an undeveloped granite quarry" naturally signifies a place from which granite may be taken. An undeveloped quarry is like an undeveloped mine, and in the cases cited on both sides the courts talk very much in the language of the bill. There are no verbal difficulties here.

It is urged that the oratrix ought not to have relied upon the representations of the defendants, though such representations were fraudulent, because actual knowledge of their falsity could have been obtained by due diligence and inquiry, and that to afford the oratrix relief would encourage culpable negligence. The Vermont cases relied on to support this claim are the following: McDaniels v. Bank of Rutland, 29 Vt. 230, 70 Am. Dec. 406; Durkee v. Durkee, 59 Vt. 70, 8 Atl. 490; Ripton v. McQuivey, 61 Vt. 76, 17 Atl. 44. But these were cases where there was no fraud or circumvention, and it is not for courts of equity to relieve a party from the mere results of his own carelessness, negligence, or laches not induced by the conduct of the other party. Hyde v. Hyde, 50 Vt. 301; Freeman v. Holt, 51 Vt. 538; Francis v. Parks, 55 Vt. 80; Bishop v. Allen, 55 Vt. 423.

But if a party is led to forbear inquiry by false representation as to matters material, and not collateral, intentionally made with knowledge of their falsity for the purpose of inducing such forbearance, or by fraudulent artifice or deceitful maneuvers resorted to with the like knowledge and purpose, upon which he in fact relies, the question of whether a careful and prudent man would have been misled in like circumstances is immaterial. Chamberlin v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 247, 256, 9 Atl. 832; Chamberlain v. Rankin, 49 Vt. 133; Delaney v. Brown, 72 Vt. 344, 47 Atl. 1067; Kendall v. Wilson, 41 Vt. 567. The case last cited grew out of a transaction the memory of which is still green in a section of the state. The plaintiffs therein bought a machine called "Leache's curious invention called perpetual motion," which was in fact a machine operated by deftly concealed clockwork. It was held that the plaintiffs were not as matter of law chargeable with knowledge that they were buying a humbug. "For," said Judge Steele in delivering the opinion of the court, "the law will afford relief even to the simple and credulous who have been duped by art and falsehood." Still more emphatic is the language of Judge Taft, speaking for the court, in Chamberlin v. Fuller, above cited.

The doctrine of the cases just above cited is now clearly discerned, though there has been some confusion about it. Bigelow, after adverting to this confusion, says: "It matters not, it has well been declared, that a person misled may be said in some loose sense to have been negligent (in reality negligence is beside the case where the misrepresentation was calculated to mislead, and did mislead); for it is not just that a man who has deceived another should be permitted to say to him. 'You ought not to have believed or trusted me,' or 'You were yourself guilty of negligence.'" "Nor," continues this textwriter, "is the rule applicable merely to cases which in some respects stand upon special grounds, e. g., suits for specific performance; it applies to rescission equally, and indeed is a general rule." 1 Bigelow, Fr. 524, 525. The doctrine inconsistent with that which has been declared by this court is said by the writer last quoted to be dead in England, if it ever existed there, and to be moribund in this country. His exact words are not quoted, for they are not at the moment of writing at hand.

So, Sir Frederick Pollock says: "In the case of active misrepresentation, it is no answer, in proceedings either for damages or for setting aside the contract, to say that the party complaining of the misrepresentation had the means of making inquiries,"—and he quotes the principle that "no man can complain that another has too implicitly relied on the truth of what he has himself stated." Williston's Wald's Pollock on Contracts, 693, 694. In a House of Lords case this principle was thus declared by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford: "When once it is established that there has been any fraudulent misrepresentation or wilful concealment by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it, to tell him that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry. He has a right to retort upon his objector, 'You, at least, who have stated what is untrue, or have concealed the truth for the purpose of drawing me into a contract, cannot accuse me of want of caution because I relied implicitly upon your fairness and honesty.'" Central R. Co. v. Kisch, L. R. 2 H. L. 99, 120, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 759. This is the expression of no obscurantist. The bare statement proves itself. It expresses a doctrine the soundness of which the sages and votaries of the common law per- 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) ceive, not always altogether clearly, but with a vision which sufficed. Any different doctrine carried to its logical conclusion would facilitate transactions in gold bricks, salted mines, bogus diamonds as real, facsimiles as originals, and would permit a variety of things destructive of commercial integrity. The maxim which requires a party to a trade to look out for himself has a wise and broad application. We would not traduce it, or deny to it the legitimate application to which it is entitled. But it cannot be permitted that that maxim should be so construed as to portray the law in caricature, and to render it an instrument of craft, a tool of fraud, a tailman of injustice, a key by the use of which one man may plunder another. For the commerce of the world is promoted, not by cunning, but by such wisdom as is consistent with that good faith which underlies everything in the social order that has stability.

Whether in a given case a party did rely upon the misrepresentations of another, instead of upon his own judgment and knowledge, or means of knowledge, is a question of fact to be determined upon a hearing; and where the allegations are such as are here made, a defendant cannot prevail on demurrer. Whitton v. Goddard, 36 Vt. 730; Hoyt v. Hanbury (Shields v. Hanbury) 128 U. S. 584, 32 L. ed. 565, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 176.

The result is that the decree sustaining the demurrer and adjudging the bill insufficient is reversed, and the case is remanded.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

DANIEL P. BALDWIN, Appt.,

v.

MATTHEW MORONEY et al.

(173 Ind. 574, 91 N. E. 3.)

Tax — drainage assessment.

1. The making of assessments for drainage improvements is an exercise of the power of taxation.

Same — displacing mortgage lien.

2. A statute making a drainage assessment take priority over existing mortgages,

Note. — Superiority of lien of local assessment over prior lien.

This note is supplementary to a note to Seattle v. Hill, 35 L.R.A. 372, having the same title. It deals with local assessments as distinct from general taxes. The question as to the rights and duties as between vendor and vendee in paying assessments is without the scope of the note, and is not discussed. As to whether life tenant or remainderman must bear the cost of a public improvement, see note to Meador v. Goldsmith, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 342. As to effect upon an assessment levied for without notice to the mortgagees out of possession, does not deprive them of their property without due process of law.

Same — obligation of contract.

3. The obligation of the contract of a mortgagee is not impaired by the passage of a drainage law providing that the assessment upon the property shall have priority over the mortgage, without requiring notice of the assessment to be given the mortgagee.

Appeal — cross errors — consideration.

4. Cross assignments of error will not be considered where appellees ask an affirmance of the judgment, which can be done without considering them.

(March 9, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cass County in defendants' favor in a suit to foreclose certain real-estate mortgages and to enjoin the assertion against the real estate described public improvements, of the subsequent condemnation of the property for other city purposes, see Re Spring Valley Park, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834. As to personal liability of the property owner to pay assessments for local improvements, see note to Brookings v. Natwick, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1259.

Power of legislature to make special assessments superior to other prior liens.

Both taxes and special assessments for local improvements are levied under the sovereign power of the state, and under the theory that they are for the general good. The same means may be given for their enforcement. As, therefore, the legislature has the constitutional power to declare that taxes shall be a lien on land prior to all other liens, so it has the power to declare that special assessments shall be a lien prior to all other liens of a private nature, even though they may have attached before the assessment was made.

Thus, the legislature may make the lien of a special assessment superior to a prior mortgage. Wilson v. California Bank, 121 Cal. 630, 54 Pac. 119; *Weinreich v. therein of any lien for certain ditch assessments. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Gamble, and McConnell, Jenkines, Jenkines, & Stuart for appellant.

Messrs. Myers & Yarlott for appellees.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Suit by appellant against appellees for strict foreclosure of certain mortgages, and that they be forever barred and enjoined from asserting any lien on the real estate described in said mortgages for a ditch assessment against the same, under the ditch law approved March 7, 1891 (Acts 1891, pp. 455-467), being §§ 5690-5717, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901. After issues were formed, the case was tried by the court, a special finding of facts made, and conclusions of law stated thereon in favor of

Under a constitutional provision that the school fund shall "remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated to the support and encouragement of the public, or common, schools," and that "no law shall ever be made authorizing said fund to be diverted to any other use," the legislature cannot constitutionally authorize a municipality to make a special assessment a lien superior to that of a mortgage in which such school fund had been invested; at least, it will not be deemed that the municipality has been given such power, without a clear and unmistakable expression of the legislative will: and such power will not be deemed to be given by a charter provision that assessment of benefits "shall be a lien upon the land on account of which they were assessed." State v. Kilburn, supra.

—by statute subsequent to creation of prior lien.

It is within the power of the legislature not only to make the lien of a special assessment prior to mortgages given after appellees, and that said ditch tax was a prior and paramount lien to the lien of said mortgages, and rendered judgment against appellant.

It appears from the special finding that a proceeding was commenced before the board of commissioners of Cass county in 1893, under the drainage law approved March 7, 1891, known as the "5-mile drainage law" (Acts 1891, pp. 455-467; §§ 5690-5717, Burns's 1901). Such proceedings were had that said drain was established by said board of commissioners in all respects as provided in said act, and the same was constructed pursuant to and in conformity with said proceedings and as required by said act. That before the enactment of said "5-mile drainage law" of 1891, and before said ditch proceedings were commenced, appellant was the owner of two mortgages executed by one Hale and his wife on certain real estate in said Cass county, owned by said Hale, to secure his promissory notes calling for $7,500. The real estate described in said mortgages was assessed with benefits for the construction of said ditch. All the owners of the lots and parcels of land affected by said proposed drain were notified of said proceedings in all respects as required by said drainage law. No summons or other process was served on appellant notifying him of such proceedings, nor was he named as a party thereto, but his mortgagor, Hale, who was then in possession of the mortgaged premises, as owner thereof, after he was served with notice of said proceedings and before the day fixed for the hearing of said petition and report, personally notified appellant of the pendency of said ditch proceeding, and that said real estate was assessed with benefits. Said appellant was at that time, and ever since has been, a resident of said Cass county, and has, at all times since said notice was given the passage of a statute giving such liens superiority over prior mortgages, but even to give such liens priority over mortgages given before the passage of such a statute. German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ramish and Murphy v. Beard, supra.

And such act of the legislature is not open to the objection that it impairs the obligation of a contract. German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ramish, supra.

Nor is it in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Ibid.

In discussing its reasons for this conclusion, the court, in Murphy v. Beard, supra, said: "The ownership in fee of the the real estate affected by such uses, while a vested right, is not more sacred than the right of the public to appropriate such real estat to such uses. When ownership is acquired, it is necessarily with the implied understanding that it is subject to this paramount right of the public. . . .

Treating the appellant's security as a vested right, we may ask, Is it more potent against the rights of the public than the ownership of the land itself? Certainly not." And, again, the court said: "If the gravel road enhanced the value of the security, and it is upon the presumption that it did that the assessment was authorized and was made, it is only equitable to charge the assessment against the land senior to the mortgage; and if the power to do so were denied, the necessary functions of government exercised under the powers of eminent domain could be obstructed and practically defeated by the execution of liens by the property owner opposed to public improvements."

It was held in Sinking Fund Comrs. v. Linden Twp. 40 N. J. Eq. 27, that a statute allowing a reassessment because a former one was defective, and providing that from and after the filing of the map and report on such reassessment, the assessments shall be and remain a lien upon each lot of property assessed, until they shall be paid and satisfied notwithstanding any devise, descent, or alienation thereof, or any judgment, mortgage, or encumbrance thereon, is constitutional; and assessments made on such reassessment take precedence over a mortgage given after the original defective assessment, but before the enactment of the statute permitting the reassessment.

The legislature may constitutionally make the property of a street car company liable to a lien for the cost of paving between its tracks, and make such lien superior to a mortgage given, prior to the passage of the statute, where the Constitution provided that "no irrevocable or uncontrollable grant of special privileges or immunities shall be made, but all privileges and franchises granted by the legislature or created under its authority shall be subject to the control thereof." Storrie v. Houston City Street R. Co. 92 Tex. 129, 44 L.R.A. 716, 46 S. W. 796.

Where statute does not expressly give preference over pre-existing liens.

In the absence of statutory authority on the subject, the lien of a special assessment will not be superior to that of a lien of a private nature prior in time. State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 252, 20 N. E. 144; Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700; Pierce v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 131 Ind. 284, 31 N. E. 68; State ex rel. Vawter v. Loveless, 133 Ind. 600, 33 N. E. 622; Morey v. Duluth, 75 Minn. 221, 77 N. W. 829; Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Lincoln, 61 Neb. 109, 84 N. W. 802; Shaler v. McAleese, 73 N. J. Eq. 536, 68 Atl. 416; Bellevue v. Umstead, supra.

But the intention of the lawmaking power to give priority to a municipal lien for local improvements over contract liens of individuals may be implied from the lan-him by said Hale, had actual notice and knowledge of said proceedings and of the assessment of benefits against said land. Bonds were sold on the strength of said assessment made for the purpose of paying for the construction of said drain, and the same was finally constructed. Afterwards, to wit, in March, 1905, a judgment and decree of foreclosure of said mortgages in favor of appellant was rendered against said Hale and wife, and afterwards, on June 7, 1905, appellant purchased said land at sheriff's sale under said decree, and on the expiration of one year from said day of sale, received a sheriff's deed therefor. Afterwards this action was brought by appellant for a strict foreclosure of said mortgages against appellees.

Appellant insists that "as said act of 1891 provides that assessments upon real estate made to pay for the construction of a ditch or drain shall be a first and paramount lien upon the real estate assessed, and does not provide in any manner for notice of any kind to be given to the holder and owners of mortgages in existence and of record at the time such ditch law went into force, it is unconstitutional and void, because in conflict with § 24, art. 1, of the Constitution of Indiana, and with § 1, art. 14, of the Constitution of the United States, which provide that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, and because such statute, as applied to mortgage contracts executed and of record prior to its enactment, impairs the obligation of guage of the law creating the lien, and from the nature and purpose of the lien. Lybass v. Ft. Myers, 56 Fla. 817, 47 So. 346; State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144; Morey v. Duluth, supra (even when the statute does not specifically declare the lien of the assessment paramount).

And it has been held that, to give the lien of the assessment priority, the statute need not expressly declare that the lien of the assessment is paramount to all other liens, if the intent of the legislature to make it so may be gathered from the various provisions read together. Morey v. Duluth, supra; Richmond v. Williams, 102 Va. 733, 47 S. E. 844.

The intent of the legislature to make the lien of a special assessment for sidewalks in a municipality superior to prior liens of a private character attaching subsequent to the passage of the statute may be inferred from a provision in a municipal charter that, upon a lotowner failing to construct or repair a sidewalk in front of his lot, the municipality may do so, and make the cost a lien on the lot, and from a general law providing that in case the lotowner fails to construct or repair the sidewalk, the municipality "may have the same done, which shall be a lien against said lots, which lien may be enforced in the manner prescribed," etc. Lybass v. Ft. Myers, supra.

A special assessment is made superior to a prior mortgage by a statute declaring that "such assessment . . . shall be a lien upon the property so assessed, . . . and shall have precedence over all other liens excepting taxes, and shall not be defeated by any judicial sale." Bloomington v. Phelps, 149 Ind. 596, 49 N. E. 581 (terms of statute given in O'Brien v. Bradley, 28 Ind. App. 487, 61 N. E. 942).

Where, by the terms of its charter, a street railway company is required to pave the space between its tracks, the lien of a special assessment to pay for such paving 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is superior to the lien of a mortgage given before the assessment. Cambria Iron Co. v. Union Trust Co. (Union Trust Co. v. Richmond City R. Co.) 154 Ind. 291, 48 L.R.A. 41, 55 N. E. 745, 56 N. E. 665. The court in the above case said: "The right the appellants seek to enforce is more than a general claim for money, for it is a right blended with the right of the mortgagor to occupy and use the streets, and one which the mortgagees were required to take notice of and estimate in the acceptance of their mortgage. The liability does not rest upon a claim against the mortgagor, but upon the duty which arises out of the occupancy of the streets."

Where it is declared by statute that the lien of a sewer assessment shall remain a lien until fully paid, and shall have precedence over all other liens except taxes, a sale under a precept for the collection of the assessment confers upon the purchaser an incipient title, subject to the statutory right of the owner, or the mortgagee for him, to redeem within the year; and upon execution of the treasurer's deed, the holder thereof will take an absolute estate in fee simple, freed from the right of redemption, his title being unimpeachable and unencumbered. O'Brien v. Bradley, supra.

A lien for a street assessment is by necessary implication given priority in rank to an antecedent mortgage on the property, by a city charter authorizing such assessments, and providing that "a lien is hereby given on the lots, . . . which costs and expenses may be listed and collected as other taxes," although such charter does not expressly declare that they shall be prior in rank to other liens. Dressman v. Farmers' & T. Nat. Bank, 100 Ky. 571, 36 L.R.A. 121, 38 S. W. 1052, followed in Dressman v. Simonin, 104 Ky. 693, 47 S. W. 767, in the case of a sewer assessment.

The lien of a special assessment is made superior to a mortgage prior in time, by a statute providing that the municipal lien shall remain a lien until fully paid and satisfied. Germania Sav. Bank v. Miller, 31 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 16; Richmond v. Williams, supra.

such mortgage contract, and denies to the owner of such mortgage contract due process of law." Appellant also insists that "laws enacted by the legislature for such public improvements as the construction of public highways or drains is not an exercise of the power of taxation."

As to the last contention, it has been held by many courts of last resort that the legislature, in enacting such laws, exercises the sovereign power of taxation. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. pp. 1181-1183; *Fallbrook Irrig. The lien of a special assessment takes precedence over that of a prior mortgage, under a statute providing that assessment shall be a lien from the time of confirmation until paid, notwithstanding any devise, descent, alienation, mortgage, or other encumbrances thereof. *Hand v. The lien of a special assessment is made paramount to all pre-existing mortgages and encumbrances, by a statute providing that "all such assessments . . . shall be and become a first and paramount lien upon the land and real estate so assessed, from the date of confirmation," especially in view of a subsequent specific provision for the redemption of the land sold under the assessment, by any mortgagee or any person having an estate therein. *Shaler v. The lien of a special assessment is given precedence over a prior mortgage, by a statute allowing the municipal authorities to place the unpaid assessment upon the grand duplicate to be collected as other taxes are collected. *Clifton v. The charge for street improvements created by a statute declaring that "until recovery of such expenses and interest, the same shall be a charge on the premises," is not on the interest of the owner of the premises, but on the premises themselves; and hence premises subject to a covenant restricting the owner thereof from building thereon may, for the purpose of satisfying such charge, be ordered to be sold free from such restrictive covenant, although the owners of the dominant estate would be thereby injured. *Tendring Union v. —particular statutes held not to make assessment lien superior.

A statute providing simply that the assessment shall "be a lien from the date of filing the report of the commissioners" does not make the lien of the assessment superior to that of a prior mortgage. State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144.

Nor does a statute providing that the assessment shall be a lien "from the time of filing the petition." Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700.

Nor does a statute containing no provision declaring assessments liens upon the lands benefited, though providing that the assessments made should be placed upon the tax duplicate and collected as "other taxes," etc., but without declaring that they were taxes, and containing no provision for notice to lien holders or to any persons except owners. *Pierce v. Where street improvements are made, and the cost of paving that portion of the same occupied by street railway companies is levied as special assessments against the property of the several street railways as separate properties, and these different street railways are afterwards consolidated and merged into one property, and operated as one street railway system, the old companies losing their individuality and identity, and the new company assuming the burdens and obligations of the constituent companies, it was held, in Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Lincoln, 61 Neb. 109, 84 N. W. 802, that, as between the consolidated company and the municipal authorities levying such special assessments, the liens arising by reason of the several assessments against the different constituent companies and properties attach to the new property owned and operated by the substituted company as one property, in its entirety, and may be enforced by the sale of the property without dismemberment and separating it into fractional properties as it existed before consolidation. But, however, it was also held that where a mortgage was placed upon a street railway property, and afterwards another company against which certain liens for taxes levied as special assessments existed was consolidated with the mortgagor company, the lien of the mortgage on the property covered thereby could not ments, § 708; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1236, 1237, and notes.

It is said in Elliott on Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 599, p. 627: "Everyone who acquires an interest in land takes it subject to the right of the sovereign to lay general taxes upon it, and to impose upon it the burden of paying the expense of public improvements which confer upon the land a special benefit. . . . Statutes giving a lien are remedial, and therefore to be liberally construed, and so construed as to accomplish the legislative purpose. In creating liens for improvement assessments, the legislature makes secure compensation for what is in truth an industrial annexation to the land, for the road or street improved is in a sense an appurtenance of the land without the consent of the mortgagee, be impaired by the agreements and acts of consolidation; and that the tax lien on the property consolidated and merged into the new company and with the property mortgaged could not be made prior to the mortgage lien on all the property after consolidation; that the tax and mortgage liens attached to the specific properties embraced in the levy and the mortgage, respectively; and that the respective liens and their priorities could be preserved only by separating the different properties into their constituent parts as before consolidation, and awarding to each a lien according to priority.

This case was followed in Lincoln v. Lincoln Street R. Co. 67 Neb. 469, 93 N. W. 766.

Under a statutory provision that "no mortgage, conveyance, pledge, transfer, or encumbrance" of the property of a street railway company, "created and suffered by any such company . . . after the time when any street, or part thereof, upon which any such street railway shall have been laid, shall have been ordered paved, repaved, macadamized, or repaired, shall be made or suffered, except subject to the actual or prospective lien of said special taxes, whether actually levied or not, if such levy be in contemplation," the lien of a mortgage attaching to a street railway property before street improvements were projected or in contemplation is prior to the lien of taxes levied thereafter, as special assessments for the costs and expenses of paving the right of way of such street railway, to conform to the improvement of the remainder of the street. Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Lincoln, 61 Neb. 109, 84 N. W. 802; Lincoln v. Lincoln Street R. Co. 67 Neb. 469, 93 N. W. 766.

The court in 61 Neb. 109, supra, quoted and approved also in 67 Neb. 469, supra, said: "By the language used it is contemplated that if the improvement has been projected and is under way, that is, if the street 'shall have been ordered paved,' no lien shall be created except subject to the prospective lien. The language of the statute 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ute excludes the idea that under all circumstances the lien for special assessments shall be superior to all other liens. If force and effect be given to the language of the statute, and the words used be taken in their ordinary and natural meaning, the conclusion is irresistible that an encumbrance placed on the property before street improvements are projected is prior to a lien for special assessments levied thereafter for such improvement.

Superiority as between successive special assessments.

The rule, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, that liens take precedence in order of time, is applicable to successive liens of assessments for local improvements; and this order of priority will not be disturbed or altered, unless expressly provided by statute. Des Moines Brick Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 108 Iowa, 307, 79 N. W. 77; Parker-Washington Co. v. Corcoran (Mo. App.) 129 S. W. 1031.

Such priority is not disturbed by a statute providing that such assessments "shall be a lien upon the property . . . from the commencement of the work, and shall remain a lien until fully paid, and shall have precedence over all other liens, excepting the ordinary taxes, and shall not be devested by any judicial sale." Des Moines Brick Mfg. Co. v. Smith, supra, disapproving Burke v. Lukens, infra.

There is no superiority as between successive assessments of the same property, under a statute providing that "assessments, as made, . . . shall be a lien upon the several lots . . . to the same extent that taxes are a lien upon such property, and shall be collectable in the same way that taxes are collected," and "that delinquent instalments shall be collected in the same manner that delinquent taxes are collected." Brownell Improv. Co. v. Nixon (Ind. App.) 92 N. E. 693, distinguishing Burke v. Lukens, 12 Ind. App. 648, 54 Am. St. Rep. 539, 40 N. E. 641, where it was held that the last assessment for street improvements takes precewhich increases its value. Whoever holds an interest in the land profits by the apportionment, and ought, in justice, to be subjected to the lien, which secures the assessment. It is, for these reasons, often proper to deduce, from the general language of the statute giving a lien, the conclusion that it gives a paramount lien to which mortgage estates or judgment liens must yield."

As the drainage act of 1891 in controversy here provided that the assessment against the lands for the construction of the proposed drain should be "a first and paramount lien upon the real estate assessed in the same manner and form as other taxes," the cases of State ex rel. Vawter v. Loveless, 133 Ind. 600, 33 N. E. 622, Pierce v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 131 Ind. 284, 31 N. E.

dence as a lien over those previously made, under a statute providing that assessments for street improvements" shall be a lien upon the property so assessed, and shall remain a lien until fully paid, and shall have precedence over all other liens excepting taxes."

Superiority as between special assessments and taxes.

It was held in McCullum v. Uhl, 128 Ind. 304, 27 N. E. 152, 725, without referring to any statute, and apparently on general principles, that a tax lien is superior to the lien of a special assessment prior in time.

But a foreclosure of a tax lien will not cut off a lien for a prior assessment, where those interested in the lien of the assessment are not made parties, and they are entitled to enforce it subject to the paramount lien of the tax. Ibid.

The intent of the legislature to make the lien of special assessments subordinate to that of general taxes is shown by a statutory provision that a deed, upon the foreclosure and sale for an assessment, shall "convey the entire title to the property therein described, stripped of all prior liens or claims, excepting unpaid instalments and general taxes." McMillan v. Tacoma, 26 Wash. 358, 67 Pac. 68; Keene v. Seattle, 31 Wash. 202, 71 Pac. 769; State ex rel. Craver v. McConnaughey, 31 Wash. 207, 71 Pac. 770; Ballard v. Way, 34 Wash. 116, 101 Am. St. Rep. 993, 74 Pac. 1067; Pennsylvania Co. v. Tacoma, 36 Wash. 656, 79 Pac. 306; Ballard v. Ross, 38 Wash. 209, 80 Pac. 439.

Where the charter of a city, after making special assessments levied by the city a paramount lien on the real estate, added the proviso "that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect or prejudice the lien of the state for all taxes which have been or may be levied upon such property under the general laws of the state," the lien for a local improvement is subordinate to the lien of the state for taxes levied under the general laws of the state, without reference to the time when the lien

68, State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144, and Cook v. State, 101 Ind. 446, in which it is held that the prior mortgage is superior to the lien of the assessment, are not in point here, because they were decided under a statute which failed to provide that the assessment, should be a first and paramount lien. What is said in the cases named as to the necessity of a provision for notice to the mortgagee was unnecessary to the decision of said cases, and was obiter dicta.

It is expressly provided in the laws concerning taxation that, "in case of mortgaged real estate, the mortgagor shall for the purpose of taxation be deemed the owner, until the mortgagee shall have taken possession of the mortgaged premises, after which accrued. White v. Knowlton, 84 Minn. 141, 86 N. W. 755; White v. Thomas, 91 Minn. 395, 98 N. W. 101.

But although, under such a charter provision, the purchaser of the lien of the state takes it with its right of priority over all the then existing liens of the city for local assessments, without reference to the time when the state lien attached, yet, after the state lien has become the subject of private ownership, the interest of the purchaser in or his lien on the land is subject to all liens of the city for local assessments thereafter attaching. White v. Thomas, supra.

Where a statute declares that the cost of a local improvement shall be a real charge on the property, and that, "it shall be considered and treated as pledged for the amount due; that it shall constitute a lien or privilege upon the abutting property," such lien is not taken away by a subsequent tax deed given for taxes which accrued before the lien of the assessment, where the statute under which the land was sold for taxes provided that "if not redeemed, such record in the conveyance or mortgage office shall operate as a cancellation of all conventional and judicial mortgages," since the lien of a special assessment is neither. Moody v. Sewerage & Water Board, 117 La. 360, 41 So. 649.

It was held in Indianapolis v. City Bond Co. 42 Ind. App. 470, 84 N. E. 20, that the lien of a special assessment is not destroyed by a tax sale and the execution of a tax deed, as the section of a statute which declares that a tax deed, "shall vest in the grantee an absolute estate in fee simple" defines the quality of the estate, and does not release it from valid encumbrances.

Superiority as between special assessments and mortgages due state.

In the absence of statute permitting it, the lien of a municipality for special assessments will not take precedence over a prior mortgage in which the funds of the state are invested. Public Schools v. Shot- the mortgagee shall be deemed the owner." Burns's 1908, § 10176. The statute also requires that real property shall be assessed to the owner if known, if not, then to the occupant if any, and if there be no occupant, then as unknown. Burns's 1908, §§ 10170, 10189.

The laws of this state concerning the assessment of property for general taxation, and the levying and collection of general taxes thereon, make provision for notice to the owner thereof (Burns's 1908, §§ 10255, 10265), and gave him the right to a hearing (Burns's 1908, § 10279), but make no provision for notice to a mortgagee, or for giving him a hearing. If, however, the mortgagee has taken possession of the mortgaged premises under the provisions of the mortgage, he "is deemed the owner," and the said law provides for notice to and a hearing for him as owner.

As lands in this state are not entered on the tax duplicate in the name of the mortgagee, or assessed or taxed in his name, but in the name of "the owner thereof if known, if not, then to the occupant if any, and if no occupant, then as unknown" (Burns's 1908, §§ 10170, 10176, 10189), it is evident from the provisions of § 5692; Burns's 1901, requiring the viewers to show in their report the name of the owner of the land benefited or damaged as the same appears on the tax duplicate at the time, that it was the legislative intent that notice should be given, not to the mere mortgagee, but to the person owning the land as shown well, 45 N. J. Eq. 106, 16 Atl. 308; State Elizabeth, Prosecutor, v. King, 51 N. J. L. 414, 17 Atl. 942 (dictum).

Even though the mortgage was originally owned by a private individual, and assigned to the state, and the assignment was not recorded. Public Schools v. Shotwell, supra.

Precedence is not given to a special assessment levied by a city over a prior mortgage owned by the state, by a statute providing generally that special assessments shall be a first lien in all cases. Ibid.

See also State v. Kilburn, 81 Conn. 9, 129 Am. St. Rep. 205, 69 Atl. 1023, supra, under title, "Power of legislature to make special assessments superior to other prior liens.

Superiority as between special assessments and private mortgages controlled by court.

Special assessments levied by a municipality will not take precedence over prior mortgages held by the chancellor of the state in his official capacity, as security for funds in court which had been loaned on mortgages on the property by order of the court. State, Elizabeth, Prosecutor, v. King, supra; Jersey City v. Foster, 32 N. J. Eq. 825.

Nor is the rule changed because the mortgage is made to an officer of the court designated by the chancellor instead of to the chancellor directly. Jersey City v. Foster, supra.

And purchasers of the property on foreclosure of the mortgage, where the municipality is a party to such foreclosure action, take free from the lien of any special assessment existing at the time of such sale. State, Elizabeth, Prosecutor, v. King, supra.

The reason for the exemption of such mortgage is thus stated by the court in State Elizabeth, Prosecutor, v. King: Cases in our court have established the rule that the same considerations of public policy, founded on expediency, which protect investments of the funds of the state from the hazards of the priority of tax liens, apply 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

with equal force to mortgages taken to secure property which the state, in virtue of its sovereignty, has drawn into its courts, and caused to be invested in the name of the chancellor, as its agent selected for that purpose. It will not permit such investments while in its custody, to be impaired or lost by the acts of other public agents, through the imposition of taxes, assessments, or other rates, for public uses. Hence, mortgages securing them are prior liens on lands and superior to municipal taxes and assessments."

Rights of transferee of assessment lien.

The assignee of a judgment recovered on a municipal lien for a special improvement, given by statute priority over other liens, acquires the same priority which the lien possessed when in the hands of the municipality. Hagemann's Appeal, 88 Pa. 21.

Land subject to the lien of a special assessment does not become exempt from such lien, so as to cut off the purchaser of assessment bonds from his right to foreclose, by a sale of such land to the municipality by the owner of the land. Indianapolis v. City Bond Co. 42 Ind. App. 470, 84 N. E. 20.

Estoppel.

The holder of a mortgage superior to the lien of a special assessment is not estopped to claim priority by merely standing silent and permitting the improvement to be made, or by anything short of a promise to pay or something calculated to deceive, for such conduct on the part of a mortgagee is entirely consistent with a reliance upon the priority of the mortgage lien. Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700.

The title acquired by one who purchased at a judicial sale to enforce the lien of a special assessment made against the lot of one holding the record title, and apparently the absolute owner by virtue of a warranty deed, which in reality was only a mortgage, is superior to that of one claiming under a judicial sale of such lot in a subsequent action to foreclose such mort-by the tax duplicate at the time. In none of the laws of this state providing for the improvement of public highways or for public drains, passed by the legislature in the exercise of the sovereign power of taxation, is there any provision for notice to a mere mortgagee. It is evident that the provisions for notice and hearing as to the benefits and damages and the amounts of the assessments, in the act of 1891, are substantially the same as those customarily followed in this state in proceedings for the assessment and collection of general taxes, and in proceedings under other statutes for the construction of drains and the improvement of public highways. In case notice is necessary, the legislature may provide what notice shall be given and the manner in which it must be given. Carr v. State, 103 Ind. 548, 3 N. E. 375; Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 582, 30 N. E. 700; Porter v. Stout, 73 Ind. 3, 9; Klein v. Tuhey, 13 Ind. App. 74, 76, 40 N. E. 144, and cases cited; Kizer v. Winchester, 141 Ind. 694, 696, 40 N. E. 265; Indianapolis & C. Gravel Road Co. v. State, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316; Swain v. Fulmer, 135 Ind. 8, 12, 34 N. E. 639; Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 199.

It is held in this state that when the statute requires the land to be described in the petition as belonging to the person who appears to be the owner as shown by the "tax duplicate or record of transfers," it is sufficient to serve notice of the assessment on the person named in the petition and on the last tax duplicate. Carr v. State, supra; Kepler v. Wright, 136 Ind. 77, 35 N. E. 1017; Reed v. Kalfsbeck, 147 Ind. 148, 45 N. E. 476, 46 N. E. 466; Poundstone v. Baldwin, 145 Ind. 139, 143, 144, 44 N. E. 191. In Bell v. Cox, 122 Ind. 153, 23 N. E. 705, it is held that persons who have no title of record need not, under the statute, be made defendants to a drainage petition, but, if they have an interest in the land affected, they may come in and defend.

Under a statute which provides that the petition for the location, vacation, or change of a highway shall set forth the names of the owners, occupants, or agents of the lands affected, it is not necessary to make the owner a party, if the occupant or agent is named and made a party. Porter v. Stout, 73 Ind. 3; Ryder v. Horsting, 130 Ind. 104, 16 L.R.A. 186, 29 N. E. 567. In this state the mortgagee has no title to the lands mortgaged, but has merely an encumbrance or lien thereon, and has no right to convey said real estate. Burns's 1908, § 1135. The mortgagee is not entitled to possession of the mortgaged premises, unless the mortgage specially provides that he shall have possession thereof. Burns's 1908, § 1133; Burns's 1901, § 1099; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1086; Jewett v. Tomlinson, 137 Ind. 326, 36 N. E. 1106. The title remains in the mortgagor, the mortgage being a mere security for the debt. Grable v. McCulloch, 27 Ind. 472; Reasoner v. Edmunson, 5 Ind. 393; Francis v. Porter, 7 Ind. 213; Morton v. Noble, 22 Ind. 160; Fletcher v. Holmes, 32 Ind. 497; Lowe v. Turpie, 147 Ind. 652, 676, 677, 37 L.R.A. 233, 44 N. E. 25, 47 N. E. 150, and cases cited; Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Broeker, 166 Ind. 576, 578, 77 N. E. 1092. See also Norwich v. Hubbard, 22 Conn. 587, 594; Great Falls Co. v. Worster, 15 N. H. 412, 434; Glover v. United States, 164 U. S. 294, 41 L. ed. 440, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95; State ex rel. Lewis v. Smith, 158 Ind. 543, 552, 63 L.R.A. 116, 63 N. E. 25, 214, 64 N. E. 18, cited by appellant, approves the rule, but states exceptions thereto. The case before us, however, falls within the rule, and not within any exception.

It has been correctly held that a provision for service of notice on the owner of land to be affected by the drain does not authorize service on mortgagees; that mortgagees do not come within such description of the persons entitled to notice; that the mortgagee is not the owner of the land mortgaged any more than any other lien holder; that he has no such interest in the land as makes notice to him necessary. Kinnie v. Bare, 80 Mich. 345, 45 N. W. 345; Richmond v. Williams, 102 Va. 733, 47 S. E. 844, and cases cited; Ahern v. Board of Im- age. Wilson v. California Bank, 121 Cal. 630, 54 Pac. 119.

In Donohue v. Brotherton, 7 Ohio N. P. 367, a real-estate syndicate on its own account improved a street running through its property, and then mortgaged some lots abutting on the street. In order to raise money to pay the contractors who made the improvements, the syndicate petitioned the village to make the identical improvements which had already been made. The village passed an ordinance to that effect, and assessed the cost against the lots. It was held that, though by estoppel such assessment would be valid as against the real-estate syndicate, yet it was not valid as against the mortgagee, who did not consent to such illegal assessment.

In Hudson Trust & Sav. Inst. v. Carr-Curran Paper Mills Co. 58 N. J. Eq. 59, 43 Atl. 419, it was held that where a city has a lien on a paper mill for water superior to that of a mortgage, and after the mortgagor was a quarter in arrears, was notified by the mortgagee to turn off the water, but did so in such a manner that the mortgagor could easily turn it on again, the city cannot, as against the mortgagee, enforce its lien as to water thereafter furnished.

Conine-Eaton Lumber Co.* 9 Colo. App. 225, 47 Pac. 912. In Richmond v. Williams, supra, appellees in 1889 took a mortgage on certain real estate. In 1892 the general assembly of Virginia passed an act (Acts 1891-92, chap. 312) by which the corporate limits of the city of Richmond were extended so as to include the property on which appellees held the above mortgage. Later the property was assessed for street improvements. The assessment was made under the act which extended the corporate limits of the city of Richmond. The decision of the case turned on the question as to whether or not appellees were owners within the meaning of the act above referred to, and as such entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard. The court held that trust creditors are not owners within the meaning of the act, and neither the city charter nor any other law required that notice should be given them, and that the lien of the city for improvements made was paramount to their prior deed of trust.

Said drainage act of 1891 does not impair the obligation of appellant's mortgages, although enacted after said mortgages were executed, for the reason that said mortgaged real estate was subject to the taxing power as against the mortgagees and lien holders, as well as against the owner. This is true, as everyone must admit, in relation to general taxes, where the only return to the taxpayer is the protection and security which the government gives him, and a fortiori should it be true in the cases of special assessments, where, in theory at least, an adequate and complete return for the money assessed is received in the enhanced value of the estate or property which he owns or to which his lien attaches. Wabash Eastern R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 384, 10 L.R.A. 285, 292, 25 N. E. 781; Seattle v. Hill, 35 L.R.A. 372, 375, and note, page 373 (14 Wash. 487, 45 Pac. 17); Dressman v. Myers, 56 Fla. 817, 47 So. 346; Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 599, p. 627, and cases cited; Elliott, Railroads, 2d ed. § 789.

It is evident that said drainage act of 1891 is not open to the objections that it deprives appellant of his property without due process of law, or that it impairs the obligations of contracts.

What we have said disposes of the controlling questions in the case.

The appellees insist on an affirmation of the case, although they have assigned cross errors. As appellees ask for an affirmation of the judgment, and the case can be affirmed by disposing of the errors assigned by appellant, the court will not decide the questions presented in the assignment of cross error. Feder v. Field, 117 Ind. 386, 20 N. E. 129; Thomas v. Simmons, 103 Ind. 538, 2 N. E. 203, 3 N. E. 381; Kammerling v. Armington, 58 Ind. 384.

Appellant having died since the submission of this cause, the judgment is affirmed as of the date of submission, as provided in § 705, Burns's 1908.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & EL PASO RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

JACOB WERTHEIM.

(— N. M. —, 110 Pac. 573.)

Pleading — denial on information of facts within knowledge.

1. Denial upon information and belief of matters necessarily within the knowledge of the pleader is not permissible.

Same — operation of railroad.

2. In a suit against a railroad company, a denial by such company upon information and belief, that it was operating a railroad at the time and place alleged, being a matter necessarily within defendant's knowledge raises no such issue upon the pleadings as will admit testimony that it was not operating such railroad over an objection that such testimony was not admissible under the pleadings.

Headnotes by POPE, Ch. J.

Note. — Denials upon information and belief, or of knowledge or information sufficient to form belief, as to matters presumptively within pleader's knowledge.

While the courts themselves seem to make no express distinction bearing on the subject, between denials upon information and belief and denials of any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, the form of the plea has been preserved in this note, the first form being indicated by the figure (1) and the second, by the figure (2).

Although denials in one or the other of these qualified forms are, in proper cases authorized in many states, it may be said

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Quay County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for destruction of certain property by fire which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Pope, Ch. J.:

The appellee, Wertheim, sued the appellant railway company for damages. The complaint alleges plaintiff's ownership in the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, township 11 N., range 30 E., New Mexico principal meridian. The following allegation then appeared: "That the defendant now is, and was at the time hereinafter mentioned, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the territory of New Mexico, owning, controlling, and operating a line of railway and a right of way extending across said territory near to said land." It is further alleged that the company negligently and carelessly allowed dried grass and other combustible material to accumulate along the said right of way, over which it was then operating trains, and that it carelessly and negligently allowed sparks to escape from engines operated over its railroad track located on said right of way, and, as a result, said dried grass and combustible materials were set on fire, and same was communicated to the lands of the appellee, with the result that the grass and hay thereon situated were burned and the in general that they cannot properly be employed where the subject-matter of the denial is presumably within the pleader's knowledge.

The use of such denials under the New York Code is well stated in Rochkind v. Perlman, 123 App. Div. 808, 108 N. Y. Supp. 224, 1151, by Gaynor, J., as follows: "Only two forms of denial are permitted, viz.: 'A general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief.' (Code Civ. Proc. § 500.) The so-called denials in this case purport to be under this latter form. It is permitted only out of necessity, to meet certain rare cases where the defendant is honestly without any knowledge or information of allegations of the complaint sufficient to form a belief of them; does not know whether they are true or false, and is therefore unable to positively deny them. In such a case he is permitted to answer that he denies that he has 'any knowledge or information thereof' (i. e., of such allegations) 'sufficient to form a belief' of them, i. e., as to their truth or falsity.

"This prescribed form of denial has to be (1) permissible in the particular case, and (2) followed in all substantial particulars, in order to be good, i. e., not frivolous.

"(a) If the facts alleged in the complaint which are denied by this form of denial are presumptively within the defendant's knowledge, as would be the case of transactions with him personally, for instance, he cannot use such form of denial. It would be a mere evasion, and that the courts will not allow. It was not meant to enable defendants to deny their own personal transactions, but only things which did not come within their personal knowledge. 'The true distinction to be observed in determining when a defendant may avail himself of the privilege accorded to him of answering in the qualified form allowed by the Code, and when he must positively admit' (he is not required to make formal admission of anything under our Code) 'or deny the allegations, is to inquire whether the facts alleged 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

are presumptively within the defendant's knowledge. If they are, he cannot avail himself of this form of denial.'

"(b) Nor may this form of denial be used in a case of intentional ignorance of the defendant when it is his duty, as here, to know or learn the facts, and they are at hand and accessible. The appellants became sureties on a bond to pay the judgment on a mechanics' lien, if the lienors should recover judgment on such lien, and this action is against the appellants on such bond. It was their duty to pay the said judgment when recovered; and when notified of its recovery and called upon to pay it, it was their duty to ascertain if it had been recovered. If a defendant's lack of knowledge or information in such a case arises from his unwillingness or refusal to know the facts, a denial in this form is not permissible. A reading of the complaint and answer would show such denial to be frivolous. Having such knowledge or information at hand, he cannot be permitted to deny that he has it, for he has it, but only shuts his eyes to it. And hence in such a case, 'a party cannot plead ignorance of a public record to which he has access, and which affords him all the means of information necessary to obtain positive knowledge of the facts.'

Pleader's own acts.

The pleader's own acts, in the absence of special circumstances, are held to be within his knowledge, so that he cannot deny them in either of their qualified forms. Hackett v. Richards, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 315 (denial (1) of allegation with defendant, as tenant, allowed premises to remain out of repair, insufficient); Richardson v. Wilton, 4 Sandf. 708 (denial (2) by defendant in action for assault, of allegation that he spit in plaintiff's face, frivolous); Pardi v. Conde, 27 Misc. 496, 58 N. Y. Supp. 410 (denial (1) by attorney for defendant in suit for slander of allegation that defendant uttered words alleged, sham); Lawrence v. Derby, 15 Abb. Pr. 346 (denial (2) in action for false imprisonment, of allegation that defendant caused writ on real estate injured, and plaintiff asked for damages in the sum of $400. The company filed the following answer: "Comes now the defendant in the above styled and numbered cause, and, answering the complaint of the plaintiff last filed herein, says: Defendant on information and belief denies each and every allegation contained in the complaint of the plaintiff filed herein, except only the allegations therein contained to the effect that the defendant is a corporation organized as stated in the said complaint. And defendant further denies that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief, or any part thereof, by him claimed, or to any relief whatsoever." Jury was waived. From a judgment for $100, the company prosecutes this appeal.

which plaintiff was arrested to be issued, sham); Lay Gas Mach. Co. v. Falls of Neuse Mfg. Co. 91 N. C. 74 (denial (2) by defendant as to time when he first complained about machine sold to him by plaintiff insufficient); Sherman v. Boehm, 13 Daly, 42, 15 Abb. N. C. 254 (denial (1) of averments in complaint as to personal transactions between plaintiff and defendant Code, sham); Masti v. Bartholomew, 41 Colo. 328, 92 Pac. 682 (denial (2) in replication to answer setting up fraudulent representations made by plaintiff, insufficient); Knox v. Galligan, 21 Wis. 470 (denial (2) of allegation of defendant's nonpayment of taxes, Code, insufficient); Mills's Estate, 40 Or. 424, 67 Pac. 107 (denial (1) of certain statements alleged to have been made by defendant in presence of several persons, insufficient); Kentucky Coal Min. Co. v. Mattingly, 133 Ky. 526, 118 S. W. 350 (denial (2) by corporation of issuance or delivery of metal checks to employees, not good plea); Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. 845 (denial (1) by directors of mining corporation of allegations that certain persons were officers, that a mine was developed, ore extracted, liabilities incurred, and as to other matters relative to conduct of corporate business, evasive); Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Pullman Co. 122 Ga. 700, 50 S. E. 1008 (answer by corporation that, for want of information, they could not deny or admit whether certain party was its general manager, Code, evasive); Edwards v. Lent, 8 How. Pr. 28 (denial (2) as to whether plaintiff gave defendants notice of increase in insurance rate, and whether they gave plaintiff authority to effect insurance, Code, insufficient); Sloan v. Little, 3 Paige, 103 (denial (2) as to exaction of usurious interest on mortgage, equity, insufficient); Carpenter v. Momsen, 92 Wis. 449, 65 N. W. 1027, 66 N. W. 692 (denial (1) by assignee that he had not demanded, and statement that it was in hands of former agent of assignor, evasive); Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co. 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527 (denial (1) by assignee of corporation as to whether certain property was attached

Messrs. Hawkins & Franklin for appellant.

Mr. Harry H. McElroy for appellee.

Pope, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only assignment of error relates to the rejection of the testimony to be now mentioned. Upon the trial the witness Franklin was introduced, who testified that, by reason of being the New Mexico attorney for the defendant, he passed on the lease between that company and the El Paso & Southwestern System, of which he was assistant general attorney, and that he also had charge of the settlement of claims over the portion of the railroad (from Tucuman to Santa Rosa) here involved, and had to realty, insufficient); Kentucky River Nav. Co. v. Com., 13 Bush, 435 (denial (1) by company as to its solvency, whether it would be able to make certain repairs, and as to validity of municipal subscriptions to its stock, Code, sham).

In Hall v. Wood, 1 Paige, 404, however, a denial in equity of knowledge or information as to sums claimed to have been collected by one who had been collecting accounts for years and had filed books and papers giving all the information he had, was held sufficient.

Making agreements and contracts.

Ordinarily, a party cannot plead upon information and belief, or knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief, as to the execution and making of agreements and contracts by him. Dugan v. Harris, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 596 (denial (2) by defendant as to execution of bond in question, insufficient); Thorn v. New York Central Mills, 10 How. Pr. 19 (denial (2) by director of corporation as to execution of note in question by its authorized officer, Code, frivolous); Lloyd v. Burns, 6 Jones & S. 423 (denial (1) by trustee of corporation as to whether alleged notes were made by corporation, Code, insufficient); Shearman v. New York Central Mills, 1 Abb. Pr. 187 (denial (2) by corporation that it made note sued on by its authorized agent, Code, frivolous); Hewel v. Hugin, 3 Cal. App. 248, 84 Pac. 1002 (denial (1) by treasurer of irrigation district as to secretary's signature to bonds, insufficient); Byrne v. Benton, 3 N. Y. Month. L. Bull. 100 (denial (1) of alleged contract for board and lodging, Code, sham); Howard v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1051, 70 S. W. 631 (denial (2) as to alleged contract with plaintiff, held admission); Compton v. Beecher, 17 App. Div. 38, 44 N. Y. Supp. 887 (denial (2) by member of firm as to whether policy of insurance had been issued by firm, insufficient); Raymond v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 232, 61 Am. St. Rep. 908, 49 Pac. 492, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 56 (denial (2) as to al-frequent occasion to advise with reference to the operation of that section of the railroad, and that, being thus in daily touch with these matters, he knew who was operating the road between the points above named. With this preliminary proof it was sought to be shown by the witness that the defendant was not operating or in charge of the track and equipment between Tucumcari and Santa Rosa at the date of the alleged injury. This was objected to on the grounds that the witness had not shown the proper qualification to testify, that the answer involved the contents of a written lease, and that the evidence was not admissible under the defendant's answer. The objection was sustained, and we are asked to review the action of the court in declaring this testimony inadmissible. We find it unnecessary to determine the correctness of this ruling upon the first two objections urged, for we deem the third—that the testimony was not admissible under the pleadings—well taken. The answer, as we have seen, was a denial on information and belief. While this tendered an issue upon some of the matters set up in the complaint, it did not have this effect as to the allegation that the defendant was operating the line of road at the place and time in question. This was a matter necessarily within the knowledge of the defendant, and as to such the law does not permit a denial upon information and belief. 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 201; Raphael Weil & Co. v. Crittenden, 139 Cal. 488, 73 Pac. 238; Smith v.

leged mining contract between plaintiff and defendant insufficient); Lewis v. Acker, 11 How. Pr. 163 (denial (2) in reply to answer, as to contract to which plaintiff was party, Code, frivolous); Streator v. Streator, 145 N. C. 337, 59 S. E. 112 (denial (2) of allegation that defendant procured lands to be conveyed to himself in pursuance of parol agreement that he should hold them in trust for certain persons, insufficient); Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 68 L.R.A. 776, 48 S. E. 775 (denial of knowledge and belief as to whether defendant purchased property under agreement to hold it for certain purposes, equity, insufficient); Wesson v. Judd, 1 Abb. Pr. 254 (denial (2) as to whether undertaking executed by pleader, was correctly set out in complaint, insufficient); Fravert v. Fealer, 11 Colo. App. 387, 53 Pac. 288 (denial (2) by party to contract as to performance by other, Code, held admission); Smith v. Stubbs, 16 Colo. App. 130, 63 Pac. 955 (denial (2) as to whether indemnity bond was made by defendant, insufficient); Mott v. Burnett, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 225 (denial (2) by joint maker of note, as to whether note was made by defendants, or either of them, Code, insufficient); Angier v. Equitable Bldg. & L. Asso. 109 Ga. 625, 35 S. E. 64; Smith v. Champion, 102 Ga. 92, 29 S. E. 160 (answer alleging that, for want of sufficient information could not deny or admit matters stated in contract executed by him, evasive).

But under certain circumstances these matters may be put in issue by a denial upon information and belief, or by a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 564, 9 S. E. 684 (denial (1) of signature by one sued for contribution as cosurety on note which had been lost for twenty years, sufficient); Kosztelnik v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 91 Fed. 606 (denial (1) by plaintiff, unable to read English, as to execution of release pleaded by defendant written in English, sufficient); Wood v. Watson, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 85 (denial (1) in action against partners on note, and for goods sold, as to making of note as partners, or delivery of goods to them as such, Code, sufficient).

And assignees and subsequent purchasers of instruments may use these forms of pleas. Fairbanks v. Isham, 16 Wis. 118 (avertment (1) by plaintiff, suing as assignee of mortgage, as to witnessing and acknowledgment of mortgage, sufficient); St. John v. Beers, 24 How. Pr. 377 (complaint by assignee of notes, alleging (1) that notes were executed by defendant, Code, sufficient); Pearson v. Neeves, 92 Wis. 319, 66 N. W. 357 (denial (2) by subsequent purchasers, in action to foreclose mortgage, as to payments of taxes and insurance by plaintiff, which mortgagor had agreed to pay, sufficient).

In Carey v. Jones, 8 Ga. 516, where the matters in question had occurred more than six years before, it was held that an answer in an action seeking to charge defendant as a stockholder, that according to his recollection, he promised he would subscribe to stock and give a mortgage to secure the payments, but that, according to his best recollection and belief, he did not subscribe for any shares or give a mortgage, was held sufficient in equity, the matter involved being remote.

And in Alston v. Brownell, 4 Ill. App. 17, an allegation in defendant's affidavit of defense, that to the best of his knowledge and belief he never was a stockholder and never owned stock in any certain company, was held good, the court saying that it amounted to a positive statement that he never was a stockholder, that he never himself subscribed for such stock, and so far as he knew no one else ever had done so.

In Balliett v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 125 App. Div. 705, 110 N. Y. Supp. 77, the court said that it would be difficult, to say the least, for the defendant to defend its denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the provisions of one of its policies. The decision, however, was put on another ground.

In Carroll County Sav. Bank v. Strother, 22 S. C. 552, an answer by defendant that he signed an instrument of writing Stubs, 16 Colo. App. 130, 63 Pac. 955. Such a pleading raises no issue of fact. Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59, 70 Am. Dec. 621; Ord v. The Uncle Sam, 13 Cal. 370; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. 844; Crane Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Morse, 49 Wis. 368, 5 N. W. 815; Carpenter v. Momsen, 92 Wis. 449, 65 N. W. 1027, 60 N. W. 692; Carpenter v. Rolling, 107 Wis. 559, 83 N. W. 953; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Carrico, 95 Ky. 489, 26 S. W. 177; Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 68 L.R.A. 776, 48 S. E. 775; Raymond v. Johnson, 17 Wash. 232, 61 Am. St. Rep. 908, 49 Pac. 492, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 56; Ensley v. Page, 13 Colo. App. 452, 59 Pac. 225; Howard v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1051, 70 S. supposed to be the paper sued on, but could not be positive without an inspection of the instrument, nor as to whether the indorsement was made before or after due, or contained a guaranty, was held not such an admission as to authorize judgment without proof of the instrument.

And in Jones v. Perot, 19 Colo. 141, 34 Pac. 728, where an action was brought against an administrator for a breach of a contract with the deceased, denials by the administrator of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief were held defective in that they did not state that he could not obtain sufficient knowledge or information upon which to base a belief, since from all that appeared he might, upon the slightest inquiry, have obtained information which would have enabled him to deny positively.

In Hand v. Miller, 58 App. Div. 126, 68 N. Y. Supp. 531, a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the execution and delivery of the contract sued on, was held not to constitute a denial of the execution of the contract, where it was followed by a statement admitting that defendant signed some paper, but denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether the paper sued on was the one signed.

Matters involved in agreements.

Parties must also as a rule plead positively as to matters involved in agreements made by them. Granniss v. McLean Automobile Co. 117 N. Y. Supp. 881 (denial (2) as to allegations in action for rent of building leased by defendant, frivolous); Wesson v. Judd, supra (denial (2) by one recognizing for appearance of one arrested, as to whether such person was arrested, insufficient); Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 47, 50 Pac. 1060 (denial (2); by sureties in redelivery bond of commencement of action, where allegations setting out bond and release of property were not denied, insufficient); Mills v. Jefferson, 20 Wis. 50 (denial (2) by town officers that bonds were given to satisfaction of supervisors, evasive).

W. 631; Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co. 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527.

Nor do we consider that the plaintiff waived the question by going to trial without attacking the form of the answer. While the general rule is that an objection to a pleading may be waived by failure to urge the objection at the proper time, or by any act which in legal contemplation implies an intention to overlook the defect (31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 717; J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. Thompson, 144 U. S. 434, 36 L. ed. 495, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 669; Pring v. M. B. Goldenburg Co. [N. M.] 107 Pac. 529), we find no such failure and no such act here. Neither a motion for judgment on the pleadings nor a demurrer was available as against the answer, for it contained denials which,

In Gallagher v. Merrill, 13 App. Div. 182, 43 N. Y. Supp. 303, a denial by a surety on a lease of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the contents of the lease, was held not to be sham under the Code, the court saying that the authorities seem to answer the question of whether such matter can be stricken out as sham in the negative.

In Genesee Mut. Ins. Co. v. Moynihan, 5 How. Pr. 321, an answer in an action on a premium note, denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to facts alleged to render the defendant liable upon the note, was held to be sufficient under the Code.

Sales.

It is generally held that a party cannot use denials upon information and belief, or of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the sale of goods to him. Chapman v. Palmer, 12 How. Pr. 37 (denial (2) by partner as to sale of goods sued for, and sums claimed, Code, evasive); Starbuck v. Dunklee, 10 Minn. 168, Gil. 136, 88 Am. Dec. 68 (answer admitting receipt of some of wood sued for, but denying any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to quantity, insufficient); Singer v. Effler, 16 Misc. 334, 30 N. Y. Supp. 720 (denial (2) that, at times mentioned in complaint, plaintiff sold goods, wares, and merchandise to defendant, insufficient); Wing v. Dugan, 8 Bush, 583 (denial (2) to defendant's plea of set-off for goods sold and delivered, Code, evasive); Raphael Weill & Co. v. Crittenden, 139 Cal. 488, 73 Pac. 238 (denial (1) as to sale and delivery of goods to defendant at his request, insufficient).

In Schroeder v. Capehart, 49 Minn. 525, 52 N. W. 140, defendant's denial that he had knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to whether plaintiffs sold or delivered the goods alleged, was held to raise an issue, while it was suffered to remain in the pleadings. The court said: "Upon a motion to strike it out, or to require the pleading to be amended, it might appear that the defendant's liability arose although upon information and belief, were good, as for instance the denials as to the ownership of the premises and the suffering of damage. These preliminary methods of attack were therefore not open to plaintiff. Upon the trial plaintiff did not by his proof go into the question of who was operating that part of the line, or recognize that as an issue, and when the defendant, by this line of proof, sought to make it as an issue, the objection now considered, based upon the pleadings, was promptly made, thus giving defendant notice of the question raised and of the desirability of an amendment. There is nothing in this to indicate a waiver of the objection or an acquiescence in the defective pleading as sufficient. 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 723; Rogers v. St. Paul, 86 Minn. 98, 90 N. W. 155. On the other hand, the form of the answer lacks much of giving the plaintiff that notice which our Code system guarantees to parties as to the issues to be insisted upon. An insistence upon this by the courts aids to economy in the preparation of cases and to certainty and despatch in the administration of justice.

We are aware that there are one or two Minnesota cases holding, contrary to the views here expressed, that advantage of a defect in pleading such as this must be made in advance of trial, and not by an objection to evidence. Smalley v. Isaacson, 40 Minn. 450, 42 N. W. 352; Schroeder v. Capehart, 49 Minn. 525, 52 N. W. 140. The latter case, seems the more nearly in point. In that case, however, it will be noted that the court's decision proceeds, at least in part, upon the ground that the matter denied upon information was not necessarily within the knowledge of the defendant. But whatever be the basis of these contrary decisions, we deem them not in accord with the modern ideas of pleading. The face to face contest, and not the masked battery, typifies the latter.

The judgment is affirmed.

Parker, McFie, Wright, and Abbott, JJ., concur. Mechem, J., having been of counsel, did not participate.

upon an implied contract for goods furnished to an agent, or at defendant's place of business under circumstances showing that the denial in the answer in the form adopted was consistent with good faith on the defendant's part."

So, in Nichols v. Corcoran, 38 Misc. 671, 78 N. Y. Supp. 242, a denial in an answer by an executrix of knowledge or information sufficient to form belief, as to goods sold and delivered to a store of the estate, which had been continued by the executrix, was held under the Code not to be a sham answer, since the store might not have been conducted personally by the executrix.

And in St. John v. Beers, supra, it was held that there was no objection to stating an allegation as to the sale of goods on information and belief, since they might have been sold by a clerk or agent.

And in Harvey v. Walker, 59 Hun. 114, 13 N. Y. Supp. 170, which was an action to recover for goods alleged to have been sold to the defendants as partners, a verified answer made upon information and belief was held good and sufficient to raise an issue as to the defendant's partnership.

In Richards v. Fuechsel, 5 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 430, a denial in an action for goods sold and delivered, of every allegation of the complaint, on information and belief, was held sufficient, the court saying that such a denial, where the matter was presumptively within the personal knowledge of the defendant, was not formerly allowed, but that the cases now seemed to countenance it.

As to indebtedness.

A party is generally required to answer positively as to whether he is indebted to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

another, and denials upon information and belief, or of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief, are held insufficient. Brady v. Ranch Min. Co. 7 Cal. App. 182, 94 Pac. 85 (denial (1) of indebtedness, insufficient); Bloch v. Bloch, 131 App. Div. 859, 116 N. Y. Supp. 339, reversed on other ground in 136 App. Div. 770, 121 N. Y. Supp. 475 (denial (2) as to allegations of loan to defendant and nonpayment, insufficient); Thompson v. Seligman, 90 Fed. 219 (denial (1) by plaintiff to counterclaim setting up loans and an account stated, insufficient); Bartlett Estate Co. v. Fraser, 11 Cal. App. 373, 105 Pac. 130 (denial (1) of nonpayment of note, insufficient).

But in Morrow v. Cougan, 3 Abb. Pr. 328, an answer to a complaint alleging in general terms that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff, denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to whether the defendant was indebted to him, was held not to be frivolous.

And in Richter v. McMurray, 15 Abb. Pr. 346, a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form belief as to the truth or falsity of a complaint alleging that an amount was due on each note sued on, without alleging that the plaintiff holds notes drawn by the defendant, was held not to be frivolous. *

Work or services.

In the following cases denials upon information and belief, or of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to work or services rendered, were upheld: Etchas v. Orena, 121 Cal. 270, 53 Pac. 798 (denial (2) by executor as to services rendered testatrix and her promise to pay therefor, sufficient); Colorado Coal & L. Co.

v. John, 5 Colo. App. 213, 38 Pac. 390 (denial (2) as to services performed and moneys laid out by attorney employed by defendant corporation's general counsel, sufficient); Hensberry v. Clark, 23 Misc. 37, 51 N. Y. Supp. 308 (denial (1) in action to recover for services, where it was claimed defendant was not in suitable mental condition to enter into contract, sufficient); Walton v. Wild Goose Min. & Trading Co. 60 C. C. A. 155, 123 Fed. 209, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 688, writ of certiorari denied in 194 U. S. 631, 48 L. ed. 1158, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 856 (denial (2) as to work performed on mining claim prior to pleader's acquisition thereof, not evasive); Humble v. McDonough, 5 Misc. 508, 25 N. Y. Supp. 965 (denial (1) as to indebtedness to plaintiff for professional services, Code, not sham).

Negligent acts must be pleaded positively, where it is clear, that the party must have some knowledge concerning the matter involved; Fallon v. Durant, 60 How. Pr. 178 (denial (1) by plaintiff of matters relative to injury sustained, where his averments showed that he had knowledge, Code, insufficient); Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 68, 26 S. W. 537; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Carico, 95 Ky. 489, 26 S. W. 177 (denial (2) by defendant carrier as to whether it injured stock transported, insufficient).

But in Boorman v. American Exp. Co. 21 Wis. 154, a denial by an express company of any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the alleged negligence of its employees in transporting a violin, was held good. The court said: "An answer denying any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to facts presumed to be within the knowledge of the defendant, or of which he can easily inform himself, is bad; but such is not the nature of the facts here put in issue. The defendant, the express company, which is no more than a copartnership doing business under that name, transacts its business through a multitude of agents residing in different parts of the country, and the knowledge of such agents is not, for this purpose, the knowledge of their principals, the proprietors of the company. Neither can the proprietors readily avail themselves of, or acquire, the knowledge of their agents. This would be extremely difficult,—in the first place, on account of the great number of such agents residing in places remote from each other and from the proprietors themselves; but more especially, because the guilty or negligent agent in every such case is adversely interested. He might evade inquiry or give false answers. To hold, therefore, that the proprietors must know the facts, or obtain correct information of them, before they can answer to an action, would, in very many cases, be equivalent to an unqualified denial of justice. We are of opinion 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) that such is not the rule of law, and that the answer in its present form is sufficient."

In Scully v. Wolf, 56 Misc. 468, 107 N. Y. Supp. 181, which was an action to recover for an injury received by being struck while passing defendant's property, with boards thrown to the ground, an answer denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the allegation, was held to be sufficient to warrant the admission of evidence as to the facts.

And in Comerford v. Dupuy, 17 Cal. 308, an answer on information and belief, that land on which damage was alleged to have been done by defendant's cattle was not in the plaintiff's possession, and that defendant was informed that other cattle had done some of the damage mentioned, was held sufficient.

Ownership and possession.

A party is generally bound to plead positively, and not upon information and belief, or by the use of a plea of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief, as to the ownership of property by himself, and also as to the ownership of one to whom he has directly transferred property. McNeeley v. Welz, 20 App. Div. 566, 47 N. Y. Supp. 310, affirmed on other grounds in 166 N. Y. 124, 59 N. E. 697 (denial (2) as to whether defendant made claim to interest in certain fund, insufficient); Fales v. Hicks, 12 How. Pr. 153 (denial (2) by last indorser of note as to transfer thereof to plaintiff, frivolous); Flammer v. Kline, 9 How. Pr. 216; Fleury v. Brown, 9 How. Pr. 217; Fleury v. Roget, 5 Sandf. 646; Fleury v. Roger, 9 How. Pr. 215 (denial (2) as to whether plaintiff, to whom defendant made and delivered notes sued on, is lawful holder of them, sham); Kamlah v. Salter, 6 Abb. Pr. 226 (denial (2) by maker of note payable to his order, as to whether it was delivered or transferred to plaintiff, frivolous); de Santes v. Searle, 11 How. Pr. 477 (denial (2) as to whether plaintiff is owner of bill of exchange alleged in complaint to have been made payable to plaintiff and delivered to him, frivolous).

And such pleas cannot be used where the instrument is payable to bearer. Bronson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 40 How. Pr. 48 (answer denying (2) that plaintiff in suit on bond payable to bearer is owner, frivolous); Asiel v. Kansas & P. R. Co. 3 N. Y. Month. L. Bull. 28 (denial (1) as to whether plaintiff was owner of note payable to bearer, insufficient).

In Deloatch v. Vinson, 108 N. C. 147, 12 S. E. 895, where a complaint by an executor averred execution by defendant of the bond sued on, an answer that defendant was informed and believed that the plaintiff was not the owner of the bond, was held sham, being merely a legal conclusion which was not allowed by the Code.

But in Townsend v. Platt, 3 Abb. Pr. 325, a denial in an action to recover securities pledged by the plaintiff with the dependant, of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief, as to whether the securities belonged to the plaintiff, was held good under the Code.

One may generally plead as to another's ownership or right to possession of property upon information and belief, or by the use of a denial of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief, where the pleader was not the direct transferor of the property, or, in case of instruments, where they were not made payable to bearer. Kraemer v. Williams, 131 App. Div. 236, 115 N. Y. Supp. 721 (allegation (1) in complaint to set aside conveyance on ground of fraud, that debtor has no other property subject to execution, sufficient); Bartow v. Northern Assur. Co. 10 S. D. 132, 72 N. W. 86 (denial (2) by defendant, a foreign corporation, in action on insurance policy, of allegation that plaintiff was owner of the property destroyed, sufficient); Colby v. Spokane, 12 Wash. 691, 42 Pac. 112 (denial (2) in action to enjoin city from proceeding with public improvements, for the purpose of which condemnation proceedings had been commenced against the plaintiff, as to allegation that plaintiff was owner of premises, sufficient); Cunningham v. Skinner, 65 Cal. 385, 4 Pac. 373 (denial (1) in action to recover personal property as to allegation that plaintiff was entitled to possession, sufficient); Flood v. Reynolds, 13 How. Pr. 112; Snyder v. White, 6 How. Pr. 321; Duncan v. Lawrence, 6 Abb. Pr. 304; Hughes v. Wilcox, 17 Misc. 32, 39 N. Y. Supp. 210 (denial (2) by maker of notes, as to transfer of notes to plaintiff, Code, sufficient); Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, Gil. 180 (denial (2) as to indorsement of note to plaintiff, sufficient); Hughes v. Brewer, 7 Colo. 583, 4 Pac. 1115 (denial (2) as to whether plaintiff was bona fide assignee of judgment, sufficient); Stacy v. Bennett, 59 Wis. 234, 18 N. W. 26 (denial (1) of averment that tax sale certificate had been assigned to plaintiff, Code, sufficient); Reese v. Walworth, 61 App. Div. 64, 69 N. Y. Supp. 1115 (denial (2) as to whether bond and mortgage sued upon had been assigned to plaintiff, Code, sufficient); Conolly v. Schroeder, 121 App. Div. 634, 106 N. Y. Supp. 303 (denial (2) in suit by one claiming rent as purchaser of premises, as to plaintiff's ownership, sufficient).

In Hyde v. Kitchen, 50 N. Y. S. R. 466, 21 N. Y. Supp. 238, an answer by executors made parties to an action against a bank for money alleged to have been deposited by their testator in trust for the plaintiff, denying, beyond the book referred to in the complaint, knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to whether they, as executors, had any interest in the fund, was held not sham.

And in Caswell v. Bushnell, 14 Barb. 393, where the maker of a note denied that he had knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to whether the payee indorsed it to the plaintiff, notwithstanding affidavits making it probable that he did have such knowledge, it was held that to hold the answer a sham would be to overturn the privilege given by the Code, which is in the alternative, to deny the allegations or to deny "any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief."

And in Harney v. McLeran, 68 Cal. 34, 1 Pac. 884, an answer in an action for street assessments, that the defendant had not sufficient information or belief as to his ownership of property to enable him to answer as to its ownership, and that he therefore denied it, was held sufficient, where no motion to strike it out was made.

For cases dealing further with ownership, see section on "Matters of public record," infra.

Service, demand, presentment.

In Ensley v. Page, 13 Colo. App. 452, 59 Pac. 225, a denial on information and belief of personal service upon defendant of a demand for possession of property was held insufficient.

In Warner v. United States Land & Invest. Co. 53 Hun, 312, 6 N. Y. Supp. 411, a denial by a foreign corporation in a suit on bonds, that it had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to a demand of interest at its agency, and default after demand, was held not frivolous. The court said: "From the nature of this case, there was nothing in the allegation contained in the complaint from which the defendant was necessarily presumed to have knowledge of the fact of this demand. It was a foreign corporation, and the demand was made at its agency in the city of New York. And although individuals and corporations are presumed to be acquainted with the acts done by themselves, yet they cannot be presumed to know as to acts done by others at agencies remote from the situs of the corporation itself."

And in Dickerson v. Kimball, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 49, a denial in an action on a promissory note of which defendant was indorser, that as to the presentment and nonpayment of the note he had no information sufficient to form belief, was held not evasive.

Fact of incorporation.

In Brown v. La Crosse City Gaslight & Coke Co. 21 Wis. 51, a denial by a corporation, through its president, of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to the allegation that the company was incorporated under a certain statute, under a given name, on a day designated, was treated as an admission.

And in Northwestern Cordage Co. v. Galbraith, 9 S. D. 634, 70 N. W. 1048, an answer that the defendant in a suit where it was alleged that the plaintiff was a corporation had no knowledge or information sufficient to enable him to form a belief, as to the truth of the allegation, was held not to put its corporate existence in issue.

And in Crucible Co. v. Steel Works, 9

Abb. Pr. N. S. 195, an answer denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether the plaintiff was a corporation was said to be frivolous, but the court held that they could not on appeal review the denial by the lower court of a motion to strike out the pleading as frivolous.

Matters within knowledge of public officials.

Where matters involved are connected with the duties of public officers, they cannot generally use the qualified denials considered in this note. Appel v. State, 9 Wyo. 188, 61 Pac. 1015 (denial (2) by chairman of county commissioners as to whether there were sufficient funds in treasury to pay warrant, insufficient); McConoughy v. Jackson, 101 Cal. 265, 40 Am. St. Rep. 53, 35 Pac. 863 (denial (1) of financial accountant of city as to sufficiency of funds to pay warrant, insufficient).

But in State ex rel. Tracy v. Cooley, 58 Minn. 514, 60 N. W. 338, an answer by a county auditor, in mandamus proceedings to compel the issuing of an order to pay school expenses, stating upon information and belief that the school district was never legally organized, and that it had been dissolved, was held sufficient.

And a city is generally held to have positive knowledge as to matters clearly within the knowledge of its officers. Borough Constr. Co. v. New York, 131 App. Div. 278, 115 N. Y. Supp. 697 (denial (2) by city as to whether plaintiff's claim was presented to comptroller, frivolous); Philadelphia v. Pierson, 211 Pa. 388, 60 Atl. 999 (denial by city of information as to whether bond of indemnity given city had been approved by its solicitor, insufficient); Carpenter v. Rolling, 107 Wis. 559, 83 N. W. 953 (denial (2) by town as to whether road was legally laid out as highway, and as to whether it was bound to keep it in repair, insufficient).

But in Smith v. Janesville, 26 Wis. 291, a denial by defendant city of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to an allegation that the city assessors had knowingly and intentionally assessed certain kinds of property at less than true value, was held to be a sufficient denial.

Matters of public record.

Matters appearing of public record cannot as a rule be denied upon information and belief, or by a denial of knowledge and information sufficient to form a belief. Peacock v. United States, 60 C. C. A. 389, 125 Fed. 583 (denial (1) as to ownership and registry of vessel shown by registry, insufficient); State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 406 (denial (1) by officer removed by board of county supervisors, that cause of his removal was particularly assigned in writing and entered upon books of board, insufficient); Union Lumbering 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. v. Chippewa County, 47 Wis. 245, 2 N. W. 281 (denial (1) in action against county supervisors to avoid taxes as illegal, that town assessors neglected to annex prescribed oath to assessment, that board of equalization was not properly sworn, and of other matters appearing of public record, insufficient); Mendocino v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 82 Pac. 1182 (denial (2) of matters in reports of viewers, and notice, hearings, orders, and proceedings of board of supervisors, insufficient); People v. McCumber, 15 How. Pr. 186 (denial (1) that bank was designated to receive canal tolls sought to be recovered, insufficient); Gridler v. Farmers' & D. Bank, 12 Bush, 333 (denial (2) by defendant of presentation, demand, refusal of payment of bill, where protest of notary is filed with petition, insufficient, this being official document signed by public officer).

But in People v. Curtis, 1 Idaho, 754, a denial of one elected probate judge, upon information and belief, as to whether the compensation of the office had been increased by a certain act, was held sufficient to raise an issue, where, to ascertain the fees paid his predecessor, he would have been obliged to have searched the records of the county commissioners, the court saying: "The facts could only have been ascertained by the examination of records, possibly within his reach, but not such as he would be presumed to know the contents of."

A party, for the purpose of pleading, is generally held to have knowledge of deeds and mortgages of record, so that he cannot resort to qualified pleas as to such instruments. Johnson v. Asher, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 317, 105 S. W. 943 (denial (2) as to recorded conveyance to plaintiff, insufficient); Wheaton v. Briggs, 35 Minn. 470, 29 N. W. 170 (denial (2) to complaint brought by assignee to foreclose mortgage, as to recorded assignment of mortgage, insufficient); Hathaway v. Baldwin, 17 Wis. 616 (denial (2) by defendants claiming interest in property about to be foreclosed, as to execution and record of plaintiff's mortgage, evasive); Daisy Realty Co. v. Brown, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 155, 35 S. W. 637 (denial (2) as to matters shown on recorded plat of defendant's land, insufficient); Goodell v. Blumer, 41 Wis. 436 (denial (1) as to averments setting out deed made to plaintiff, and giving volume and page where recorded, insufficient); Schwartz v. Ribaud, 52 Misc. 102, 101 N. Y. Supp. 599, affirmed on other points in 110 N. Y. Supp. 352; Burdick v. Sterr, 2 W. N. C. 123 (denial (1) as to assignment of mortgage sued on, where record referred to in pleadings, insufficient).

In Bidwell v. Sullivan, 10 App. Div. 135, 41 N. Y. Supp. 770, however, where a defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage answered that he had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, as to allegations in the complaint that his lien was subsequent to the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, it was held not to be frivolous. The court said: "The answer was adjusted to be frivolous apparently upon the ground that the defendant was bound to take notice of the fact of the recording of the prior mortgage, and, therefore he was not at liberty to set up a general denial upon the ground that he had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. While the record of the mortgage is undoubtedly notice of its existence to any one who has occasion to examine the record, yet it clearly is not proof of the due execution and delivery of the mortgage, although it may raise a presumption of those facts, and those facts are put in issue by the denial of the defendant in the form in which the statute permits him to make it, as much as any other facts. Although a defendant may be able by inquiry to ascertain whether the allegations of the complaint are true, he is not bound to do so, and unless such allegations are necessarily within his personal knowledge, an answer in the form of this one is not frivolous."

And in McIntosh v. Omaha, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 408, 91 N. W. 527, an answer as to whether the plaintiff was the owner of land, stating that the defendant was not sufficiently informed as to the plaintiff's ownership, and therefore denied it, was held sufficient, where it was not alleged that the deed of conveyance was recorded, since the title might have been acquired by adverse possession or otherwise not appearing of record.

In Smalley v. Isaacson, 40 Minn. 450, 42 N. W. 352, a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to allegations respecting the title of the several parties was held to raise an issue so long as it remained in the answer, but not after a motion was made to strike out.

In Collart v. Fisk, 38 Wis. 242, an answer by one made defendant in an action to foreclose a recorded mortgage, in which the complaint stated that the defendant had some interest in land subsequent to plaintiff's mortgage, of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to any averment of the complaint, except that the defendant had an interest in the land, was held to be a good traverse, but it was held to admit that the defendant's interest was subsequent to plaintiff's mortgage.

So, a pleader is presumed, for the purposes of pleading, to have knowledge as to recorded liens. Oakes v. Ziemer, 62 Neb. 603, 87 N. W. 350 (denial (1) as to regularity of tax lien, insufficient); Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144 (denial (1) as to whether plaintiff had recorded claim for mechanics' lien, insufficient).

But in Hagman v. Williams, 88 Cal. 146, 25 Pac. 1111, a denial on information and belief that a recorded claim for a mechanics' lien, which was inartificially drawn, contained the necessary facts, was held sufficient.

And the same rule of notice applies as to the assessment, etc., of taxes. Austen v. Westchester Teleph. Co. 8 Misc. 11, 28 N. Y. Supp. 77 (denials (1) in complaint to collect personal taxes as to proceedings for taxing, levying, and demand, frivolous); Stone v. Auerbach, 133 App. Div. 75, 117 N. Y. Supp. 734 (denial (2) by assignee of lease under which lessee undertook to pay taxes, as to assessment, etc., shown by records, frivolous); Van Dyke v. Doherty, 6 N. D. 263, 69 N. W. 200 (denial (2) as to whether plaintiff paid taxes sued for, where defendant was attorney located at county seat where public records kept, insufficient); Wickersham v. Russell, 51 Pa. 71 (denial (1) as to the assessment and payment of taxes upon land of defendant, insufficient); Davis v. Louk, 30 Wis. 308 (denial (2) in action by one who has paid taxes to recover part from defendant, as to who paid taxes, insufficient); Wentzel v. Zinn, 7 Ohio N. P. 512 (statement in action to recover from doweress proportion of taxes paid on her account, that she was not informed of amounts of taxes and assessments unpaid by her, evasive).

Pleaders are generally presumed to have knowledge of judgments appearing of record to which they are parties and matters involved therein cannot be denied upon information and belief, or by the use of denials of knowledge or information. Ketcham v. Zerega, 1 E. D. Smith, 553; Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 34 (denial (2) as to judgment sued on which was rendered against defendant in same court, insufficient); Gjerstadengen v. Hartzell, 8 N. D. 424, 79 N. W. 872; Livingston v. Hammer, 7 Bosw. 670 (denial (2) as to whether judgment against defendant set out in complaint was entered, frivolous); Buller v. Sidell, 43 Fed. 116 (denial (2) regarding judgment sued on, where pleader entered appearance in the former suit, sham); Beebe v. Marvin, 17 Abb. Pr. 194 (denial (2) as to recovery of judgment against defendant in foreign state, Code sham); Roblin v. Long, 60 How. Pr. 200 (denial (2) in action on foreign judgment in which defendant appeared, Code, sham); Lucas v. Lucas, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 661, 37 S. W. 588 (denial (2) by defendant as to whether court of another state had jurisdiction in divorce suit against him, or whether he was properly before the court in that action, insufficient).

And the same rule applies where they are in such a position as naturally to know of such judgments. First Nat. Bank v. Watt, 7 Idaho, 510, 64 Pac. 223 (allegation (1) in answer of surety that note signed by principals had been reduced to judgment, insufficient); Hance v. Rumming, 2 E. D. Smith, 48 (denial (2) by sureties as to judgment rendered against principal, where attorney acted for both original defendant and subsequently for sureties, sham); Brown v. Scott, 25 Cal. 190 (denial (1) by one to whom judgments had been assigned, of whether the execution sale at which he purchased was had under these judgments, and whether he used the judgments in payment of the sum bid by him, insufficient); Elmore v. Hill, 46 Wis. 618, 1 N. W. 235 (denial (2) as to validity of judgment on which execution which was handed to defendant sheriff for levy was issued, insufficient); Zivi v. Einstein, 1 Misc. 212, 20 N. Y. Supp. 893, 894 (denial (2) by stockholders of corporation as to recovery of judgment against corporation, insufficient).

But in Wesson v. Judd, 1 Abb. Pr. 254, a denial upon knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, by one who gave an undertaking that the defendant in supplementary proceedings should attend, as to the existence of the judgment on which the supplementary proceedings were founded, was held not to be sham or evasive.

And where the pleader is not a party to the judgment, these pleas have been upheld. Mower v. Stickney, 5 Minn. 397, Gil. 321 (denial (2) as to judgment pleaded by plaintiff, to which defendant was not a party, sufficient); Vassault v. Austin, 32 Cal. 597 (denial (1) by several defendants of complaint averring judgment against one of defendants, the court where recorded, and the date and amount, Code sufficient).

And in Dittmore v. Cable Mill Co. 16 Idaho, 298, 133 Am. St. Rep. 98, 101 Pac. 593, a denial of information as to an adjudication of insolvency, to which the defendant was not a party, and also the appointment of the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy, was held sufficient.

Matters other than judgments, which appear upon the records of the court, are also held to be within the presumptive knowledge of those connected therewith, for the purpose of pleading. Huffaker v. National Bank, 12 Bush, 287 (denial (2) as to whether note was duly presented and payment refused, where protest was filed with petition, insufficient); McClure v. Bigstaff, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 601, 37 S. W. 294, 38 S. W. 431 (denial (1) as to assignment of notes, where notes with assignments thereon were part of record, insufficient); Douglass v. Cline, 12 Bush, 608 (denial (2) as to whether wages were due, where pay rolls upon which claims were based were part of record, equity, insufficient); First Nat. Bank v. Martin, 6 Idaho, 204, 55 Pac. 302 (denial (1) of matters upon records in case in which defendant was principal party, insufficient); Herald v. Hargis, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1287, 54 S. W. 958 (denial (1) as to court order of record 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) approving sheriff's bond in action against defendant, insufficient); Steinberg v. Saltzman, 130 Wis. 419, 110 N. W. 198 (denial (1) that license to sell real estate in suit was granted by probate court to administrator, insufficient); Wallace v. Bacon, 80 Fed. 553 (denial (1) by stockholder in corporation, as to appointment of receiver of corporation, his qualification, and assessment of stock by comptroller of currency, insufficient); Work Bros. v. Kinney, 7 Idaho, 460, 63 Pac. 596 (denial (2) in suit against sheriff and his sureties, as to matters relative to suit upon which execution in question issued, insufficient); Simpson v. Remington, 6 Idaho, 681, 59 Pac. 360 (denying (1) in supplementary proceedings, allegation of issuance of execution, and return nulla bona, insufficient).

And where the plaintiff in an action on bills of exchange filed an amended petition, upon defendants' request, for the purpose of showing usury, stating the history of the bills, when they originated, their dates, and amount of interest, it was held that defendants could not deny that they had sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief as to whether the information given was true. Rudd v. Deposit Bank, 105 Ky. 443, 49 S. W. 207, 971.

The appointment of officials is also held to be a matter presumptively within the knowledge of the pleader. Re Clement, 132 App. Div. 598, 117 N. Y. Supp. 30 (denial (2) in answer to action by state commissioner of excise, as to whether petitioner was the duly appointed and qualified commissioner, insufficient to compel introduction of affirmative proof); Simmons v. Craig, 137 N. Y. 550, 33 N. E. 76 (denial (2) as to appointment of person alleged by other party to have been appointed executrix, insufficient); Thompson v. Skeen, 14 Utah, 209, 46 Pac. 1103 (denial (1) as to appointment of personal representative, where complaint stated that will of deceased had been probated at certain place, and necessary steps taken to enable plaintiff's to sue, insufficient).

But in Wittman v. Watry, 37 Wis. 238, in a suit where the plaintiff stated that she sued as executrix and residuary legatee, an answer denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the plaintiff's statements was held sufficient to put the allegation of whether she was executrix and legatee in issue.

The proceedings of city councils are held to be matters of record of which pleaders will be presumed to have knowledge. Barret v. Godshaw, 12 Bush. 592 (denial (2), as to whether alleged ordinances authorizing improvements in question had been passed and approved by city council, insufficient); Milwaukee v. O'Sullivan, 25 Wis. 666 (allegation (1) that city council allowed claim of which defendant was assignee for certain amount, insufficient).

In Greer v. Covington, 83 Ky. 410, a statement that defendant "has no information sufficient to form a belief upon, that any of the ordinances mentioned in plaintiff's amended petition were ever published as required by law," was held to be but a statement of the party's want of information of the law, and not good.

Exception as to allegations.

It has been held that allegations of affirmative matter may be pleaded upon information and belief, notwithstanding it is presumptively within the knowledge of the pleader.

Thus, in New York Marbled Iron Works v. Smith, 4 Duer, 362, where the plaintiffs in their complaint alleged on information and belief that they were a corporation, that defendant indorsed the note sued on, and that it was duly presented, demand made, and payment refused, the court said: "The other objections to the complaint are so plainly groundless as scarcely to require a remark. Although a defendant in an answer under oath is not permitted to answer upon information as to facts within his personal knowledge, no such rule is applicable to averments in a complaint, and so applied, the rule would be arbitrary and senseless. Whether the material facts stated in a complaint are stated upon information or knowledge, it is equally the existence of the facts that is averred, and that the plaintiff is bound to prove upon the trial. Hence, the form of the averment is to the defendant a matter of entire indifference."

And this case was followed in Risdon v. Davenport, 4 S. D. 555, 57 N. W. 482, where an answer alleging affirmatively, upon information and belief, that the service of the summons or notice of contest in proceedings referred to in the complaint was made by publication only, and in no other way, was held valid.

Rule as to corporations.

In Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. 111 Cal. 668, 32 L.R.A. 193, 44 Pac. 320, the court said: "The denial of an allegation in the complaint, for want of sufficient information and belief to enable the defendant to answer the same, justifies the court in disregarding or striking out such denial, if the matter is presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant; and although a corporation does not itself have any knowledge of the matters alleged, but is compelled to act through its officers, whose information may be derived from others, yet it cannot place its denials upon its want of information and belief, if the matters alleged were presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers, even though the officer verifying the answer was himself without any information or belief upon the subject." The rule here laid down is the one generally adopted, as will be seen by other corporation cases appearing under the several sections of this note, where the general rule has been applied.

But in Martin v. Erie Preserving Co. 48 Hun, 81, it was held that the rule allowing the plaintiff to show by affidavit that defendant's answer on information and belief is false, and that the facts alleged or constituting plaintiff's cause of action are within defendant's knowledge, did not apply where the defendant was a corporation. The court said: "But if it should be conceded that the general rule is as contended for by the counsel for the plaintiff in actions against persons, it does not apply in cases where a corporation is the defendant, making a denial upon information and belief. The answer by a corporation may be verified by one of its officers, and in the form here used. It is not to be supposed that the officers of a corporation having charge of its affairs have personal knowledge of all its business transactions. If a corporation disputes the cause of action set up in the complaint, it may, by its answer, deny the same on information and belief otherwise it might not be able, in many instances, to serve a verified answer. If the officer making the verification does not have personal knowledge that the allegations in the complaint relative to the cause of action are false and untrue, he would place himself in a position of great peril in making the affidavit of verification, should the answer contain a positive denial of the cause of action. It is declared in § 524, that unless the allegations in a pleading are stated to be on information and belief of a party, they must be regarded for all purposes, including a criminal prosecution, as having been made upon the personal knowledge of the person verifying the pleading."

Miscellaneous.

In Noyes v. Inland & S. Coasting Co. MacArth. & M. 2, a statement on information and belief in an answer by a corporation which had taken over a foreign corporation, as to the latter's power to loan money upon certain security, was held sufficient.

And in Adams v. Clark, 36 Colo. 65, 85 Pac. 642, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 774, the plaintiff's reply to defendant's answer alleging that a certain statute never was a law of the state, or enacted and signed as prescribed by the Constitution, that they had not, and could not, obtain sufficient knowledge or information upon which to base a belief, was held good under the Code.

In Straus v. American Publishers' Assn. 96 App. Div. 315, 89 N. Y. Supp. 172, where an action was brought against various defendants to declare a combination unlawful, the court said: "One line of the plaintiffs' objections is that the answer in several places avers or denies upon information and belief, and the plaintiffs insist that the defendants know of their own knowledge. This, we think, is not a very serious objection, and, as said by the respondents, while in some cases anyone of the defendants might perhaps allege that he himself had or had not knowledge or motive or the like, he certainly could only answer on information and belief as to those matters with respect to his codefendants; and as to the averment that an illegal combination existed, the defendants would rely upon legal advice as to the nature of their association, and hence, must answer on information and belief."

And in Hopkins v. Meyer, 76 App. Div. 365, 78 N. Y. Supp. 459, where the facts pleaded do not appear, the court said that it is well settled that an answer made upon information and belief cannot be stricken out as sham, even where a person is in a position to know the facts, and that such allegations cannot be disregarded as pleading.

And where the matter involved was particularly within the knowledge of the other party, pleas upon information and belief have been upheld. McDermont v. Anaheim Union Water Co. 124 Cal. 112, 56 Pac. 779 (material allegations (1) in complaint by stockholder against irrigation corporation, to prevent its furnishing water to new members, where truth as to matters particularly within defendant's knowledge, Code sufficient); Campbell-Kawannanaka v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 92 Pac. 184 (allegations (1) in complaint sounding in fraud, of matters peculiarly within defendant's knowledge, sufficient).

In Robinson v. Ferguson, 119 Iowa, 325, 93 N. W. 350, in an action by a county treasurer under a statute providing that when property subject to taxation is withheld, overlooked, or for any other cause not listed or assessed, such treasurer shall when appraised thereof cause an action to be brought therefor it was held that the necessary allegations in the petition might be made by him upon information and belief, since he might not have actual knowledge that the property had been omitted.

So a denial on information and belief of allegations that plaintiff forwarded a warrant with a certain indorsement thereon is good, although the warrant is in defendant's possession, the material allegation going to the act of forwarding and not the indorsement. Seattle Bank v. Meerwaldt, 8 Wash. 630, 36 Pac. 763.

The rule in equity that matters within the presumptive knowledge of the pleader must be set out positively, and not upon information and belief, or upon knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, was laid down in the following cases but the decisions were placed upon other grounds: Miles v. Miles, 27 N. H. 440; Dinsmoor v. Hazelton, 22 N. H. 535; McAllister v. Clopton, 51 Miss. 257; Mead v. Day, 54 Miss. 58; Woods v. Morrell, 1 Johns. Ch. 103. J. T. W.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE MEDICAL BOARD OF ARKANSAS MEDICAL SOCIETY, Appt.,

v.

A. S. McCrary.

(— Ark. —, 130 S. W. 544.)

Physician — revoking license — necessity of judicial proceeding.

1. Judicial proceedings are not necessary to the revocation of a license to practise medicine, in order to avoid conflict with the constitutional provision against depriving one of property without due process of law.

Statute — certainty — regulation of physicians.

2. A statute providing for the revocation of the license of a physician who advertises special ability to treat or cure chronic and incurable cases is not void for uncertainty.

Physician — forbidding to advertise special ability — validity.

3. Forbidding physicians to advertise special ability to treat or cure chronic or incurable diseases is within the police power.

Note. — Grounds for revoking physician's license.

The early cases dealing with grounds for the revoking of physician's licenses are covered in the notes to Macomber v. State Bd. of Health, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 585, and Munk v. Frink, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439.

The expression "gross immorality," named in a statute as a cause for the revocation of a physician's license, was held in Rose v. Baxter, 7 Ohio N. P. N. S. 132, not so vague, uncertain, broad, and comprehensive as to give the medical board the sole power to determine whether the license should be revoked without providing any standard as to qualification. The court said: "Gross immorality is a term which has been used and has received adjudication at the hands of a great many courts. The word 'gross' does not mean great or big or excessive, necessarily, but rather such a wilful, flagrant, and shameful quality with respect to the office involved as renders the officer unfit to hold his license and authority to act. Sometimes the expression is found, under the law, 'gross misbehaviour.' The expression 'moral turpitude' is closely akin to the expression at bar, and has received a great many interpretations, but has always been sustained by the courts so far as I have been able to ascertain, and I find no cases in which it has been held so indefinite as to preclude action against a person guilty thereof."

And this statute is violated where a physician maintains two offices under different names, intending thereby to perpetrate a fraud upon the public. Ibid.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Pulaski Chancery Court enjoining it from interfering with plaintiff's right to practise medicine because of an alleged unlawful advertisement. Reversed.

Statement by Hart, J.:

A. S. McCrary was duly notified to appear before the State Board of the Arkansas Medical Society in the hall of the house of representatives, in the statehouse, in the city of Little Rock, Arkansas, on November 10, 1909, and show cause why his certificate to practise medicine in said state should not be revoked under subdivision d of § 8 of act 219, of the Arkansas general assembly, approved May 6, 1909. It is as follows:

So, a statute providing for the revocation of dentists' licenses for fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation in the practice of dentistry, or for gross violation of professional duties, is not unconstitutional on the ground of uncertainty, because the grounds for which it authorizes the revocation have no fixed or determined meaning, but are left to the caprice and whims of the state board of dental examiners, since they have a well-defined meaning. State ex rel. Williams v. Purl, 228 Mo. 1, 128 S. W. 100.

And this statute is violated where a dentist inserts false advertisements as to price, the making of teeth without bridges or plates, the re-enameling of teeth, the tightening of loose teeth, the curing of pyorrhea, and other false statements tending to deceive the public and to impose on the credulous and ignorant. Ibid.

So, a statute giving a medical board power to revoke a physician's certificate, where he inserts or causes to be inserted in the newspapers an advertisement relative to venereal diseases, is not unconstitutional because it does not state in advance what act or acts may be in violation of its provisions. Kennedy v. State Bd. of Registration, 145 Mich. 241, 108 N. W. 730, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 125.

This case is distinguished from Matthews v. Murphy, infra, and like cases, on the ground that in the Kennedy case the legislature had declared what acts or conduct afforded a ground for revocation, while in the Matthews case the statute did not specifically provide what acts should be regarded as unprofessional conduct which was calculated to deceive or defraud the public.

In Matthews v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 750, 54 L.R.A. 415, 63 S. W. 785, a statute authorizing the revocation of a physician's license for grossly unprofessional conduct likely to deceive or defraud the public, without fixing any standard by which such fact should be determined, was held void.

A statute authorizing a medical board to revoke a physician's license when the holder has been guilty of a felony or of gross immorality does not violate the provisions of the state or Federal Constitutions. Spurgeon v. Rhodes, 167 Ind. 1, 78 N. E. 228. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Section 8. Every person residing in this state, or coming into it, of the age of twenty-one years, who has not heretofore been licensed to practise medicine under the existing laws, making application to register under the provisions of this act for the purpose of practising medicine in this state, shall first make application to the secretary of the board representing the school of medicine from which he graduated, and his application shall be accompanied by a fee of $15, this fee being for examination and registration before the boards. The applicant shall present to the board satisfactory evidence of graduation from a reputable medical school, and a school shall be considered reputable within the meaning of this act whose entrance, requirements, and

The illegal sale of intoxicating liquors is not a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, within the meaning of a statute providing that whenever a physician or surgeon shall be convicted of any crime and misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in addition to the other penalties imposed, his license shall be revoked. Fort v. Brinkley, 87 Ark. 400, 112 S. W. 1084. The court said: "Moral turpitude is defined to be an act of baseness, vileness, or depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to his fellowmen or to society in general." 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 872. See also Ex parte Mason, 29 Or. 18, 54 Am. St. Rep. 772, 43 Pac. 651; In Re Kirby, 10 S. D. 322, 414, 39 L.R.A. 856, 73 N. W. 92, 907. . . . Moral turpitude implies something immoral in itself, regardless of the fact whether it is punishable by law. The doing of the act itself, and not its prohibition by statute, fixes the moral turpitude. It seems clearly deducible from the above-cited authorities that the words 'moral turpitude' had a positive and fixed meaning, at common law, and that the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, not being an offense punishable at common law, does not come within the definition of a crime involving moral turpitude."

Extensive advertising by a physician cannot of itself be said to be disgraceful conduct, but where such advertisements are studied efforts to impose upon the credulity of the public for gain they are utterly disgraceful within the meaning of a statute providing for an erasure of physicians' names from the medical register where they are guilty of disgraceful conduct. Re Washington, 23 Ont. Rep. 299.

And a physician is guilty of disgraceful conduct under this statute where he accepts money from those in the last stages of consumption, under the representation that they are suffering from catarrhal-bronchitis, when he must have known the truth. Ibid.

However, a charge merely stating that a physician has published the symptoms of catarrh does not charge disgraceful conduct in a professional aspect, within the meaning of the foregoing statute. Ibid.

course of instruction are as high as those adopted by the better class of medical schools of the United States. Such examinations may be written or oral, and shall be of a practical character and conducted on the scientific branches only, and shall include anatomy, physiology, medical chemistry, materia medica, therapeutics, theory and practice of medicine, pathology, bacteriology, surgery, obstetrics, gynecology, and hygiene. All questions and answers, with grades attached, shall be preserved by the secretary for one year.

"If in the opinion of the board the applicant possesses the necessary qualifications, the board shall issue to him a certificate. The boards may, at their discretion, arrange for reciprocity in license with the authorities of states and territories having requirements equal to those established by the boards, and every person desiring license under reciprocity must make application to the secretary of the board representing the school of medicine from which he graduated. License may be granted applicants for license under such reciprocity on payment of $25.

"The boards may refuse to grant or may revoke a license for the following causes, to-wit: "(a) Chronic and persistent inebriety; (b) the practice of criminal abortion, either as principal or abettor; (c) conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude; (d) publicly advertising special ability to treat or cure chronic and incurable diseases; (e) the presentation to the board of any license, certificate, or diploma which was illegally or fraudulently obtained, or the practice of fraud or deception in passing the examination. In complaints for violating the provisions of this section, the accused person shall be furnished a copy of the complaint, and given hearing before said board in person, or by attorney; and any person after such refusing or revocation of license, who shall attempt or continue the practice of medicine, shall be subject to the penalties hereinabove described."

On November 10, 1909, Dr. McCrary filed a complaint against said board and the members thereof to enjoin them from acting in the complaint filed against him before said board. With his petition he filed the following exhibits: First. The notice served on him to appear before the State Medical Board and show cause why his license to practise medicine in the state of Arkansas should not be revoked. Second. The complaint filed against him before said board. It charged that he had violated subdivision d of the above-quoted act, "by publicly advertising special ability to treat or cure chronic and incurable diseases," in violation of the terms thereof. Third, A verbatim copy of his advertisement, stating his success and ability to cure certain ailments. It is not necessary to set out his advertisement; for it seems to be conceded that if the act in question is constitutional, and is not void for uncertainty, the advertisement falls within its prohibition.

The board demurred to the complaint. The court overruled the demurrer on the ground that subdivision d, which authorized the board to revoke the license of a physician, if he "publicly advertise special ability to treat or cure chronic and incurable diseases, is too indefinite and uncertain for en-

Under a statute providing in substance that any registered medical practitioner who shall have been convicted of any felony shall thereby forfeit his registration, or in case of a person known to have been convicted of a felony who shall present himself for registration the register shall have power to refuse such registration, the name of one who had previously been convicted of manslaughter and after the full term of his sentence had expired had made application for registration and been registered, cannot be removed from the register because of this conviction. R. v. College of Physicians & Surgeons, 44 U. C. Q. B. 146.

And where he was asked no questions at the time of registration, he is guilty of no false or fraudulent representations justifying the erasure of his name from the register, although the secretary did not know of the conviction at the time his name was entered. Ibid.

In Re Telford, 11 B. C. 355, a young woman who was pregnant, and who had herself made unsuccessful attempts to bring about a miscarriage, asked a physician to effect an abortion. The physician, believing that it would be necessary to expel the contents of the uterus, owing to the patient's attempts at miscarriage, inflicted a wound on her body with the object of enabling him and the patient more effectually to deceive her parents and others with respect to her real condition, by causing them to believe that she had been operated on for the removal of the appendix. The operation was performed in a private sanatorium, without professional or other consultation, and it was shown that it could serve no purpose relative to the health of the patient. The woman died from the effects of the attempts at abortion, and the physician was acquitted on a charge of manslaughter, but it was held that the medical council were justified in erasing his name from the register, since he was guilty of unprofessional conduct.

And the cancellation of a physician's license on the ground that he had committed a criminal abortion was upheld in Mathews v. Hedlund, 82 Neb. 825, 119 N. W. 17, and it was held that the revocation might be made before his conviction in a criminal court.

forcement." The board electing to stand on its demurrer, and refusing to further plead, a decree was entered enjoining it and the members thereof from in any way interfering with the right of the plaintiff to practise medicine, because of the advertisement charged in the complaint made against him.

To reverse that decree this appeal is prosecuted.

Messrs. Coleman & Lewis, with Mr. H. L. Norwood, Attorney General, for appellant.

Messrs. Pettard & Brickhouse and W. T. Tucker for appellee.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The constitutionality of the above-quoted statute is attacked by appellee. He contends that his license to practise medicine is a property right, the revocation of which is an exercise of judicial power, which cannot be vested in any administrative board, but only in the courts; and that to assume to invest this power in the board is to deprive him of his property without due process of law, in violation of § 8 of article 2 of our Constitution.

In discussing this question, the supreme court of the state of Minnesota, in a clear and well-considered opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Mitchell, said: "The radical fallacy in this chain of argument is the assumption that the revocation of such a license is the exercise of judicial power. 'Due process of law,' or 'the law of the land' (which means the same thing), is not necessarily judicial proceedings. Private rights and the enjoyment of property may be interfered with by the legislative or executive, as well as the judicial, department of the government. When it is declared that a person shall not be deprived of his property without 'due process of law' it means such an exercise of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, under such safeguards as these maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs. . . . It has never been held that the granting or refusing to grant such a license as this was the exercise of judicial power, . . . and there is no possible distinction in this respect between refusing to grant a license and revoking one already granted. Both acts are an exercise of the police power. The power exercised and the object of its exercise are in each case identical, viz., to exclude an incompetent or unworthy person from this employment. Therefore the same body which may be vested with the power to grant, or refuse to grant, a license may also be vested with the power to revoke. The statutes of all the states are full of enactments giving the power to revoke licenses of dealers, innkeepers, hackman, draymen, pawnbrokers, auctioneers, pilots, engineers, and the like, to the same bodies, boards, or officers who are authorized to issue them, such as city councils, county commissioners, selectmen, boards of health, boards of excise, etc. The constitutionality of such laws, as a valid exercise of the public power, has often been sustained, and, indeed, rarely questioned. . . . The only authorities cited by relator to support his contention are cases in which it has been held that the removal of an attorney by a court from his office as an attorney of the court, like the order of his admission, is the exercise of judicial power, and is a judgment of the court. But these cases are not at all analogous to the one at bar. They rest expressly upon the ground that attorneys are officers of the court, whose duties relate almost exclusively to proceedings of a judicial nature, and that at common law it vested exclusively with a court to determine who is qualified to become one of its officers, and for what cause he ought to be removed, and hence that attorneys could only be removed from office for misconduct ascertained and declared by judgment of the court. Ex parte Secombe, 19 How. 9, 15 L. ed. 565; Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 18 L. ed. 366." State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123.

This is a leading case on the subject, and has been cited with approval by nearly all the courts where the question has been under consideration. In the case of Meffert v. State Bd. of Medical Registration (Meffert v. Packer) 66 Kan. 710, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811, 72 Pac. 247, which was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court without discussion (Meffert v. Packer, 195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 790), all the authorities bearing on the question were reviewed, and the quotation we have made from the Chapman Case was discussed and approved in its entirety. The Meffert Case is also reported in 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811, and contains an excellent case note. To the same effect see Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 42 L. ed. 1002, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; State v. Schmidt, 138 Wis. 53, 110 N. W. 647; State ex rel Burroughs v. Webster, 150 Ind. 607, 41 L.R.A. 212, 50 N. E. 750, and cases cited. Our own court, in a carefully prepared opinion by Mr. Justice Riddick, has held (quoting from syllabus): "Acts 1903, p. 342, forbidding physicians and surgeons engaged in the practice of medicine to solicit patients by paid agents, is a valid exercise of the state's police power in regulating the practice of medicine and surgery." Thompson v. Van Lear, 77 Ark. 506, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, 92 S. W. 773, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 154. As stated in the case of Com. v. Porn, 196 Mass. 326, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 94, 82 N. E. 31, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 569, "the maintenance of a high standard of professional qualifications for physicians is of vital concern to the public health, and reasonable regulations to this end do not contravene any provision of the state or Federal Constitution."

It is also contended that section d of the section of the statute in question is too vague and indefinite to be upheld and enforced; and to our minds, this is the most difficult question in the case to determine. It has given us the gravest concern, and after due consideration we have decided to uphold it. Our attention has not been called to any case where a statute of similar import has become the subject of judicial determination. Counsel for appellee rely upon cases where statutes authorizing the Board of Medical Examiners to revoke the certificate of a physician for making "grossly improbable statements" or for "unprofessional or dishonorable conduct" have been held void, as being unreasonable, too uncertain, and indefinite. Hewitt v. State Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 84 Pac. 39, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 750; Matthews v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 750, 54 L.R.A. 415, 63 S. W. 785; Czarra v. Medical Supervisors, 25 App. D. C. 443.

On the other hand there are cases upholding statutes empowering boards to revoke the licenses of physicians who are guilty of unprofessional and dishonorable conduct, and the licenses have been revoked or not, according to the proof made. State ex rel. Feller v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 391, 26 N. W. 125; Macomber v. State Bd. of Health, 28 R. I. 3, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 585, 65 Atl. 263, and the case note to Hewitt v. State Medical Examiners, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 750, indicate that the weight of authority is to this effect. But we need not decide that question; for we hold that the language of subdivision d in question is not too uncertain and indefinite to be upheld and enforced. In the case of Thompson v. Van Lear, supra, this court held that an act forbidding physicians and surgeons to solicit patients by paid agents was a valid exercise of the police power. For like reason, a statute forbidding a physician to advertise for patients in newspapers would be upheld; and by analogy, a statute forbidding them to advertise their ability to treat and cure certain named diseases would be a valid exercise of the police power.

While the particular disease against which the prohibition of the statute is directed is not named, as was the case of Kennedy v. State Bd. of Registration, 145 Mich. 241, 108 N. W. 730, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 125, yet the words "chronic and incurable," when used with reference to diseases of the body, are not variable, but have a settled and generally accepted meaning. The word "chronic" is the antithesis of "acute," and a chronic and incurable disease is generally understood to be one of long standing, deep-rooted, obstinate, persistent, and unyielding to treatment. On this account those afflicted with such diseases become discouraged, and to an extent desperate, and more easily become the prey of conscienceless and unscrupulous practitioners in the medical profession. Such diseases are specifically named and discussed in standard medical works, and are known to all physicians who may possess a sufficient knowledge of their profession to practise the art of healing, as chronic and incurable diseases. For the board to consult these standard medical works would not be to use them as evidence as contended by appellee, but such act would be rather done as an aid to the memory and understanding of the members of the board. See State v. Wilhite, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 180, and case note (132 Iowa, 226, 109 N. W. 730).

The decree will be reversed, and the complaint dismissed for want of equity.

Note. — Adjudication of bankruptcy of member of firm as affecting rights of firm creditors against firm property.

As to effect of adjudication of bankruptcy of partnership to subject separate estates of partners to administration in a statement in a case-made preceding the evidence, to the effect that "the following evidence was introduced, same being all the evidence introduced by both parties at the trial," whereupon the evidence follows, is a sufficient compliance with the rule to authorize a review of alleged errors requiring a consideration of all the facts.

Bankruptcy — partner — estate of unadjudicated firm — attachment — validity.

2. Where one of two members constituting a firm is adjudicated a bankrupt, but there is no adjudication against the firm, the property of the firm does not pass to the trustee of the estate of the individual bankrupt; and such adjudication does not defeat an attachment lien of a firm creditor who has caused an attachment to be levied on a portion of the firm's assets within four months prior to the adjudication of the individual as a bankrupt, nor does it require that such attachment shall be discharged.

ERROR to the District Court for Muskogee County to review a judgment dissolving an attachment in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Hayes, J.:

This is an action brought by plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, against defendants in error, Carl E. Coover and O. E. Coover, doing business under the firm name and style of Coover Hardware Company, to recover on a promissory note for the sum of $1,082 and bankruptcy, see the note to Dickas v. Barnes, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 654.

As to whether individual partners, as well as firm, must be insolvent in order to render the firm bankrupt, or to avoid payment of a firm debt as a preference, see the note in 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 960.

It seems to have been the rule under the various bankruptcy statutes that ordinarily the trustee of one partner could not claim the partnership assets in the absence of the bankruptcy of all the partners, or of the firm itself. Under the act of 1898 this rule seems to have been made a matter of express provision. It should be noted that no attempt has been made to treat exhaustively the question of the right of the assignee or trustee of one partner to administer firm assets. While some cases passing on this question, but not coming within the title of this note, are herein referred to merely for illustrative purposes, there are other cases of the same kind which have not been considered.

Section 14 of the bankruptcy act of 1841 provided, among other things, that upon the insolvency of two or more persons who were partners in trade, an order might be made, upon which all the joint property and also all the separate estate of each of the partners should be taken; that the net proceeds of the joint property should be appropriated to the payment of the creditors of the firm, and the net proceeds of the separate property to the payment of the separate creditors; and that in other respects proceedings against partners should be conducted in like manner as if they had been prosecuted against one person alone.

The rule under this act is indicated by the following language employed in Ayer v. Brastow, Fed. Cas. No. 682 (D. C. Me.): "On the separate bankruptcy of one partner, if the firm or if the other partners are solvent, the general rule in equity, as I understand it, is that the court will not take the joint effects out of the hands of the solvent partners, but leave the possession and distribution with them, subject, of course, to be controlled by the court when equity requires it, unless when a sale is demanded, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or when some special ground is shown requiring the interposition of the court. But where the firm itself and all the partners are insolvent, the interest of the creditors and the policy of the law require that the rule should be reversed, and that the administration of the assets should be by the assignee or a receiver under the direction of the court, and the distribution be made by the law." In this case the contest was between the assignee of the partner in bankruptcy and the insolvent partner not in bankruptcy, who claimed the right to retain the assets of the firm which was also insolvent, for the purpose of settling its affairs. It does not appear that any of the firm creditors were seeking to enforce any rights against the firm assets, but the court had their rights in mind in reaching the decision, for it said: "If the effects are left in the hands of the insolvent partner, as his administration is not under the immediate control of the court, he has it in his power to defeat the policy of the bankrupt law by giving preferences. In this case, the respondent states in his answer, that he has settled, by payment or compromise, one half or more of the whole debts of the firm; that is, the effects of the firm thus far have been appropriated to the payment of one half of the creditors, while the other half have received nothing. Now one great object of the bankrupt law is to prevent this preference of favored creditors, and to give to all an equal share of the estate in proportion to the amount of their demands. Another very obvious reason for preferring the administration of the assignee is found in the fact itself that the partner is insolvent. The creditors among whom the property is to be distributed have a just claim to have the effects placed in security for the purpose of being converted into money for their benefit. As a general rule, it cannot be doubted that the administration will be more safe in the hands of an assignee than in those of an insolvent partner. Has, then, the court the power of taking the effects out of the possession of the insolvent partner and placing them in the hands of the assignee? As a general question this interest, executed on the 31st day of January, 1907, and signed by Coover Hardware Company. Ancillary to the main action, plaintiff sued out a writ of attachment, which was levied upon certain property of the partnership. Subsequently a receiver was appointed on application of plaintiff, who took charge of the property attached, and later, by agreement of the parties, said property was sold and the money ordered to be held by the receiver subject to the order of the court on the final hearing of the cause. Defendants by their answer deny that they constitute a partnership, and allege that Carl E. Coover alone was doing business under the style and firm name of Coover Hardware Company. They admit the execution of the note sued on, but allege that O. E. Coover had nothing to do with the indebtedness it represents, and was not a party to the execution of the note. Further answering, they allege as a defense that in the month of March, 1907, within four months of the filing of this action and the execution of the note, the defendant Carl E. Coover had filed his application in the Federal district court to be adjudged a bankrupt, and denied all the grounds of attachment alleged in plaintiff's petition. The action was originally instituted in the United States court for the western district of Muskogee before the admission of the state, it was transferred to the district court of Muskogee county, where a trial was had to the court without the intervention of a jury.

I suppose does not admit of doubt. The partnership is dissolved by the bankruptcy; and on a dissolution by bankruptcy or otherwise, any of the partners or the representatives of a partner may insist on having the whole concern wound up by a sale."

A provision in § 2 of the act of 1841, that nothing therein should be construed to annul, destroy, or impair any liens, mortgages, or other securities, was invoked in Parker v. Muggridge, 2 Story, 334, Fed. Cas. No. 10,743 (C. C. N. H.) where it was held that where creditors of a partnership had instituted actions at law against a partnership, and attached its property, but had continued the actions from time to time as the result of agreements with the members of the firm, until finally the actions were defaulted, the creditors had an equitable lien upon the firm property, which survived a decree in voluntary bankruptcy of several of the partners, before the entry of the default judgments. The following language indicates the basis of the decision: "The general rule in bankruptcy is that in cases of partnership, where one partner becomes bankrupt, his assignee can take only that portion of the partnership assets which would belong to the bankrupt, after payment of all the partnership debts; and that the solvent partners have a lien upon the partnership assets for all the partnership debts, and also for their own shares thereof, before the separate creditors of the bankrupt partner can come in and take anything. It is true that in such cases, it may often, from the necessity of the case, and for the purpose of ascertaining the partnership assets and debts, and adjusting and settling the same, and making a final settlement and distribution of the surplus, be indispensable that the district court, as a court of equity, should take into its own hands the exclusive management and administration of all the partnership assets, and inhibit the other partners from meddling therewith. But this it will do with caution, and solely for the purposes before stated. And so far from thereby displacing any of the rights, liens, and equities of the other partners, it studiously seeks to maintain and protect them. Now, in the present case, under its peculiar circumstances, there is no reason whatever for the interference of the district court by way of injunction, or otherwise, to administer the property in controversy. On the contrary, by refusing or dissolving the injunction, it accomplishes the very ends designed by the contracts between all the parties, and allows the partnership property to be applied to the discharge of the partnership debts according to its just and original destination."

Recognizing the principles enunciated in the two foregoing cases, the court in For-saith v. Merritt, 1 Low. Dec. 336, Fed. Cas. No. 4,946, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 48 (D. C. Mass.), held that the assignee of a bankrupt partner could not avoid a conveyance executed by both partners in favor of firm creditors, upon the ground that it constituted a preference, the other partner not being bankrupt.

Where the partners as well as the firm were insolvent, and had, in contemplation of insolvency, assigned all of their property in trust for creditors, it was held that the assignee in bankruptcy of one partner, who filed his petition nine days after the assignment for creditors, was entitled to have the assigned property taken into the bankruptcy court, notwithstanding that, under the assignment, the same disposition of the property would have been made as was directed by the bankruptcy act, and that the greater part of the creditors were satisfied with the conditions existing under the assignment. McLean v. Johnson, 3 McLean, 202, Fed. Cas. No. 8,883 (C. C. Ohio).

In Ex parte Norcross, 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 100, Fed. Cas. No. 10,293 (D. C. Me.), where the contest was between the assignee in bankruptcy of one partner, and the solvent partner, it was held that the bankruptcy of one partner worked a dissolution of the firm, and made the assignee a tenant in common with the solvent partner, but that the right of the assignee was not to the possession of the partnership effects, but to an account, and to the bankrupt's share of the surplus, after the firm debts should be paid.

Section 36 of the act of 1867 was in all

The court found that Coover Hardware Company was composed of O. E. Coover and Carl E. Coover, and found all the issues of fact in the main action in favor of plaintiff, and rendered judgment against defendants for the amount of the note. But the court found that the defendant Carl E. Coover had filed a petition in bankruptcy, and had been adjudged a bankrupt within four months from the bringing of this action, and for that reason dissolved the attachment, and ordered the receiver to pay the proceeds of the attached property over to the clerk of the court. No appeal has been taken by defendants, and plaintiff prosecutes this proceeding from only that part of the judgment of the trial court which dissolves the attachment.

Messrs. Masterson Peyton and Matthew G. Mason, for plaintiff in error:

Creditors of a partnership are subrogated to all of the rights or liens of each individual partner for the payment of the debts of the firm.

A partnership and the individuals composing it are distinct legal entities, and proceedings in bankruptcy by or against one do not of necessity involve the other. The filing of a voluntary petition by Carl E. Coover as an individual does not involve the attached partnership property of the Coover Hardware Company.

In the case of Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. 395, 22 L. ed. 801, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 495, decided while the act of 1867 was in force, it was held that an assignee of the estate of an individual partner had no such title as would enable him to call third parties to account for partnership property; that money, if it could be recovered back at all, should be claimed by the partnership in whose behalf it was paid, or by an assignee duly appointed to administer the joint estate; and that therefore the assignee of the estate of an individual partner of a debtor copartnership could not maintain a suit to recover back money previously paid to a firm creditor, upon the ground that the money was paid in fraud of other creditors of the firm, and in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act. The court said: "Assignees in bankruptcy of the estate of an insolvent copartnership may, perhaps, maintain such a suit for such a claim, even though the money was paid by an individual partner under such an agreement to compromise his separate debts, as the assignees in such a case are required to keep separate accounts of the joint stock or property of the copartnership and of the separate estate of each member of which the copartnership is composed; and the provision is that the net proceeds of the joint stock and property shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the copartnership, and that the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors. None of the proceeds of the separate estate of the individual partners can be appropriated to pay the partnership debts, unless the proceeds from that source exceed what is necessary to pay the separate debts of the partner, nor can any part of the proceeds of the joint stock or property of the copartnership be appropriated to pay the separate debts of the individual partner, unless there is an excess from that source beyond what is required to pay the partnership debts. 14 Stat. at L. 535, chap. 176 [§ 35 act 1867]. These regulations show that, in cases where they apply, the assignees in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) bankruptcy of the joint stock and property of a copartnership are required to administer the separate estate of the individual members of the firm or company as well as the described estate of the copartnership, but the bankrupt act contains no regulations of a corresponding character applicable in a case where an individual member of a copartnership is adjudged a bankrupt, without any such decree against the copartnership or the other partner or partners of which the copartnership is composed. Instead of that, the bankrupt act provides that in all other respects the proceedings against partners shall be conducted in the like manner as if they had been commenced and prosecuted against one person alone. Partners are not entitled in any case to come in competition with the joint creditors upon the partnership funds, whatever may be the rights and equities which would otherwise attach between them and the bankrupt partner or partners."

So, under this act it was held that partnership assets could not be reached in bankruptcy unless all the persons who had an interest as copartners in such property were adjudged bankrupt. Re Shepard, 3 Ben. 347, Fed. Cas. No. 12,754, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 172 (S. D. N. Y.). In this case the partnership was, by mutual agreement, dissolved, "except so far as it may be necessary to continue the same for the final liquidation and settlement of the business thereof." One of the two partners took all of the assets for application to the payment of firm debts. Thereafter he made a voluntary assignment of firm property in trust for the payment of firm debts, and he was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one of his creditors. The assignee in bankruptcy brought suit to have the assignment set aside upon the ground that it was made with intent to give preferences. It was held that the suit could not be maintained, for the assignee showed no title to call the assignee for creditors, or anyone else, to account. It was pointed out that the partnership was not dissolved with respect to partnership property relinquished by the retiring partner, with re-

Messrs. W. T. Hutchings, George A. Murphey, and W. P. Z. Georman for defendants in error.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question which we are asked to determine by this proceeding requires a consideration of all the evidence, and defendants object to any consideration thereof, upon the ground that the case-made does not contain an averment by way of recital spect to partnership debts, or with respect to proceedings under the bankruptcy act.

Where a firm composed of three members transferred certain value to its creditors, and thereafter one of the partners died, it was held that the assignee in bankruptcy of the surviving partners, who were adjudged bankrupts within four months after the transfer, could not have the same set aside as a preference or fraud on the bankruptcy act, the firm itself not being in bankruptcy. Withrow v. Fowler, Fed. Cas. No. 17,919, 7 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 339 (E. D. Mo.).

From these cases it is apparent that, under the earlier bankruptcy acts, it was the policy of the courts to prevent the assignee in bankruptcy of one partner from claiming the firm assets, in the absence of the insolvency of all the partners or of the firm itself; and the courts clearly, and it would seem correctly, give the reasons for the rule. Since the individual partner, or his creditors, have no claim upon firm assets until the firm creditors are paid, there is ordinarily no reason for taking the assets from the solvent partners. Now if the rule had been to the contrary, namely, that the assignee of an insolvent partner was entitled to take the firm assets, it would by no means have necessarily followed that his taking would, in any way, have interfered with the rights of firm creditors to pursue firm property, or retain that already received. In the case of lien creditors it is certain that their rights could not be thus impaired, as is shown by Parker v. Mugridge, supra. And where the assignee cannot take the firm property, the bankruptcy of one member a fortiori does not affect the right of firm creditors against firm property.

Then the only room for a nice question, it would seem, is as to the right of the assignee or trustee in bankruptcy of one partner to avoid preferences secured by firm creditors. In other words the question is, May a payment made to, or a lien acquired by, firm creditors upon firm property in circumstances that would render it subject to attack as a preference if the part-that it contains all the evidence. That, in order to authorize this court to review any alleged error which requires an examination of all the evidence, the case-made must contain an averment by way of a recital to the effect that it contains all the evidence, has been frequently held (Wagner v. Satt'oy Mfg. Co. 23 Okla. 52, 99 Pac. 643), but the objection of defendants in error to the record in this case is not well founded in fact. There is nothing in the rule which requires that case-made to contain such averment, that prescribes any definite language, to be used, or the place in the case-made at which the same shall appear. Just preceding the evidence in this case-made appears the following statement: "And thereafter, to wit, on the 9th day of nership were in bankruptcy, be attacked by an assignee or trustee in bankruptcy, when not all of the partners are involved, as is required to render the firm assets subject to administration in bankruptcy? This has been answered in the negative in Forsaith v. Merritt; Amsinck v. Bean; and Re Shepard,—supra, and it should be kept in mind in referring to the cases hereinafter cited and also AMERICAN STEEL & WIRE Co. v. COOVER, all of which arose under the bankruptcy act or 1898.

Section 5 h of the act of 1898 provides that in the event of one or more, but not all, of the members of a partnership being adjudged a bankrupt, the partnership property shall not be administered in bankruptcy, unless by consent of the partner or partners not adjudged bankrupt; but that such partner or partners shall settle the partnership business, and account for the interest of the partner or partners adjudged bankrupt. As previously suggested, this section is, in effect, an enactment of the rule obtaining under the earlier statutes.

It was held in Lane v. Tanner, 156 Cal. 135, 103 Pac. 846, that under this section, the trustee in bankruptcy of a partner could not sue for partnership property taken by mortgagees of the firm a few days before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy of the partner, where the property was taken in pursuance of authority given by the mortgage, which was executed five months before the filing of the petition. The apparent ground of this decision is not that the trustee of the individual partner could not avoid a preference, but that the transaction did not constitute a voidable preference, because the taking should be regarded as of the date of the mortgage.

And it was held in Burke v. Rollinson, 23 R. I. 177, 49 Atl. 694, that under § 5 h the trustee in bankruptcy of one member of a firm could not recover back money paid by such member to a third person under a firm contract. Although, as a matter of fact, the payment was made within four months before the filing of the petition, it is not expressly made to appear that the July, 1908, said cause comes on for hearing and the plaintiff appearing by its attorney of record, Masterson Peyton, Esq., and the defendants appearing by their attorneys, Hutchings, Murphey, & German, by agreement of parties, a jury is waived and cause submitted to the court sitting as a jury, whereupon the following proceedings were had, and the following evidence was introduced, same being all the evidence introduced by both parties at the trial." Then follows the evidence. Had the foregoing statement followed the evidence in the record, and been made to read, "the foregoing evidence was introduced, same being all the evidence introduced by both parties at the trial," there could not be any question of its sufficiency; but the meaning of such statement would not be different from the one appearing in the case-made. Each is equivalent to averring that the evidence in the case-made is all the evidence that was introduced, and complies with the requirement of the rule.

Defendant O. E. Coover is the father of defendant Carl E. Coover. They were engaged in a general hardware and implement business in the town of Haskell, in this state. The business was managed principally by the son. The father, who is a resident of the state of Missouri, furnished practically all, if not all, the capital that went into the business. The son advertised to the public the fact that his father was a member of the firm, and appears to have held him out continually as a member of the firm until the commencement of this proceeding. The evidence does not disclose whether the partnership is in an insolvent condition, but it does appear that O. E. Coover is solvent. There is no evidence whatever relative to the bankruptcy proceedings of Carl E. Coover. Defendants allege in their answer that within four months preceding the institution of this action Carl E. Coover filed his petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt; and counsel for plaintiff at the trial admitted, without the introduction of evidence, that such petition had been filed and Carl E. Coover adjudicated a bankrupt as alleged in the answer. The foregoing constitutes all the facts in the record relative to said bankruptcy proceeding. No petition has ever been filed by or against the partnership for its adjudication as a bankrupt. The property attached in this proceeding was the property of the partnership of the individual Carl E. Coover.

Section 67 of the bankruptcy act (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3449) provides that all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt, and the property affected by the levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same, and shall pass to the trustee. There can be no doubt that, if the partnership had been adjudicated a bankrupt, such adjudication would have discharged the attachment; and it appears that the learned trial court entertained the view that, by reason of this section, the adjudication of Carl T. Coover individually as a bankrupt had that effect, and that the attached property passed to the trustee as part of the estate of Carl action was based upon that ground, but it is to be inferred that such was the ground.

It was held in Moses v. Pond, 32 Misc. 406, 66 N. Y. Supp. 600, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 656, that the trustee in voluntary bankruptcy of a surviving member of a partnership could not, as against judgment creditors of the firm, take the surplus resulting from the foreclosure of a joint mortgage upon the partnership real state. Here the judgments were recovered after the filing of the petition.

A partnership mortgage upon firm property was held in Sanderlin, 109 Fed. 857, 6 Am. Bankr. Rep. 384 (E. D. N. C.), not to be affected by the bankruptcy of one of the partners within four months thereafter, although it appeared that, after the execution of the mortgage, the firm had been dissolved and the bankrupt had taken its assets and assumed its debts. The decision on this point was affirmed in 51 C. C. A. 89, 113 Fed. 113, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 638 (4th Circuit).

Section 5h has been held not to apply where the partner not in bankruptcy was excepted from the adjudication upon the ground of his infancy. Re Dunnigan, 95 Fed. 428, 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 628 (D. C. Mass.); Re Duguid, 100 Fed. 274, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 794 (E. D. N. C.). In the latter case the trustee was allowed to administer the property as against judgment creditors who had levied upon firm property, and the court held that such judgments as were rendered within four months before the filing of the petition were void as against the trustee.

E. Coover, bankrupt. In this view, we think the court fell into error. The better reasoned current authorities construing and applying the bankruptcy act of 1898 agree that, in contemplation of that statute, a partnership is a distinct separate entity from the individual partners who compose it, and that a partnership can be adjudicated a bankrupt only when a petition therefor has been filed by it or directed against it, alleging an act of bankruptcy in which it is involved. A proceeding in bankruptcy may be prosecuted against the partnership, and it be adjudicated a bankrupt without any proceeding prosecuted against the individual members of the partnership and without their being adjudicated bankrupts individually, and the individual partners may be adjudicated bankrupts without involving the partnership. Re Meyer, 39 C. C. A. 368, 98 Fed. 976; Re L. Stein & Co. 62 C. C. A. 272, 127 Fed. 547; Re Bertenshaw, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 887, 85 C. C. A. 61, 157 Fed. 363, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 986.

In the last cited case Mr. Circuit Judge Sanborn, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A partnership owns its own property, and owes its own debts. It, its property, and its debts are separate and distinct from the individuals who compose it, from their individual property, and from their individual debts. The partnership does not own, cannot assign or apply to the partnership debts, the individual property of its members, nor is it liable for their debts. The most that a creditor of a partner can secure from a partnership or from its property is the excess of the latter after the partnership debts have been paid. The partners and their individual property are to a limited extent, to the extent of the excess of their individual property over their individual debts, but not to the full extent of ordinary indorsers or indemnitors, sureties for the debts of the partnership. The act of 1898 recognized these patent facts, and provided for separate adjudications of the partnership and of its members. Under this act, the partnership may make an assignment or commit some other act of bankruptcy and be adjudged a bankrupt while many of its members are solvent, and cannot be so adjudged. On the other hand, some of its members may be adjudged bankrupts while the partnership is not subject to such an adjudication."

The debt this plaintiff is trying to collect in this case is a partnership debt. The property which it is endeavoring to have appropriated to the payment of that debt is partnership property, and not the property of the individual partner who was adjudicated a bankrupt. Had the partnership been adjudicated a bankrupt, then, under the section of the act of 1898 above referred to, the attachment having been levied within four months prior to the adjudication, while the partnership was insolvent, such adjudication would have dissolved the attachment. But does the adjudication of the individual members of the partnership draw into the bankruptcy proceeding the assets of the partnership of which the bankrupt is a member, but against which no bankruptcy proceedings are pending? This question, we think, must upon reason and the authorities be answered in the negative. Re Mercur, 58 C. C. A. 472, 122 Fed. 384, was a case wherein both of the two persons composing a firm had been, in separate proceedings instituted against them, adjudged individually to be bankrupts, but there had been no proceeding against or adjudication of the firm. The partnership within four months prior to the adjudication of the individual partners as bankrupts had made assignment of parts of its property for the benefit of its creditors. The trustee of the individual bankrupts' estates sought to recover from the assignee of the partnership this property, but the court denied him relief, and held that the adjudication of the individual partners did not give the court jurisdiction of the firm assets, and that, in order for the court to obtain jurisdiction thereof, it was necessary that there be an adjudication of the partnership as a bankrupt. The court quoted approvingly from the opinion of the district court in that case (116 Fed. 635) the following: "There has been no adjudication against the firm, and the trustee was not appointed to represent it, but only the two members who happened to compose it in their separate and individual capacity. Under such circumstances, the trustee has no authority to demand or interfere with the firm assets. This is settled by the case of Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. 395, 22 L. ed. 801, where it was held that, while the assignee (trustee) in bankruptcy of the joint stock and property of a partnership is required by the statute to administer the separate estate of the individual members as well as that of the firm, there is no reciprocal regulation with regard to the estate of the partnership where an individual member of it has alone been adjudged a bankrupt."

In the Amsinck v. Bean Case, one of the partners constituting a copartnership had furnished the greater part of the capital invested by the firm, and was a large creditor thereof. The other partner had suffered him. after the firm had ceased paying its creditors, to take charge of the partnership assets and manage them as if they had been owned by him individually. The managing partner proposed and made settlements with creditors of the firm on a basis of 70 cents on the dollar, took the partnership stock, transacted business in his own name, bought and sold new stock and mingled funds, but the court held that such acts did not dissolve the partnership, and that a decree of bankruptcy against the managing partner individually did not pass the partnership assets to his assignee in bankruptcy. The trustee of the bankrupt estate of Carl E. Coover has no interest in the firm assets further than the bankrupt's share of the surplus of those assets that may be left over after the firm's debts are paid, if there be any. The adjudication of the partnership as a bankrupt would not pass the assets of the firm to the trustee of the firm for administration without the consent of the solvent partner; and much greater is the reason why the insolvency and adjudication of one of the individuals of the firm should not operate to transfer the assets of perhaps a solvent firm to the bankruptcy court for administration. If the attachment lien of plaintiff in error could be destroyed by such a proceeding, then the creditors of solvent firms could have no protection in the enforcement of their claims by the provisional remedies prescribed by the statute or by execution, so long as the firm contains a member who is individually insolvent; for by voluntary application of that individual partner for an adjudication as a bankrupt, such liens would all be discharged.

Re Harris (D. C.) 108 Fed. 517, is cited and relied upon by defendant in error, but that case is not in point. In that case a person was adjudged a bankrupt as the sole owner of a business conducted in the name of a company. Throughout the entire bankruptcy proceedings the assets of the bankrupt, which were composed entirely of the assets of the company, were treated by the bankrupt and by his creditors, who were composed entirely of the creditors of the company, as the property of the bankrupt. The evidence in the case disclosed a silent partner, who himself permitted the court and the bankrupt and his creditors to treat the assets of the company as the individual property of the bankrupt member; and the court held under those circumstances that the distribution of the estate would be made on the basis that the assets were the property of the individual bankrupt. What representation was made by the bankrupt in the bankruptcy proceedings in this case as to the ownership of the partnership as 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sets the record does not disclose, nor does it disclose whether the partnership creditors, if any such there are, have participated in that proceeding, or whether it has been participated in only by the individual creditors of the bankrupt. Prior to his adjudication, the record does disclose that the bankrupt represented that his father was an interested partner in the business, and held him out to the world as such. Plaintiff in error relied upon such fact when it extended credit to the firm, and has never consented that the property of the firm should be treated as the assets of the bankrupt, nor has it by its acts estopped itself from now asserting that such property is not the property of the bankrupt. It has at all times insisted upon its right to have the assets attached by it applied to the payment of its claim against the partnership. Its claim and contention are similar to those of the creditors in the case of Re Mercur, supra; the only difference being that in that case the creditors obtained a lien upon the assets of the firm within four months prior to the adjudication of the individual partners as bankrupt by virtue of an assignment by the firm for the benefit of the firm's creditors, whereas, in this case plaintiff obtained his lien by means of an attachment. The principle involved in both cases is the same. No contention is made that the grounds of attachment were not established by the evidence; and there is evidence reasonably tending to support same. The only reason presented for dissolution of the attachment was that the adjudication of the junior member of the partnership as a bankrupt operated as a discharge of the attachment and passed the property to the bankrupt's estate.

It follows from the views already expressed that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed and the cause is remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

OWEN TURPIN, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(— Ky. —, 130 S. W. 1086.)

Trial — argument — facts not in evidence — error.

A statement by the state's attorney when summing up a criminal case to the jury, to the effect that to the knowledge of the presiding judge one of the number had been fixed, based not upon facts in evidence, but upon the judge's statement to him that he had seen the juror and a relative of the accused in conversation under suspicious circumstances, an objection to which the judge overrules, is reversible error.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rockcastle County convicting him of voluntary manslaughter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Brown and C. C. Williams, for appellant:

The statement of the state's attorney to the effect that one of the jurors had been fixed was prejudicial.

Note.—Reference by prosecuting attorney, in argument to jury, to attempts to tamper with witnesses or jurymen as ground for reversal.

Where, as in TURPIN v. COM., there is no evidence upon which to predicate a reference by the prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury, as to attempts to bribe witness or jurors, the statement is held to constitute ground for reversal, provided the prejudice created is not removed by instructions from the court to disregard the statements made.

Thus, where the only evidence justifying the assertions is the testimony of defendant's wife that a certain person who was employed by her husband had gone away, the prosecutor's statement in his closing argument that the person had been bribed to leave, that if he had not gone, the same Winchester that settled the person whom defendant was accused of killing would have settled him, and that one of defendant's horses and some money settled the question of his testimony, was held to constitute ground for reversal, the court merely having stated to the jury that the counsel's remarks were not evidence. Butler v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 27 S. W. 128.

So, where the prosecuting attorney in his argument said: "The attorney for the defendant has tampered with the witnesses. You know it, and I know it, and he ought to be convicted for it; and, too, the attorney for the defendant has attempted to buffalo and bulldoze this court and myself, just because we were new at the business, and thought we would not know any better. The defendant is a scoundrel and a perjurer, and ought to be convicted." It was held reversible error, the court not having instructed the jury to disregard the remarks, but merely requested the attorney to keep within the record. State v. Clapper, 203 Mo. 549, 102 S. W. 560.

ground that it was in response to remarks by defendant's counsel, but these remarks did not in fact appear, and there was no evidence to justify them: "I tell you, gentlemen, money talks. Oliver Helm, Amanda Helm, and Ed. Short were witnesses before the grand jury and at the coroner's inquest. They were then witnesses for the state, now they are witnesses for the defendant. We have been prepared for this thing. We knew someone had been to Ottumwa and Bonaparte, and were prepared for the evidence from there." State v. Helm, 92 Iowa, 540, 61 N. W. 246.

And where, in a trial for breaking and entering a storehouse, there is no evidence that anything was stolen, a statement by the prosecutor that three witnesses who had testified in defendants' behalf "had gotten part of the stolen goods" is cause for reversal. Dunmore v. State, 115 Ala. 69, 22 So. 541.

So, in a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, where officers and agents of a company from whom property had been taken had testified for the state, a statement by the prosecuting attorney that the company in question could have received a large amount for dropping the case should have been excluded, where there was no evidence to support it; and for this and other causes the case was reversed. Piano v. State, 161 Ala. 88, 49 So. 803.

And it is error for the prosecuting attorney to refer to an alleged threat to injure witness and his property, made by the defendant to one of his witnesses, providing such witness did not testify in a given way, where the fact that defendant had made such a statement was not proved. State v. Hogan, 115 Iowa, 457, 58 N. W. 1074.

In State v. Woolard, 111 Mo. 248, 20 S. W. 27, the statement by one of the prosecuting attorneys in a murder trial, in answer to criticism by defendant's counsel based on the statement of a witness to the effect that the prosecutor had told him that if he would testify against the accused he would turn witness loose, that the prosecuting officer had merely told his witness that all he wanted was the truth, and that he had made no promise to induce him to testify, was held highly improper where these facts were not in evidence; and for this and other errors the judgment was reversed.

And a ground for a new trial is shown where the prosecuting attorney, in arguing to the court for a mistrial on the ground of fraud in drawing the jury, said that two jurors "had gone into the jury box with souls blackened with perjury and bribery, and that all hell could not change their minds," the jury being present when the statement was made. State v. Noland, 85 N. C. 576.

So, it was held prejudicial error in State v. Montgomery, 56 Wash. 443, 134 Am. St. Rep. 1119, 105 Pac. 1035, for the prosecuting attorney to state in the jury's presence, after the prosecuting witness had denied the charge against the defendant in a prosecution for rape, that she had made contradictory statements to him, and had been tampered with and bought, and then temporarily excuse her, and subsequently, before recalling her, tell her that she could be imprisoned for perjury.

Where there is evidence in the record upon which to base statements as to the bribery of witnesses or jurors, or, in the absence of such evidence, where the prejudice can be removed by a direction from the court to disregard the statements, they are generally held not to constitute ground for reversal.

Thus, in Billingsley v. State, 96 Ala. 126, 11 So. 409, where the defendant was accused 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of the crime of voluntary manslaughter. He has had two trials, each resulting in verdict of guilty. The verdict upon the first trial was set aside, and a new trial granted by the circuit court upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. There appears to have been some difficulty in obtaining a qualified jury on the second trial. While the jury was being impaneled, one of the venire men notified the court that he had been approached by a son-in-law of appellant, who sought to influence his verdict, should he be selected. The court upon a trial of the party charged found him guilty of contempt and punished him. The jury was finally selected, and the trial begun. It lasted for several days. Toward the close of the trial and at the noon adjournment, while the jury was in charge of the sheriff under admonition to be kept together, and not suffer anyone to approach them on the subject of the trial, they were taken to the public water-closet at the courthouse by the sheriff. One of the jury necessarily, or under the pretense of necessity, went into the closet, the others and the sheriff remaining outside. A son of appellant then came up and went into the closet also. He claims that he did not of selling liquor without a license, and no objection was made to testimony of a witness for defendant, who was a member of the grand jury which found the indictment, to the effect that he took a drink with the sheriff shortly before he went upon the stand, it was held that a statement by the prosecutor in his argument as follows: "Gentlemen, it is an outrage when the sheriff of your county and a grand juror are drinking together while court is in session,"—was not a ground for reversal, although it went to the utmost limit.

So, in McDonald v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 508, 117 S. W. 131, in a prosecution for carrying a pistol, where the defendant and his witnesses had testified that he went to a stall in a stable to get the pistol of one who was in jail, and who had told defendant to get it in payment of a debt, and the theory of the prosecution was that he had rushed to the stall to hide the pistol when he saw the rangers, it was held that the county attorney's statement that the defendant had brought his witnesses to court to swear him out of the case, and that the witnesses had manufactured the defense, was proper under the evidence in the case.

And where there is evidence that defendant's witnesses in a murder trial had been furnished with typewritten copies of what they were to testify to, it is not reversible error for the prosecuting attorney to state this fact in his argument. Ross v. State, 8 Wyo. 351, 57 Pac. 924.

And no prejudicial error is shown where

know that it was occupied, did not know the juror, and said nothing to him, which the juror confirms. While they were in the closet, the presiding judge of the court, having occasion to use it, and not knowing it was occupied, went in there also, when he found the parties in earnest and apparently confidential conversation. When they saw him, they appeared confused and hurriedly withdrew. The jury had been put in charge of the sheriff by the court. But, without the knowledge of the court, and, as the judge certifies, to his surprise, they had been turned over to a deputy sheriff, who was related to the accused. The judge reported what he had seen to the commonwealth's attorney, and issued a rule against appellant's son and the juror to answer for contempt, but the rule was not tried or executed until after the trial of the principal case. There was no evidence introduced before the jury at the trial of this case, of the foregoing circumstances. In the concluding argument of the commonwealth's attorney, he used this language, which was objected to by the accused, but the court overruled his objections, and refused to admonish the attorney or to withdraw the remarks: "There is one man on this jury who has been 'fixed' in this case. This fact is known by the judge on the bench. Eleven of you have not been 'fixed.' Eleven of you know who this juror is. I will expect that juror to be for an acquittal, but I expect the other eleven of you to be for a conviction. Judge Frank Finley, while circuit judge, and while presiding at the trial of a case, and knowing that one of the jurors had been 'fixed' to find for the defendant, peremptorily instructed the jury to find the defendant guilty, and afterwards set the verdict aside. I appeal to the 'fixed' juror to look at the emblem of justice here on the judge's stand,—the beautiful figure of a woman, blindfolded, with the scales of justice equally poised in her hand. She administers justice without fear and without knowing any man. She is blindfolded, as shown by this figure." The defendant then moved the court to discharge the jury, which was also overruled. Another attorney for the commonwealth, in his argument of the case to the jury, said: "A great and outraged populace is appealing to you to do your duty in this case." That remark was objected to. The court sustained the objection, and admonished the jury not to consider the statement. These arguments of counsel are the only grounds urged for a reversal.

The matter last quoted, irregular and improper as it was, was probably cured by the prosecuting attorney, in his argument in a trial for unlawful cohabitation, said that it was in defendant's power to show all the facts in defense by his wife and children, but that it was not within the power of the prosecution to do so by them, because they had been put out of the way by the procurement of the defendant, and in another place, said that an outsider had made signals to the jury; the court having subsequently charged the jury that they should not go outside of the evidence in reaching their verdict, and it appearing that the counsel ceased such remarks immediately upon his attention being called to the impropriety by the court. United States v. Musser, 4 Utah, 153, 7 Pac. 389.

In State v. Thomas, 135 Iowa, 717, 109 N. W. 900, a murder trial, it appeared in evidence that a witness for defendant was at the time an inmate of the poorhouse, that he had gone from the office of the defendant's attorneys to a place of business where he was acquainted, and, jingling three silver dollars in his hand, stated that he was to be a witness in the case in question. The prosecuting attorney in his argument jingled several silver coins in his hands, and referred to one of the counsel for the defendant in such language as to indicate that while there might not be legal evidence that he had bribed the witness, to a moral certainty he had. The court, in holding this not irreparable error, said: "Without discussing from a professional standpoint the propriety or advisability of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) this kind of argument, we are only concerned now in determining whether there was such misconduct as to require a new trial. It is not claimed that the court was remiss in giving to the defendant any protection to which he was entitled, so far as redress could be given or protection afforded, by reprimanding counsel or cautioning the jury as to the effect to be given by them to the argument. The sole contention is that irreparable error was committed for which a reversal must be granted. The argument of counsel is not open to the objection that it refers to matters outside of the record. The facts as to what Noble did and said were in the record, and counsel for the prosecution did not pretend that there was any evidence of bribery of the witness by defendant's counsel, or that he had any information as to such bribery, not contained in the record itself. He simply made a charge based upon inference, and which on its face showed that it had no other basis.

In Cook v. State, 152 Ala. 66, 44 So. 549, a statement by the prosecuting attorney that a certain witness should not be believed in preference to another mentioned, because the predicate laid to the first put in his mouth what to testify to, was held within the limits of legitimate advocacy.

For a note on reversal of conviction because of unfair or irrelevant argument or statements of facts by prosecuting attorney, see People v. Fielding, 46 L.R.A. 641.

the admonition of the court. Whether we would have reversed for it alone is not necessary to decide. But the other matter is more serious. It contained a statement of fact not in evidence before the jury, of a most damaging character as affecting the guilt of the accused. It charged that the fact was within the personal knowledge of the presiding judge of the court. When the accused objected to the character of the argument, and his objection was overruled by the judge, it tended to confirm the attorney's statement that the fact existed, and was within the judge's knowledge. It also indicated to the jury that the argument was not improper, which is to say not illegal, and that, therefore, it was a matter which they were at liberty to, perhaps under the duty to, consider. The statement of the attorney was evidence of a clearly incriminatory nature. If one accused of crime flees, or attempts to bribe a witness or a juror, or to fabricate evidence, all such conduct is receivable as evidence of his guilt of the main fact charged. It is in the nature of an admission; for it is not to be supposed that one who is innocent, and conscious of the fact, would flee, or would feel the necessity for fabricating evidence. Moriarty v. London, C. & D. R. Co. L. R. 5 Q. B. 314; Winchell v. Edwards, 57 Ill. 41; Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 316, 52 Am. Dec. 711; Com. v. Brigham, 147 Mass. 415, 18 N. E. 167. Upon the same principle, one who is innocent would not be apt to resort to bribery, either of a witness or of a juror, to insure his acquittal. Consequently, if he resort to that course, it is evidence from which the jury may infer guilt. At least, it is evidence corroborating the other evidence of guilt, and may tend strongly to remove any doubt left in the mind of the jury as to the prisoner's guilt. It would have been competent for the prosecution to have introduced evidence that the prisoner had offered a bribe to a juror to find him not guilty. The evidence is material in character, and is in chief. But, like all other evidence of admissions, it is to be received guardedly. It is a fact explainable, and, whether explained by other evidence or not, is solely for the jury to apply in the light of the surroundings and of the intelligence of the accused. But, in any event, he was entitled to have the witness who testified to such damaging facts against him sworn, and an opportunity for cross-examination, and for counter evidence. In the course pursued in this case, these rights of the accused were denied him. Even though there was no doubt of his guilt, even if it had occurred in the presence of the distinguished trial judge and commonwealth's attorney, it was 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nevertheless a fact to be proven, if it was to be used against him, like all other facts, by authentic documents or out of the mouths of sworn witnesses confronting him at the bar of the court. Here, his son is charged with having tampered with a juror. It was not shown, nor attempted to be, nor is it claimed, that the prisoner knew of the act, or in any wise authorized it. The young man may have done it on his volition, and out of his anxiety concerning a parent in great trouble. Under such circumstances, criminal though the act be, the prisoner here would be neither legally nor morally responsible for it, and it would not constitute evidence of any kind against him. Yet the effect of the attorney's statement was as if the prisoner had bribed a juror, or had caused it to be done. The circumstance of itself shows the wisdom of the rule requiring the evidence to be heard in court from the mouth of the witness having the knowledge, and subjected to cross-examination, to counter evidence, and to explanation. Furthermore, the trial judge did not claim to have heard what passed between the juror and young Turpin. Nor did he see any consideration pass. The circumstance and the conduct of the parties were highly suspicious. More, it was in contempt of the rule and orders of the court. Nevertheless, it may have been the result of ignorance or accident, as it was claimed (though of the latter there is doubt) but there was no conclusive evidence of either motive or consequence. It was certainly explainable, and needed explanation. But opportunity was not afforded for refuting or explanatory evidence. The commonwealth's attorney did not claim to have witnessed the transaction. His statement was pure hearsay evidence. On that score also, it was error to allow it to go to the jury.

A fair summary of the principle under discussion is found in Wigmore on Evidence, § 1806, as follows: "A counsel's argument is in its purpose a connected presentation of the facts supposed to have been proved by the evidence tending in favor of his client. He is not a witness. He may have testified as a witness; but in his argument he has solely the functions and rights of counsel. Any representation of fact, therefore, which is made by him in the argument, must not be an assertion made upon his own credit. It must be based solely upon those matters of fact of which evidence has already been introduced, or of which no evidence need ever be introduced because of their notoriety as judicially noticed facts. To bring forward in argument an assertion of fact not of these two sorts is to become a witness; and to be a witness without being subjected to cross-examination is to violate the fundamental principle of the hearsay rule." Authorities are numerous and consistent in support of that announcement. This court has had frequent occasion to consider the subject. The rule announced was applied in Cook v. Com. 86 Ky. 663, 7 S. W. 155; Bates v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 132, 16 S. W. 528; McHenry Coal Co. v. Sneddon, 98 Ky. 687, 34 S. W. 228; Howard v. Com. 110 Ky. 356, 61 S. W. 756, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 533. In Sasse v. State, 68 Wis. 530, 32 N. W. 849, the district attorney intimated that someone on behalf of the defendant had tampered with the witness for the state, or spirited him away, and, upon objections being made, remarked that he would prove it before he got through, after which he did not even offer to prove the charge. It was held error, and ground for reversal. In Nalley v. State, 28 Tex. App. 392, 13 S. W. 672, the prosecuting attorney stated to the jury that he expected to show by a witness that Sam Nalley had induced him to leave the county, so as not to testify. The court, reversing the judgment, said: "There was no statement by the district attorney to the effect, and no pretense, that he sought to inculcate the defendant in any manner directly with this attempt to suppress the testimony. Even if the prosecuting officer could have proved what he stated, such testimony would have been clearly inadmissible against defendant, unless he had been directly connected with the matter. Favors v. State, 20 Tex. App. 158; Marshall v. State, 5 Tex. App. 273. There being no proof that these overtures to the witness were made by the authority or with the knowledge of the accused, such statement by the district attorney was illegal and unjust, and was highly calculated to prejudice the accused. Barbee v. State, 23 Tex. App. 199, 4 S. W. 584. Anything Sam Nalley, the brother, might have done in the matter, in the absence and without the knowledge of defendant, was most clearly inadmissible against, and could not be binding upon, him, . . . and afforded no reasonable presumption or inference pertinent to the issue in the case for which defendant was on trial, and the court should have so instructed the jury."

If an effort on the part of the accused to influence witnesses in his behalf to fabricate evidence, or to have the evidence against him suppressed, would tend, and it does, to establish his guilt under the main charge, it is equally so for him to attempt to corrupt a juror trying his case. The latter act is apt to have even more force in the minds of the jury than the former; for not only is it of equal effect upon the result, if successful, but it is contempt of the tribunal composed of the jurymen. It is an affront to their dignity and the integrity of their body. It is an attempt which would cause them all to be held up to the scorn of the public, because of a miscarriage of justice at their hands. It is therefore more likely to be visited by a harsh judgment from the men who have been so insulted. The effort to get before the minds of the jury thus illegally matter of such grave importance as conducing to the verdict was in every probability most prejudicial to the accused. If, perchance, the juror under suspicion were in fact innocent of wrong in the matter, it practically destroyed his independence as a juror, for knowing he was suspected and thus singled out, he scarcely might dare to act with that independence of judgment on the merits of the case that is essential to a fair trial. He would be more concerned about his own standing, and the effect upon himself of any verdict he might render. The other jurors, not knowing who was alluded to in the remark of the prosecuting attorney, naming the presiding judge as having knowledge of an unlawful effort on behalf of the accused to corrupt one of their number, would look with suspicion upon any one of them who, in their private deliberations, might express an opinion favorable to the accused. The legitimate influence of such a juror and the force of his reasoning in their consultation would be nullified. From whatever point the matter is viewed, we cannot escape the conclusion that the remark was prejudicial and most damaging to the accused. Whatever our opinion might be as to his guilt, and however this court may sympathize with the purpose of the learned trial judge, and applaud his zeal in endeavoring to protect the trial from improper influence from without, we cannot pass over so grave an offense against the plainest, as well as most valuable, right of a man charged with crime, a right equally valuable to the public, which is the guaranty of a fair trial, upon legal evidence only, and face to face with the witnesses who constitute his accusers.

We commend the efforts of the trial judge in endeavoring to protect the jury against outside influence. The question necessarily arose in his mind what to do in view of what he had seen, or thought he saw the evidence of, to prevent a miscarriage of justice. If he should discharge the jury, that would operate to release the defendant, he being then "in jeopardy." If he should content himself alone with punishing as for contempt those engaged in disobeying the rules of the court, that would have no effect on the trial of the principal case, and the mischief feared might be done regardless of the penalizing of the minor culprits. We are of the opinion the trial judge, upon informing counsel in the case what he had observed, should have left it to them to introduce evidence of the fact, by competent means, before the jury. If the evidence connected the prisoner with the matter, it would have been relevant in his case. If the prisoner was not connected with it, then he was entitled to have the jury know the fact, so that they might not impute to him an act for which he was in no wise responsible. The matter thus coming into the trial as evidence, given by witnesses under oath, subject to cross-examination and contradiction, and all the means by which the truth is sifted out by a trial in court, it would be then for the jury, and be open for such argument based upon it, including such inferences deducible from it, as might fairly be warranted. If the prosecuting attorney had not seen proper to introduce the matter as evidence before the jury in the case on trial, it was at the option of the trial judge to have issued a rule against the alleged offenders, and have tried them then and there, letting it have such effect on the trial of the principal case as it might, controlling its application by appropriate instructions to the jury. That such proceeding would have injected a trial into another trial is an incident of the nature of the offense. It is not unusual, rather it is usual, for the trial court to punish witnesses, attorneys, parties, jurors, or others for contempt committed in the court's presence during the trial, and inflict the punishment generally in the presence of the jury. Whether to do so depends on the circumstances of the case, and appeals to the sound discretion of the judge.

As neither course suggested was adopted when the attorney indulged the argument complained of, it should have been withdrawn in such manner as to leave no doubt that its evil effect was removed, or the court, upon the consent of the accused, should have set aside the swearing of the jury.

We perceive no other error in the record. Judgment reversed, and remanded for a new trial under proceedings consistent herewith.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

EDWARD L'HOUX

v.

UNION CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

(— Me. —, 77 Atl. 636.)

Servant — flying splinters — assumption of risk.

1. An experience adult assumes the risk of injury from flying splinters caused by striking a small chisel held against iron a hard blow with a heavy hammer.

Evidence — uncontradicted — right to follow.

2. The jury cannot act upon the uncontradicted testimony of an experienced laborer that he did not know that striking a hard blow with a heavy hammer upon a small chisel held against iron would cause splinters to fly, where ordinary observation and thought would have revealed that fact to him.

Note. — Liability of master for injuries caused by splinters flying from hammers or chisels, punches, and other similar tools.

The "common" tool rule.

It is a general rule recognized by a great many cases, that the duty of a master to exercise reasonable care to provide reasonably safe tools and appliances for his servants has no application where the tools and appliances furnished are of a simple nature, easily understood, and in which the defects, if any, can be readily observed by such servant. As to liability of master for injury by defect in common tool, see note to Vanderpool v. Partridge, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 668.

This rule has been applied and a recovery denied where the servant has been injured by slivers of iron or steel flying from hammers or chisels, punches, etc. Lynn v. Glucose Sugar Ref. Co. 128 Iowa, 501, 104 N. W. 577 (hammer); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weikal, 73 Kan. 763, 84 Pac. 720 (chisel); Gillaspie v. United Iron-Works, 76 Kan. 70, 90 Pac. 760 ("set" used as buffer); Golden v. Ellis, 104 Me. 177, 71 Atl. 649 (hammer); Dompier v. Lewis, 131 Mich. 144, 91 N. W. 152 (hammer); Koschman v. Ash, 98 Minn. 312, 116 Am. St. Rep. 373, 108 N. W. 514 (common sledge or hammer); Rahm v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 679, 108 S. W. 570 (bolt-punch hammer); Campbell v. T. A. Gillespie Co. 69 N. J. L. 279, 55 Atl. 276 (driftpin); Demato v. Hudson County Gas Co. 74 N. J. L. 793, 67 Atl. 28 (chisel); Martin v. Highland Park Mfg. Co. 128 N. C. 264, 83 Am. St. Rep. 671, 38 S. E. 876 (hammer); Meyer v. Ladewig, 130 Wis. 566, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 684, 110 N. W. 419 (hammer).

And, again, it has been held that a servant cannot recover for injuries due to splinters of steel flying from the head of hammers, or chisels, punches, etc., because in such an action the servant's opportunity of knowing of the defects in such tools is equal or superior to that of the master; this, of course, is merely another form of expressing the so-called common or simple tool rule. Fordyce v. Stafford, 57 Ark. 503, 22 S. W. 161 (chisel); Banks v. J. S. Schofield's Sons Co. 126 Ga. 667, 55 S. E. 939 (chisel); Gillaspie v. United Iron-Works

MOTION by defendant for a new trial after verdict for plaintiff on a trial before the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County, of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bisbee & Parker and Newell & Skelton, for defendant:

Plaintiff assumed the risk.

Golden v. Ellis, 104 Me. 177, 71 Atl. 649; Jensen v. Kyer, 101 Me. 112, 63 Atl. 389; Lemoine v. Aldrich, 177 Mass. 90, 58 N. E. 178; Bryant v. Great Northern Paper Co. 100 Me. 174, 60 Atl. 797; Cunningham v. Bath Iron Works, 92 Me. 510, 43 Atl.

106; Podvin v. Pepperen Mfg. Co. 104 Me. 564, 129 Am. St. Rep. 411, 72 Atl. 618.

Messrs. McGillicuddy & Morey for plaintiff.

Emery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's version of the reception of the injury for which he seeks to recover compensation is substantially as follows: He was in the employ of the defendant company in the construction of a system of waterworks for supplying a town with water, etc., and while in such employ, a Mr. Reed, whom the plaintiff supposed to have authority, and who appeared to have authority, from the defendant to do so, came to the plaintiff at the tool house, selected

Co. supra ("snap" or "set" used as a buffer); Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. 118 Mich. 275, 76 N. W. 497 (snap hammer).

It is only machinery and appliances which are recognized as in their nature dangerous to employees using them or working in proximity to them, as to which the employer owes the duty to the employee of looking out for his safety. Lynn v. Glucose Sugar Ref. Co. supra.

A master is under no obligation to a servant to inspect for defects a hammer which was reasonably safe and free from obvious defects when furnished, although it was of peculiar construction and intended for use on iron or steel. Meyer v. Ladewig, supra.

Although a hammer is made of suitable material and properly tempered, yet it is a matter of common knowledge that when it is used with great force upon other implements small chips of steel are likely to fall off and fly from one instrument or the other. Golden v. Ellis, supra.

The duty of inspection and repair of chisels, driftpins, and similar tools, so as to prevent their getting into a condition that slivers are likely to fly off, is upon the servant. Campbell v. T. A. Gillespie Co. and Demato v. Hudson County Gas Co. supra.

The danger of chips of steel flying from a chisel which is being struck with a hammer is an obvious danger concerning which the master is under no obligation to warn a servant. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weikal, supra.

The ordinary rule of the nonliability of an employer for injury sustained by an adult employee of ordinary discretion, through the voluntary use of a defective tool, when the facts and the danger were within the comprehension of any ordinarily intelligent and prudent man, and were as completely within the knowledge and appreciation of the servant as of the master, is applicable to the case of a man who lost an eye by being struck by a sliver of steel from a "set" or "snap" used to receive the blows of the sledge in riveting I-beams. Gillaspie v. United Iron-Works Co. supra. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The promise to repair rule does not apply to simple tools like a hammer, so as to remove the question of assumption of risk, and permit a recovery for injuries due to a splinter of metal flying from the hammer. Webster Mfg. Co. v. Nisbett, 205 Ill. 273, 68 N. E. 936.

But in Buchanan v. Blanchard (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 1153, the court held that the general rule that a servant assumes no risk of defective conditions unless he knows thereof, or it is so obvious as to charge him with knowledge of them and of the danger incident to their use, is not limited in its application to complex instruments, but applies to simple tools in ordinary use, so that a servant will not assume the risk of an injury from a sliver or splinter of steel flying off from the head of a steel cutter, unless he knew or ought to have known that the cutter was defective.

And the general rule that the servant has a right to rely upon the safety of the tools furnished by the master was held to apply in Drolet v. La Compagnie de Pulpe de Metabetchouan, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 26 C. S. 107, where a plaintiff was injured by a sliver of steel which flew off from a chisel with which he was at work with other servants in cutting a steel rail.

A flogging hammer used in a machine shop for striking chisels and similar instruments, when manufactured and furnished by the master, is an implement within the rule requiring the master to furnish tools and appliances reasonably safe for the purpose used, and to such tools the common tool rule does not apply. Morris v. Eastern R. Co. 88 Minn. 112, 92 N. W. 535; Vant Hul v. Great Northern R. Co. 90 Minn. 329, 96 N. W. 789.

Master's liability as determined by ordinary rules of master and servant.

In many cases the master's liability for injuries caused by splinters of steel or iron flying from the heads of hammers or chisels, punches, or other similar instruments, on being struck by a hammer, is determined by the general rules of master and servant.

Thus, if the servant knows of the defect

a small steel "cold chisel" and a 7 pound striking hammer, and directed the plaintiff to take those tools and go with him to cut off some iron pipe. The plaintiff did so without objection. On reaching the place, Mr. Reed held the chisel upon the pipe, and directed the plaintiff to strike the head of the chisel with the hammer. The plaintiff struck a first blow "not very hard," and then a second blow "pretty near" as hard as he could. As a result of the second blow a fragment broke off the point of the chisel and flew up into his eye.

There was no evidence that the chisel or the hammer was visibly imperfect, or that the chisel was improperly held for the plaintiff to strike upon it, or that the plaintiff was directed to strike so hard. The only proposition upon which the plaintiff bases his claim for compensation is that Reed was negligent in selecting so small a chisel and so heavy a hammer. In answer it is contended by the defendant that the danger of breakage in striking so heavily with such a hammer upon such a chisel placed against an iron pipe was so obvious that the plaintiff must be charged with knowledge of it; that the plaintiff alone was responsible for striking so hard as to break the point of the chisel; and hence must be held to have assumed the risk.

It appears from the plaintiff's own testimony that he was thirty-seven years old; that he had worked for seventeen years in the construction of waterworks, railroads, etc.; that he had used a striking hammer on a steel drill every year when there was blasting to do; that he knew steel drills used on stone hammered down on top and sometimes broke off at the point; that he had this chisel made from a piece of steel he took to the blacksmith. He saw clearly the kind of hammer and the kind of chisel proposed to be used.

It would seem to be a matter of common knowledge that, when steel hammers are struck with great force upon steel chisels or drills held against iron surfaces, chips in the hammer, chisel, or other tool, he will ordinarily be precluded from recovering for the injury, under the doctrine of assumption of risk. Fordyce v. Stafford, 57 Ark. 503, 22 S. W. 161 (chisel); Baker v. Western & A. R. Co. 68 Ga. 699 (sledge); Banks v. J. S. Schofield's Sons Co. 126 Ga. 667, 55 S. E. 939 (chisel); Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weikal, 73 Kan. 763, 84 Pac. 720 (chisel); Golden v. Ellis, 104 Me. 177, 71 Atl. 649 (hammer); Buchanan v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 10 N. Y. S. R. 326 (chisel); Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Conrad, 62 Tex. 627 (cold chisel); H. S. Hopkins Bridge Co. v. Burnett, 85 Tex. 16, 19 S. W. 886 (hammer); Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Ramp, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 70 S. W. 568 (chisel); San Antonio Sewer Pipe Co. v. Moll, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 83 S. W. 900 (chisel).

Of course, if the servant is guilty of contributory negligence, either in the manner of using the tool or because the tool itself is essentially dangerous in the condition in which it is, there can be no recovery. Baker v. Western & A. R. Co. 68 Ga. 699 (sledge); San Antonio Sewer Pipe Co. v. Moll, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 83 S. W. 900 (chisel).

Where the head of a hammer or of a chisel, punch, or other such instrument has become battered and burred by use, an experienced workman must be held to have knowledge of the fact that slivers of iron or steel are likely to fly off,—that being an ordinary occurrence or incident of the use of such a tool in that condition. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Phinney, 38 Ind. App. 546, 77 N. E. 296 (punch); Kellogg v. New York Edison Co. 120 App. Div. 410, 105 N. Y. Supp. 398 (hand drill).

1125, where a servant, while steadying a rail which was being cut several feet from him, by other servants by means of a hammer and chisel, was injured by a sliver of steel flying from either the hammer or the chisel or the rail, it was held that the master was not liable, since the method adopted had long been in general use upon railroads, and was deemed the most effective way to cut the rail, and there was no proof that any accident had ever occurred before by the flying off of slivers from the implements used in carrying on the work. The nonliability of the master was put squarely upon the ground that he was not negligent, since the danger was not one which could have been reasonably anticipated.

A master is not liable for injuries due to splinters of steel flying from the head of defective hammers or chisels, where the master has furnished a number of such tools and the servant or his fellow servants have voluntarily selected a defective one. Needham v. Stone, 186 Mass. 565, 72 N. E. 80 (cutting chisel); Rawley v. Colliau, 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350 (sledge hammer); Hefferen v. Northern P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 471, 48 N. W. 1, 526 (cold chisel).

It cannot be assumed as a matter of law that the master was negligent because a sledge hammer was lying about a blacksmith shop with its face cracked or battered, when there were others that were sound and in safe condition for use, and when neither the plaintiff nor any of his fellow employees were obliged or directed by the defendant to use this particular hammer in their work, and when they could have used a hammer not defective. Rawley v. Colliau, supra.

But if the driftpin at the time it was taken by the servant was unfit for use and subject to throw off splinters, and there was not a reasonable supply of safe pins particles of steel are liable to break off in the chisel, as well as from the hammer the iron surface, and fly up and about. Especially would it seem that a man of plaintiff's age, experience, opportunities of observation, and knowledge of the liability of the steel drills to break off at the point when held against stone, would know there was such danger when such a chisel was held against iron and struck so hard with a 7-pound hammer. If this were all that appeared in the evidence, there would be no question that the plaintiff assumed the risk of the consequences resulting from a heavy blow, under the familiar rule that a servant, if he does not stipulate otherwise, assumes such risks in his employment as are known to him, or would be known to him by the exercise of ordinary observation and forethought. Golden v. Bliss, 104 Me. 177, 71 Atl. 640.

But the plaintiff further testified that he in fact did not know that, in striking as hard as he did with that hammer upon that chisel held against the iron pipe, there was any danger or liability of bits of steel breaking off from the chisel and flying about. His counsel argues that that testimony warranted the jury's finding that he did not assume the risk. Despite his assertion to the contrary, however, it is so clear that he must have known the danger or liability, had he been, as it was his duty to be, ordinarily observant and thoughtful, that the jury finding, resting as it does on that assertion alone, cannot be sustained. We must assume that he was ordinarily observant and caretaking, since such was his duty. Workmen are not excused from the exercise of their senses and reasoning faculties, and, unless they stipulate otherwise, they assume the risks that such exercise would reveal to them.

Motion sustained.
Verdict set aside.

accessible to him, from which he might have selected a safe one, then the master is at fault. Campbell v. T. A. Gillespie Co. 69 N. J. L. 279, 55 Atl. 276.

Under the Missouri doctrine, that a servant never assumes the risk of the master's negligence, a servant, if in the exercise of due care, may recover for injuries caused by splinters flying off from hammers, chisels, punches, and other similar tools, where the master knew of the defect or was chargeable with knowledge thereof. Johnson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 96 Mo. 340, 9 Am. St. Rep. 351, 9 S. W. 790; Franklin v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 97 Mo. App. 473, 71 S. W. 540; Robbins v. Big Circle Min. Co. 105 Mo. App. 78, 79 S. W. 480.

So, a common section hand will not be chargeable with contributory negligence in using a defective claw bar a splinter from which flew up and struck him in the eye, where, although he knew of the defect, he did not fully comprehend the danger. Booth v. Kansas City & I. Air Line, 76 Mo. App. 516.

And averments to the effect that a drift-pin constructed of iron or steel was defective in that it was improperly and unskillfully made, and of defective material, shape, and construction, rendering it liable to chip and splinter, are sufficiently specific, and adequately advise the defendant of the facts constituting a right of action. Rickaly v. O'Brien Boiler Works Co. 108 Mo. App. 130, 82 S. W. 963.

As in all other cases, a servant is not chargeable with the assumption of the risk of splinters or chips flying from hammers, or chisels, punches, etc., where he has neither actual nor constructive knowledge of the danger.

Thus, a servant may recover for injuries received from the splintering of a brass punch furnished by the master, where he had previously used an iron punch, and did not know that a brass one would splinter. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Whisenhunt, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 135, 81 S. W. 332.

And it is error to grant a nonsuit in an action by a servant for an injury caused by a splinter flying from a chisel which he was using, where it was made of coarse-grained steel, and not fine-grained steel as chisels for his work were ordinarily made, and the foreman had assured the plaintiff that it was all right, and it so appeared to the plaintiff upon an examination of it before using it. Crilley v. New Amsterdam Gas Co. 106 App. Div. 127, 94 N. Y. Supp. 102.

So, where the character of the work is such and the tools are of such delicate material that the splinters are so small as not to be noticeable, the servant will not be chargeable with assumption of risk, in the absence of warning of the danger on the part of the master. Standard Oil Co. v. Fordeck, 34 Ind. App. 181, 71 N. E. 163.

A recovery was allowed in Famous Mfg. Co. v. Harmon, 28 Ind. App. 117, 62 N. E. 306, for injuries caused by the flying off of a splinter of steel from a punch with which the plaintiff was engaged in punching holes in a piece of iron with a punching machine, where he had no means of knowing of the defects in the punch.

An inexperienced workman who complained to his foreman that a hammer being used by him was defective, and was assured by the foreman that it was all right, may recover for injuries caused by a splinter flying therefrom and striking him in the eye, as he had the right to rely upon the superior knowledge of the foreman. Duerst v. St. Louis Stamping Co. 163 Mo. 607, 63 S. W. 827.

Where a servant upon a railroad, engaged in driving spikes, is furnished by the section boss with an iron maul known by the boss to be defective, and is injured in consequence of such defect, the company is liable, although the defect was patent, and would have been known to the servant had he inspected it. Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 11 Lea, 373, 47 Am. Rep. 286.

Where the plaintiff was inexperienced, and did not know that the new tool which had been furnished him to work with was more brittle and more likely to splinter than the tool with which he was more familiar, he cannot be held to have assumed the risk of the danger of the tool so splintering. Littlefield v. Edward P. Allis Co. 177 Mass. 151, 58 N. E. 692.

That a sliver of steel was likely to fly from a rod which was being hammered to cause it to swell ought to have been anticipated and guarded against by the master, and an inexperienced workman may recover for injuries caused thereby. Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. Ohler, 161 Ind. 393, 68 N. E. 901.

Master's liability as affected by fact that defective tool was furnished to and used by another servant.

If the plaintiff is injured by a splinter flying off a hammer or chisel, punch, or other such tool, which had been furnished by the master to another servant and was being used by him, then the master is generally held liable.

Thus, the master's liability for injuries to a servant caused by a splinter of steel flying from a "soft-head" or buffer furnished for his use is not defeated by the fact that the defective condition was known to a fellow servant who procured the tool for use by himself and the injured servant, and who was therefore negligent in regard to such use. Noble v. Bessemer S. S. Co. 127 Mich. 103, 54 L.R.A. 456, 89 Am. St. Rep. 461, 86 N. W. 520.

So, a machinist engaged in the work of chipping a casting by means of a chisel which he himself held while it was being struck by a sledge hammer supplied by the master is under no obligation to inspect the helper's sledge or to observe its defective condition, and he has a right to assume that the master had performed its duty and furnished the helper with a proper tool. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Quinlan, 77 Kan. 126, 93 Pac. 632.

And a servant can recover where he is injured by a sliver flying off a spike maul being used by a fellow servant, where he did not have actual knowledge of the defective maul, and never had occasion to use it so as to be chargeable with constructive knowledge. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Roberts, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1160, 70 S. W. 833.

A servant injured by splinters flying from the head of a defective chisel used by a fellow servant, and which he himself had never seen, may recover for such injury, since the act of the foreman in selecting the chisel was that of the master. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Walker, 41 Ind. App. 588, 84 N. E. 730.

If the defective tool is furnished to another servant, and the injured servant has no occasion to examine the same, nor an opportunity of observing it, then the master will be liable for injuries resulting therefrom. De la Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Stahl, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 471, 60 S. W. 319; Texas Mexican R. C. v. Trijerina, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 100, 111 S. W. 239.

Where tool is not shown to be dangerous.

If the tool is not shown to be defective or dangerous, then the master cannot be held liable, even if the common tool rule would not apply.

Thus a servant is properly nonsuited in an action for injuries caused by a splinter flying from a pin which he was driving into a rivet hole for the purpose of making the hole larger, if he fails to show that the pin was defective. Goransson v. Riter-Conley Mfg. Co. 186 Mo. 300, 85 S. W. 338.

And the master is not liable where there was no proof that the condition of the chisel before the blow was struck was dangerous, nor that an examination would have disclosed the danger. Mulligan v. Crimmins, 75 Hun, 578, 27 N. Y. Supp. 819, affirmed without opinion in 149 N. Y. 594, 44 N. E. 1126. W. M. G.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE C. TUDOR
v.

R. J. BOWEN, Appt

(152 N. C. 441, 67 S. E. 1015.)

Negligence — cranking automobile — frightening horse — liability.

1. One attempting to crank an automobile in close proximity to horses, without paying any attention to whether or not they are frightened by the resulting noise, and continuing to turn the crank until the machine starts notwithstanding the horses manifest fright, as the result of which they run away, is responsible for the resulting injury to them.

Same — notice to driver.

2. It is negligence per se to attempt to crank a defective automobile which makes a terrible noise when starting, in close proximity to horses, without giving their driver notice to remove them to a safe place.

Note.—Various questions affecting the liability for injuries caused by the frightening of horses by automobiles will be found in earlier notes in this series indexed under the topic "Automobiles."

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The second and third paragraphs of the charge referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"(2) Although the jury may find that there was nothing unusual about the defendant's automobile, and that it did not make any unusual noise, still, if they further find that the defendant knew, or could by the exercise of that care required of him under the circumstances—that is, by the use of ordinary care—have known, that the horses were restless and had been frightened by his automobile, if the jury find as a fact that they were restless and frightened thereby, then it was a wrongful and negligent act for him to have done anything in reference to his automobile which would have been considered by an ordinarily prudent man to have a tendency to increase their fright and cause them to run away; and, if the jury find that the defendant, under the circumstances just stated, cranked his machine and started it off, and by the noise made thereby the team was caused to run away, they will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'"

"(3) If the jury should find from the evidence that, in attempting to start the defendant's machine, it made an unusually loud and alarming noise, one calculated to startle or frighten horses of ordinary temper and training, and this condition of the machine was known to the defendant, it was his duty in operating said machine to use reasonable prudence in seeing that no horses or animals were about, and so situated as, under reasonable circumstances, would be frightened by the starting of the said machine; and if the defendant, knowing that he had a machine which made such an unusual and alarming noise, failed to look around or to regard horses that were frightened in his immediate vicinity, and went on cranking his machine, making such a noise as would reasonably scare horses of ordinary temper and training, and if thereby as a proximate result plaintiff's horses were scared and the injury brought about, he would be guilty of negligence, and you will answer the first issue, 'Yes.'"

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Watson, Buxton & Watson for appellant.

Messrs. Manly & Hendren, for appellee:

The degree of care required in the use and operation of a vehicle upon the streets of a city depends upon the dangerous character of the vehicle and its liability to do injury to others lawfully upon such streets, as well as its liability to frighten animals. The more dangerous its character, and the greater its liability to do injury to others or to frighten animals, the greater the degree of care and caution required in its use and operation.

Bennett v. Lovell, 12 R. I. 166, 34 Am. Rep. 628; Knight v. Lanier, 69 App. Div. 454, 74 N. Y. Supp. 999; Miller v. Addison, 96 Md. 731, 54 Atl. 967; Hannigan v. Wright, 5 Penn. (Del.) 537, 63 Atl. 237; Indiana Springs Co. v. Brown, 165 Ind. 465, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 238, 74 N. E. 615, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 650; Ingraham v. Stockamore, 63 Misc. 114, 118 N. Y. Supp. 399; Towle v. Morse, 103 Me. 250, 68 Atl. 1044; Mason v. West, 61 App. Div. 40, 70

There is, however, but little specific authority upon the question involved in TUDOR v. BOWEN, as to the liability for frightening horses by the noise peculiar to the starting of an automobile. The question, like most others relating to liability for frightening horses, is generally one of fact for the jury upon the evidence.

It was so held in Fisher v. McGrath (Minn.) 128 N. W. 579, where a young woman, twenty-four years of age, accustomed to driving horses and meeting automobiles, when at a distance of about 80 rods, saw the defendant on his knees looking at his automobile, which was stationary on the highway, and having no reason to anticipate trouble in passing kept on her way until she had reached a point 25 feet from the machine, at which time the defendant and two ladies were standing near its front end, and continued to drive along without giving any indication that she wished to pass, when the defendant, without giving any warning, suddenly started his motor causing the usual nerve-wrecking noise made by a machine when cranked, frightening the horse, which whirled and threw the plaintiff into a ditch. The court said in effect that the mere fact of starting the machine was not evidence of negligence, but that the failure to warn the plaintiff of the intent to start the motor was the gist of the cause of action.

Whether the owner of an automobile having stopped at the request of a driver whose horse was frightened by the approach of the machine was guilty of negligence in starting up his machine again while the driver was holding the horse by the head, and while the horse was still frightened, is a question for the jury. Knight v. Lanier, 69 App. Div. 454, 74 N. Y. Supp. 999. In this case it appeared to be the moving vehicle itself, rather than any noise incident to its starting, that caused the horse to become frightened.

N. Y. Supp. 478; McCann v. Consolidated Traction Co. 59 N. J. L. 481, 38 L.R.A. 236, 36 Atl. 888; Ayars v. Camden & Suburban R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 416, 43 Atl. 680; Feeney v. Wabash R. Co. 123 Mo. App. 1, 97 S. W. 974.

If the defendant knew, or could by the exercise of that care required of him under the circumstances have known, of the restless and frightened condition of the horses, it was his duty to refrain from doing anything, even though under other circumstances he might have had a right to do it, about his automobile, which would, by an ordinarily prudent man, have been considered to increase their fright and cause them to run away, such as cranking his machine and starting it off.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No motion to nonsuit was made, and no assignment of error challenges the sufficiency of the evidence upon the issue of negligence. So we have to consider only the correctness of the portions of the charge excepted to in view of the evidence adduced on the trial. In the brief the defendant abandons the first assignment of error, and confines his criticisms to the second and third paragraphs of the charge.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff tends to prove that the defendant was driving his automobile on the streets of Winston-Salem, and stopped it for purposes of examination within a few feet of where plaintiff's team of horses were standing harnessed to a surrey and in charge of a competent driver; that the machine could not be seen by the horses, but could be heard by them; that when the machine was being cranked for the purpose of starting, one horse began to prance and show symptoms of fright; that the cranking kept on and did not stop, causing the horses to run away and injure themselves and the vehicle; that the driver, when the cranking commenced, called to defendant to "wait a minute," but whether the call was heard or not does not appear. This evidence also tends to prove that the defendant's automobile made a most unusual and loud noise while being cranked up; that "the gear wheels were loose, and made a terrible noise;" that no other machine makes such a fearful noise; that it could have been avoided by using rawhide gearing, but defendant said the price was too high. Upon this phase of the evidence we think his Honor's charge is supported by generally recognized principles of law. Negligence is essentially relative and comparative. The legal duty we owe to others is the accepted standard, and that duty is measured by the exigencies of the occasion. A want of caution to avoid injury, where the duty to exercise caution is incumbent, and a reckless or heedless use of a dangerous agency in a locality where the peril from its use is obvious, constitute breaches of duty which may become, when causing injury, actionable negligence. As has been said, "The term covers all those shades of inadvertence which range between deliberate intention on the one hand and total absence of responsible consciousness on the other." Cooke v. Baltimore Traction Co. 80 Md. 554, 31 Atl. 327; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 506. The existence of negligence is therefore to be sought for in the facts and surroundings of each particular case.

Although the use of automobiles began in recent years, it seems to have caused much litigation, though not in this state. It is the consensus of judicial opinion that it is the duty of the operator of an automobile upon highways and public streets to use every reasonable precaution to avoid causing injury, and this duty requires him to take into consideration "the character of his machine and its tendency to frighten horses." Hannigan v. Wright, 5 Penn. (Del.) 537, 63 Atl. 234; House v. Cramer, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. p. 463, note, and cases cited. The possession of a powerful or dangerous vehicle imposes upon the chauffeur the duty of employing a degree of care commensurate with the risk of danger to others, engendered by the use of such a machine on a public thoroughfare.

Upon the case as made out by plaintiff we think the defendant is liable for the damage done, upon two phases of the evidence:

1. The proximity of the auto to plaintiff's team when it stopped was such that defendant must have seen the horses and vehicle, unless he was either blind or guilty of gross carelessness. There is evidence sufficient to go to the jury that when the defendant began to "crank up," the animals manifested fright, and that defendant, if at all observant, must have seen it, but, instead of stopping his cranking, he continued until his machine started. It is well settled that it is the duty of an autoist to stop his machine, or to do whatever is reasonably required to relieve persons of peril, when he sees a horse is becoming frightened by his machine. Indiana Springs Co. v. Brown, 165 Ind. 465, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 238, 74 N. E. 615, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 666; Shinkle v. McCullough, 116 Ky. 960, 105 Am. St. Rep. 249, 77 S. W. 186; House v. Cramer, supra, and cases cited in notes. This duty is imposed by statutes in many states regulating the use of automobiles, but we think it is easily deducible from elementary principles of the common law. Long v. Warlick, 148 N. C. 32, 61 S. E. 617. It was the duty of this defendant, assuming that his machine was a normal one, when he began to "crank up" to keep a watchful eye on the horses standing so close by. It was his duty, when he saw that they were manifesting symptoms of fright, to stop at once, until the horses could be removed. There is evidence that in this respect the defendant failed in his duty.

2. The plaintiff shows by evidence that defendant's machine was not a normal, but a most abnormal, one; that the noise it made when cranking up was something "terrible," to use the expression of one witness. That defendant was fully aware of this, and refused to correct it because of the incidental expense, is testified to by the machinist Hamlin. His Honor might well have told the jury that to crank up such a defective and abnormal machine in close proximity to a pair of horses, without giving the driver notice to remove them, is per se negligence. This imposes no great burden upon those who use the public highways, even with the best-equipped and safest machines. To require less would render the highways of the country dangerous to the lives and property of those who daily use them.

We are of the opinion that his Honor correctly and fairly submitted the case to the jury, in a charge free from error.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

P. E. BROOKS et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.

HINTON STATE BANK.

(— Okla. —, 110 Pac. 46.)

Assumpsit — money not rightfully retained.

1. An action will lie to recover a sum certain whenever one has the money of another which he in equity and good conscience has no right to retain.

Same — money held by second assignee.

2. Plaintiffs' evidence disclosed that P., having a claim against a county for building a bridge, assigned, in writing, a part thereof to them, as partners, in payment of a debt due the firm; that said assignment when made was pinned to said claim; that subsequently, while in this condition, said claim was, in writing on the back thereof,

Headnotes by TURNER, J.

Note. — Right of first assignee of claim to recover from the second assignee the amount collected by latter on the claim.

Although there are many cases in which one person sought, in an action for money had and received, to recover money which for some reason had been paid to another, the cases are but few where, as in Brooks v. Hinton State Bank, the money in question had been assigned to two different assignees.

In Carnegie Trust Co. v. Battery Place Realty Co. 67 Misc. 452, 122 N. Y. Supp. 697, where a creditor after assigning a part of the amount due him from his debtor, assigned to a second assignee an amount greater than still remained, and the debtor, with notice of both assignments, paid the second assignee the whole amount assigned, it was said: "The relation between the assignor and the state was that of debtor and creditor. The assignment to the plaintiff was a valid assignment. The assignment to the defendant was subject to the plaintiff's prior rights by virtue of his earlier assignment. Under these circumstances the plaintiff might have repudiated the payment by the debtor and recovered the amount thereof from him; but he had also the right to adopt and ratify the act of the debtor in making the payment, and bring this action for money had and received."

assigned by P. to defendant, and by it lodged in the office of the county clerk, where the same was filed, and by the chairman of the board of county commissioners approved, audited, allowed, and by said board paid in full to defendant. Held, in a suit by plaintiffs against defendant for the amount due them under their assignment, that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the evidence.

ERROR to the District Court for Caddo County to review a judgment dismissing an action brought to recover certain moneys which defendant had received upon an assigned claim but to which plaintiffs alleged title under a prior assignment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. J. Morris for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. H. W. Morgan and F. E. Gillette, for defendant in error:

Where there are two claimants for the same money, and one of them is recognized as being entitled to it by the person from whom it is due, and is paid, the other cannot sue him to recover the money, for the reason that having received the money under a claim of right in himself, the law will not imply any contract or promise by him to hold the money for the use of the other claimant, or to pay it over to him, and therefore there is not, under the circumstances, any privity of contract on which to found the action.

27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 859 & cases cited.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 22, 1904, P. E. Brooks and H. Flanagan, partners as Brooks & Flanagan, plaintiffs in error, sued the Hinton State Bank, defendant in error, in the district court of Caddo county as in assumption for money had and received. After answer and reply filed there was trial to a jury. At the close of plaintiffs' testimony defendant demurred to the evidence, which was sustained, the suit dismissed, and plaintiffs taxed with the costs. After motion for a new trial filed and overruled, plaintiffs bring the case here, and assign that the court erred in sustaining said motion. There is no conflict in the testimony. It discloses that on April 18, 1904, Caddo county being indebted to C. H. Patterson for the construction of the Henley bridge, he, on that date, made out a claim against the county for the amount due him therefor, and swore thereto before S. B. Gorman, township trustee; that on the same day, being indebted to plaintiffs for material furnished him in the construction of the bridge, he made out an order, which read:

Bridgeport, O. T., 4-18-1904.

To the Honorable Board of County Commissioners of Caddo County, O. T.

Gentlemen:—

Pay to Brooks & Flanagan out of contract for what is known as Henley Bridge, sections 10 and 15, amount of it to be paid Brooks & Flanagan is $165.00.

C. H. Patterson.

—and pinned it to said claim. In this shape it was then turned over to said township trustees, who turned it over to defendant in error, which procured an assignment written upon the body of the claim, which reads:

Bridgeport, O. T., April 20-1904.

I hereby assign the within claim to the Hinton State Bank. C. H. Patterson.

With both assignments on the claim it was, by the bank, then forwarded to the county clerk, filed, approved, audited, and allowed, and the following indorsements made thereon:

No. 2953. Claim of C. H. Patterson against Caddo county, Oklahoma, for bridge material. Filed 22d day of April, 1904.

Fremont Boyle, County Clerk.

Amount claimed $258 82
Amount approved 22d day of April,

1904, for building bridge $258 82

Audited and allowed on R. & B. fund this 22d day of April, 1904.

C. W. Ludwick, Chairman.

While in the office of the county clerk the assignment by Patterson to Brooks & Flanagan of their part of the claim became detached and lost, and a controversy arose as to whom and in what amounts the claim should be paid. In passing on the matter the board of county commissioners made the following order: "There seeming to be a controversy over claim 2953 allowed to C. H. Patterson, different parties claiming to have an assignment of said claim, the clerk is hereby directed to draw one warrant for $194.12, and one warrant for $64.70, the two warrants to cover claim 2953; and he is further directed to hold said warrant awaiting the further direction of the board."

Later, the attorney for defendant called for and received the warrant for $194.12, the amount of plaintiff's claim, concerning which there appears this entry:

Paid by warrant No. 193, claim 2953,

$194.12, issued July 29, 1904, Series C, in favor of C. H. Patterson. For what purpose: Building bridge. Received this order the 6th day of August, 1904.

Carl Glitsch, Attorney.

Plaintiffs sue to recover the $194.12 paid by the treasurer to defendant on the warrant. We think they are entitled to recover, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence.

We gather from the briefs that the trial court predicated its action on the ground that the evidence failed to disclose any privity of contract on which to found the action. We think there is sufficient privity. This is established when the evidence discloses that one person has another's money which he in equity and good conscience has no right to keep. In such a case there arises an implication of law that he will pay it over. This was so held by this court in Allsman v. Oklahoma City, 21 Okla. 142, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 511, 95 Pac. 468, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 184, where the second section of the syllabus reads: "An action will lie to recover a sum certain whenever one has the money of another which he in equity and good conscience has no right to retain." The doctrine is thus broadly stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gaines v. Miller, 111 U. S. 395, 28 L. ed. 466, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426, where the court said: "Whenever one person has in his hands money equitably belonging to another, that other person may recover it by assumpsit for money had and received. Pickard v. Bankes, 13 East, 20; Spratt v. Hobhouse, 4 Bing. 173; Israel v. Douglas, 1 H. Bl. 239; Beardsley v. Root, 11 Johns. 406; Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass. 575; Clafin v. Godfrey, 21 Pick. 1."

Brand v. Williams, 29 Minn. 238, 13 N. W. 42, was a suit in assumpsit for money had and received. The facts set forth in the complaint in substance were that the sheriff of Lyon county held in his possession a stock of goods belonging to Robinson & Mass under certain levies of executions against them, in favor of certain creditors, including plaintiffs; three of said executions, amounting to some $2,000, were prior to plaintiffs', which was next, and amounted to over $1,000; that under these executions the sheriff sold the goods for $4,000 in cash, sufficient to cover costs and fees, and to satisfy all said executions; that defendant, knowing plaintiff to be entitled to satisfaction out of said sum, induced the sheriff to turn over to him all of the proceeds of said sale left after payment of the first execution, and refused to pay plaintiff his share thereof on demand. The court gave judgment for defendant on the plea—30 L.R.A. (N.S.) ings. Held error, and the case reversed. The supreme court in passing, in effect, held, and declared the proposition elementary, that an action in assumpsit for money had and received would lie whenever one man has received or obtained the possession of the money of another, which he ought in equity and good conscience to pay over; that there need be no privity between the parties or any promise to pay other than that which results or may be implied from one man's having another's money which he has no right in conscience to retain; that when the fact is proved that he has the money, if he can show no legal or equitable ground for retaining it, the law implies the privity and the promise.

Ph. Zang Brewing Co. v. Bernheim, 7 Colo. App. 528, 44 Pac. 380, was a suit by Bernheim Brothers against the brewing company to compel them to pay over money had and received for plaintiff's use. They and Uri were judgment creditors of Herman Eli, as were also Oppenheimer Brothers and Rabb Brothers; executions issued on all said judgments and money collected sufficient to satisfy the Oppenheimer judgment in full and the Rabb judgment in part, leaving a balance which was, according to appellee's contention, properly applicable to the payment of their judgment. This money was in the hands of the sheriff, who failed to apply it to appellee's claim, but turned it over to a constable who held an execution in favor of the Zwang Brewing Company, and said company applied it in satisfaction of their claim. Appellee contended that the brewing company was not entitled to hold it, and sued for its recovery. There was judgment for appellee. The brewing company appealed. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed. The supreme court in passing recognized the well-established doctrine above set forth and said: "The rule in these cases is very broad, and is ample to include an action by the Bernheim Brothers against the brewing company to compel them to pay over this fund which they had wrongfully received and applied to the discharge of their debt,"—citing Brand v. Williams, supra; Haebler v. Myers, 132 N. Y. 363, 15 I.R.A. 588, 28 Am. St. Rep. 589, 30 N. E. 963; Clark v. Pinney, 6 Cow. 297.

In Bates-Farley Sav. Bank v. Dismukes, 107 Ga. 212, 33 S. E. 175, the petition alleged Dismukes and certain other persons therein named to be the respective owners of certain certificates issued by a certain loan association, representing their stock therein. On each of said stock certificates was printed the contract between the association and its stockholders, in substance, that the certificate might at any time after one year and before two years be returned and the member entitled to receive for each share the money paid into the loan fund; that at any time after two years and before maturity the member would be entitled to withdraw his stock and receive the amount paid into the loan fund and not less than 6 per cent interest for the average time,—withdrawal of shares to be on sixty days' notice to the association; that each of said stockholders desiring to receive the withdrawal value of his stock indorsed or transferred the certificate representing the same to the said association "for withdrawal." Subsequently, plaintiff in error bank obtained possession of said certificates from said association, some of them being transferred to it in writing. Upon each said bank collected from said association the withdrawal value of said stock, which the certificate represented, returning the certificate with its own indorsement in blank thereon to the association, which thereupon marked the certificate "withdrawn." Subsequently Dismukes became the owner by proper assignment of the separate rights of the other stockholders under their respective certificates and their respective rights against the bank, and brought suit against it for money had and received. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and the bank appealed. The supreme court affirmed the judgment of the trial court, and on the subject of privacy quoted approvingly from Nisbit, J., in Culbreath v. Culbreath, 7 Ga. 68, 50 Am. Dec. 375, wherein he said: "It is not founded upon the idea of a contract." And from Lord Mansfield in Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, where he said: "If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund, the law implies a debt and gives this action, founded in the equity of the plaintiff's case, as if it were upon contract." See also Dorsey v. Williams, 48 Ill. App. 386; Calais v. Whidden, 64 Me. 249; Richardson v. Moffitt-West Drug Co. 92 Mo. App. 515, 69 S. W. 398; Tamm v. Kellogg, 49 Mo. 118; 27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 857. The great weight of authority supports this doctrine, although there are some cases which seem to hold that where of two claimants for the same money, one of them is recognized as being entitled to receive it by the person from whom it is due, and is paid, the other cannot sue him to recover the money. The cases so holding fail to recognize any privacy on which to found the action. In so far as they conflict with our holding in this case, we refuse to follow them.

For the error complained of, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

BARRON COUNTY, Respt.,

v.

J. C. BECKWITH, Appt.

(142 Wis. 519, 124 N. W. 1030.)

Officer — fees — accounting — naturalization.

The fees or compensation to be turned over to the county treasurer by a county clerk who is by statute upon a salary in lieu of all fees or compensation for services rendered by him, which shall be so turned over, include fees collected under the naturalization laws of the United States, which authorize and permit him to retain a portion of the fee received, although the Federal law is passed subsequently to the state law, so that they were not directly in contemplation when the state law was passed.

Note. — Right of clerk on salary basis to retain fee for naturalization.

It is generally held that a clerk under a fixed salary is not entitled to retain as his own the fees received in naturalization cases by virtue of his office.

Thus, in Cowan v. New York, 3 Hun, 632, 6 Thomp. & C. 151, a salaried clerk and assistant in the marine court in the city of New York is not entitled to recover compensation for extra work performed by him, in furnishing naturalization papers and indexing naturalization books in that court, such services being imposed upon him by law as part of the duties pertaining to his office.

So, in People ex rel. Whittemore v. Seabury, 23 How. Pr. 121, a clerk of the city court of Brooklyn has no authority to retain as his own, fees received by him for the naturalization of aliens, where statute expressly declares that he shall be paid for his services, not by the fees he may receive, but by a fixed annual salary.

And in Eder v. Kreiter, 40 Ind. App. 542, 82 N. E. 552, it is held that the fee of $1 charged by the circuit court clerk under statute, and specifically designated therein as an item to be taxed and charged on behalf of the county, is the property of the county, and does not belong to the clerk.

But in United States v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169, 30 L. ed. 627, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510, affirming 25 Fed. 375, which was an action on the official bond of the clerk of a district court, for failure to account for fees charged by him in naturalization cases, it was held that such fees are not within § 833, Rev. Stat. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 642, requiring such clerks to account for all fees and emoluments of their offices of every name and nature, where it appears that for many years it had been the custom of the clerks of the United States for that district to collect the fees incident to naturalization proceedings, without including them

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Barron County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover certain fees which had been allowed defendant under Federal statutes for services in naturalization proceedings, to which plaintiff alleged that it was entitled under a state statute placing the clerks of circuit courts of the state upon a salary basis of compensation. Affirmed

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him rendered in the circuit court for Barron county for the sum of $165.50. The question involved is the right of the clerks of the circuit courts of this state, who, pursuant to the state statute, have been placed upon a salary basis of compensation, to retain fees allowed to them by the Federal statutes for services in naturalization proceedings. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant was clerk of the circuit court for Barron county; that the county board of said county, pursuant to chapter 411, Laws of 1901, which provides for a change from the fee to the salary system, adopted in 1901 the following resolution: "Whereas, chapter 411, Laws of 1901, provides for a change from fees to salary system of officers therein named, therefore be it resolved in accordance therewith, that the method of compensating the clerk of circuit court for his in returns of fees and emoluments, which fact was known and approved of by the judge and accounting officers. In the opinion of the circuit court it is stated: "It is for services rendered under these rules and as a special officer of the court, and not as clerk, that these fees have been permitted. They were not duties pertaining to the office of clerk. They could as well have been performed by any other person designated by the court for the purpose, as by the district attorney or a commissioner of the circuit court or an attorney, or any suitable person not an officer of the court."

• Following the above case, United States v. McMillan, 165 U. S. 504, 41 L. ed. 805, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 395, holds that the clerk of a district court of a territory is not obliged to return to the United States, as a part of the emoluments of his office, sums received for his services in naturalization proceedings.

In Eldredge v. Salt Lake County, 27 Utah 106 Pac. 939, it is held that a clerk of the district court who performs services in naturalization proceedings under an act of Congress is not accountable to his county for fees retained as provided by that act, although he is paid a salary fixed by law. It seems from the opinion in this case that, prior to the passage of the naturalization act of June 29, 1906, Congress had left it to the several states to determine and fix the fees that the state or county officers should be permitted to collect for the services rendered by them in hearing and passing upon applications for and in making a record of the proceedings by which aliens were admitted to citizenship. By this act of Congress, however, the states were deprived of this power. In view of this the court said: "From the foregoing it seems clear to us that the duties which appellant discharged, and the services rendered by him, by virtue of the act of Congress aforesaid, are not duties which are imposed on, nor services which are rendered as a part of, the county office to which he was elected, and of which he was the incumbent during the time in which the fees in question were earned and received by him. If this be so, then the salary which he received as compensation for discharging the duties of such office was not intended to, and did not, constitute compensation for the extra official services he rendered as an agent of the general government in discharging the powers conferred on him by the act of Congress aforesaid, and for which services the fees in question were allowed him by the national, and not by the state, government." In distinguishing People ex rel. Whittemore v. Seabury, supra, the court said: "That case was decided in 1862, and by the decision the clerk of the city court of Brooklyn was required to account for fees collected by him in naturalization cases. At that time, however, as we have pointed out, Congress permitted the states to fix and collect the fees in naturalization cases which were conducted in the state courts. The whole question of what the fees should be, and how collected and accounted for, was thus left to the states. The whole matter being thus within the power of the states, they, no doubt, could determine what should be done with the fees they had the power to and did impose. We have seen, however, that Congress has deprived the states of the power to impose fees in naturalization cases, and with it went the power to dispose of them. In view, therefore, of the changed conditions, and for the reasons hereinbefore stated, the case last referred to is in our judgment not an authority."

So, in Hampden County v. Morris (Mass.) 207 Mass. 93 N. E. 579, it is held that the state statute requiring that all fees received by the clerk in naturalization cases, except sums expended for additional clerical assistance, shall be paid over to the county treasurer, conflicts with the statute of United States in regard to the naturalization of aliens, requiring clerks of courts to account to the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization for one half of the fees collected by them, and permitting the clerks to retain the other half for themselves, first paying from these fees all additional clerical force that may be required in performing the duties imposed by the act: and that consequently a clerk of the state court need not pay over to the county treasurer fees received in naturalization cases.

services shall be a salary fixed by the county board, which shall be in lieu of all fees, per diem, and compensation for services rendered by him or his deputy, and that all such fees, per diem, and compensation for services rendered shall be turned over to the county treasurer according to law." It is further alleged in the complaint that between January 1, 1907, and January 1, 1909, the defendant as a clerk collected as fees under the naturalization laws of the United States the sum of $165.50, which sum has been retained by him, and which he has failed to turn over to the treasurer of said county. The defendant answered admitting certain allegations of the complaint, and alleged that the fees received by him under the naturalization laws of the United States were not included in such fees as he was required to account for and turn over to the treasurer of the county under the resolution referred to, and denied any indebtedness to the county. The case was tried by the court. The court held that the defendant was liable to the county for the fees, and rendered judgment accordingly. From this judgment, the defendant appealed.

Messrs. Olin & Butler, for appellant:

The act of 1906 clearly contemplates that one half of the fees collected by clerks shall belong to them, and to require the surrender thereof would defeat the intention of Congress.

Courts or their clerks could not be compelled to perform naturalization duties by virtue of their offices, or be held liable for official misconduct if they failed to do so.

Re Stephens, 4 Gray, 561.

The clerks of the state courts are entitled to retain the fees in naturalization proceedings, and are not compelled to account therefor to their counties, notwithstanding constitutional or statutory provisions requiring clerks to pay over to their counties all fees collected by them.

Eldredge v. Salt Lake County (Utah) 106 Pac. 939.

Mr. J. W. Soderberg for respondent.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was clerk of the circuit court for Barron county upon a salary basis, under the provisions of chapter 411, Laws 1901, and a resolution of the county board passed in pursuance thereto by which he was to receive for his services as such clerk a fixed salary in lieu of all fees, per diem, and compensation for services rendered by him or his deputy. The resolution provided that all such fees, per diem, and compensation for services rendered, should be turned over to the county treasurer according to law. The amount in dispute was collected by the defendant as fees under the naturalization laws of the United States, and which he claims the right to retain. The manifest purpose of the legislature, as indicated in chapter 411, Laws 1901, was to make the salary fixed full compensation to the clerk for all services performed by him as such clerk, and therefore provided that he should pay to the county treasurer "all fees, per diem, and other emoluments of whatever kind, received by him," and that the salary of clerks and deputies should be in "lieu of all fees, per diem, and compensation for services rendered." The language of this statute is about as broad and sweeping as it could well be, and would seem to leave no doubt that it was the purpose of the legislature to make the salary full compensation for all services performed by the clerk as clerk, and vest the county with all moneys earned by the clerk in his capacity of clerk of the circuit court. But it is argued with much ability by counsel for appellant, that the statute only contemplates the fee system under state laws, and was not designed to cover, and does not cover, fees earned under the act of Congress relating to naturalization. The question is not free from difficulty. The act of Congress was passed in 1906, being an act to establish a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, and providing fees to be charged by clerks of courts exercising jurisdiction in naturalization cases, and further providing that such clerks are authorized to retain a certain portion of the fees received, and pay over the balance to the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization. United States Act 59th Congress, June 29, 1906, chap. 3592, § 13, 34 Stat. at L. 600, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 483. Before the passage of the above act of Congress, the state courts, under power conferred by Congress, naturalized aliens, and the clerks were by state statute allowed certain fees for their services. Section 747, Stat. 1898. Much stress is placed by counsel for appellant upon the act of 1906 as a uniform rule of naturalization as affecting the fees of clerks of circuit courts in naturalization proceedings, and removing them from the fee system of state courts. And it is argued that since the passage of said act of Congress, chapter 411, Laws 1901, does not include fees in naturalization proceedings. This argument is based upon the exclusive power of Congress on the subject of naturalization, and the particular language of the act, and further, that the resolution and law upon which the plaintiff rests apply only to fees provided for at the time of the adoption of the resolution, hence do not cover fees provided by the act of Congress passed in 1906, and subsequent to the passage of the resolution. The argument is ingenious, but it seems to us that the statute was intended to cover all fees and emoluments coming to the clerk in his official capacity while holding the office upon the salary basis. We think it cannot be successfully maintained that if, during the salary term, the legislature of the state should increase the fee bill under the fee system as to clerks of courts, that the clerks, though on a salary, could retain, in addition to the salary, the extra fees provided for by legislative enactment after the salary had been fixed. No reason appears why the same rule should not apply to the change in fees by Congress after the adoption of the resolution. The fees and emoluments to be turned over under the statute (chapter 411, Laws 1901) are such as have been received by such clerk, and he is required to make a sworn statement at the end of each quarter of all fees, per diem, and emoluments collected by him, and file it with the county clerk. The clerk, therefore, takes the office upon the salary fixed, and must account to the county treasurer for all fees and emoluments received by him in his official capacity during his term. The question then arises whether the act of Congress, passed after defendant was put on the salary basis, alters the situation. It is urged that because prior to 1906 there was no Federal law providing fees for clerks in naturalization proceedings, the fees in question could not have been contemplated by the legislature. But fees were then prescribed by the state statute (§ 747, Stat. 1898), hence some fees for such services must have been in contemplation. The fact that Congress had exclusive power when it assumed to act, and that the fees prescribed are at variance with the fees fixed by state statute, we do not regard significant so long as the acts performed by the clerk were official in the discharge of his duty as clerk. The courts of the state designated in the act have power to naturalize aliens, and the clerks perform services as clerks in such proceedings, and receive fees as clerks for such services, and whether such fees are fixed by act of Congress or by state law, they are fees or emoluments of the office, within the meaning of chapter 411, Laws 1901. Even if it be true, as contended by counsel for appellant, that the power of Congress is exclusive, State ex rel. Newman v. Libby, 47 Wash. 481, 92 Pac. 350, and that the state law is superseded as to amount of fees, the fees are nevertheless emoluments of the office of clerk, within the meaning of the state law.

It is further argued that the words of the act of Congress that the clerks are "authorized" and "permitted to retain one half of the fees" involve the granting of a privilege to hold the fees as their own. We think the words used in this connection have reference solely to the adjustment under the act of Congress between the clerks and the bureau. Clearly they cannot be held to authorize or permit the clerks on salary basis to hold them as against the counties, if they are fees or emoluments which belong to the counties. So we come back to the proposition whether they are or not.

It is insisted that such services are performed in a nonofficial capacity, therefore belong to the clerks exclusively, and are not covered by the state law or the resolution requiring fees and emoluments received by clerks in their official capacity to be turned over to the county. And it is argued that clerks would not be obliged to turn over money earned in work purely nonofficial, as, for example, time not required in discharge of official duty spent in bookkeeping. This might be admitted, but it does not reach the question, because in the case before us the services were strictly official. The naturalization proceedings are proceedings in court, and the clerk, in the performance of services therein, acts in his official capacity as clerk of the court. The act of Congress purports to confer jurisdiction to naturalize aliens on "all courts of record in any state." And the courts of record in this state have uniformly from an early day assumed such jurisdiction, and the clerks of the circuit courts have acted in their official capacity in such proceedings before and since the act of Congress. That the circuit courts of the state have jurisdiction to naturalize aliens is beyond question. This is not denied by counsel for appellant, but it is argued that the jurisdiction is limited or quasi judicial in its nature, and that Congress might designate the board of aldermen of cities to determine the requisite facts to entitle to citizenship under the conditions prescribed by law. Whether Congress could have conferred the power on other bodies than courts of record we need not determine. It is sufficient that it has authorized courts to perform the function, and provided the fees to be received by clerks for the performance of their duties as clerks of courts in that regard. The courts having assumed to act have the right to do so in the absence of any law of the state prohibiting such action. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539, 10 L. ed. 1060; Re Stephens, 4 Gray, 559; Levin v. United States, 63 C. C. A. 476, 128 Fed 826.

We shall briefly refer to some of the principal authorities relied upon by appellant's counsel. In United States v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169, 30 L. ed. 627, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 510, under an act of Congress providing, in effect, that the clerk shall not be allowed to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over expenses including clerk hire to be audited and allowed by the proper officer, a sum exceeding $3,500, and that the accounts should be examined and certified by the judge, and be subject to revision by the accounting officers, it appeared in the case that, for a great number of years, naturalization fees had not been included in such fees in the clerk's return. All the facts were known to the judge who passed on the accounts, and the general custom was acquiesced in for a long period of time. Under the act of Congress, there was no fee provided for in naturalization proceedings, but a fee of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

$3 was by custom charged by the clerks, and the court made rules respecting naturalization proceedings and the services. At page 179 of 120 U. S., the court said: "It is for services rendered under these rules, and as a special officer of the court, and not as clerk, that these fees have been permitted. They were not duties pertaining to the office of clerk. They could as well have been performed by any other person designated by the court for the purpose, as by the district attorney or a commissioner of the circuit court or an attorney, or any suitable person not an officer of the court."

In United States v. McMillan, 165 U. S. 504, 41 L. ed. 805, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 395, the court followed the decision in United States v. Hill, supra. In United States v. Brindle, 110 U. S. 688, 28 L. ed. 286, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180, Brindle held a public office upon a salary, and the act of Congress prohibited receiving compensation for discharging the duties of any other office. He was appointed to perform a service in no way connected with the office he held, and which was not an office known to the law, and it was held that the service had "no affinity or connection, either in its character or by law or usage, with the line of his official duty." Mechem on Public Officers, § 863, lays down the general rule that one holding an office is not rendered legally incompetent to discharge duties clearly extra-official, outside of the scope of his official duty. In Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 764, the treasurer of the city of Trenton performed services not part of the duties of his office, and it was held that he was entitled to compensation therefor, in addition to his salary as treasurer. In Leavenworth County v. Brewer, 9 Kan. 307, it was held that a county attorney is not bound to go beyond his county to do business for the county, and if he does he is entitled to reasonable compensation therefor in addition to his salary. This was substantially ruled by this court in Eagle River v. Oneida County, 86 Wis. 266, 56 N. W. 644, relied upon by appellant. In Niles v. Muzzy, 33 Mich. 61, 20 Am. Rep. 670, it was held that one who was mayor and councilman of a city, and an attorney at law, could act for the city and defend a suit against it and recover the value of his services. In Kollock v. Dodge, 105 Wis. 187, 80 N. W. 608, the points involved mainly were the scope of legislative power delegated to the city council, and that, under the delegated power, the council determined that the services of the officer in question were not official, and that this was not an unwarranted exercise of power.

We have found this case by no means easy of solution. Some cogent reasons have been presented by counsel for appellant in support of their contentions. However, after a careful examination of the case, the court have reached the conclusion that the judgment below should be affirmed.

The judgment below is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied April 26, 1910.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

MARSHALL L. STRINGER, Admr., etc., of Fannie Stephens, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

JOHN GAMBLE, Admr., etc., of Thomas
Stephens, Deceased, et al.

(155 Mich. 295, 118 N. W. 979.)

Will — charge on property — lien — enforcement.

1. A provision in a will requiring the devisee to make certain payments to testator's wife, that they shall be and remain a lien upon the property devised so long as the wife shall live, will permit a recovery after her death of sums accruing during her lifetime.

Election of remedies — decedent's estate — presentation of claim.

2. The presentation in administration proceedings upon the estate of one to whom property was devised upon condition that he make certain annual payments to testator's wife, which are made a lien on the property, of a claim for arrears not paid, and the acceptance of payment of such instalments with interest as were not barred by limitation, is not an election of remedies which will prevent enforcement of the lien against the property for the residue of the arrears.

Limitation of action — mortgage — testamentary lien.

3. The statute governing the limitation period for enforcement of mortgage liens applies to a suit to enforce a lien imposed by the will on property devised, to secure payment of annuities to testator's widow.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Oakland County, in Chancery, in defendants' favor in a suit brought to enforce a lien on certain real estate to secure payment of arrearages of annuities. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion and in that in the case of Stringer v. Stephens, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 393.

Mr. Thomas A. Conlon for appellant.

Mr. James H. Lynch for appellees.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The position of appellees is stated in the following language taken from the brief: "In the former trial I claimed, and I again claim, that, when Thomas Stephens accepted the property under the will, he took it charged with the conditions imposed by the Note. — Remedies for enforcement of legacy when charged upon devise.

Cases involving enforcement of legacies for sums of money, annuities, or the support of another, where charged upon a devise of real estate, are included herein. Cases involving the enforcement of debts of the decedent charged upon his real estate are excluded, although perhaps in a general way the questions are similar. The fact, however, that the creditors of a decedent are entitled to look to the entire estate, including the personal, real, and mixed property, and have a right of priority of payment over bequests and devises, and the further fact that the court will conclusively presume that the testator intended his debts to be paid at all hazards, that he intended to be honest before he was generous, and, to effectuate this presumption, will enforce the payment of the testator's debts to the exclusion of bequests and devises,—justify the distinction.

Personal liability of devisee.

By imposing upon a devise of real estate the payment of a legacy, a charge is created against the devised land, which is thereby made primarily liable for the payment of such legacy. In general, a devisee, by accepting a devise subject to, or charged with, a legacy, also becomes personally liable for the payment thereof. Ruston v. Ruston, 2 Dall. 243, 1 L. ed. 365, 1 Am. Dec. 283; Mason v. Smith, 49 Ala. 71; Burch v. Burch, 52 Ind. 136; Duncan v. Prentice, 4 Met. (Ky.) 216; Doolittle v. Hilton, 63 Me. 537; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 3 Md. Ch. 71; Cumberland v. Codrington, 3 Johns. Ch. 229, 8 Am. Dec. 492; Glen v. Fisher, 6 Johns. Ch. 33, 10 Am. Dec. 310; Birdsall v. Hewlett, 1 Paige, 32, 19 Am. Dec. 392; Cook v. Grant, 1 Paige 407; Johnson v. Cornwall, 26 Hun, 499, affirmed without opinion in 91 N. Y. 660; Hoover v. Hoover, 5 Pa. 351; Miltenberger v. Schlegel, 7 Pa. 241; Snyder's Appeal, 75 Pa. 191; Jordan v. Donahue, 12 R. I. 199; Preston v. Preston, 2 Jur. N. S. 1040.

Compare with Jillard v. Edgar, 3 De G. & S. 502, which holds that, in order to charge the devisee personally, the devised land must not only be charged, but the devisee also. His mere acceptance of land devised subject to a legacy is not sufficient. In Preston v. Preston the devisee was directed by the testator to pay the legacy charged upon the land. And see to same effect Jillard v. Edgar.

will, but his position was not the same as if he had entered into a written agreement with his father or his mother by which he agreed to pay a certain sum of money and furnish certain products of the farm, but, so far as the performance of the conditions is concerned, he was personally liable upon a contract, either express or implied, and the land was charged with the performance thereof so long as Fannie Stephens lived. At the death of Fannie Stephens, if there were any portions of the annual payments unpaid, the estate of Thomas Stephens would be liable for the same unless barred by limitation or other defense. If the lien continued beyond the life of Fannie Stephens, in case of unpaid instalments, her representative might proceed in equity to enforce the lien." This statement is in accord with the rules of law generally adopted in cases involving facts like those presented in the case at bar, and with the opinion of this court in Stringer v. Stevens, 146 Mich. 181, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, 117 Am. St. Rep. 620, 109 N. W. 269, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 337. The brief proceeds: "So far it would be analogous to the case of a promissory note secured by real-estate mortgage. But when suit is brought upon a promissory note secured by mortgage, and judgment is taken in such suit, and the same paid and satisfied, then the mortgage lien in any event is thereby terminated." The legal representative of Fannie Stephens is seeking in this suit to enforce the lien. It would appear that the questions presented charged thereon, although the land is also primarily liable for payment thereof. Snyder's Appeal, supra.

A legacy charged upon an estate devised becomes a personal liability of the devisee upon his acceptance of the devise. It, however, still remains an equitable lien upon the land, and may be enforced in equity by a sale thereof. Birdsall v. Hewlett, supra.

From the fact of acceptance of a devise charged with the payment of a legacy, the devisee thereby becomes personally liable therefor, although the land is worth less than the amount of the legacy. Hodges v. Phelps, 65 Vt. 303, 26 Atl. 625.

In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that where the will does not expressly make the devisee personally liable for the payment of a legacy charged on the devised real estate, personal liability does not arise from the mere acceptance of the devise. Hayes v. Sykes, 120 Ind. 180, 21 N. E. 1080; Brown v. Furer, 4 Serg. & R. 213, 8 Am. Dec. 693; Lockwood v. Stockholm, 11 Paige, 87. (But see New York cases, supra, and Redfield v. Redfield, infra.)

And in Brown v. Furer, supra, it was held that devisees did not, by accepting the devise, become personally liable for payment of the legacy, in the absence of an express promise to pay. The court said that the land was the fund to be looked to in whatever hands it might be. This case is not in accord with the later Pennsylvania decisions. See such cases, supra.

A devise of real estate subject to the payment of a certain legacy, unexplained and unqualified by anything else in the will, constitutes a charge upon the land, and not a personal charge upon the devisee. Den ex dem. Wilson v. Small, 20 N. J. L. 151.

By the weight of authority, the acceptance of a devise of real estate charged with, or subject to, a legacy, in the absence of language in the will indicating a contrary intention on the part of the testator, renders the devisee personally liable for the amount of the legacy charged upon the devised property, even though such property is of less value than the legacy.

In Redfield v. Redfield, 126 N. Y. 466, 27 N. E. 1032, it was said that an annuity charged upon land is a lien thereon, which will be enforced by a sale of the premises if necessary, that devisees, by accepting a devise charged with an annuity, render themselves personally liable therefor in the first instance, as well as liable for any deficiency arising from the sale of the devised property to pay the annuity.

If a devisee accepts a devise upon which a testator has charged a legacy, he becomes personally bound to pay the legacy, and is thus bound even though the land devised to him proves to be less in value than the legacy; he can only escape such personal liability by refusing to accept the devise. Williams v. Nichol, 47 Ark. 254, 1 S. W. 243.

A devisee upon accepting a devise of real estate of greater value than a charge imposed thereon by the testator becomes personally liable therefor, and upon a refusal or failure to pay same, such charge, with interest thereon, may be enforced by a personal decree against him, which will also be made a lien upon the estate devised. Dunne v. Dunne, 66 Cal. 157, 4 Pac. 441, 1152.

Where there is a mandatory direction that the executor, who is also a devisee of real estate, and the testator, shall pay a sum of money to another, and the devise is subject to such direction, the real estate is charged therewith equally with the personal estate, and the devisee, by accepting the devised property, is personally liable for such money in case of a deficiency of the assets. Preston v. Preston, supra.

Where the question as to the personal liability of a devisee for the payment of a legacy charged upon the devised property, and the extent of such liability, is determined from the intent of the testator as evidenced by the language of his will, if it evidences the intent of the testator personally to charge the devisee, his acceptance of the devise renders him personally liable to such an extent as the language of the will for our determination are, first, whether the lien was discharged by the death of the person in whose interest it was created; if it was not, then, second, whether the fact that the claim for unpaid portions of the charge was presented as a demand against the estate of Thomas Stephens, and a portion of it allowed and paid, operated to discharge the lien.

First. The words employed by the testator, after reciting the charge in favor of his wife imposed upon his devisee, are: "All the above to be and remain: a lien upon said above-described farm as long as my said wife shall live;" and the devise is made "upon this express condition, that he furnish to my beloved wife," etc. No other provision for the wife is made in the will.

indicates the testator intended he should be personally charged. On the other hand, where the language used negatives an intention personally to charge the devisee, he incurs no personal liability by the acceptance of the devise. Spencer v. Spencer, 4 Md. Ch. 456; Hunkypillar v. Harrison, 59 Ark. 453, 27 S. W. 1004; Eskridge v. Farrar, 34 La. Ann. 721; Nudd v. Powers, 136 Mass. 273; Commons v. Commons, 115 Ind. 162, 16 N. E. 820, 17 N. E. 271; Hancock v. Fleming, 103 Ind. 533, 3 N. E. 254.

The general rule as to personal liability of the devisee upon accepting a devise charged with a legacy is subject to the exception that, if the intention of the testator as gathered from the language of the will is that he does not wish the devisee to pay the legacy at all events, but only so far as the devised property will enable him to, his acceptance of the devise does not create a personal liability beyond the value of the real estate received thereunder. Hunkypillar v. Harrison, supra.

Thus, where the testator requires the devisee to pay a legacy out of the proceeds of the devised real estate, this language will be considered as limiting the devisee's personal liability to the sum received from the sale of the real estate. Hancock v. Fleming, supra.

Where a legacy is to be paid by a devisee out of the estate devised him, he is not personally liable therefor, except to the extent of the rents and profits received by him; if these are not sufficient to satisfy the legacy, the balance may be raised by a sale. Wallington v. Taylor, 1 N. J. Eq. 314.

So, a devisee of real estate devised subject to a legacy to be paid out of the proceeds when the real estate is sold does not, by accepting the devise, become personally liable to pay the legacy. He cannot be required to pay anything until after selling the real estate, and then not to exceed the amount received therefor. Haskett v. Alexander, 134 Ind. 543, 34 N. E. 325.

To the same effect, as to the charge of a legacy on real estate to be payable out of

It is clear from the nature of the charge imposed that it was intended by the testator to secure to the wife subsistence during her life. There may be doubt whether, strictly speaking, the provision made for the wife should be called an annuity, a question which is sometimes of considerable importance; but it is in essence an annuity, expressly charged upon the corpus of the particular land devised to the son, payable annually, and measured by the duration of her life. See 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 390. I think the express provision for a lien should be held not either to limit the duration of a lien which, in the absence of the express provision, would be raised by law, or to expire at the death of the annuitant. It is more reasonable to say that the rents and profits thereof, is Eskridge v. Farrar, 34 La. Ann. 709.

Where charges are made upon the rents from property devised to another, and not upon the corpus or upon the devisee personally, by accepting the devise he does not become personally liable, except to the amount of the rent and profit actually received or chargeable to him by reason of his possession and occupancy of the premises. To this extent, however, the charge will be enforced in equity, and a receiver appointed to take charge of the rents if that course is necessary. Nudd v. Powers, supra.

Where an annuity is made a charge upon the rents and profits of real estate devised, it can be enforced against the devisee personally only so far as he has received the rents and profits. Irwin v. Wollpert, 128 Ill. 527, 21 N. E. 501.

A devisee of a life estate subject to an annuity payable annually does not, by taking possession of the devised real estate, render himself or his estate personally liable for any part of the legacy not due and payable during his life. Decker v. Decker, 3 Ohio, 157.

Where an annuity is made a charge upon two different lots, each to pay a ratable portion thereof, it must be enforced in that manner, and will not be enforced entirely out of one of the lots. Irwin v. Wollpert, supra.

Right as against several devisees.

A legatee whose legacy is made a charge upon different devises of real estate is entitled to maintain a bill in equity against all of such devisees jointly, and in such action is entitled to a decree requiring that each devisee pay his equal share of the legacy, and, in default thereof, that the real estate of the defaulting devisee be sold to pay such share. Larkin v. Mann, 53 Barb. 267.

Where land is devised to different persons charged equally with the support of other persons, upon accepting their devises each devisee is bound for the faithful perform-it was given to secure payment of the sums accruing during her life, and for that purpose may be enforced after her death.

Second. The whole demand for unpaid money (for nine years) was presented as a claim against the estate of the devisee. A judgment for the entire amount, with interest, was rendered. The case coming to this court on error, it was held, first, that although the demand grew out of a specialty,—a will,—it was nevertheless one properly recoverable in that action as upon an implied promise of the devisee to pay the annuity. It was held, second, that the statute of limitations had application as in the case of an ordinary action upon an implied contract. It was found that the statute barred recovery for the most of the demand, and the claimant was given an option to permit judgment to stand for the sum not barred, or to take a judgment of reversal and a new trial. He exercised the option by permitting the judgment for the smaller sum to stand, and by accepting the amount of that judgment. In the entire proceeding the demand was for the several annual money charges, and interest was allowed as upon sums falling due annually. I am not prepared to hold that this operated as a performance of the condition. I think the decision was not res judicata to the extent of the condition unperformed and of the sum actually secured by the lien, and, if the lien survived this action, it might be enforced notwithstanding the judgment and its payment. The question is, it seems to ance of the charge, and, for breach of it, is jointly and severally accountable to the parties for whose benefit the charge was imposed. Shillito v. Shillito, 160 Pa. 167, 28 Atl. 637.

So, where land is devised to several persons, charged with payment of a gross sum of money, each devisee is liable for his proportionate share. Newman's Appeal, 35 Pa. 339; Field's Appeal, 36 Pa. 11.

Compare with Dewart's Appeal, 70 Pa. 403, which holds that where different devisees of real estate are charged with payment of a legacy, it is error for the orphans' court to decree payment by each devisee of his proportionate share of the legacy; the court said that the decree should have decreed the sale of the lands charged with the payment of the legacy.

The court will apportion a legacy made a charge upon different parcels of real estate devised to different parties, some of whom have disposed of their portions to third persons, among all the parties whose real estate is bound, and will establish, as between the respective owners of the different properties, a ratable proportion which each must pay. Sinking Fund Comrs. v. Woodward, 40 N. J. Eq. 23.

Heirs or personal representatives of devisee.

A devise of land charged with a legacy renders the devisee personally liable upon acceptance, and those claiming through or under him are also liable in proportion to their respective estates, and in aid of such liability the devised land is also liable in the same manner and proportion. Shobe v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10.

The heirs of a devisee of land charged with a legacy take subject thereto, and must pay the same proportionately. Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. 785.

Real estate devised subject to a life estate, also to a legacy to be paid at a designated time after the termination of the life estate, is not released from the charge by the death of the devisee prior to the termination of the life estate, but the legacy remains a charge upon the lands in the hands of his next of kin, and may be enforced against them. Miles v. Leigh, 1 Atk. 573. To the same effect, as to heir of a devisee whose devise was conditioned upon payment of certain legacies, is Wigg v. Wigg, 1 Atk. 382.

A legatee whose legacy is made a charge upon real estate devised to another may enforce such legacy against the devisee personally, or, upon his death without having paid same, against the distributees of his property. Methodist Episcopal Church v. Reeve, 79 App. Div. 65, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1102.

Where a will constitutes a link in the chain of title of a purchaser or mortgagee of real estate, and by the terms of such will a charge is imposed thereon in favor of a legatee, such purchaser or mortgagee is chargeable with notice of this lien upon the property, and he, no more than the devisee, can hold it without conforming to the requirements of the will in respect of payment thereof, and, for failure to make payment, the lien will be enforced against the lands in his hands to the same extent as though title remained in the devisee. Wilson v. Piper, 77 Ind. 437; Nash v. Taylor, 83 Ind. 347; Henry v. Griffiths, 89 Iowa, 543, 58 N. W. 670; Proctor Coal Co. v. Beams, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1913, 50 S. W. 533; Kemp v. M'Pherson, 7 Harr. & J. 320; Meakin v. Duvall, 43 Md. 372; Re Moores, 84 Mich. 474, 48 N. W. 39; Peebles v. Acker, 70 Miss. 356, 12 So. 248; Jenkins v. Freyer, 4 Paige, 47; Briggs v. Carroll, 117 N. Y. 288, 22 N. E. 1054; Mallery v. Facer, 181 N. Y. 567, 74 N. E. 487; Shanley v. Shanley, 34 App. Div. 172, 54 N. Y. Supp. 652; Sherrer v. Bartlett, 45 App. Div. 135, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1067; Phillips v. Humphrey, 42 N. C. (7 Ired. Eq.) 206; Patterson v. Patterson, 63 N. C. 322; Clyde v. Simpson, 4 Ohio St. 445; Nellons v. Truax, 6 Ohio St. 97; Gumaer's Estate, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 621; Newman v. Kent, 1 Meriv. 240, followed in Jillard v. Edgar, 3 De G. & S. 502.

me, whether by adopting the remedy the lien was waived. Neither the charge upon the land nor the lien was created by the devisee. There is no undertaking of the devisee to pay the annuity, although he became liable to do so by accepting the devise. The lien did not exist to secure the liability thus arising, but it did exist to secure, out of the land itself, the benefit intended for the wife. In this state a mortgage is a security merely, transferring no interest in the property mortgaged, and is not released because an action at law is brought to recover the sum secured. Ordinarily the rule is no different where the note is given by one person and the mortgage by another. I think there is no ground for a distinction in the fact that the liability of the devisee to pay the secured charge rested upon legal implication, instead of express stipulation. The annuitant had two remedies, not inconsistent with each other, for obtaining the benefit secured to her in the will of her husband. It was established in the probate proceedings, the remedy first adopted, that, because of the operation of the statute of limitations applicable to the form of action, no recovery could be had for sums falling due in certain years. For these years she has not received the benefit. She has not waived or forgiven it. The land is not relieved of this charge unless by operation of the statute of limitations. I know of no rule which denies her the right to pursue the remedy afforded by the terms of the will. I am of

Of course, the general rule that a subsequent purchaser takes subject to equities against his vendor also applies where the former has actual knowledge of the terms of the will. Siron v. Ruleman, 32 Gratt. 215; Brooks v. Eskins, 24 Mo. App. 296.

Compare with Colyer v. Finch, 5 H. L. Cas. 905, which holds that if the devisee takes an estate devised in fee, but charged with payment of the debts and legacies, and thereafter sells the same, it is as if an executor sells property at executor's sale, unless it can be shown that the purchaser knew the purchase money was not going to be employed in paying the debts and legacies.

To the same effect is Re Henson [1908] 2 Ch. 356, which holds that a mortgage by a devisee of real estate devised subject, in common with other realty and personalty, to the payment of certain legacies, takes priority over such legacies. The will contained a direction to the devisee to pay such legacies, and the stated object of the devisee in making the loan in question was to obtain money for this purpose, the court saying that under such circumstances the duty did not devolve upon the mortgagee to see to the proper application of the money.

Compare Bank of Bombay v. Suleman Somji, 24 Times L. R. 840, which holds that a bank, in loaning money to a devisee of real estate devised subject to certain legacies, takes subject thereto, where an investigation on its part would have revealed the will which created the charge, and the mortgagor practised no concealment in this respect.

Where the intention as expressed in the will is that the land and particularly the proceeds are to be the primary fund for the discharge of an obligation to support another imposed thereon, it is a continued charge which can only be strictly performed during the tenure of occupancy of the land upon which it is imposed by the devisee, and where he is no longer in possession and an alienee is in possession, equity, at the instance of the executor of such legatee, will hold the subsequent purchaser to the performance of the obligation, since the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

means to perform—the funds specifically charged—are in his exclusive control. And this is true, although such support was actually furnished by the devisee, he being the son of the legatee, and it not appearing that the support was not furnished in fulfilment of his moral obligation arising from this relationship, rather than because of any liability from accepting the devise Wingett v. Bell, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 558.

And where a devisee conveys the devised land subject to the charge of a legacy, his vendee stands, in respect of personal liability, charged like a purchaser of mortgaged premises subject to a mortgage, he not becoming personally liable for the mortgage debt without a contract of assumption evidenced in some way; but no particular form of words is necessary to create such a liability. Any words which fairly import the assumption of such liability are sufficient to impose it, and the intention will be sought from the whole instrument, when the promise is to be gathered from a writing. Hodges v. Phelps, 65 Vt. 303, 26 Atl. 625.

A court of equity will enforce a legacy charged upon real estate devised to another, by declaring it a lien upon such real estate, with a provision for foreclosure by sale of the property, unless same is discharged by payment. The fact that the land has been conveyed to others with notice of such legacy is of no consequence as affecting the right of the legatee to such relief. Wilson v. Piper, supra.

A devise of real estate charged with the support of the testator's unmarried daughter out of the proceeds of the devised land remains a charge thereon in the hands of a subsequent purchaser, and a decree will be entered against him for the proceeds of the land received by him. Bakert v. Bakert, 86 Mo. App. 83.

The lessee of a testator who bequeaths rents thereafter to accrue to a certain person, and devises the land to another subject to the lease, cannot, by purchasing from the devisee and surrendering the lease, defeat the right of the legatee to the rental, and this is true although, by the terms of opinion that in this case the court should adopt the rule of the statute affecting the foreclosure of mortgage liens, and that a decree should pass for such sums only as were not fifteen years past due at the time of filing the bill. No trust relation existed between the wife and the devisee of the land. The wife died February 28, 1897. As to each annual instalment unpaid, the statute began to run during her life. Thomas Stephens died April 9, 1903. The bill was filed on or about February 26, 1907. All payments falling due prior to February 26 1892, are barred.

The decree of the court below should be reversed, with costs of both courts, and a decree entered in this court requiring payment within four months from the date of the decree of the instalments which came due June 7, 1892, June 7, 1893, and June 7, 1894, each instalment being $100, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the dates when they respectively became due. In default of payment, the decree should provide for a sale of the premises after the manner of foreclosure sales under decrees of a court of chancery.

Blair, Ch. J., and Montgomery, Hooker, and Moore, JJ., concurred.

the lease, he was entitled to surrender the premises and terminate the lease at any time. Graham v. Woodson, 2 Call (Va.) 249.

A devisee of an estate in remainder, subject to a legacy, takes only an equity of redemption, which may be foreclosed in equity in satisfaction of the legacy, and his subsequent grantee acquires no better right to the devised land. Warner v. Bronson, 81 Vt. 121, 69 Atl. 655.

Where an estate is devised in tail, a charge thereon will not affect the remainder, and a sale of the land to pay the charge gives the purchaser no greater right than the holder of the estate in tail. Den ex dem. Wilson v. Small, 20 N. J. L. 151.

But a legatee whose legacy is charged upon both the real estate and personal property of the testator, before being entitled to the aid of equity to enforce payment thereof as a lien upon the real estate, where the same has been sold by the devisee, must show that the personal estate has been exhausted in the payment of the debts of the estate, or not collectable, it appearing that there was sufficient personalty originally to pay the legacy. Dodge v. Manning, 1 N. Y. 298.

Where different parcels of real estate charged with the payment of a legacy or legacies are disposed of by the devisee at different times, and to different persons, such real estate in the hands of the subsequent purchasers is liable for the payment of the legacy, and payment of the same will be enforced thereon in inverse order of alienation. Jenkins v. Freyer, supra; Rogers v. Smith, 177 N. Y. 588, 70 N. E. 1108, affirming without opinion 75 App. Div. 141, 77 N. Y. Supp. 392; Mallery v. Facer, supra; Wieting v. Bellinger, 50 Hun, 324, 3 N. Y. Supp. 361; Fessenden's Estate, 170 Pa. 631, 33 Atl. 135; Nellons v. Truax, supra; Cowden's Estate, 1 Pa. St. 267. And see Pickering v. Pickering, infra, under heading "Charge for support, education, etc."

But where the devisee of different parcels of real estate charged with a legacy sells the same at different times, and to different persons purchasing without knowledge of the charge, except the last purchaser, who is informed thereof by the devisee, and who purchases subject thereto, the legacy will be decreed to be paid out of the latter property exclusively, if the same is sufficient for that purpose. James v. Bremar, 2 Desauss, Eq. 560.

Third person in possession.

Third persons who go into possession of real property devised subject to the payment of legacies, without the consent of the devisee or any other authorized person, must account for the rents and profits to satisfy the legacies. Morgan v. Titus, 3 N. J. Eq. 201.

Purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale.

The doctrine that the lien of a legacy where charged upon land devised to another continues upon the lands although in the hands of subsequent purchasers, and may be enforced thereout, also applies to purchasers of the property at mortgage foreclosure sale, foreclosing a mortgage executed by the devisee. Conkling v. Weatherwax, 173 N. Y. 43, 65 N. E. 855; Hutchins v. Hutchins, 18 Misc. 633, 42 N. Y. Supp. 601; Ogle v. Tayloe, 49 Md. 158; Reynolds v. Bond, 83 Ind. 36; Rogers v. Smith, supra; Walm v. Emley, 26 N. J. Eq. 243.

In Reynolds v. Bond, it was said a mortgagee whose mortgagor based his title upon a will in which he was devised land subject to a legacy took his mortgage chargeable with notice of the contents of the will, and the lien of the legacy would be declared a lien upon the land, and it would be sold for the payment thereof, as against the claims of the mortgagee.

Lands devised upon condition that the devisee pay a legacy charged thereon may be applied in satisfaction thereof, and the same ordered sold, the devisee having the right to the aid of equity to redeem the property upon paying such charge with interest and costs. A mortgagee of the lands holding under a mortgage executed by the devisee is entitled to the same, but no greater, right; so, also is a purchaser at an execution sale of another portion of the devised land. In order to enable them to retain their interests, they must pay the amount charged against the lands. If they elect to redeem, they ought to pay according to the interest they respectively have in the property, and if they refuse to redeem, and a sale is ordered or a partition made, it ought to be upon the same principle. Bissell v. Bissell, 24 Conn. 241.

The mortgagee in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage which is subject to a legacy may make the legatee a party thereto, and such legatee will be entitled to priority of payment over the mortgagee out of the proceeds of the sale. Farra v. Adams, 12 Bush, 515. To the same effect is Conkling v. Weatherwax, supra.

The support of testator's widow when charged upon a farm is a lien thereon as against the original devisee, and a purchaser from him takes subject to the charge, and where the widow is justified in leaving the farm because of ill treatment, the value of such support may be filed by a court of equity as an annuity, and enforced out of the farm in the hands of the subsequent purchaser, purchasing at a sale on the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the devisee. Gardenville Permanent Loan Asso. v. Walker, 52 Md. 452.

A purchaser at execution sale stands in no better position than the owner of the real estate sold, who had been devised the property charged with a legacy in favor of another. The latter's right is enforceable against the devised land in the hands of such purchaser to the same extent as when the title was in the devisee, the sale not having the effect of divesting the lien of the legacy. Donnelly v. Edelen, 40 Md. 117 (support); Harris v. Fly, 7 Paige, 421; Dewart's Appeal, 43 Pa. 325; Newman's Appeal, 35 Pa. 339; Cowden's Estate and Wingett v. Bell, supra.

Legacies charged upon land devised to another are a fixed lien thereon, and a purchaser thereof at sheriff's sale has constructive notice of the charge, and is bound to know that the lien is not divested by such sale upon execution against the devisee, and that, in order to protect his interests in the land, he will have to pay the legacy when it becomes due. Lake's Estate, 2 Del. Co. Rep. 12.

In Pennsylvania it is held that a sale of devised land by a sheriff, by order of the orphans' court, discharges the lien of legacies existing against it, but the proceeds of the sale must in the first instance be applied to payment of the liens against the real estate according to their respective priority. M'Lanahan v. Wyant, 1 Penr. & W. 96, 21 Am. Dec. 363; Pryer v. Mark, 129 Pa. 529, 19 Atl. 895.

But this rule applies only where the legacy is determinate (Barnet v. Washebaugh, 16 Serg. & R. 410); hence it does not apply to a charge of support which is not determinate, and the lien of such a charge is not divested by a sheriff's sale of the 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

land on an execution against the devisee, but the land remains bound thereby, and the lien may be enforced against it in the hands of the purchaser (Walter's Estate, 197 Pa. 555, 47 Atl. 862).

Purchaser from administrator or executor of devisee.

Where the support of a person is made a charge upon real estate devised to another, a subsequent purchaser thereof, from the administrator of the devisee, will be deemed to have purchased subject to the charge; hence he has no standing in equity to require enforcement of the charge in the first instance, against the legal representatives of the devisee, but the legatee may proceed in equity to enforce the charge against the devised lands in his hands. Bourne v. Hall, 10 R. I. 139.

But where the real estate charged with payment of legacies is sold at administrator's sale for the payment of debts and the maintenance of children, the purchaser obtains a title divested of the lien of the legacies. the legatees' relief being to reach the fund arising from the sale in the hands of the administrator. Randolph's Appeal, 5 Pa. 242.

Executors of a devisee of land charged with certain legacies and annuities cannot, by a sale thereof under a power given in the devisee's will, discharge the lien of the legacies, and payment by the purchaser of the purchase price into court does not have that effect. McCredy's Appeal, 47 Pa. 442.

Purchaser from executor or administrator of testator's estate.

The administrator of an estate may be authorized to sell devised land charged with a legacy, in order to obtain the funds to pay the same, and in the event of such a sale, the land becomes freed from the charge of the legacy. Root's Will, 81 Wis. 263, 51 N. W. 435.

Where land is charged with payment of legacies, but express power is given in the will to the executor to sell the same to obtain money to pay such legacies, or for any other purpose he may think advantageous, such land, upon sale under this power, is discharged from the liability of the legacies. Turner v. Turner, 57 Miss. 775.

A purchaser from an executor of real estate charged with the payment generally of the debts and legacies is not bound to see to the proper application of the purchase price, and if he turns the same over to the trustee, the estate in his hands stands discharged from the trust. Andrews v. Sparhawk, 13 Pick. 393.

But legatees whose legacies are made a charge upon real estate which its executors are authorized to sell to pay the legacies may enforce in equity their lien upon the devised premises against the purchaser at administrator's sale, who has not paid the purchase price. Elstner v. Fife, 32 Ohio St. 358.

Where a devisee of land charged with legacies is also an executor of the will, and as such executor he gives a bond to pay such legacies, a charge of support upon the real estate, being one of the legacies, is released as to the real estate conveyed away by the executor. Currier v. Earl, 13 Me. 213.

A devisee of real estate devised subject to certain legacies holds the same free from the lien of such legacies, where he is also the executor of the estate, and charges himself as such with the amount of the legacies. Manifold v. Jones, 117 Ind. 212, 20 N. E. 124.

Compare with State use of Hewlett v. Hewlett, 48 Md. 138, which holds that where a legal and beneficial interest in the residuary estate is vested in a person as devisee, subject only to a charge in favor of another, the devisee as to such charge holds as devisee in trust, and for the enforcement of this trust his testamentary bond given as executor of the estate is not answerable.

Where a testator in his lifetime contracts to dispose of real estate charged in his will with the payment of a legacy, the real estate is free from the lien of the legacy, although contract to sell is not carried out until after the death of the testator. Guelich v. Clark, 3 Thomp. & C. 315.

Assignee for creditors of devisee.

An assignee for creditors of a devisee of land charged with a legacy takes the same subject to the lien thereon in favor of the legatee, and the lien is enforceable upon the lands in his hands to the same extent as against the devisee. Swoyer's Appeal, 5 Pa. 377.

Real estate devised charged with the keep of certain live stock belonging to third persons, so long as they shall remain unmarried, remains charged therewith in the hands of the assignee for creditors of the devisee, and may be enforced against him by an action in favor of the legatees, for the expense of caring for the stock, where neither the devisee nor his assignee has complied with the provisions of the will in that respect. Veazey v. Whitehouse, 10 N. H. 409.

Right of subrogation to remedies of legatee.

Where real estate is devised to several devisees jointly, subject to certain legacies which are a charge thereon, any of the devisees may pay such legacies, and thereby relieve the common estate of the burden, and in equity may enforce contributions from the other devisees. Cook v. Cook, 92 Ind. 398; Cook v. Cook, 92 Ind. 602.

Where different devisees of real estate are each equally charged with a legacy, one of the devisees, who is compelled to discharge the entire legacy in consequence of the inability or refusal of the others to bear their share, is in equity entitled to contribution from the other devisees. Shillito v. Shillito, 160 Pa. 167, 28 Atl. 637.

A devise of real estate subject to the payment by the devisee of an annual sum to whoever has control of an infant during his minority, and a certain amount upon his reaching his majority, is a proper claim against the estate of the deceased devisee, in behalf of a person furnishing such support, and the same may also be enforced by declaring such sums to be a lien upon the devised lands with the usual remedies for enforcing the same. Bailey v. Bailey, 115 Ill. 551, 4 N. E. 394.

Devisees accepting real estate devised subject to a legacy are personally liable to pay the same, and this liability may be enforced against them in an action of debt instituted by the legatees, or by a subsequent purchaser of the devised land, who has been subrogated to the rights of legatees by paying them the amount of their legacies, in order to protect his interest in the land. Lake's Estate, 2 Del. Co. Rep. 12.

But one loaning money to a devisee to be used to pay legacies charged upon devised real estate has no right to be subrogated to remedies of the legatees. Sommers v. Schrader, 59 App. Div. 340, 69 N. Y. Supp. 866.

A person furnishing support to another whose support is made a charge upon real estate devised to a third person is entitled to enforce the charge against such real estate, to the extent of the support furnished. Warburton v. Williams, 116 Wis. 557, 93 N. W. 438; Clark v. Marlow, 149 Ind. 41, 48 N. E. 359.

The arrears due for the support of a person, where charged upon real estate devised to another, may be recovered by an action at law from the devisee of the land, where he accepts the same; and where the support has been furnished by a guardian of the legatee, he may recover therefor. Pinkerton v. Sargent, 112 Mass. 110.

Where third parties furnished support to another, relying for their compensation on a charge made upon certain real estate for the support of such person, equity will enforce in their behalf an equitable lien of the legatee upon the devised real estate, to the extent of the value of the support furnished. Thurber v. Chambers, 66 N. Y. 42.

But see McQuerry v. Wilson, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 112, 50 S. W. 1099, which holds that a person supporting the widow of a testator who has devised land subject to her support is a mere volunteer, and cannot assert a lien upon the land devised, or hold the devisee personally liable for the value thereof.

Although a legatee might maintain a bill to enforce a charge for support against real estate charged therewith, yet a mere volunteer who furnished such support cannot do so; neither is he entitled to have a judgment previously rendered in his favor against a devisee for the value of the support declared a lien on the land. Halstead v. Westervelt, 41 N. J. Eq. 100, 3 Atl. 270.

And a person furnishing support to another under a will making the latter's support a charge upon land devised to a third person is not subrogated to the rights of such legatee to the extent of being entitled to proceed in the same manner to enforce the charge as is given the legatee by statute. Luckenbach's Estate, 170 Pa. 586, 33 Atl. 121.

Whether remedy is at law or in equity.

Where it is sought to enforce merely the personal liability of a devisee for a legacy to which his devise was subject, and payment is not sought out of the devised real estate, the legatee has an adequate remedy at law, and is entitled to plant his action in a court of law thus to charge the devisee. Burch v. Burch, 52 Ind. 136; Lofton v. Moore, 83 Ind. 112; Davidson v. Coon, 125 Ind. 497, 9 L.R.A. 584, 25 N. E. 601; Red v. Powers, 69 Miss. 242, 13 So. 586; Dudgeon v. Dudgeon, 87 Mo. 218; Brown v. Knapp, 79 N. Y. 136; Montgomery v. Cook, 6 Watts, 238.

An action at law on a legacy may be maintained by the legatee against the devisee, who has accepted his devise subject to the legacy; such action is based upon an implied assumpsit, and is transitory in its nature. Willis v. Roberts, 48 Me. 257; Brown v. Knapp, supra; Van Orden v. Van Orden, 10 Johns. 30, 6 Am. Dec. 314; Wiggin v. Wiggin, 43 N. H. 561, 80 Am. Dec. 192.

Assumpsit is a proper action by a legatee bequeathed her support out of devised real estate, against the devisee or his grantee to enforce the same, and in such action she is entitled to recover the value of such support. Sheldon v. Purple, 15 Pick. 532.

Compare with Pelletreau v. Rathbone, 18 Johns. 428, which holds that an action at law cannot be maintained by a legatee to recover his legacy from a devisee of real estate accepting a devise charged with the legacy, unless he has expressly promised to pay the same.

An action on the case to recover a legacy charged upon different parcels of land devised in severalty may be maintained by a legatee jointly against the devisees. Montgomery v. Cook, supra.

Ejectment may be maintained against a grantee of a devise of land charged with the support of two mentally incompetent persons. Ripple v. Ripple, 1 Rawle, 386.

Where a legacy is made a charge upon real estate devised to another subject thereto, an equitable lien is thereby created on such real estate, and it becomes primarily liable for the payment thereof. As already seen, the devisee may be, and generally is, by accepting the devise, also personally liable for the payment of the legacy to which the devise is subject. A status or condition is therefore created very similar to that arising from a real-estate mortgage securing a note or bond in those jurisdictions where a mortgage is held not to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee. The manner of enforcing a legacy so charged upon real estate after acceptance by the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

devisee, where it is sought to hold both the real estate and the devisee, is very similar to a procedure for the foreclosure of such a mortgage. A personal decree may be rendered against the devisee, to secure the payment of which the legacy will be declared a lien upon the devised land, and the sale thereof ordered in foreclosure of the lien. Harland v. Person, 93 Ala. 273, 9 So. 379; Dodge v. Dodge, 1 Root, 233, 1 Am. Dec. 40; George v. McMullin, 3 Del. Ch. 269; Mahar v. O'Hara, 9 Ill. 424; Raher v. Raher, 130 Iowa, 743, 107 N. W. 810; Merritt v. Bucknam, 78 Me. 504, 7 Atl. 383; Sherman v. Sherman, 4 Allen, 302; Smith v. Jackman, 115 Mich. 192, 73 N. W. 228; Horning v. Wiederspale, 28 N. J. Eq. 387; Fox v. Phelps, 20 Wend. 437, affirming 17 Wend. 303; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 85 N. Y. 142; Redfield v. Redfield, 126 N. Y. 466, 27 N. E. 1032; Dunning v. Dunning, 147 N. Y. 686, 42 N. E. 722, affirming 82 Hun, 462, 31 N. Y. Supp. 719; Dunham v. Deraismes, 165 N. Y. 65, 58 N. E. 789; Carter v. Worrell, 96 N. C. 358, 60 Am. Rep. 420, 2 S. E. 528; Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 43, 20 S. E. 852; Powers v. Powers, 28 Wis. 659.

On this point, in Merritt v. Bucknam, supra, the court reasoned that such a legacy was not a mortgage according to the Maine doctrine of mortgages, which is that the mortgagee has a legal estate, but that it was analogous to a mortgage according to the doctrine of mortgages which obtains in some states, that the legal estate is in the mortgagor; it was said that in these jurisdictions the usual procedure to enforce a mortgage was by process in equity, and decree for the sale of the land, and the payment of the debt out of the proceeds, the residue to be paid to the mortgagor. The court added that such a procedure and decree were applicable in that state to a legacy charged upon real estate devised to another.

A legacy charged upon real estate devised to another may be enforced as a prior lien in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage given by the devisee. Coleman v. Howell (N. J. Eq.) 16 Atl. 202.

Generally, it is optional with the legatee whether to proceed at law or in equity, to enforce payment of the legacy against a devisee whose devise was subject thereto. Williams v. Nichol, 47 Ark. 254, 1 S. W. 243.

The liability of a devisee of real estate charged with the payment of a legacy may be enforced by a suit in equity against the real estate devised, or by a common-law action directed against the devisee upon his implied promise to pay it, the promise being implied from his acceptance of the devise. Ibid.

Where a legatee is given a lien or charge upon devised land, to secure payment of the legacy, he has a right to invoke the power of the court, whether of law or of equity, to exert its proper machinery to render that lien effective in producing the amount of the legacy. Courts of equity have many methods within their power, prominent among which is judicial sale, for the enforcement of such a legacy, and a transfer of the whole or a portion of the devised property, as may be necessary, to a purchaser who will pay the amount of money requisite to satisfy the charge. Korn v. Friz, 128 Wis. 428, 107 N. W. 659.

The fact that a legatee has a remedy at law for the enforcement of his legacy is not a bar to his proceeding in equity to enforce the same against the real estate charged with payment thereof, and also against the devisee accepting the same. Cady v. Cady, 67 Miss. 425, 7 So. 216; Cray v. Johnson (N. J. Eq.) 20 Atl. 212.

And equity will take jurisdiction of a proceeding to enforce a legacy charged upon real estate, where such remedy is adequate and just to all the parties, including a purchaser of the devised land, although by the terms of the will the legatee is given the right to enforce the legacy by entry and distress. Duncombe v. Greenacre, 6 Jur. N. S. 987.

—as affected by nature of the legacy.

Under some circumstances, however, equity has exclusive jurisdiction over proceedings by a legatee to enforce payment of his legacy from a devisee taking subject thereto. Indeed, it has been asserted that, in general, equity has exclusive jurisdiction over such proceedings. Cornish v. Willson, 6 Gill, 299; Nash v. Clarke, 4 Dana, 69.

But this is not the general rule, at least where the devisee is personally liable, unless the terms of the legacy or the manner of payment or other circumstances connected therewith are such that a remedy at law is not adequate. In such cases equity has exclusive jurisdiction. Thus, where a devise of real estate requires the devisees to pay debts of the testator sufficient to equalize their portion with that of another charge on such real estate, a court of equity alone has jurisdiction to adjust the rights of the parties, and enforce the charge. Harland v. Person, supra.

A court of law has no jurisdiction in an action to enforce the personal liability of a devisee of real estate upon a legacy charged thereon, where it does not expressly appear that the testator had not intended also to charge his personal estate with payment thereof. Where both are chargeable therewith, equity has exclusive jurisdiction to adjust the rights of the parties, and to enforce the charge. Tole v. Hardy, 6 Cow. 333.

Where a devisee of real estate charged with a legacy payable in the future upon the happening of a contingency, interest payable yearly, became so embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs that he failed to pay the interest, and lost possession of the farm against which the legacy was charged, and the rest of the property devised to him subject to the charge had either been conveyed away or encumbered to such an extent that a sale of it was necessary, thereby impairing the security for the payment of the legacy with the interest, the legatee is entitled to the aid of equity to raise the amount of the legacy out of the property upon which it is charged, the proceeds thereof to be invested to carry out the requirements of the will with reference to the legacy. Woodward v. Woodward, 28 N. J. Eq. 119.

Where a charge of support or other charge of a similar character is made upon real estate devised to another, it constitutes an equitable lien upon the property, and generally a personal liability of the devisee upon his acceptance of the devise. Such a charge is enforceable in equity, and will be enforced by fixing the value of the support, and declaring it a lien upon the devised property, with a provision for the sale of the property in satisfaction thereof unless payment is made by those holding through or under the devisee, in accordance with the terms of the decree. Ellis v. Ellis, 64 N. J. Eq. 375, 55 Atl. 103 (support and education of minor child); Borst v. Crommie, 19 Hun, 209.

A person whose support is made a charge upon devised real estate, upon failure of the devisees to support her, may enforce her lien by recovering the reasonable value of such support, and have the same declared a lien upon the devised real estate, although the same is in the hands of a subsequent purchaser from the devisee; and she is entitled to a foreclosure of such lien upon the real estate unless the same is discharged by the payment thereof. Borst v. Crommie, supra.

Where the widow of a testator, whose support is charged upon land devised to others, is not limited or restricted to any particular place to receive the maintenance provided by the will, it is the duty of those charged with furnishing it to furnish it, or tender performance to her, where she may choose; and where this is not done, she is entitled to a decree in her favor to enforce the charge against the devisees or their subsequent grantees of the real estate charged. Steele's Appeal, 47 Pa. 437.

A charge upon devised real estate for the support of another person entitles such person to board and clothing, and a reasonable sum must be allowed for these purposes or a gross amount in commutation thereof out of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate. This annual allowance is not to be made out of the profits of the estate in common with the devisee and his family; neither is it to be limited to a proportion of the interest on the proceeds of the sale, where the devised real estate has been disposed of to different persons ratably apportioned, and charged upon the different portions of the real estate. Hutchins v. Hutchins, 3 Md. Ch. 356.

The bequest of a specific number of horses and cows, with a proviso that the same are to be kept upon certain land devised to another during the natural life of the legatees, is a charge upon the land which will be enforced in equity, by requiring the devisee to pay for the hay and pasturage for the animals mentioned, and making that amount a standing charge upon the land. Kingsland v. Kingsland, 60 N. J. Eq. 65, 47 Atl. 69.

The proper way to enforce a charge for support charged upon a devise of real estate is for equity to treat the devisee as a trustee of the person to be supported, and to make the amount fixed upon as the value of the support a charge on the land. Tolson v. Tolson, 10 Gill & J. 150.

In equity a devisee of real estate charged with the support of the widow of the testator is considered a trustee for the purpose of executing the provisions in her favor, and by accepting the devise he assumes the trust, and the estate devised is not only chargeable in equity therewith, but the devisee becomes personally responsible for its payment according to the provisions of the will. Mahar v. O'Hara, 9 Ill. 424.

A charge of support upon the real estate devised will in equity be charged as an annuity upon the devised real estate, and enforced as such. Willett v. Carroll, 13 Md. 459.

Where real estate devised to one person is charged with the support and education of an infant, such charge will be declared to be an equitable lien upon, and enforced out of, real estate thereafter purchased by the devisee from the proceeds of the devised land. Murphy v. Carlin, 113 Mo. 112, 35 Am. St. Rep. 699, 20 S. W. 786.

A person whose support has been charged against real estate devised to another cannot maintain assumpsit against several different purchasers of different portions of such real estate, to recover from them the value of such support, the remedy being in equity, where the charge can be enforced, and the amount thereof apportioned against different parcels of the land. Pickering v. Pickering, 15 N. H. 281.

Compare with Swasey v. Little, 7 Pick, 296, which holds that an action of assumpsit may be maintained to recover an annuity made a charge upon real estate devised, and subsequent purchasers of different portions of such real estate may be joined in the action.

Where the support and education of an infant is made a charge upon real estate devised, the legatee may recover damages from the devisee accepting the devise for his failure to provide the support and education charged thereon. Watt v. Pittman, 125 Ind. 168, 25 N. E. 191.

Where certain devised real estate is charged with, and made subject to, the payment of an annuity a court of equity may appoint a receiver for the purpose of collecting and applying rents from such real estate to the satisfaction of a decree in favor of the annuitant. Gee v. Gee, 204 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ill. 588; 68 N. E. 515; Watt v. Pittman, supra; Willis v. Roberts, 48 Me. 257; Wiggin v. Wiggin, 43 N. H. 561, 80 Am. Dec. 192; Kelsey v. Deyo, 3 Cow. 133; Beecker v. Beecker, 7 Johns. 99, 5 Am. Dec. 246; Van Orden v. Van Orden, 10 Johns. 30, 6 Am. Dec. 314.

A court of equity has discretionary power to order a sale or mortgage of real estate charged with the payment of an annuity, in order to realize a sum sufficient to satisfy the annuity. Tucker v. Tucker [1893] 2 Ch. 323.

When action may be brought.

An action against a devisee of an estate in remainder charged with the legacy cannot be maintained at law prior to the expiration of the intervening life estate, although he has accepted the devise, and paid a portion of the legacy. Duncan v. Prentice, 4 Met. (Ky.) 216.

A legacy charged upon land devised to another creates an equitable lien thereon, which equity will enforce even after the final settlement of the estate. Davidson v. Coon, 125 Ind. 497, 9 L.R.A. 584, 25 N. E. 601.

A devisee accepting a devise charged with a legacy to be paid out of the proceeds of the real estate cannot be required to pay anything on the legacy until after a sale of the real estate. Haskett v. Alexander, 134 Ind. 543, 34 N. E. 325.

Enforcement of legacy in orphans', surrogate, or probate court.

In Pennsylvania, by statutory enactment of 1834, the orphans' court has exclusive jurisdiction of proceedings by a legatee to enforce his lien against real estate devised to another subject thereto. Strickler v. Sheaffer, 5 Pa. 240; Reed v. Reed, 5 Pa. 241, note; Downer v. Downer, 9 Pa. 302; Hamilton v. Whitely Twp. 12 Pa. 147; Swoope's Appeal, 27 Pa. 58; Marcy's Estate, 22 Pa. 140; Wertz's Appeal, 69 Pa. 173; Pierce v. Livingston, 80 Pa. 99; Eyre's Appeal, 106 Pa. 184.

Where the support of one person is charged upon the real estate devised to another, such support cannot be enforced by ejectment proceedings against the devisee to recover possession of the devised land, but proceedings should be had in the orphans' court to enforce against the land the lien created thereon for such support. Craven v. Bleakney, 9 Watts, 19.

But jurisdiction in the orphans' court to enforce the payment of a legacy charged upon real estate devised to another is exclusive only where relief is sought against the land; where the devisee accepts the devise, and thereby becomes personally responsible for its payment, an action by the legatee to enforce this personal liability may be maintained in a court of common pleas. Headley v. Renner, 129 Pa. 542, 18 Atl. 549.

To the same effect is Etter v. Greenawalt, 98 Pa. 422; Eyre's Appeal, supra; Dinsmore v. Ramsay, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 657.

Where a devisee dies before a testator, legatees whose legacies are made a charge upon the devised land may enforce the same by a sale of the land under a decree of the orphans' court. Solliday v. Gruver, 7 Pa. 452.

Where a devisee of real estate subject to a legacy or annuity in favor of the widow of the testator becomes the administrator of such legatee, her heirs, upon petition to the orphans' court having jurisdiction of the legatee's estate, may have the amount of such legacy charged against the administrator, he having failed to pay it during the lifetime of the legatee. Smith v. Smith, 7 Md. 55.

And where land is devised with direction to the devisee to pay certain legacies as each legatee arrives at his majority, and the devisee dies before all of such legatees attain the requisite age, his estate remains liable to such legatees upon the maturity of their legacy, and it is the duty of the administrator to pay the same; and this is true although such legatees are heirs of the devisee, and, as such heirs, take the devised land by inheritance. Case v. Hall, 52 Ohio St. 24, 25 L.R.A. 766, 38 N. E. 618.

The personal liability of a devisee of real estate charged with a legacy arises from his acceptance thereof, and is a valid claim against his estate where he dies after acceptance, but before paying the legacy; and the same may be enforced as any other claim against his estate. Glen v. Fisher, 6 Johns. Ch. 33, 10 Am. Dec. 310.

Compare with Mitchell v. Mitchell, 3 Md. Ch. 71, which holds that while a devisee of real estate charged with a legacy, upon accepting the devise, becomes personally bound for the payment of the legacy, yet, where he dies without having paid it, the devised real estate is primarily liable for the payment thereof, rather than the estate of the devisee.

Election of remedies.

The fact that a legatee has a lien upon real estate for the payment of his legacy, and that the devisee of such real estate is also personally liable for the payment thereof, does not make his remedy against the land or the devisee personally inconsistent in the sense that an election to pursue one remedy will thereafter preclude recourse to the other. On the contrary, such remedies are cumulative merely, and either or both may be pursued until the legacy has been satisfied. (See STRINGER v. GAMBLE.) In this connection, however, it will be noted that, as a matter of procedure, if the legatee seeks the aid of equity to enforce his legacy as a charge upon real estate devised to another, in those jurisdictions where, in such proceeding, he is entitled also to a personal decree against a devisee, if he fails to ask for this relief in his prayer for relief, but merely seeks a sale of the property, he cannot thereafter obtain a personal judgment against the dev- 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

isee. For a case where this rule was applied, see Cook v. Grant, 1 Paige, 407.

The fact that a legatee obtained a judgment against a devisee for the amount of a note given to cover a legacy, and also presented her claim to the auditors in an attachment proceeding issued in her behalf, did not bar her from thereafter asserting and enforcing her lien upon the real estate charged with the legacy, although in the hands of third persons. Schanck v. Arrow-smith, 9 N. J. Eq. 314. The court reasoned that the fact of the legatee obtaining judgment against the devisee did not affect her lien under the will, since she had two remedies within her reach. She could prosecute the devisee on his personal liability, or enforce her lien against the land. She might pursue both her remedies simultaneously without affecting either, or one of them at her pleasure, and until the debt was discharged by actual payment, no objection could be made to either prosecution.

The acceptance of a devise of real estate imposes a personal obligation upon the devisee where such devise is charged with the support of the widow of the testator, the payment of which is made a condition of the devise; and this obligation may be enforced by a suit to recover a personal judgment against the devisee to an amount exceeding the value of the real estate devised, and such judgment may be enforced either against the devisee personally, or by resort to the land devised, or against the devisee personally to the extent of his available assets and against the land for the balance. Porter v. Jackson, 95 Ind. 210, 48 Am. Rep. 707.

A legatee, by accepting a bond from the devisees whose real estate is devised to them subject to such legacy, does not thereby waive or release the devisees from their personal obligation to her, and such bond does not operate to discharge the devised land from the legacy. Kelsey v. Western, 2 N. Y. 500.

Where an executor takes an estate charged with the support of a third person, and gives a bond for the payment of the debts and legacies, upon his death without payment the claim can be enforced against his estate, and the legatee may also charge the land, as that remains charged until the actual payment of the legacy. Copp v. Hersey, 31 N. H. 317.

The fact that a legatee had a right of action upon a bond given by a devisee to pay debts and legacies does not preclude action against the purchasers of the real estate from the devisee, as that is merely a cumulative remedy. Sheldon v. Purple, 15 Pick. 532.

A subsequent purchaser of real estate devised subject to a legacy cannot maintain a bill in equity to require the legatee to look to a bond filed by the devisee to pay the debts and legacies, since the bond is at most only a supplementary obligation. Amherst College v. Smith, 134 Mass. 543.

A subsequent purchaser of land from a devisee who was devised the same subject to an annuity cannot require a legatee to resort to the personal obligation of the devisee on a bond given by him, before attempting to enforce a lien on the land. Evans v. Sowles, 51 Vt. 177.

Compare with Dodge v. Manning, 1 N. Y. 298, which holds that a devisee, by accepting a devise of real estate charged with a legacy, becomes personally liable for the payment of the legacy, and the remedy against him should be first exhausted, before a subsequent purchaser on a mortgage foreclosure sale of a mortgage given by the devisee of the real estate should be charged in respect of such real estate.

A devise of land merely accompanied by a direction to the devisee to pay certain sums to other persons does not constitute such sums a charge upon the land; they, however, become a personal charge against the devisee upon his accepting the devise, and this liability is not merged in a bond executed by him to the legatees for the payment of the legacies. Miltenerger v. Schlegel, 7 Pa. 241.

See, further, as to election of remedies, STRINGER v. GAMBLE.

Right of legatee to possession of real estate charged with the legacy.

Where a devise of real estate is subject to a charge for the support of the widow of a testator, upon the failure of the devisee or his grantees to provide such support, the widow is entitled to enter upon the estate, and hold possession until her support is furnished; or she may maintain a petition in chancery, and such petition is not subject to abatement upon the ground that she has an adequate remedy at law. Dodge v. Dodge, 1 Root, 233, 1 Am. Dec. 40.

Compare with Thomas v. Boyd, 13 Ind. 333, which holds that a devise of real estate subject to the support of the widow of the testator does not give the primary right to the widow to control the land devised, but, on failure or refusal of the devisees to provide for her as provided in the will, gives her the right to subject the land to that purpose.

A person whose support is charged on devised real estate is not ordinarily entitled to the possession thereof, but if such possession is necessary to provide the support, it will not be interfered with. Harris v. Ross, 57 N. C. (4 Jones, Eq.) 413.

See Dinan v. Coneys, 143 N. Y. 544, 38 N. E. 715, which holds that the existence of a legacy charged upon real estate devised to another gives the legatee no right of possession as against the devisee, whether the legacy is paid or not, and in an action of ejectment by the devisee against the legatee, to obtain possession of the devised real estate, the legatee cannot set up his legacy as a counterclaim. PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

NORRIS E. HENDERSON

v.

JOHN W. JENNINGS, Appt.

Sale — mortgage — passing title.

1. The title to the mortgage passes at the time of making the contract, where one interested in a building operation agrees with a materialman that if he will furnish certain materials for the project, and take in part payment a specifically described mortgage on the property, "to purchase from you within sixty days after its delivery" the mortgage, the contractor stating "I purchase simply what you get."

Damages — failure to pay for mortgage.

2. The measure of damages for breach of a contract to purchase a specifically designated mortgage within sixty days after its delivery by the mortgagor to the mortgagee is the price, and not the difference between the price and the market value of the mortgage, since the title passes when the contract is made.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 2 for Philadelphia County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract to purchase a certain mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Francis J. Maneely and Morris Dos Passos for appellant.

Messrs. Alfred D. Wiler and William H. Peace, for appellee:

As the bond and mortgage had been executed, was duly recorded, and was in the possession of the Union Trust Company to deliver to the plaintiff, and was later duly assigned to plaintiff, and defendant agreed to pay for it in sixty days after its delivery to plaintiff, the title to it passed to defendant under his contract, and plaintiff should recover the full price of the mortgage.

Reynolds v. Callender, 19 Pa. Super. Ct.

Note. — Although there are many cases passing on the general question as to the remedies of the seller under an executed contract when the buyer refuses to accept the goods sold, the rules applicable to those cases do not seem heretofore to have been applied in a case where the purchaser refused to accept a mortgage which at the time of the sale was not in existence.

Mason*, 120 Mass. 53.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was interested—to what extent we do not know, nor is it material—with one Sharp in a building operation in Philadelphia. The plaintiff proposed to supply them with the hardware required in the construction of certain buildings, for the sum of $3,072. The terms of payment offered him were 50 per cent cash and 50 per cent in a second mortgage or mortgages upon the buildings. He at first declined these terms. Thereupon it was proposed that, if he would accept the terms offered, Jennings would purchase from him the mortgage or mortgages within sixty days after they were delivered to him at the face value, less 10 per cent. This was satisfactory to the plaintiff, and the contract was accordingly entered into, Jennings on a separate paper obligating himself to purchase from the plaintiff the particular mortgage for $1,550, which plaintiff had finally agreed to accept. Plaintiff, having received the mortgage, at the expiration of, not within, the sixty days, requested Jennings to redeem his promise by purchasing the mortgage. Jennings refused, and plaintiff then brought this action to recover the price Jennings had agreed to pay. The trial resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for the amount claimed.

There is but one assignment of error that calls for consideration. The recovery was permitted for the full contract price for the mortgage. It is insisted that the true and only measure of damage in such case is the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery, and that, inasmuch as plaintiff had not shown any loss, he was not entitled to recover anything. The question turns on the construction of the contract. Jennings's written offer was in these words, addressed to the plaintiff: "In consideration of your entering into an agreement with Richard H. Sharp, and your paying me a commission of 10 per cent on the face amount thereof, I hereby agree to purchase from you within sixty days after its delivery to you a certain mortgage of $1,550, described in schedule C of your contract with Mr. Sharp, and in connection with the ninety-six buildings about to be erected in the Forty-Second ward of Philadelphia, without regard to title, completion, street improvements, liability for mechanics' or municipal claims, as I purchase simply what you get." The jury found as a fact that plaintiff accepted this offer, and, relying upon it, contracted with Sharp to supply the required hardware for the buildings, and accept in part consideration the mortgage described in the offer. This states the whole contract. As between the plaintiff and Jennings, touching the mortgage, was it an actual sale or merely a contract to purchase? In other words, was it an executed or executory contract? If the former, then title to the mortgage at once passed to Jennings, subject to the plaintiff's right of lien until the conditions were complied with, or until full delivery (Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14, 62 Am. Dec. 354); and in such case the measure of damage would be the contract price (Ballentine v. Robinson, 46 Pa. 177). In the case last cited we have this very satisfactory exposition of the law. "Where a sale of goods has been made and they have been delivered, it is plain the measure of damages for nonpayment is the stipulated price. About that there is no difficulty. Doubts, however, have been entertained where goods have been sold, and not delivered in consequence of the refusal of the buyer to complete the contract. It has sometimes been said the standard for measurement is the excess of the contract price over the market value. Yet where the subject of the same is a specific article, where the contract has been so far completed as to pass the property in the article to the vendee, the possession being retained only because the price is not paid, there seems to be no good reason why the vendor should not be permitted to recover the agreed value. He has fully complied with all that he was under obligation to do. He has parted with his property, and given the full equivalent for the stipulated price. His right to the property having passed to the vendee, his right to the price would appear to be consummate." This marks the distinction as to the measure of damages in case where the default is in connection with an executed contract, and where it is in connection with a simple contract to sell. In the latter, the measure of damage is determined by the general rule of difference between contract price and market value; in the former, the contract price is the measure.

Did the right of property in the mortgage, as between vendor and vendee, pass to the latter upon the plaintiff's acceptance of the defendant's offer? This depends upon the intention of the parties as it is to be derived from the contract and its circumstances. We are of opinion that it did pass. The subject of the sale was a specific thing, distinctly designated in the contract, and unassociated with anything else. The language of the offer following a description of the mortgage is: "I purchase simply what you get." "Where there is a sale of goods generally, no property in them passes till delivery, because until then the very goods are not ascertained. But where by the contract itself the vendor appropriates to the vendee a specific chattel, and the latter thereby agrees to take that specific chattel and to pay the stipulated price, the parties are then in the same situation as they would be after a delivery of goods in pursuance of a general contract. The very appropriation of the chattel is equivalent to delivery by the vendor, and the assent of the vendee to take the specific chattel and to pay the price is equivalent to his accepting possession. The effect of the contract, therefore, is to vest the property in the bargainee." 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 315. The above quotation from the text of the authority cited is adopted from the opinion of Baron Parke in Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & A. 313, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 385. The rule as there expressed has been very generally accepted and enforced, confining it, of course, to the controversies between vendor and vendee, with no intervening rights to be disturbed. Our own state authorities give most unqualified recognition to the rule.

The case of Winslow v. Leonard, supra, is directly in point. Equally so is Ballentine v. Robinson, supra. No less explicit are Gonser v. Smith, 115 Pa. 452, 8 Atl. 770, and Com. v. Hess, 148 Pa. 98, 17 L.R.A. 176, 33 Am. St. Rep. 810, 23 Atl. 977. The opinion of Paxson, Ch. J., in the case last cited, contains a very full and careful review of all the authorities on the subject. We see nothing in the facts of the case to take it out of the operation of this general rule. That the mortgage was not in actual existence at the time the contract was entered into is unimportant. "In relation to things not yet in existence, or not yet belonging to the vendor, the law considers them as divided into two classes, one of which may be sold, while the other can only be the subject of an agreement to sell, of an executory contract. Things not yet existing which may be sold are those which are said to have a potential existence; that is, things which are the natural product or expected increase of something already belonging to the vendor." 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 78. The rule is thus stated by 2 Story on Contracts, § 75. "So, also, although the thing to be sold have no actual and present existence, yet, if it be the anticipated product or increase of something to which the seller has a vested right, the sale will be good." Under this general rule, it has been decided that the earnings of an engagement of service already entered into may be the subject of a present sale. One may assign earnings arising out of a contract of service already entered into, but not those of a prospective service. In the one case the earnings have a potential existence, though there is a possibility that they may never materialize. In the other there is nothing more than a mere possibility of existence. Hartley v. Tapley, 2 Gray, 505; Augur v. New York Belting & Packing Co. 39 Conn. 536, and Farnsworth v. Jackson, 32 Me. 419, further illustrate the rule. In the present case the obligation on part of the defendant became binding at once upon the plaintiff's entering into the contract with Sharp, and defendant at once acquired a present right to the mortgage under his contract, which would ripen into a perfect title by lapse of time. It was not the case of a mere possibility coupled with no interest; nor was it a case of one selling something which he did not have, but which he expected to buy in the general market. This one particular mortgage was the thing sold, and at the time of the sale nobody had any right to it except the plaintiff.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, Appt.,

v.

SAM WATKINS et al.

SAME, Appt.,

v.

GEORGE BURNS et al.

(— Tenn. —, 130 S. W. 839.)

Criminal law — misdemeanor — disturbing meeting.

It is a misdemeanor at common law wantonly to disturb an assembly of persons met together for any lawful purpose, such as the enjoyment of a Christmas tree, and this law is not changed by a statute pro-

Note. — Character of meeting essential to the offense of disturbing a meeting.

This note is confined to the single question as to the kinds of meetings within the purview of the common-law or statutory offense of disturbing meetings. It is not concerned with the question whether the offense may be committed by acts done before the viding for the punishment of anyone who shall disturb a meeting for religious, educational, or literary purposes, or for the promotion of temperance.

A PPEALS by the State from orders of the Circuit Court for Loudon County quashing indictments for disturbing a public assemblage in violation of law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter W. Faw, for the State:

It is a misdemeanor at common law wantonly to disturb an assemblage of persons met together for any specific and lawful purpose, particularly meetings of a distinctly moral or benevolent character.

assembling, or after the dispersal, of such a meeting with the question what amounts to a disturbance of such a meeting, or any other questions affecting other ingredients of the offense. The question whether the statutory provisions on the subject of disturbing meetings preclude a prosecution at common law is also beyond the scope of this note, unless the contention was that the enumeration of meetings in the statute is exclusive, and for that reason prevents a prosecution at common law for disturbing a meeting within the purview of the common-law offense, but not named in the statute.

Religious meetings.

There is no doubt that meetings for public worship are in general within the purview of the statutory or the common-law offense. This is assumed by a multitude of cases dealing with questions not within the scope of this note. The question here considered is merely, What are meetings for public religious worship within the purview of the offense.

It is stated in State v. Jasper, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 323, holding that the disturbance of a public religious meeting was a misdemeanor and indictable at common law, that while that was also the rule in England with respect to the Established Church, it was not the case with respect to Dissenters, for whose protection it was necessary to pass specific statutes.

The point is, of course, only of historical interest, but it may be noted that as early as R. v. Hube, 5 T. R. 542, it was held that a dissenting congregation was protected from disturbance.

And so, according to a dictum of Lord Mansfield in R. v. Wroughton, 3 Burr. 1683, Methodists and Dissenters had a right to the protection of the court if interrupted in their decent and quiet devotions.

So, the statute protecting from riotous, violent, or indecent behavior, any cathedral, church, chapel, or churchyard, applies as well to persons in Holy Orders as to laymen. Vallancey v. Fletcher [1897] 1 Q. B. 265. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 10th ed. § 1556; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 542; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 301; People v. Crowley, 23 Hun, 412.

As the statute does not include and cover the present case, it leaves the law as it was before its enactment.

State v. Cooper, 120 Tenn. 553, 113 S. W. 1048, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1116.

Messrs. Frank R. Harrison and John J. Blair for appellees.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment in this case charges that "Sam Watkins, Henry Jackson (and?), Charles Dobson, heretofore, on the 25th day of December, 1909, in the county aforesaid,

In this country it is clear that if the meeting can be properly regarded as one for public worship, the fact that it may not conform to the modes and forms of worship observed in more conventional organizations will not deprive it of the protection of the law.

Thus, the nature and form of worship is immaterial. Kinney v. State, 38 Ala. 224.

So, the protection of the law extends to all, irrespective of creed, opinion, or mode of worship, if it is not indecent or unlawful. Hull v. State, 120 Ind. 153, 22 N. E. 117.

But the fact that a religious congregation may have been trespassers in using a church on a day set apart for its use by another denomination will not justify a sexton in disturbing such gathering, on the ground that, as trespassers, they were conducting themselves in an unlawful manner, and consequently were not within the purview of the statute protecting "any congregation assembled for religious worship, and conducting themselves in a lawful manner." Dorn v. State, 4 Tex. App. 67.

The Salvation Army, though not incorporated, is a religious society within the statute denouncing this offense. State v. Stuth, 11 Wash. 423, 39 Pac. 665.

—Sunday school.

See also infra: "Meetings for social, entertainment, or educational purposes."

Sunday schools are within the purview of the common-law offense. State v. Branner, 140 N. C. 559, 63 S. E. 169.

And are within the North Carolina statute on the subject. Ibid.

And are within a statute making the unlawful disturbance of "public worship" indictable. Martin v. State, 6 Baxt. 234.

But it was held in Hubbard v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 389, 24 S. W. 30, that a conviction for disturbing a Sunday school could not be sustained under an information charging a disturbance of religious worship, for the reason that the local statute makes a clear distinction between a disturbance of religious worship and a disturbance of a Sunday school.

did unlawfully, wilfully, and knowingly disturb an assemblage of persons met for the purpose of a 'Christmas tree,' by loud talking, profane discourse, and other rude and improper conduct, to the common nuisance, against the peace and dignity of the state." Upon motion the trial judge quashed the indictment, upon the ground, as stated in his order, that "it did not charge an indictable offense." From his action the case has been brought to this court by the state, and error assigned upon it.

It will be observed that this indictment is found under the common law, and, as such, we are satisfied was maintainable. It is a misdemeanor at common law wantonly to disturb an assemblage of persons met together for any lawful purpose, particularly meetings of a distinctly moral or benevolent character. In 2 Wharton's Criminal Law, 10th ed. § 1556, it is said: "For three or more persons to attempt to break up a meeting, religious or secular, is indictable either as a riot or as an attempt at riot. There may be cases, however, in which the number joining in the disturbance is not large enough to constitute a riot, or there may be cases in which it is desirable, for statutory or other reasons, to prosecute for the distinctive offense of improperly interfering with the right belonging to all citizens to meet together for religious or secular conference. There can be no question that the violent interference with this right is indictable at common law, and that any conduct which —business meeting of religious society.

The statute protecting from disturbance people assembled "for divine worship" does not extend to a religious society which has concluded its religious services, and entered upon secular business. State v. Fisher, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 111.

Nor does the statute protecting from disturbance a congregation assembled for religious worship apply to a congregation assembled exclusively for business purposes, even though the proceedings were opened with religious exercises. Wood v. State, 11 Tex. App. 318. The statute governing this case protects, and is only intended to protect, "any congregation or part of a congregation assembled for religious worship."

But in Hollingsworth v. State, 5 Sneed, 519, the statute providing for the punishment of any person disturbing any congregation met "for the purpose of worshipping Almighty God, or aid or assist in the same," is extended to a religious congregation assembled to transact business connected with their interests as a church.

—as affected by place where meeting is held.

In State v. Smith, 5 Harr. (Del.) 490, it is held an indictable offense to disturb a religious society, regardless of the place if within the county. The court said: "Even without an act of assembly, this would be an indictable offense, as the Christian religion is protected by the common law."

And a congregation engaged in public worship, though it be not in a church, chapel, or meetinghouse specially set apart for the purpose, is within the statute protecting from disturbance a congregation met "for the purpose of divine service, and engaged in the worship of Almighty God." State v. Swink, 20 N. C. 492 (4 Dev. & B. L. 358).

Under statute making it a misdemeanor to "disturb any camp meeting, congregation, or other assembly met for religious worship," a congregation met for religious worship at a designated school and church house is protected, although the place had not been set apart for that purpose. State v. Alford, 142 Mo. App. 412, 127 S. W. 109. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But where the members of a certain family were accustomed to gather annually for a family reunion, the residence at which a religious service was held on one of those occasions is not within the purview of the statute making it a misdemeanor to disturb religious worship at a place where people are accustomed to meet for divine worship. The court said that the statute was intended to protect known and regularly established places of public worship, within the reasonable knowledge of the general public, and when it is fair to presume that they were put upon notice that divine service was likely to be going on whenever numbers of people were then assembled, and does not include an exceptional meeting of this kind, which assembles first at one house and then at another of the members. State v. Starnes, 151 N. C. 724, 66 S. E. 347.

In Stratton v. State, 13 Ark. 688, which held an indictment for disturbing a religious congregation assembled in a certain church unsustainable by proof that defendant disturbed a congregation assembled in the open air, the court said: "It is the body of people or worshippers associated together for religious purposes, that constitutes a church, and that are equally protected by the statute against disturbance, though assembled at a camp ground or in the open air or in a private house."

But in State v. Schieneman, 64 Mo. 386, it is held that the statute prohibiting any person disturbing "any camp meeting, congregation, or other assembly of people met for religious worship," was intended to protect camp meetings held on a piece of ground set apart for that purpose, and congregations of persons gathered together within their place or house of worship, and did not extend to assemblages conducting religious services in public squares and streets.

Temperance meeting.

In Com. v. Porter, 1 Gray, 476, it is held that the statute inhibiting disturbances of schools and public meetings includes temperance meetings and, it seems, political gatherings, meetings for amusements, and wantonly disturbs persons so meeting is in like manner indictable."

In 1 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 542, dealing with the same subject-matter, the author says: "When people assemble for worship or in their town, or other like meetings, or probably always when they come together in an orderly way for a purpose not unlawful, the common law makes it a crime to disturb their meeting. . . . What amounts to disturbance varies with the nature and objects of the meeting."

This holding in no way trenches upon the authority of Layne v. State, 4 Lea, 199.

all public meetings held for lawful purposes. The court said: "If the public meeting of citizens for lawful purposes is an essential and valuable right, and this law goes no further than to give practical efficacy and security to it by a moderate punishment for its disturbance, we can perceive no good reason why the law should not be made to be coextensive with the right to be secured, and applied, according to its plain terms, to the wilful disturbance of all public meetings held for lawful purposes."

Cases like State v. Norris, 59 N. H. 530, upon the question whether a temperance camp meeting is within the purview of a statute prohibiting the sale of liquor within a given distance of a place of religious worship, are not within the scope of the note.

Also such cases as Com. v. Jennings, 3 Gratt. 624, and State v. Edwards, 32 Mo. 550, which turn on the question whether the offense may be committed after the assemblage has retired or dispersed, are excluded.

Meetings for social, entertainment, or educational purposes.

An assemblage of people met to celebrate the birth of Christ with a Sunday school Christmas tree, and also with prayer, song, and scriptural talk from the minister, is within the statute prohibiting disturbance of assemblages for divine worship. Staford v. State, 154 Ala. 71, 45 So. 673.

But a Sunday school celebration and Christmas tree at which no religious services had been appointed, but speeches were made upon the subject of Sunday schools and public morality, is not within the statute protecting against disturbance "assemblies met for religious worship." Layne v. State, 4 Lea. 201.

In Brock v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 44 S. W. 516, an assemblage of people in a public schoolhouse, to rehearse for a public entertainment, is protected by a statute making it an offense to disturb the peace. The court said that the assembly, though in a sense for private purposes to rehearse, was in a public place, and the fact that it was a private rehearsal would not strip the place of its public character.

An assemblage met solely for instruction in the art of singing, although confined to the singing of sacred songs, is not an as-

In that the presentment was framed under § 4853 of the old Code (Shannon's Code, § 6776), which section is as follows: "If any person wilfully disturb or disquiet any assemblage of persons meeting for religious worship, or for educational or literary purposes, or as a lodge of or for the purpose of engaging in or promoting the cause of temperance, by noise, profane discourse, rude or indecent behavior, or any other act at or near the place of meeting, he shall be fined not less than twenty nor more than two hundred dollars, and may also be imprisoned not exceeding six months in the assemblage met for religious worship, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the disturbing of "religious worship." Adair v. State, 134 Ala. 183, 32 So. 326.

Disturbing a singing school is an indictable offense by an act providing a penalty for disturbing "any meeting of inhabitants of the state met together for any lawful purpose." State v. Oskins, 28 Ind. 364.

But persons assembled at a schoolhouse, to train their voices for singing, are not within the statute protecting from disturbance a congregation met for religious worship. Green v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 56 S. W. 915.

In Von Rueden v. State, 96 Wis. 671, 71 N. W. 1048, it is held that the statute providing against the disturbance of any assembly or meeting of people "for religious worship or for other purposes" includes a gathering of people in a public highway to listen to a lecture.

The statute providing a penalty for disturbing any teacher or pupils in any school kept in "any schoolhouse or other place of instruction" applies to a private school for instruction in writing. State v. Leighton, 35 Me. 195.

And it is an indictable offense to disturb a school assemblage, although at the time it was not in the school, but was at a bush arbor near thereto. McCright v. State, 110 Ga. 261, 34 S. E. 368.

Political or official meeting.

Where disturbing a town meeting constitutes an offense at common law, an indictment concluding against the form of a statute may be maintained, if the facts charged amount to such an offense, and are not within the purview of any statute. Com. v. Hoxey, 16 Mass. 385.

A meeting of electors is not protected by a statute making it an offense to disturb an assemblage of persons met for religious worship. R. v. Lavoie, 6 Can. Crim. Cas. 39, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 21 C. S. 128.

Maliciously disturbing a meeting of school directors is indictable at common law, although not punishable by any act of assembly. Campbell v. Com. 59 Pa. 266.

J. D. C.

county jail." The plaintiff in error in that case was presented for disturbing "an assembly of persons met for religious worship," and was convicted. It appeared from the proof that it was not such an assembly, but a meeting held at a schoolhouse as a "Sunday school celebration and Christmas tree," at which no religious services had been appointed, but where speeches were made on the subject of Sunday school and public morality. Upon appeal, it was held by this court that there was a variance between the proof and the charge in the indictment, and that, therefore, the conviction could not be sustained. This was the full extent of the court's holding. There is no intimation in the opinion that it is not a misdemeanor in Tennessee to unlawfully and wilfully disturb an assemblage of persons met for the purpose described in the indictment in this case.

The section of the Code does not pretend to cover the whole ground of nuisance as defined and made punishable at common law. It does not abrogate the common law relating to the disturbance of meetings other than those specifically mentioned therein, and it is held in Layne v. State, supra, that a meeting for the purpose of Christmas tree celebrations is not included either in its letter or spirit. It is well settled that "if the statute does not include and cover such a case, it leaves the law as it was before its enactment. . . . A statute will not be construed to alter the common law further than the act expressly declares, or than is necessarily implied from the fact that it covers the whole subject-matter." State v. Cooper, 120 Tenn. 553, 113 S. W. 1049, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1116.

It is a matter of common knowledge, as is well remarked by the attorney general in the brief submitted by him in this case, that the "custom of having Christmas trees for the benefit and enjoyment of the children and youths of Sunday schools is long established in Tennessee." This custom not only prevails in the cities and towns of the state, but in the rural districts, where there is but little police protection. In such places, if rowdies, by violent and obscene conduct and speech, can interfere with and break up such gatherings without being subject to criminal indictment and punishment, the people have no remedy. As is said for the state: "It will not suffice to say that an indictment for public profanity or obscenity will lie, for in many cases there may be serious disturbances without the guilty parties indulging in either of these offenses."

The judgment in this cause is reversed, and the case is remanded for a trial.

This opinion disposes also of the case of State v. George Burns et al., involving an offense of a similar character.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

MARTIN V. B. VAN NESS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

ROYAL PHOSPHATE COMPANY.

Covenant — breach — railroad on land.

The legal existence of a railroad right of way and of the roadbed and track upon real estate at the time it is conveyed by a deed in which the grantors bind "themselves and their heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend the title to said premises unto the said party of the second part, its heirs, successors, and assigns, against the said parties of the first part and their heirs, executors, and administrators, and against all persons whomsoever lawfully or equitably claiming, or to claim, the same," does not give the grantee in the deed a right of action for damages against the grantor, because of the existence of the said right of way, roadbed, and track.

Headnotes by HOCKER, J.

Note. — Existence of public highway, private way, or railroad right of way across land at time of conveyance as breach of covenants.

This note is confined strictly to a discussion of those cases involving public highways, private pass ways, and railroads; and while similar questions involving other encumbrances affecting the physical condition of the land, such as water rights, ponds, party walls, wharves, etc., may to a certain extent depend upon similar principles, they form a distinctive class sufficient to warrant an independent treatment.

The cases are taken up in the order noted in the title, and as far as possible have been treated with respect to each specific covenant or covenants involved. Those cases involving covenants of seisin and of good right to convey are treated together, as one is practically the equivalent of the other. Also covenants for quiet enjoyment and of warranty are practically identical in operation, since whatever constitutes a breach of the one is a breach of the other, and they will be considered together. On the other hand, a covenant of seisin is not a covenant against encumbrances, but is sometimes embraced in a general warranty, which, where a statutory form is provided, as in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE Co., generally includes all the common-law covenants. Therefore, for cases involving any particular covenant, an examination should be made of the cases, as set out under the various divisions, which necessarily conflict.

The principal conflict of authority arises among the public highway and railroad cases, in which the encumbrances are open, visible, and notorious, it being held in many such cases that the parties are supposed to have contracted with reference to them, and that such encumbrances do not breach covenants of general warranty or those against encumbrances. A highway which conferred a benefit has also been held not to constitute an encumbrance. These rules, however, do not seem to have been extended to private rights of way, and in a few jurisdictions an express distinction has been made. Some courts, too, seem reluctant to extend the rule to existing railroads, but to the writer it seems difficult, if not impossible, to find a basis for such distinction.

Also, many cases are not based, either directly or inferentially, upon the existence of notice, either actual or constructive, in the covenantee.

Further discussions of the rules drawn and their application will be found accompanying the cases.

The division of the note into separate subdivisions, treating respectively public highways, private ways, and railroads, has some justification in essential distinctions made by the courts between these different classes of cases; but these subdivisions ought not to be regarded as mutually exclusive, to such an extent that the cases included in one have no bearing upon the principles applicable to those included in the others.

Public highways.

The question whether an existing public highway breaches covenants of seisin or of good right to convey in general depends upon the extent of the right vested in the public, a mere easement for passage being held not to breach such covenants, and this may be considered the logical rule, since 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the covenant of seisin is merely an assurance to the purchaser that the grantor has the estate, at least the possession thereof, in quantity and quality which he purports to convey. Therefore, in attempting to convey a fee, there will be no breach unless the fee to a highway on the lands had vested in the public.

Thus, the following cases held that the existence of a public easement for a highway over land conveyed is not a breach of a covenant of seisin, since the public easement does not affect the technical seisin of the purchaser: Moore v. Johnston, 87 Ala. 220, 6 So. 50 (cited in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE Co.); Vaughn v. Stuzaker, 16 Ind. 338 (quoted with approval in Shelbyville & B. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205); Jordan v. Eve, 31 Gratt. 1.

And see also Moore v. Boulton, 10 U. C. Q. B. 140, infra, "Covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment."

And Vt. Rev. Laws 1880, page 586, § 3042, provide that "where real estate is conveyed by deed, the existence of a public highway over or upon any part of such estate shall not be treated as a breach of the covenant of seisin or warranty, or any covenant against encumbrances contained in such deed, unless the parties to such deed expressly refer to and covenant against such highway."

In Whitebeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272, set out and quoted from in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE Co., the covenants involved were those of seisin, of right to convey, and for quiet enjoyment, but the first two only are involved in the decision as set out in the VAN NESS CASE. A strong dissenting opinion was rendered by Justice Van Ness (reported at page 544 of 15 Johns.), in which, after declaring his inability to distinguish between the covenants involved and a covenant against encumbrances, in the sense that breach of the latter would not constitute a breach of the former, he said: "It has been argued that where conveyances include highways, the grantee takes the land subject to the easement; and knowing of its existence, it would, therefore, be unjust and inequitable that he should maintain an action on any of the usual covenants in the deed. But, in a court of law, these considerations can have no influence. The question here is not whether the grantee did or did not know of that existence of the road. Whether the covenant is broken or not cannot depend upon that fact, nor can it at all be the subject of inquiry. A court of law must judge from what appears in the deed itself, and is not permitted to travel out of it to determine its legal effect. Let us suppose, however, the grantee to have been an entire stranger to the land; that he had never seen it; that he purchased it by the acre, and that all the land described in the deed had been covered by a highway; how would the equity of the case then stand? If, in this case, the grantee did not know of the existence of the road, and the deed had been executed under mistake or misapprehension, the grantee might, perhaps, have relief elsewhere; but in this court he is bound by the terms of his covenants. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the plaintiff has shown a right to recover." As to the covenant for quiet enjoyment, there was no decision upon the merits, as a demurrer to the averment of a breach thereof was held well taken, because the declaration contained no averment of an eviction, which was held essential, since the covenant for quiet enjoyment goes to the possession, and not the title.

And in Burbach v. Schweinler, 56 Wis. 386, 14 N. W. 449, where lands were conveyed with reference to a recorded plat, a street or alley over such lands, shown by the plat, was held not to breach covenants of seisin, of right to convey, and against encumbrances in the conveyance, irrespective of the grantee's actual knowledge, and of whether the street was a mere public easement or whether the fee vested in the public, the court saying that if the former were the case, the lands were conveyed subject to the easements, and if the latter, the land occupied by the highway was wholly excluded from the conveyance, the ground 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

being that the grantee was chargeable with notice of any streets and alleys shown on the referred-to plat.

But in Haynie v. American Trust Invest. Co. (Tenn.) 39 S. W. 860, a public road fenced up, and not in actual use as such, yet still legally existent, the existence of which was unknown to the purchaser, was held to breach a covenant of seisin, the ground being that the grantee had the right to treat the loss of the land covered by the public road as an entire failure of title to that portion of the land purported to be conveyed.

And in Daisy Realty Co. v. Brown, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 155, 35 S. W. 637, it was held that covenants in a deed that the grantor was lawfully "seised in fee simple" of the property conveyed, that he had "good right and full power to convey the same," and that it is "free from all encumbrances," were broken by the existence of a street thereon which had been dedicated to the public use.

Of course, if the deed containing the covenant of seisin only purports to convey to the edge of the street, the existence of the highway constitutes no breach of that covenant. Tuskegee Land & Secur. Co. v. Birmingham Realty Co. 161 Ala. 542, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 992, 49 So. 378, though it is otherwise as to covenants against encumbrances. Ibid.

The greatest conflict among the authorities as to whether the existence of a public highway over land conveyed breaches a covenant against encumbrances in a deed arises, as before stated, around the effect of knowledge on the part of the covenantee of the existence of the way. The weight of authority, although, perhaps, not based on the sounder legal reason, releases the grantor from liability where the grantee has either actual or constructive notice, and in at least two states the question is settled by statute.

Some cases, without discussing the effect of knowledge, hold that the existence of a law for damages in the circuit court of Citrus county against the plaintiff in error, and recovered upon the trial a large judgment, which the plaintiff in error has brought here for review. There is a perfect mass of pleas, motions to strike, demurrers, etc., in the record, but out of this labyrinth there emerges the question whether, on the facts stated, the defendant in error was entitled to recover damages from the plaintiff in error under the alleged warranties in the deed, because, when the deed was executed to the defendant in error, there existed upon the land the easement of a railroad right of way under the deed from the plaintiff in error herein referred to. The deed from the plaintiff in error to defendant in error does not follow the language or the form of a warranty deed, prescribed in § 2449, Gen. Stat. 1906. The language of the warranty, thereby given the effect of the "full common-law covenants" by § 2450, Id., is as follows: "And the said party of the first part does hereby fully warrant the title to said land, and will defend the same against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever." In the deed the plaintiff in error does not follow the language of the statute, and "fully warrant and defend the title," but simply binds himself and his heirs, etc., "to warrant and defend the title." Statutes such as this one are always strictly construed, because they are in derogation of the common law, and "consequently, in order to constitute the statutory covenants, the words of the stat-against all encumbrances, he is not liable to refund the money paid upon the mortgage by the grantee. That is, he is so liable at law. This is the written contract of the parties, and it cannot be set right in a court of law, where the writing is the exclusive evidence of the contract. But in such a case, the party must resort to a court of equity, to restrain the other party from claiming indemnity against an encumbrance, which was intended to be excepted from the covenant. And the same is no doubt true of a covenant against encumbrances, so far as highways are concerned. Ordinarily, a court of equity would readily suppose the encumbrance of an existing highway or railway, or any other known and notorious right of a similar character, as a right to draw water from a spring, exercised by another at the time of the conveyance, could not have been intended to be indemnified against, and therefore should have been excepted from the operation of the covenant, and would, no doubt, so require the parties to treat the deed. But a court of law could not do this, without confounding all distinctions between the equity and law jurisdiction upon the subject." Continuing, the court characterized the attempt made in Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272, to show that a highway is not an encumbrance, as "more plausible than sound." See Vt. Rev. Laws, 1880, p. 586, as quoted supra.

In Hubbard v. Norton, 10 Conn. 422, evidence that certain highways which were alleged to constitute a breach of covenant against encumbrances were open and notorious, and known to the covenantee at the time of the purchase, was held inadmissible on the ground that the covenantee's knowledge could not destroy the effect of the defendant's covenant, the court saying: Will it not excite "surprise that the grantor should convey these lands with the knowledge he must have of these encumbrances, without making an exception of them, unless he was willing to sustain the damages that might arise from them? When it is recollected that this is the deed of the grantor, and these his covenants, it seems more correct to say that he must abide by them, than to permit him to unnerve or destroy them by proof of this kind, which is only calculated to induce a belief that the party grantor could not have intended what he has actually covenanted for."

But in the following cases, it was held that a covenant against encumbrances in a deed of land is not broken by the existence of a public road over the land, known to the purchaser at the time of the purchase: Desvergers v. Willis, 56 Ga. 515, 21 Am. Rep. 289 (set out at length in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO.); Weller v. Fidelity Trust & S. V. Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1136, 64 S. W. 843; Haldane v. Sweet, 55 Mich. 198, 20 N. W. 902; Patterson v. Arthurs, 9 Watts, 152 (also set out in the VAN NESS CASE); Jordan v. Eve, 31 Gratt. 1, approved in Deacon v. Doyle, 75 Va. 258, and in Trice v. Kayton, 84 Va. 217, 10 Am. St. Rep. 836, 4 S. E. 377.

And a legal highway which is open and in actual use at the time of the conveyance is not embraced in a general covenant against encumbrances. Scribner v. Holmes, 16 Ind. 142, disapproved in Burk v. Hill, 48 Ind. 52, 17 Am. Rep. 731; Perry v. Williamson (Tenn.) 47 S. W. 189 (dictum); Kutz v. McCune, 22 Wis. 628, 99 Am. Dec. 85 (dictum set out in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO.).

And in Vermont it is so provided by statute. See Vt. Rev. Laws 1880, page 586, as quoted supra. See also Ill. Rev. Stat. 1883, page 286, as quoted infra.

In Ashburner v. Sewell (1891) 3 Ch. 405, Justice Chitty said, obiter: "The general rule of law in regard to rights of way may be stated as follows: Where it is obvious that there is a right of way enjoyed by some third person or by the public in general, the existence of such right of way cannot give rise to any objection to the title; as, for example, if the estate sold is a large one with a public highway running through it, then it is obvious that it is not intended to sell the property free from such right of way; but the purchaser would take subject to the right of way."

And that a street or alley indicated on a

Hocker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 27th day of February, A. D. 1900, the plaintiff in error, joined by his wife, executed a deed to the defendant in error, in which he granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed to the defendant in error 145 acres of land, more or less, lying in Citrus county, Florida, together with the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging. In this deed the plaintiff in error and his wife, the parties of the first part, "do hereby bind themselves and their heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend the title to said premises unto the said party of the second part, its heirs, successors, and assigns, against the said parties of the first part and their heirs, executors, and administrators, and against all persons whomsoever lawfully or equitably claiming, or to claim, the same." There was no other covenant in the deed.

On the 26th of May, 1891, the plaintiff in error and his wife executed and delivered a deed to the Silver Springs, Ocala, & Gulf Railroad Company conveying a right of way over the above-mentioned land for said railroad 100 feet wide, on which the said road at once constructed, built, and operated its said railroad, and has done so ever since, and is now in possession of said right of way. Because of the existence of this right of way as an alleged breach of the warranties of its deed from plaintiff in error, the defendant in error brought a suit at public highway over land conveyed by a deed covenanting against encumbrances is a burden and a breach of the covenant. Copeland v. McAdory, 100 Ala. 553, 13 So. 545; Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. 97 (a much-cited case); Prichard v. Atkinson, 3 N. H. 335; Haynes v. Stevens, 11 N. H. 28.

The decision in People's Sav. Bank v. Alexander, 2 Sadler (Pa.) 287, 3 Atl. 821, is merely to the effect that the existence of a street legally laid out across a lot, but not open for use, and not known to the grantee of the lot, is an encumbrance sufficient to excuse the purchaser from performing, and entitling him to recover the purchase money paid.

And in DeLong v. Spring Lake Beach Improv. Co. 72 N. J. L. 135, 59 Atl. 1034, a declaration on a covenant against encumbrances, which averred as an encumbrance that a part of the land conveyed had been dedicated as a public park and as a way of access to a lake, was held not subject to a plea that the dedication was known to the grantee at the date of the sale. See also Daisy Realty Co. v. Brown, supra.

And in Butler v. Gale, 27 Vt. 739, a leading and much-cited case, it was expressly held that an open, public, and long-established highway was an encumbrance on land which it crossed, and that where not excepted in a deed of such land containing a covenant against encumbrances, it constituted a breach thereof. In arriving at this conclusion, Chief Justice Redfield made a very clear statement of the arguments advanced against the rule as laid down in New York, Pennsylvania, and other states announcing similar conclusions, as follows: "The question in regard to the highway being a breach of the covenants against all encumbrances, to a mere lawyer, would not seem to be one of much difficulty. But if one chose to confound the powers of the court of chancery, in restraining the party from claiming damages for such a mere technical breach, which the parties must have understood, and could not really have intended to indemnify against, with the dry law of the case, and to appeal to the merely popular opinion, as to the extent of such a 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

covenant, he might very readily convince some persons of no great perspicuity in their views, and very likely the great majority of men, of the very great absurdity of the law, without, at the same time, really showing very clearly how a highway or a railway or a private right of way was not, after all, an encumbrance upon the land. In this country, where our tenures are strictly allodial, we are very much accustomed to consider that, if another really possesses any rights in our land, it is so far forth an encumbrance upon our title. Whether it be small or large in amount, whether it be a mortgage, or a right to flow a portion or all of the land, for a shorter or longer period during the year, or to draw water from a well or spring, or to water cattle at a brook, or to pass across the land on foot or with teams, or to draw wood in winter only across the land, or to build and maintain a railway perpetually, or a highway, is certainly of no importance in determining the mere technical question of encumbrance or no encumbrance. And it can make no difference whether this right is notorious or not. If the question of an encumbrance were to be determined by its notoriety, or what is the same thing, by its being known to the purchaser, it must, to preserve consistency, be extended to all encumbrances. And in that view the grantee could not recover upon this covenant, for paying a mortgage which he knew existed at the time of his purchase. But the contrary is perfectly well established. And in regard to these rights of way, if they existed only in a prior grant, and were not known to the grantee at the time of purchase, no one could claim that they did not constitute a breach of the covenant against encumbrances. And if the question whether a highway is an encumbrance upon land is to be determined by the fact of its being open and notorious, it resolves itself into this, whether it was the intention of the parties to treat it as an encumbrance or not. And the same rule should equally apply to a mortgage which the purchaser agreed to pay. But no lawyer will contend that, in such a case, if the grantor covenants law for damages in the circuit court of Citrus county against the plaintiff in error, and recovered upon the trial a large judgment, which the plaintiff in error has brought here for review. There is a perfect mass of pleas, motions to strike, demurrers, etc., in the record, but out of this labyrinth there emerges the question whether, on the facts stated, the defendant in error was entitled to recover damages from the plaintiff in error under the alleged warranties in the deed, because, when the deed was executed to the defendant in error, there existed upon the land the easement of a railroad right of way under the deed from the plaintiff in error herein referred to. The deed from the plaintiff in error to defendant in error does not follow the language or the form of a warranty deed, prescribed in § 2449, Gen. Stat. 1906. The language of the warranty, thereby given the effect of the "full common-law covenants" by § 2450, Id., is as follows: "And the said party of the first part does hereby fully warrant the title to said land, and will defend the same against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever." Sewell* (1891) 3 Ch. 405, Justice Chitty said, obiter: "The general rule of law in regard to rights of way may be stated as follows: Where it is obvious that there is a right of way enjoyed by some third person or by the public in general, the existence of such right of way cannot give rise to any objection to the title; as, for example, if the estate sold is a large one with a public highway running through it, then it is obvious that it is not intended to sell the property free from such right of way; but the purchaser would take subject to the right of way."

ute must be strictly followed. The use of less words than all of the words implying the covenants is insufficient." 11 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1047, 1048, and cases cited in notes 32 and 33, p. 1048. If there be any authority to the contrary, it has not been discovered. We do not think, therefore, that the statute affords any light upon the proper construction of this deed. The covenant in the deed under which the defendant in error claims can only be regarded as one of general warranty, independent of the statute. But whether the covenant in this case is to be regarded as one of general warranty, and equivalent to the covenant for quiet enjoyment (11 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1072-1076), or whether it be regarded as embracing, under the statute, full covenants of seisin, of right to convey, against encumbrances, for quiet enjoyment, and for further assurance (11 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1063, 1064), we do not think the plaintiff below was entitled to recover. It seems to us, although there is a conflict in the decisions on the question, that a sound view of the law and a proper application of the principles of justice will deny to the defendant in error a right of action in the instant case. 11 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1067.

It is held in many respectable jurisdictions that the existence of a public highway or a railroad right of way, in no wise interfering with the technical seisin of the grantee in the deed, and which was a visible notorious easement when the deed was executed, is not a breach of the covenant recorded plat referred to in the deed does not constitute a breach of a covenant against encumbrances, see Burbach v. Schweinler, as set out supra.

In Cincinnati v. Brachman, 35 Ohio St. 289, where the deed described the land conveyed as extending to the center of a certain street "as to be extended," and referred to a plat on which the street was traced, the subsequent use of the street as a public highway was held not to constitute a breach of covenant against encumbrances or of general warranty in the deed.

And where land conveyed is described as bounded on a certain public road, such public road is not an encumbrance on the estate within a covenant against encumbrances, since, as the description in the deed made the road a monument, the grantee took under it, only to the road as it legally existed when his deed was made. Frost v. Angier, 127 Mass. 212.

And in Patten v. Fitz, 138 Mass. 456, where land was described in a deed containing a covenant against encumbrances as bounded on A street, which street had been used as a private way until accepted by the city previous to the conveyance to covenantee, and by it ordered laid out as a public way, it was held that the street itself was not such an encumbrance as would give the grantee a right of action for damages caused by changing the grade thereof in laying it out after the grantee took possession, since the parties must be presumed to have contemplated the street as it was laid out and established by the city.

And in Patten v. Fitz, supra, it was held that a release by the grantor of all claim for damages on account of the laying out as a public street of a strip of land that had heretofore been used as a private way is not a breach of a covenant against encumbrances contained in a deed executed subsequent to the acceptance by the city of the way as a public street, and prior to the actual laying out thereof as such on land abutting on such street, where it describes the land as bounded on such street, since in such case the parties must be presumed to have contemplated the street as a boundary as it was laid out, although in doing so the grade was changed to the damage of such abutting property.

In Holmes v. Danforth, 83 Me. 139, 21 Atl. 845, in holding that a covenant against encumbrances in a deed conveying land described as bounded by the center of a public road was not breached by the existence of that part of the highway on the land conveyed, said: "The principle on which these and many other similar decisions rest is that, when the estate conveyed is so described that the parties must have understood that it was subject to a servitude, the grantee takes it cum onere, and will not be allowed to complain of that servitude as a breach of the covenants in his deed. In all such cases the conclusion is irresistible that, if the encumbrance was a damage to the estate, that fact was taken into account in fixing the price; and that the grantee has obtained all that he bargained for and all that he paid for."

In Harrison v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 114, 58 N. W. 1081, in holding that an existing easement of a public highway which was not shown to be depreciative of the value of the lands on which it constituted an easement was not a breach of the ordinary covenant against encumbrances, the court expressly distinguished highways from railroads on the ground that highways through agricultural lands were not in legal contemplation encumbrances, in the absence of proof that they depreciated the value of the fee, since it is presumed that such ways are not only essential to enjoyment of the servient estate, but that they enhance the value thereof.

A conflict based upon the grounds specified in the last-mentioned subdivision of this note also arises in the decisions involving covenants of general warranty and for quiet enjoyment, and the statement there made applies as well to the question here discussed.

against encumbrances or of the general warranty; for, it being open and visible, the purchaser must be presumed to have seen it, and to have fixed his price with reference to the actual condition of the land at the time of purchase. 11 Cyc. Law. & Proc. p. 1067. Why should the technical rules of conveyancing be converted into a trap to catch an unwary grantor, unskilled in them, when it is perfectly obvious that he never intended to bind himself to do that which he could not do, viz., remove a railroad right of way and track from the land he is selling, the existence of which was perfectly obvious to the purchaser? The allegation in the declaration that the purpose of buying the land was to utilize the phosphate on it affords no foundation for a suit for damages. No such purpose is mentioned in the deed. If the purposes of a grantee in buying property, not expressed in the deed, are to be grounds of such suits, then a grantor who sells a lot with an old building on it which does not suit the purposes of the grantee when it was conveyed to him may be sued by the grantee for a breach of his warranty because of the existence of the old building. If there happens to be a mound of earth on the property conveyed, thrown up in a previous mining for minerals, which covers minerals underneath it, this also might afford a basis for a suit for breach of the covenant of warranty; for undoubtedly it will interfere to some extent with the purposes of the grantee, if he bought the land for the minerals on it.

A public road is an easement, the existence of which over a part of land conveyed by deed with covenant of general warranty is a breach of such a covenant. Haynes v. Young, 36 Me. 557.

And in Alling v. Burlock, 46 Conn. 504, a covenant of general warranty was held broken by the existence of a public highway across the land conveyed. In this case the land for the highway was conveyed in fee by quitclaim deed, and the deed recorded, but the strip remained unappropriated for highway purposes until after the conveyance by warranty deed. Subsequent to such purchase, but before the opening of the highway to the public, the public, by proper court proceedings, asserted its paramount title. The decision turned upon the point that such action, together with the fact that the fee to the highway was in the grantees thereof, amounted to an eviction, thereby breaching the covenant of general warranty.

And in Louisville Public Warehouse Co. v. James, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1726, 56 S. W. 19 (see same case in 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1216, 64 S. W. 966, and in 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1266, 70 S. W. 1046), where, under facts similar to the preceding case, with the exception that the right of way had been dedicated instead of conveyed in fee, the same conclusion was reached.

And in Southern Wood Mfg. & Creosoting Co. v. Davenport, 50 La. Ann. 505, 23 So. 448, an existing easement for a public highway, although not known to either the grantor or grantee at the time of the conveyance by warranty deed of the land across which it extended, was held to constitute a breach of the covenant of warranty, notwithstanding the opening of the street worked a benefit to the covenantee.

In Copeland v. McAdory, 100 Ala. 553, 13 So. 545, in holding that the existence of a public highway over land conveyed by a deed containing a general covenant to warrant and defend constituted a breach of the covenant, notwithstanding the covenantee had full knowledge of the existence of the encumbrance, the court said: "But knowledge or notice, however full, of an encumbrance or of a paramount title, does not impair the right of recovery upon covenants of warranty. The covenants are taken for protection and indemnity against known and unknown encumbrances or defects of title." The following case is to the same effect: Burk v. Hill, 48 Ind. 52, 17 Am. Rep. 731, disapproving Scribner v. Holmes, 16 Ind. 142.

But in Hymes v. Estey, 116 N. Y. 501, 15 Am. St. Rep. 421, 22 N. E. 1087, the court said: "It must be deemed the settled doctrine in this state, that the fact that part of land conveyed with covenant of warranty was at the time of conveyance a highway, and used as such, is not a breach of the covenant. This is so, for the reason that the grantee must be presumed to have known of the existence of the public easement, and purchased upon a consideration in reference to the situation in that respect," citing among other cases Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272.

And in Butt v. Riffe, 78 Ky. 352, it was said that when a public highway is on land at the date of purchase thereof, the grantee must be held to know of its existence, and to have made his bargain with a knowledge of the inconvenience resulting from it, and that therefore such a highway would not constitute a breach of warranty of title.

In Bowles v. Round, 5 Ves. Jr. 508, it was held that a purchaser could not be relieved of his purchase of certain meadow lands merely because there was a road going through them, the ground being that the road was not a latent defect, which would excuse the purchaser's carelessness.

In Illinois it is provided by statute that "no covenant of warranty shall be considered as broken by the existence of a highway upon the land conveyed, unless otherwise particularly stated in the deed." Ill. Rev. Stat. 1883, page 286 (act in effect July 1, 1874). See also Vt. Rev. Laws 1880, page 586, as quoted supra.

In Ake v. Mason, 101 Pa. 17, it was held that a purchaser having constructive notice from the public records, of the construc-

To require such a technical exactness and nicety of knowledge on the part of grantors of real estate of the various kinds, of possible encumbrances for which they may lay themselves liable to suits for damages, about which the courts themselves are divided in opinion, is carrying technical nicety further than we are willing to go. A sane grantor will not intentionally make a conveyance of land which will authorize the grantee to immediately sue him for damages, and an honest grantee cannot be presumed to intentionally exact such a conveyance for such a purpose.

In the case of Desvergers v. Willis, 56 Ga. 515, 21 Am. Rep. 289, it was held that "a covenant against encumbrances in a deed of land is not broken by the existence of a public road over the land, known to the purchasers at the time of the purchase." In the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Warner it is said: "A general warranty of title to land against the claims of all persons includes in itself covenant of a right to sell and of quiet enjoyment and of freedom from encumbrances. Code, § 2603. The question made by the record in this case is whether a public road on the land, which fact was known to the purchaser at the time of his purchase, is in this state a breach of a covenant of warranty against encumbrances. The decisions of the courts of this country are not uniform upon this question, but the weight of authority we think is that the existence of a public road on the land, known to the purchaser, is not tion of a public street across the lands bought, was not, upon the actual opening thereof, thereby afforded an action for breach of a covenant against encumbrances or for quiet enjoyment implied from the words "grant, bargain, and sell" contained in the deed.

And as to a street "as to be extended" as traced on a referred-to plat, which street formed one of the boundaries of the lands conveyed, see Cincinnati v. Brachman, 35 Ohio St. 289.

But if, when the land was conveyed, there was nothing to indicate that it was part of a street, and it does not appear that the grantee had knowledge that a part thereof had previously been dedicated as such, the rule does not apply; and there is a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment where it is subsequently established that a portion of the land had been so dedicated. Hymes v. Esty, supra, approved on subsequent appeal in 133 N. Y. 342, 31 N. E. 105.

In Trice v. Kayton, 84 Va. 217, 10 Am. St. Rep. 836, 4 S. E. 377, the court, while expressly approving the doctrine of Jordan v. Eve, 31 Gratt. 1, refused to extend it so as to include an encumbrance which was a hidden fact, and held that the grantee of a house and lot was disturbed in violation of his covenant for quiet enjoyment, by being compelled to remove a part of the house, which, unknown to the parties to the deed, encroached upon an adjoining street, saying: "The street was obvious and observable, of course, but the hidden fact, which afterwards transpired, that, according to the true measurements of the street, the house stood upon a part of the highway, was not observable, in no wise apparent, and could not have been in contemplation of the parties contracting together."

Regarding the result above, in Moore v. Boulton, 10 U. C. Q. B. 140, that case might be taken as sustaining the view that the existence of a public highway known to the covenantee will not constitute a breach of a covenant of warranty or its equivalent, quiet enjoyment, as the decision in the case was that a covenant denominated as a covenant for quiet enjoyment was not breached. As a matter of fact, however, the case, so far as it is authority on this point, bears the other way, taking the view of the covenant for quiet enjoyment that generally obtains in this country, since the court expressly stated that no principles can be founded on variety of circumstances, such as whether the injury is trifling, or whether the highway is an actual advantage to the grantee, and that a court of law cannot allow any effect to the circumstance that the covenantee had notice of the existence of the highway. The decision is accounted for by the court's assumption that the covenant for quiet enjoyment is the equivalent of a covenant of seisin, and not, as generally held in this country, the equivalent of a covenant of warranty. In this view of the nature of a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the decision is in accord with the weight of authority shown in the first subdivision, with respect to covenants of seisin, and wholly independent of the question as to the effect of knowledge of the condition.

Private rights of way.

The few cases in which the existence of a private way has been set up as a breach of a covenant of seisin are unanimous in sustaining such contention, but, as has before been said, even in those jurisdictions where the knowledge of the grantee of the existence of a public right of way has been held to except such a way from a covenant of general warranty, or from the more specific covenant against encumbrances, the courts do not apply a similar rule to private rights of way, but rule, without exception, that knowledge is immaterial in such cases. The result is that there is little, if any, conflict in the law as to whether the existence of private rights of way across land at the time of its conveyance will operate as a breach of covenant.

—covenants of seisin and of right to convey.

such an encumbrance as would constitute a breach of the covenant of warranty. This view of the question is sustained by the better reason, especially as applicable to the condition of the people of this state. To hold that a public road running through a tract of land, which was known to the purchaser at the time of his purchase thereof, is such an encumbrance on the land as would constitute a breach of a covenant of warranty against encumbrances, would produce a crop of litigation in this state that would be almost interminable."

In Moore v. Johnston, 87 Ala. 220, 6 So. 50, in an opinion by Justice Somerville, the existence of a public easement as a street or right of way, which does not affect the 189, it was held that a private right of way across a farm constituted a breach of a covenant of seisin in the deed to the farm.

And in Turner v. Moon [1901] 2 Ch. 825, a private right of way not known to the purchaser of land which it crossed was held to constitute a breach of a covenant of title, for which damages could be recovered.

And in Ashburner v. Sewell [1891] 3 Ch. 405, it was held that a right of way unknown to both the grantor and grantee constituted a latent defect which was an objection to title, within the meaning of the contract of sale, which permitted the vendor to rescind if the purchaser should insist on an objection in respect of the title which the vendor would be unable or unwilling to remove.

In Dykes v. Blake, 4 Bing. (N. R.) 463, it was held that a private right of way, the existence of which was so concealed that a purchaser, in the exercise of ordinary care, would not have discovered it, constituted such a defect in title as justified the purchaser in rescinding the contract, for, as the way was one that might materially interfere with the intended use of the property, the purchaser could say that the lots which the seller was ready to convey were not the lots which he purchased.

The existence of an easement consisting of a right to pass over and use for the purpose of a private way a certain portion of land conveyed by deed containing a covenant against encumbrances is a breach of that covenant. Young v. Gower, 88 Ill. App. 70; Vonderhite v. Walton, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 766; Blake v. Everett, 1 Allen, 248; Wetherbee v. Bennett, 2 Allen, 428; Bailey v. Agawam Nat. Bank, 190 Mass. 20, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 98, 112 Am. St. Rep. 296, 76 N. E. 449; Russ v. Steele, 40 Vt. 310.

It is immaterial that the covenantee knew of a private cartway across premises, the title to which was covenanted to be free from encumbrances, if the cartway was technical seisin of the purchaser, is not a breach of the covenant of seisin.

In the case of Brown v. Young, 69 Iowa, 625, 29 N. W. 941, it is held that "a right of way for a railroad is only an easement, though it be conveyed by deed, and the existence of such easement is not a breach of the covenant as to title in a warranty deed subsequently made conveying the land."

In the case of Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 483, 8 Am. Dec. 272, it is held: "It is not a breach of the covenants that the grantor was lawful owner of the land, was well seised, and had full power to convey, that part of the land was a public highway and was used as such, a public highway being a mere easement, and the seisin and right to convey still continuing not excepted from the covenant. Sherwood v. Johnson, 28 Ind. App. 277, 62 N. E. 645.

In Perry v. Williamson, supra, it was held that a purchaser's knowledge of a farm pass way across land at the time of purchase did not estop him from objecting to it as an encumbrance, where he did not know that it was a right of way of a third person.

In Illinois, where § 9, chap. 30, Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) 374, provides that deeds substantially in the prescribed form shall be deemed a conveyance in fee simple, with covenant against encumbrances, it was held in Schmisseur v. Penn, 47 Ill. App. 278 (see same case 77 Ill. App. 526) that a private way was not within the meaning of the term "highways" as used in § 10, chap. 30, Ill. Rev. Stat., providing that "no covenant of warranty shall be considered as broken by the existence of a highway upon the land conveyed, unless otherwise particularly specified in the deed," which act went into effect in 1874, and that therefore it constituted a breach of the implied covenant against encumbrances. In connection with this case it should be noted that previous to 1874 it had been held in Illinois that knowledge at the time of the conveyance of the existence of a then existing easement afforded no defense to a suit on the covenant. See Beach v. Miller, 51 Ill. 209, 2 Am. Rep. 290, and Wadhams v. Swan, 109 Ill. 46.

In Harlow v. Thomas, 15 Pick. 66, the court, in holding that a private right of passageway over land to a spring constituted a breach of a covenant against encumbrances, and that the covenantee's knowledge of the existence of the encumbrance at the time of the purchase was immaterial, because proof thereof could not be made under the parol evidence rule, said: "Uncertain would be the titles of real estate, and useless the registration of deeds, if their contents and effects were to be determined by the testimony of witnesses. They would mislead, rather than guide us in a safe course." in the owner of the land over which it was laid out." Justice Spencer in delivering the opinion of the court says: "It must strike the mind with surprise that a person who purchases a farm through which a public road runs at the time of purchase, and had so run long before, who must be presumed to have known of the existence of the road, and who chooses to have it included in his purchase, shall turn round on his grantor and complain that the general covenants in the deed have been broken by the existence of what he saw when he purchased, and what must have enhanced the value of the farm. It is hazarding little to say that such an attempt is unjust and inequitable, and contrary to the universal understanding of both vendors and purchasers. If it could succeed, a flood gate of litigation would be opened, and for many years to come this kind of action would abound."

In the case of Wilson v. Cochran, 46 Pa. 229, it was, among other things, held that "a purchaser who sees such a road that has been used thirty years upon the land he is buying has no right to consider it an encumbrance, within the meaning of a covenant against encumbrances. If it is not a positive benefit to the premises, he is presumed to have estimated its disadvantages in adjusting the price he has agreed to pay."

In the case of Kutz v. McCune, 22 Wis. 628, 99 Am. Dec. 85, it is held that the "existence of easement obviously and notoriously affecting physical condition of land —covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment.

In Rea v. Minkler, 5 Lans. 196, the court, in holding the purchaser's knowledge of a previous conveyance of a strip of land in the rear of the granted premises, from which there was no access to the highway except over the subsequently granted premises, together with a right of way thereover, no defense to an action for breach of a covenant to warrant and forever defend the premises and every part and parcel thereof against every person claiming them or any part thereof, in that the use of a way to the rear strip constituted a breach of the covenant, distinguished between private and public rights of way as follows: "There is, I think, a broad distinction between a public highway and a private right of way. The latter is secured by a conveyance to an adjoining proprietor for his private use, while the former is for the benefit of the public, as well as the owner of the land through which it passes, and a positive advantage. While the latter might be unknown to a purchaser, the former, running through a farm, would be seen when purchased, and could not but be considered as an enhancement of its value," and, continuing, said that the rule as to public highways should not be enlarged so as to embrace private rights of way.

In Wilson v. Cochran, 46 Pa. 229, from which an obiter statement made in distinguishing between public and private rights of way is quoted as the law of the case in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO., the court, in holding an asserted private right of way over land conveyed to be a breach of covenant of general warranty, where the purchaser had no actual notice of the existence of such way, but only constructive notice through the public registry, said, in speaking of Patterson v. Arthurs, 9 Watts, 152: "It is broadly distinguishable from the case before us. Public roads are laid out in Pennsylvania by authority of law, in pursuance of the policy of Penn., who established the custom of allowing to every grantee of land 6 acres in the hundred, as a compensation for the roads that should thereafter be opened; and they confer on the public merely a right of passage, whilst the title to the soil is left undisturbed in the owner of the land through which they pass. A purchaser who sees such a road, that has been used thirty years, upon the land he is buying, has no right to consider it an encumbrance, within the meaning of a covenant against encumbrances. If it is not a positive benefit to the premises, he is presumed to have estimated its disadvantages in adjusting the price he has agreed to pay. But Schultz's private way in this case had no public policy or public law to support it; it rested wholly in a private grant, and it was a grant of an interest in the land,—a vested estate that would pass by deed and would descend to heirs,—and of its existence the purchaser had no actual notice, but only that constructive notice with which an unsearched registry affects him."

The successful assertion by a stranger of a pass way over land, the title and full use and enjoyment of which has been conveyed to the grantee, amounts to a breach of a covenant of warranty. Ware v. Owens, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 308; Lamb v. Danforth, 59 Me. 322, 8 Am. Rep. 426; Russ v. Steele, 40 Vt. 310.

In Bridger v. Pierson, 1 Lans. 481, where the grantee of land conveyed by deed containing a general covenant of warranty was mulcted in damages for obstructing a prescriptive right of way thereover, held by a stranger, it was held that the covenantee could recover over from the grantor on the ground that the established private right of way constituted a breach of the covenant. On appeal (45 N. Y. 601) the judgment in this case was reversed, but upon the ground that the right of way which was alleged to breach the covenant of warranty was excepted in the conveyance, it being conceded, however, that, were it not so excepted it would have constituted a breach.

In Butt v. Riffe, 78 Ky. 352, it was held that the existing easement of a private at the time of its sale, such as a right of flowing the land by a mill pond in actual existence upon it, does not constitute a breach of a general covenant against encumbrances." The opinion in this case is strong and well reasoned.

In the case of Smith v. Hughes, 50 Wis. 620, 7 N. W. 653, it is held that "where there are railways or other highways in use as such, over land, at the time of its sale, the purchaser is presumed to have taken with knowledge of them, and they constitute no breach of the usual covenants in his deed."

In the case of Memmert v. McKeen, 112 Pa. 315, 4 Atl. 542, Mr. Justice Paxson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Encumbrances are of two kinds, viz.: (1) pass way of which the grantee had no knowledge was inconsistent with, if not hostile to, a title conveyed by deed containing a warrant of title, the court saying that the fact that the grantee may appropriate his land to such purposes as he may see proper, not inconsistent with the right of private passage, is no response to the claim for damages, as the right to the use of a portion of the land for a private pass way is to that extent a depreciation of the free use and enjoyment of the premises by the covenantee. Continuing, the court said: "A covenant of warranty in a deed embraces the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and also protects the grantee against encumbrances that affect the title, or that the grantee may be compelled to remove in order to have the possession and enjoyment of the estate purchased."

And the existence and use of a right of way for a private road across conveyed premises to which they were subject at the time of the conveyance, breaches a covenant for quiet enjoyment, although the grantee knew of the existence of the private way at the time of the purchase, but did not know of its extent. Eller v. Moore, 48 App. Div. 403, 63 N. Y. Supp. 88.

In Ladue v. Cooper, 32 Misc. 544, 67 N. Y. Supp. 319, it was held that a private lane partly on premises conveyed by a deed containing a covenant of warranty broad enough to cover the easement was a breach of the covenant, irrespective of the grantee's knowledge of the lane.

In Helton v. Asher, 135 Ky. 751, 123 S. W. 285, it was held that the rule that a purchaser must be held to know of the existence of a public highway or railroad easement, and to have purchased with knowledge of the inconvenience resulting therefrom, does not apply to a private pass way, so as to prevent recovery of damages caused by the existence of a private tramway across land conveyed by deed of general warranty, even though the covenantee knew of the existence thereof at the time of his purchase. This decision was based upon the ground that Butt v. Riffe, supra, made the distinction herein asserted, but a 30 J.R.A. (N.S.)

Such as affect the title; and (2) those which affect only the physical condition of the property. A mortgage or other lien is a fair illustration of the former; a public road or a right of way, of the latter. Where encumbrances of the former class exist, the covenant referred to [against encumbrances], under all the authorities, is broken the instant it is made, and it is of no importance that the grantee had notice of them when he took the title. Cathcart v. Bowman, 5 Pa. 317; Funk v. Voneida, 11 Serg. & R. 109, 14 Am. Dec. 617. Such encumbrances are usually of a temporary character and capable of removal. The very object of the covenant is to protect the vendee against them. Hence, knowledge, actual or constructive, of their existence, is no careful study of that case shows that the premise taken therein was that the grantee had no knowledge of the existence of the private easement involved.

Railroad rights of way.

—covenants of seisin and of right to convey.

The discussion under the subdivision of this note relating to public highways as breaches of covenant of seisin or of right to convey is here applicable, the cases generally turning upon the question whether or not the fee is considered as vested in the railroad.

Thus, the following cases hold that the existence of a mere easement of a railroad right of way does not breach a covenant of seisin in a deed by which the servient estate was conveyed: Douglass v. Thomas, 103 Ind. 187, 2 N. E. 562, quoted with approval in Quick v. Taylor, 113 Ind. 540, 16 N. E. 588; Kellogg v. Malin, 50 Mo. 496, 11 Am. Rep. 426.

In Messer v. Oestreich, 52 Wis. 684, 10 N. W. 6, a right of way for a railroad, which had been conveyed by deed which vested at least a conditional fee in the railroad company, was held to breach a covenant of seisin in a subsequent deed of land crossed by the railroad right of way. The court based the decision on the ground that the deed by conveying at least a conditional fee affected the technical seisin of the grantor, and distinguished the case from that of Kutz v. McCune, 22 Wis. 628, 99 Am. Dec. 85 (set out in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO.), on the ground that in the Kutz Case merely an easement was involved, and also distinguished it from Smith v. Hughes, 50 Wis. 620, 7 N. W. 653 (also set out in the VAN NESS CASE), on the ground that the railroad right of way involved therein was taken by eminent domain.

And in Foster v. Byrd, 119 Mo. App. 169, 96 S. W. 224, where an attempt was made to convey an entire quarter section of land by deed containing a covenant of seisin, answer to an action for breach of such covenant. Where, however, there is a servitude imposed upon the land, which is visible to the eye, and which affects not title, but the physical condition of the property, a different rule prevails. Thus, it was held in Patterson v. Arthurs, 9 Watts, 152, that where the owner had covenanted to convey certain lots free from all encumbrances, a public road which occupied a portion of such lots was not an encumbrance, within the meaning of the covenant. This is not because of any right acquired by the public, but by reason of the fact that the road, although admittedly an encumbrance, and possibly an injury to the property, was there when the purchaser bought, and he is presumed to have had knowledge of it. In such and similar cases there is the further presumption that if the encumbrance is really an injury, such injury was in the contemplation of the parties, and that the price was regulated accordingly. It was said by Justice Kennedy in the case cited: 'Although a public highway no doubt is in many instances an injury instead of a benefit to the holder or owner of the land upon which it is located, and therefore tends to it was held that the covenant of seisin was broken at the delivery of the deed, where the grantor had previously deeded a portion of the quarter section to a railroad company for a right of way; and this on the ground that the possession of such strip was not and could not be delivered by the grantor.

But in Jerald v. Elly, 51 Iowa, 321, 1 N. W. 639, it was said that proof of prior use of a portion of land conveyed by deed containing a covenant of seisin, by a railroad company as a right of way under valid right, would establish a breach of the covenant of seisin. The covenantee failed to recover, however, because he did not establish the fact that the railroad company was using a portion of the land under valid right.

The decided weight of authority is to the effect that a railroad right of way constitutes a breach of a covenant against encumbrances, irrespective of the question of the knowledge of the grantee as to the existence of such a right of way. A few courts, however, place a railroad on the same basis as a public highway, and consider it as not constituting an encumbrance.

An existing right of way for a railroad, independently of any consideration of the question of knowledge, was held to be an encumbrance for which a grantee might recover under a covenant against encumbrances, in the following cases: Barlow v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 69; Kostendader v. Pierce, 37 Iowa, 645; Jerald v. Elly, supra; Pierce v. Houghton, 122 Iowa, 477, 98 N. W. 306.

And the existence of an easement, consisting of a railroad right of way across land conveyed by deed containing a covenant against encumbrances was held in Beach v. Miller, 51 Ill. 209, 2 Am. Rep. 290, to breach the covenant, although both parties knew of the existence of the railroad easement at the time of the conveyance, the court saying: "When a purchaser obtains title by deed without covenants, he, of course, takes it subject to all defects and encumbrances it may be under at the time of the conveyance. But where a person insists upon and obtains covenants for title, he has the right, when obtained, to rely upon them and enforce their performance, or recover damages for their breach. The vendor is under no compulsion to make covenants when he sells land, but, having done so, he must keep them, or respond in damages for injury sustained by their breach. Nor is it a release or discharge of the covenant to say that both parties knew it was not true, or that it would not be performed, when it was made. A person may warrant an article to be sound, when both buyer and seller know it is unsound; so the seller may warrant the quantity or quality of an article he sells, when both parties know that it is not of the quality or does not contain the quantity warranted. In fact, the reason the purchaser insists upon covenants for title, or a warranty of quality or quantity, is because he either knows or fears that the title is not good, or that the article lacks in quantity or quality. If he were perfectly assured on those questions, he would seldom be tenacious in obtaining a covenant of warranty."

And the following cases are to the same effect as respects the effect of knowledge of the covenantee as to the existence of the railroad: Wadhams v. Swan, 109 Ill. 46; Barlow v. McKinley, supra; Gerald v. Elly, 45 Iowa, 322; Flynn v. White Breast Coal & Min. Co. 72 Iowa, 738, 32 N. W. 471; Burk v. Hill, 48 Ind. 52, 17 Am. Rep. 731; Quick v. Taylor, 113 Ind. 540, 16 N. E. 588; Kellogg v. Malin, 50 Mo. 496, 11 Am. Rep. 426; Williamson v. Hall, 62 Mo. 405; Whiteside v. Magruder, 75 Mo. App. 364; Farrington v. Tourtelott, 39 Fed. 738.

And in Wadhams v. Swan, supra, it was held that a covenant against encumbrances was technically broken by the existence of a railroad right of way across the land conveyed, notwithstanding the fact that the railroad, when considered with reference to the contract as an entirety, enhanced rather than diminished its value; but the court said that in such case nominal damages only could be recovered.

And in Tuskegee Land & Secur. Co. v. Birmingham Realty Co. 161 Ala. 542, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 992, 49 So. 378, it was held that the existence of a railroad in a street, damages for the construction of which to the property conveyed have been released by the grantor, is a breach of covenant against encumbrances in a grant of prop-lessor its value in the estimation of a purchaser, yet it is fair to presume that every purchaser, before he closes his contract for his purchase of land, has seen it and made himself acquainted with its locality and the state and condition of it, and consequently, if there be a public road or highway open or in use upon it, he must be taken to have seen it, and to have fixed in his own mind the price that he was willing to give for the land with a reference to the road, either making the price less or more, as he conceived the road to be injurious or advantageous to the occupation and enjoyment of the land."

In the case of Janes v. Jenkins, 34 Md. 1, text 10, 6 Am. Rep. 300, the question was whether a servitude which had been created upon land by the owner made him liable to an action for breach of the covenants in a subsequent deed by the grantee in the former deed, the court says: "Then, as to the second question, whether the existence of this servitude or burden upon the property sold to the appellant, and the enjoyment thereof by the owner of the eastern lot, erty abutting on the street, although the deed purports to convey only to the line of the street.

But no breach of covenant of seisin or right to convey is shown by the existence of a railroad in the abutting street, where the deed conveys only to the edge of the street. Ibid.

And in Bacharach v. Von Eiff, 74 Hun, 533, 26 N. Y. Supp. 842, it was held that the existence, in front of premises conveyed with covenants against encumbrances, of an elevated railroad as to which the grantor had executed a release of easements, did not constitute a breach of the covenant against encumbrances in the grant of the property adjoining that on which the railroad was constructed, where the grantee knew at the time of making his contract and taking his deed that the easement was in the actual use and occupation of a railroad company, since this was notice to him that the railroad company had some claim to the easement, and that it was partially extinguished, and that therefore he must be considered as having purchased with reference thereto.

With respect to general covenants of warranty, the cases are in unison in holding that an existing railroad across land at the time of a conveyance does not work a breach of the covenant.

Thus, as is held in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO., the existence of a railroad across land at the time of its conveyance by a deed binding the grantor to warrant and forever defend the title against all persons lawfully claiming the same does not constitute a breach of the covenant irrespective of whether it be considered as one of general warranty and equivalent to one for quiet enjoyment, or whether it be regarded as embracing all the common-law covenants, the ground being that since, as the railroad was perfectly obvious, it must have been in the minds of the parties at the time of the conveyance.

was held not entitled to an abatement of the purchase price for the number of acres included in the right of way, on the ground that he must have purchased with reference to the easement, since it was known to him.

And the fact that land was purchased for mineral purposes does not of itself render the existence of a railroad across the land at the time of its conveyance a breach of warranty against encumbrances, where the purposes of the grantee were not expressed in the deed, although the railroad easement interfered with the carrying out of the proposed mineral purposes. VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO. This seems to be the only case in which the contention that the purpose for which the land was purchased would govern has been raised.

In Brown v. Young, 69 Iowa, 625, 29 N. W. 941, cited in VAN NESS v. ROYAL PHOSPHATE CO., it was held that a right of way, since it is only an easement, although conveyed by deed, does not constitute a breach of the covenant as to title in a general warranty deed subsequently made, conveying the land across which the easement exists. This decision seems to be in direct conflict with both the earlier and later Iowa cases, and, in fact, is not mentioned in later cases holding to the contrary. (See Flynn v. White Breast Coal & Min. Co. and Pierce v. Houghton, supra.) However, if the general warranty deed be considered as one against encumbrances created by the covenantor himself, the decision may be reconciled with the other Iowa cases, as the encumbrance was created by previous owners.

In Milwaukee & N. R. Co. v. Strange, 63 Wis. 178, 23 N. W. 432, it was held that a grantee of land crossed by a railroad right of way took subject to such easement, so as to prevent the grantee from recovering compensation and damages assessed because of the location and construction of the railroad on such lands, which had not been paid to the grantor at the time of the conveyance, the ground of the decision being that he must be considered as having purchased the land subject to such burden, and to have deducted from the purchase price an amount equal to the depreciation in value by reason of such easement. G. J. C.

constitute a breach of the covenant of special warranty. [The warranty was to the effect that the grantor shall forever warrant and defend the property against the claims of grantor and all persons.] This depends upon the apparent and ostensible condition of the property at the time of sale. And as the wall had been erected, and the lights therein were plainly to be seen when the appellant purchased the property overlooked by them, it is but rational to conclude that he contracted with reference to that condition of the property, and that the price was regulated accordingly. The parties, in the absence of anything to the contrary, are presumed to have contracted with reference to the then state and condition of the property; and if an easement to which it is subject be open and visible, and of a continuous character, the purchaser is supposed to have been willing to take the property as it was at the time, subject to such a burden. That being so, the covenants in the deed must likewise be construed with reference to the condition of the property at the time of the conveyance. The grantor by his covenant warranted the premises as they were, and by no means intended to warrant against an existing easement which was open and visible to the appellant, and over which the former had no power or control whatever. To construe the covenant to embrace such subject would most likely defeat the understanding and intention of the parties; certainly of the grantor."

In the case of Pomeroy v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 25 Wis. 641, 643, Justice Paine says: "Where there is a sale of a tract of land upon which there is an obvious existing easement or burden of any kind, like an ordinary highway, a railroad, or mill pond, the fair presumption, in the absence of any express provision in the contract upon the subject, is that both parties act with direct reference to the apparent existing burden, and that the vendor demands, and the purchaser pays, only the value of the land subject to it."

In an order made by the circuit judge, it appears that both parties relied in the court below upon the decision of this court in the case of Silver Springs, O. & G. R. Co. v. Van Ness, 45 Fla. 559, 34 So. 884. That case certainly determines that the deed which is before us only conveyed an easement to the railroad company, and that the technical right to the phosphate underneath the railroad was still in the grantor. That is the true condition now. Should the railroad track be removed or abandoned, the right of the defendant in error to the phosphate would be unrestricted.

instant case which squints at the notion that it is brought to recover of Van Ness the money which he recovered from the railroad company in the suit to which reference has been made. There is not the slightest indication in the deed to the defendant in error from Van Ness that he was covenanting to pay over to the defendant in error any such moneys. Without such an allegation in the declaration, and such an agreement on the part of Van Ness, it is impossible to conceive how the fact that Van Ness did recover damages from the railroad company can have anything to do with this case.

For the reasons given, the judgment below is reversed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

JACOB DOTTERER, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF INDIANA.

Witness — impeachment — record.

1. A witness who has denied being present when an assault was committed for which another person is being tried may, for the purpose of impeachment, be asked on cross-examination if he had not been convicted for an assault on the same person at the same time as that involved in the case on trial, and it is not necessary to prove that fact by the record of conviction.

Appeal — improper evidence — immateriality.

2. One who is shown to be guilty of assaulting an officer in the discharge of his duty, upon his own evidence, cannot secure a reversal of the conviction because improper evidence was admitted for the impeachment of one of his witnesses.

Note. — Cross-examination as proper mode of proving conviction of crime for purposes of impeachment.

As suggested by the title, this note presupposes the competency for impeaching purposes of the particular fact in respect of conviction which is sought to be elicited by the cross-examination, and deals only with the question whether cross-examination is a proper mode of establishing that fact, conceding or assuming its competency when properly established, or whether, on the other hand, it must be proved by the production of the record. In other words, the APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Howard County convicting him of assault and battery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harness, Moon, & Voorhis, for appellant:

The conviction of the witness for assault and battery upon an officer is not proper evidence to introduce on cross-examination as affecting the credibility of the witness.

Glenn v. Clore, 42 Ind. 60.

If a person has been convicted of assault and battery, the only proper evidence to be introduced, if it is competent at all, would be the record of his conviction.

Messrs. James Bingham, Attorney General, Alexander G. Cavins, William H. Thompson, Edward M. White, and J. Fenimore Cooper for appellee.

Myers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted upon a charge of assault and battery, and the only error assigned arises upon the motion for a new trial.

note is confined to cases in which the objection to the cross-examination is essentially that the record is the best evidence. Hence, cases in which the objection goes merely to the form of the question, the extent to which the cross-examination may be permitted, or the particular kind of conviction that may be inquired into, and not to the point whether cross-examination is a proper mode of establishing a conviction: concededly competent for impeaching purposes, if properly established, are not within the scope of the note.

Illustrations of the class of cases thus excluded are those involving the question whether the witness may be asked on cross-examination if he has even been in jail or has ever been indicted, where it is obvious that the real ground of the objections is that the fact itself is not competent, and not that cross-examination would not be a proper method of proving it, if it were competent. For the same reason cases involving forms of question permissible on cross-examination under a statute expressly permitting a conviction to be shown by cross-examination for impeaching purposes, as well as those involving the question whether under such a statute it is proper to ask a witness if he has been convicted of an offense which is a misdemeanor only, and not a felony, are excluded. That the latter question relates essentially to the competency of the conviction for impeaching purposes, rather than to the propriety of cross-examination as a method of establishing it, is well illustrated by the case of Burke v. Stewart, 81 Ill. App. 506, where the decision that felonies only, and not misdemeanors, are within the purview of a statute providing that the conviction of "any crime" may be shown in a civil action, for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, and that the fact of such conviction may be shown like any other fact not of record by the witness himself, was based upon a similar decision in Bartholomew v. People, 104 Ill. 601, 44 Am. Rep. 97, with respect to the provision of the Criminal Code that the conviction of a person for a crime may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility, although the section of the Criminal Code referred to makes no provision for oral proof, so that in criminal cases the fact of conviction, even when competent, must, as the court expressly declared, be shown by the record, and cannot be proved by cross-examination. It is thus apparent that the distinction between misdemeanors and felonies bears essentially on the competency of the particular conviction, and not upon the mode of establishing a competent conviction, even when the objection is formally made to a question asked upon cross-examination.

It is true that in People v. Schenick, 65 Cal. 625, 4 Pac. 675, holding that a conviction for a misdemeanor could not be shown upon cross-examination, under a statute permitting a conviction of a felony to be shown in that manner, the court suggested that a conviction for a misdemeanor might be shown by the record, but that suggestion was repudiated by later cases. See People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. 52; Jones v. Duchow, 87 Cal. 109, 23 Pac. 371, 25 Pac. 256; Clements v. McGinn (Cal.) 33 Pac. 920.

It would seem in general that all objections that relate essentially to the mode of proof, as distinguished from the competency of the conviction itself, are obviated by a statute expressly recognizing cross-examination as a proper mode of establishing a conviction for impeaching purposes, and that any question arising under the statute in respect of the form of the question, the extent of the examination, or the particular character of the conviction inquired about, must go essentially to the competency of the particular fact sought to be shown in this manner, and not to the point, which is alone considered in this note, as to the propriety of cross-examination as a means of showing it.

The question whether a witness may refuse to answer the question, on the ground that it will tend to incriminate or degrade him, is also excluded, as are the questions

The prosecuting witness testified that on Sunday, July 19, 1908, at about 2:30 o'clock P. M., while on duty as a patrolman, dressed in full uniform, and having his star and mace, he saw one Moynahan go to the back door of appellant's saloon, and knock on the door two or three times, and work the door latch; that the door opened, and Moynahan entered the saloon; that he (witness) went directly to the same door, imitated the knocking on the door and working of the latch as nearly as he could and the door was partially opened by appellant; that he stated to appellant that he wanted to see who was in there, and was informed by appellant with an oath that it was none of his business who was there; that he got his hand inside the door, and was then assaulted both by Moynahan and appellant, his face scratched by appellant, who also struck him in the face, Moynahan hit him with a beer bottle, and appellant threw him out; that, as he went out, he got hold of appellant's suspender and pulled it partly off; that he remained at the back door two or three minutes, then went to the front door, and found Moynahan there, and soon after procured a warrant for the arrest of appellant. The statement of witness that his face was scratched is corroborated by others. Appellant testified that he started out of the back door, and there met the officer; that the latter put his foot inside the door, and said, "I want in;" that appellant said, "You have not got any business in here;" and that he shoved the officer whether the objection has been waived, or the error, if any, of the trial court, has been cured.

It is to be noted that where the purpose of the evidence is to disqualify the witness, it is generally, though not universally, held that the proof must be made by the record only. Cases of disqualification, however, are to be distinguished from those of mere impeachment, with which alone this note is concerned. In many jurisdictions the cases decided on general principles are no longer authoritative on account of the later enactment of statutes controlling the subject; and these cases are cited not as representing the existing rule of law in the particular jurisdiction, but as precedents upon the point in question when not governed by an express statute.

View that cross-examination is a proper mode.

Even in the absence of controlling statutes, it has been held in many cases that proof of a witness's conviction of crime, as affecting his credibility, may be made by cross-examination of the witness. Lang v. United States, 66 C. C. A. 255, 133 Fed. 201; State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90, 12 Pac. 406; State v. Probasco, 46 Kan. 310, 26 Pac. 749; State v. Alexis, 45 La. Ann. 973, 13 So. 394 (compare State v. McCoy, 109 La. 682, 33 So. 730, where the court seemed to think the question would not have been free from doubt if properly raised); *State v. There are many other cases in which this has been assumed, but which are not here cited for the reason that the objections to the cross-examination went to the competency of the particular facts sought to be shown, and not to the mode of showing them.

In Slater v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 275, 98 Pac. 110, the court referred to the Indian Territory Stats. of 1899, § 2017, providing that "it may be shown by the examination of a witness, or the record of a judgment, that he has been convicted of a felony," and seemed in some doubt whether this statute applied to the state of Oklahoma, but based its decision both on the statute and general law, holding that a witness's conviction of a felony or of any crime involving a want of moral character might be shown on his cross-examination as affecting his credibility. This back, and as he shoved him back the officer grabbed appellant's suspender; that Moynahan was not there; that when he asked the officer to step back, he would not do it, and he shoved him away; that he did not strike the officer or scratch him in the face; and that a crowd collected there.

Moynahan testified that about 12:30 o'clock on July 19th he had knocked at appellant's side door, and failed to get an answer or to get in; and that he was not at the back door when the officer was, that he did not strike the officer, and did not see him until about half an hour after he (Moynahan) had tried to get into the saloon; that he had gone to appellant's place to get beer; but that he was not in or about the saloon after 2 o'clock. It was in this connection that Moynahan was asked: "I will ask if you was ever convicted of assault and battery upon any person at a saloon,—at the door of a saloon. The person upon whom the assault and battery was committed was Edward Meeker [the prosecuting witness in this case], an officer, and at the back door of Dotterer's saloon, and on Sunday, when it was illegal to allow persons in a saloon; and you were convicted on that charge?" Objection was made that "the conviction of the witness for assault and battery upon an officer is not proper evidence to be introduced on cross-examination, as affecting the credibility of the witness. If he has been convicted of assault and battery, the only proper evidence to be introduced, if it is competent at all, would be the record of his case was approved in Price v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 291, 97 Pac. 1056, and was followed in Nelson v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 468, 106 Pac. 647, in Keys v. United States, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 647, 103 Pac. 874, and in Hendrix v. State (Okla. Crim. Rep.) 111 Pac. 688.

In Indiana it will be seen by DOTTERER v. STATE, that the supreme court inclines to the view that the evidence of a witness's conviction of crime may be shown upon his cross-examination as affecting his credibility, but that this view is by no means necessary to the decision. In Farley v. State, 57 Ind. 331 (to which the court refers in DOTTERER v. STATE), one of the grounds of the decision was that the conviction of a witness was improperly shown on his cross-examination, as this was not the best evidence.

In Vanceleave v. State, 150 Ind. 273, 49 N. E. 1060, it was held that where the defendant in a criminal case was asked on his cross-examination whether he had been convicted of a crime, such question was proper as affecting his credibility, in the absence of an objection that the record was the best evidence. What would have been the effect of such objection, the court does not state.

In Missouri, prior to the statute of 1895, the cases were contradictory, some holding that the proof of a witness's conviction should be shown by the record. State v. Rugan, 68 Mo. 214; State v. McGraw, 74 Mo. 573; State v. Brent, 100 Mo. 531, 13 S. W. 874; State v. Douglass, 81 Mo. 231; Berman v. Hoke, 61 Mo. App. 376. And others permitting a witness to be questioned touching his confinements for crimes. State v. Miller, 100 Mo. 606, 13 S. W. 832, 1051; State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153, 24 S. W. 449, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 51; State v. Pratt, 121 Mo. 566, 26 S. W. 556; see also to similar effect State v. Martin, 124 Mo. 514, 28 S. W. 12.

In State v. Knowles, supra, the court said: "Whether, to impeach his credibility the conviction of a witness may be proved by questioning him on cross-examination, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) has been variously decided by different judicial tribunals. Formerly, when conviction of an infamous crime rendered a witness incompetent, it was universally held that for that purpose the conviction could be proved by the record alone. In many of those jurisdictions, however, where the conviction of crime no longer affects the competency, but simply goes to the credibility, of the witness, there has been a tendency, sometimes by legislative enactment and sometimes by judicial decision, to broaden the sources of evidence, and permit the conviction to be shown by cross-examination of the witness himself. In a technical sense, the record may be the best evidence and the rule of primariness may require its production. This general rule, however, is of no great value unless, in its application to the subject under consideration, it is necessary for the interests of justice, to avoid error, exclude falsehood, and promote the truth. It can hardly be claimed that a record of conviction is any more convincing to the mind, or less liable to error, than is the witness's own admission of the fact under oath."

When a government witness in a criminal case testified on cross-examination that he had been in jail, and on the redirect, that he was confined for "getting tight," it was held that an objection to the latter question, that the record was the only proper evidence, was not a good objection, as, for aught that appeared, the witness might have been confined by a police officer without any trial or sentence. State v. Pike, 65 Me. 111.

In Fisher v. Crescent Ins. Co. 33 Fed. 544, the conviction of a witness was shown on his cross-examination, without comment upon its propriety, the court charging the jury that they might consider such evidence as affecting the credibility of the witness.

In State v. Hill, 52 W. Va. 296, 43 S. E. 160, it was stated to be the proper practice to ask a witness whether he had been in the penitentiary, but in that case no objection was made to the question; the court seemed to be in some doubt whether, if the conviction." The objection was overruled, and exception reserved, and the witness answered, "Yes, sir, I paid a fine." Reliance is here placed on the cases of Farley v. State (1877), 57 Ind. 331, 334; Glenn v. Clore (1873), 42 Ind. 60. See also Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, §§ 530, 2110, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 506; Acts 1905, p. 584, § 234; Com. v. Walsh (1907), 196 Mass. 369, 124 Am. St. Rep. 559, 82 N. E. 19, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 642; Bise v. United States (1906), 74 C. C. A. 1, 144 Fed. 374, 376, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 165; James v. United States (1907), 7 Ind. Terr. 250, 104 S. W. 607.

question had been as to a conviction, it could have been shown without the record, if objected to.

In some cases the allowance of such cross-examination has been sustained as within the discretion of the trial court. State v. Pfeifferle, 36 Kan. 90, 12 Pac. 406; State v. Probasco, 46 Kan. 310, 26 Pac. 749.

Thus, it has been held that a statute providing that "the conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude may be given in evidence to affect the credibility of a witness" does not prevent the court, in its discretion, from permitting a witness to be cross-examined as to his conviction of an offense not involving moral turpitude, and that the record is not necessary. McGovern v. Hays, supra.

In State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311, it was said that while it was probably improper to cross-examine a witness as to a conviction, instead of producing the record, the modern tendency was to greater liberality in that respect, and the error was not considered material.

View that cross-examination is not a proper method.

In other cases it is held that the conviction of a witness, as affecting his credibility, must be shown by the record. Murphy v. State, 108 Ala. 10, 18 So. 557; Thompson v. State, 100 Ala. 70, 14 So. 878 (dictum); People v. McDonald, 39 Cal. 697; People v. Reinhart, 39 Cal. 449; People v. Buckner (Cal.) 4 Pac. 489; Hall v. Brown, 30 Conn. 551; State v. Fisher, 1 Penn. (Del.) 303, 41 Atl. 208 (where the court seemed to place some weight on the fact that the record was of easy access, as it was in the same court); Johnson v. State, 48 Ga. 116 (holding it to be no error to refuse to compel a witness to answer, for the purpose of discrediting him, that he had pleaded guilty to various crimes, as the record of his plea was the best evidence); Com. v. Quin, 5 Gray, 478; Com. v. Sullivan, 161 Mass. 59, 36 N. E. 583; Com. v. Walsh, 196 Mass. 369, 124 Am. St. Rep. 559, 82 N. E. 19, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 642; Clement v. Brooks, 13 N. H. 92; Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140. The principle of the last case was approved in Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 4 N. W. 785, the court in the latter case having overlooked the Wisconsin 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There is a diversity of holdings in the different courts upon the questions presented, and it will be useless to attempt to do more than to keep the line of cases in our own state upon a consistent course. Section 530, supra, is as follows: "Any fact which might heretofore be shown to render a witness incompetent may be hereafter shown to affect his credibility." Section 2110, supra, is as follows: "The rules of evidence prescribed in civil cases, and concerning the competency of witnesses, shall govern in criminal cases, except as otherwise provided in this act." Section 2116, Burns's Anno.

But in Childs v. State, 58 Ala. 349, it was held that there was no error in permitting the question to be put to a witness on cross-examination as affecting his credibility, whether he had not pleaded guilty of stealing from a store in a certain place, it appearing that the trial in which the plea was made was before a justice of the peace, and it not appearing that any record was made of it.

Where a witness for the prosecution in a criminal case was asked on his cross-examination whether he had not been in the house of correction, the court said the witness might answer or not as he pleased, and he declined to answer; the trial court ruled that the question need not be answered on account of the witness's privilege, and because the prison record was the proper mode of proof; and the appellate court held that the questions were improperly put, as prior convictions could only be proved by the record. Com. v. Quin, supra.

In Illinois it is asserted in a number of cases that in a criminal case the proof of a witness's conviction of crime, as affecting his credibility, must be made by the record, but the decisions seem generally to have been grounded in whole or in part on other considerations; thus in Bartholomew v. People, 104 Ill. 601, 44 Am. Rep. 97, the defendant having denied that he had been in the penitentiary, it was held that it was error to admit any further evidence of his conviction other than the record, and also that, to discredit the witness, a conviction must be of an infamous crime.

Similarly, in Kirby v. People, 123 Ill. 436, 15 N. E. 33, where a defendant in a criminal case declined to answer whether he had been convicted of a certain crime, it was held to be error to admit in evidence an incomplete part of the record of conviction.

In Simons v. People, 150 Ill. 66, 36 N. E. 1019, where the defendant was asked on cross-examination whether he had been convicted of a crime, and admitted the fact, it was held that while this was error, it would not require the reversal of the case, as the objection to the question was general, and not on the ground that the fact could not be proved by parol, particularly where the court later excluded the evidence.

Stat. 1908, Acts 1905, p. 584, § 240, is as follows: "In all questions affecting the credibility of a witness, his general moral character may be given in evidence." A like provision is contained in Burns's Ann. Stat. 1908, § 529, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 505. Section 530, supra, was evidently enacted in view of, and to remove, the ban of the provisions of § 79, p. 999, Rev. Stat. 1843, defining infamous crimes, and rendering those convicted of the defined crimes incompetent to testify even in civil causes. Assault and battery was not among the offenses. Section 2116, supra, applies to the cross-examination of a witness, for it is well recognized in the practice that, both as to parties and witnesses, the state may show on cross-examination, as affecting the credibility of a party or witness, that he had been arrested, prosecuted, or convicted of similar offenses. Parker v. State (1894) 136 Ind. 284, 35 N. E. 1105; Vancleave v. State (1898) 150 Ind. 275, 49 N. E. 1060; Shears v. State (1897) 147 Ind. 55, 46 N. E. 331; Crum v. State (1897) 148 Ind. 401, 411, 47 N. E. 833. This section is declaratory of a general rule, and was enacted in 1881, doubt-

This case was followed in O'Donnell v. People, 224 Ill. 218, 79 N. E. 639, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 123, as to the absence of a specific objection to proving a witness's conviction by parol.

In McKevitt v. People, 208 Ill. 460, 70 N. E. 693, it was held to be error to show by a witness for the defendant in a criminal case, on cross-examination, that he had been in the penitentiary for robbery, but that the error was harmless, as the other testimony of the witness did not tend to show that the defendant was innocent of the crime for which he was being tried.

Where a defendant jointly indicted with others refused counsel, and voluntarily took the stand and testified, and counsel for other defendants asked him on cross-examination whether he had been convicted of larceny (an infamous crime), it was held to be error for the court to disallow the question, as this amounted to the technical objection that the record was the best evidence, and, as the witness had refused counsel, such a technical objection ought not to have been taken unless he took it personally, in view of his testimony against the other defendants. Looney v. People, 81 Ill. App. 370.

In Daxanbeklar v. People, 93 Ill. App. 553, it was held that a question to a witness in a criminal case, "Were you ever in the Reform School of the State of Iowa?" was properly excluded, as the only conviction which could be shown to affect credibility was of an infamous crime, and that in a criminal case that could only be shown by the record.

Defendant in criminal case as a witness.

The detailed discussion of the question whether defendant in a criminal case, who has taken the stand in his own behalf, may be cross-examined with reference to prior convictions, for the purpose of impeaching him, is not within the scope of this note, as the essential point is the competency of the particular conviction sought to be shown, rather than the proper method of showing it. It is sufficient for the purposes of this note, to point out that in general it is held that such a defendant is subject, the same as other witnesses, to provisions of the statute permitting cross-examination of witnesses in regard to former convictions 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for purposes of impeachment, without discussing the particular applications, limitations, or exceptions to the rule, which go essentially to the competency of the fact rather than the mode of proving it. *Ball v. less in view of the rule in Farley v. State (1877) supra.

In People v. Cascone (1906) 185 N. Y. 317, 78 N. E. 287, it is said: "The defendant in an action, either civil or criminal, cannot be asked on cross-examination whether he has been indicted, for an indictment is merely an accusation, and no evidence of guilt. . . . He cannot be asked if he was tried for a crime, unless it appears that he was convicted, because a trial followed by acquittal is but an accusation successfully met. A conviction for crime may be proved, or on cross-examination actual guilt without a conviction, for either implies moral obliquity, and hence affects credibility,"—citing cases. And if he was convicted, he cannot prove that he was not in fact guilty. Com. v. Galligan (1891) 155 Mass. 54, 28 N. E. 1129. "The cross examination may go far enough not only to overthrow the direct evidence of the witness, but also to rebut inferences. Gillett, Indirect & Collateral Ev. § 90. And when the fact goes to the weight of the testimony, it is admissible. Gillett, Indirect & Collat. Ev. § 91. "A series of mutually dependent crimes may be shown where they tend to prove that they were committed under a system which becomes relevant to the inquiry." Gillett, Crim. Law, (2d ed.) p. 653. It is always proper to introduce evidence of identity, though it may involve a collateral crime. Abbott, Trial Brief, p. 349; Roscoe, Crim. Ev. 7th ed. 90; Frazier v. State (1893) 135 Ind. 38, 41, 34 N. E. 817. Also evidence of other similar crimes, or conviction thereof, may be shown. Crum v. State; Shears v. State; and Vancleave v. State,—supra. If the evidence tends to prove a material fact, it is admissible. 3 Rice, Ev. § 155; 1 Elliott, Ev. §§ 174, 175; Higgins v. State (1901) 157 Ind. 58, 60 N. E. 685. It is a well-recognized rule that any fact tending to impair the credibility of the witness by showing his interest, bias, ignorance, motives, or that he is depraved in character, may be shown on cross-examination; but the extent to which such cross-examination may be carried is within the sound discretion of the court. 1 Wharton Ev. (3d ed.) § 567; South Bend v. Hardy (1884) 98 Ind. 577, 49 Am. Rep. 792; Parker v. State (1894) 136 Ind. 284, 286, 35 N. E. 1105; Spencer v. Robins (1886) 106 Ind. 586, 5 N. E. 726. In People v. Molineux (1901) 108 N. Y. 264, 62 L.R.A. 193, 61 N. E. 286, 302, it is said with regard to the rule as to showing the guilt or conviction of a party of a crime: "Another exception to the general rule is that, when the evidence of an extraneous crime tends to identify the person who committed it as the same

Within this rule, it was clearly competent, for the purpose of impeaching and discrediting the witness, to connect him with the transaction by showing his conviction for the same offense, at the same time, and as a part of the same assault, when he had denied being present. The prosecuting witness had testified that Moynahan was present on the occasion mentioned, and struck him with a beer bottle. Appellant and Moynahan had both testified that Moynahan was not present. It is not made directly to appear that the occasion referred to in the question was the same as the one on which the assault is charged to have been committed, or that it was on the same person, though the name of the officer was given as "Edward Meeker," the name of the prosecuting witness; but no objection was made on either of those grounds, but on the ground that the question was not proper on cross-examination. It is quite clear to us that if it was on the same occasion and on the same person, the fact of conviction not only had a direct tendency, but was conclusive as to Moynahan, upon that question, both as to a material fact and as showing the witness's bias and prejudice, or grounds for them. The credibility of the witness was a matter to be considered and tested by his cross-examination within proper limits. In view of his testimony that he was not present when the prosecuting witness said he was, and when appellant says he was not, the fact went directly to affect his credibility. The fact of his conviction was material, and concluded him as to the one fact, and was admissible, if the occasion was the same. It was competent to show the identity of the transaction by his cross-examination, and that he had been concluded on that question by a conviction on trial, or by a plea of guilty. It established the fact of his presence, in direct contravention of his testimony.

The cases of Farley v. State, supra; Fletcher v. State (1874) 49 Ind. 124, 19 Am. Rep. 673, and Glenn v. Clore (1873) 42 Ind. 60, were decided prior to the enactment of § 2116, supra, and held that, as a witness could not be impeached or sustained by proof of general moral character, much less could this be so by proof of isolated acts of good or bad conduct. In Farley v. State, supra, the defendant, on trial for the larceny of a horse, not having put his character in issue, was asked upon cross-examination, "Have you not been convicted of stealing horses before, and sent to the penitentiary?" Over objection of irrelevancy and immateriality, and that the question was not proper cross-examination, he answered in the negative. He was then asked, "Have you not been convicted of some other crime, and sent to the penitentiary?" Over objection of irrelevancy, immateriality, and that the evidence was improper in any event, and was not proper on cross-examination, he answered: "Yes, sir; for complicity in forgery." The admission of this evidence was held improper, as not relevant to the issue. The case is based upon Fletcher v. State, supra, in which it is said: "It is conceded by counsel for appellant that the state had the right to impeach the appellant as a witness, by proving that his general character for truth and veracity was bad in the neighborhood of his residence; but it is very strenuously contended that the state had no right to prove what his general moral character was, to impeach him as a witness." The charge there was forgery, and it was held that proof of the defendant's general moral character was improper, on the ground that the provisions of the Civil Code did not apply, and the effect was to put defendant's general moral character in issue without his consent, and without a statute authorizing it. Both reasons are removed by the present statute.

In Glenn v. Clore, supra, a civil action, it was held error, on a trial for seduction, to introduce against a witness, for the purpose of affecting his credibility, the record on a charge of assault and battery with intent to commit rape, when the conviction was for assault only. This evidence was held irrelevant and improper on the ground that, as he was not incompetent as a witness prior to the adoption of the Code, the offense of which he was convicted could not be admitted to affect his credibility, under § 529, supra.

We are unable to perceive that these cases are controlling in this case, except on the ground of the lack of identity of the time and place to connect the incident with the material fact in issue at the trial. If the witness was convicted it was clearly competent; but, no objection having been interposed upon that ground, and the matter being apparently treated as the same incident, the objection made is unavailing. Besides, with the view we take of the evidence, even if not properly connected with the same transaction, appellant was not harmed by it.

Upon the question of the record being the only method of discrediting the witness by reason of a former conviction, we do not think that the apparent rule in Farley v. State, supra, is controlling here. There the offense was grand larceny, an infamous crime at the common law and under our statute of 1843, supra, which rendered the witness wholly incompetent, though such evidence was admissible under the statute then in force, to affect his credibility. The record could not have been introduced in evidence by the state in chief, because it was collateral,—the test being: Would the cross-examining party be entitled to go into such matter in chief? If not, it is collateral. Welch v. State (1885) 104 Ind. 347, 3 N. E. 850, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 450; Staser v. Hogan (1889) 120 Ind. 207, 21 N. E. 911, 22 N. E. 990; George v. State (1884) 16 Neb. 318, 20 N. W. 311. The rule for requiring a record of a conviction grew out of a state of the law which rendered those convicted of infamous crimes incompetent as witnesses, and the rule requiring the record was for the twofold purpose of certainty as to what the offense was, and in order that witnesses might not be deterred by imputation upon their character and integrity. Before a witness should be disqualified, it should certainly and definitely be shown that he was thus disqualified, and this is the reason and basis for the rule as shown in Bise v. United States (1906) 74 C. C. A. 1, 144 Fed. 374, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 165, and James v. United States (1907) 7 Ind. Terr. 250, 104 S. W. 607. Com. v. Walsh, supra, is based on Com. v. Quinn (1855) 5 Gray, 478, and Com. v. Sullivan (1894) 161 Mass. 59, 36 N. E. 583.

There is some support for the holding in the former case, which together with Farley v. State, supra, is broadly grounded on the doctrine declared in 1 Greenleaf Evidence (14th ed.), § 457, that, "where the question involves the fact of a previous conviction, it ought not to be asked, because there is higher and better evidence which ought to be offered;" but in Com. v. Sullivan, supra, the rule is entirely relaxed, a fact which seems to be entirely overlooked in Com. v. Walsh, supra, for in the Sullivan Case, supra, upon the question being put to the witness on cross-examination, "Were you ever in jail in Essex county?" the court refused to allow the question to be answered, unless the record of a conviction of the witness should be produced, and the cross-examiner stated that he had no such record to produce. It clearly appears from that case that it would have been held a proper question in case of a negative answer if followed by a record of conviction; but, if answered affirmatively, what good ground could there be for demanding the record? To do so is to do more than has been done; but if there is a negative answer, the record of conviction is an effectual impeachment, and is admissible, if material. In the earlier cases questions which not only tended to criminate, but those tending to disgrace, witnesses, were excluded. The rule before quoted from 1 Greenleaf Evidence (15th ed.) § 457, has been much modified, we think with reason. It is a familiar rule that a witness may be impeached by statements made out of court contrary to those made in court, or by testimony given on a former trial, or by testimony in other cases involving the same question or transaction, different from that given in a second trial, and while such testimony might, in the modern preservation of evidence by stenographic notes, or by a bill of exceptions, be shown by them, we apprehend that there can be no good reason urged by a witness who heard the testimony may not, upon the laying of proper ground for the impeachment, testify to the fact. That is precisely what was attempted here, as we view it, and whilst, perhaps, the ground was not definitely enough laid as to time and the individual assaulted, no objection was made on that score.

The rule as stated by Professor Greenleaf is based upon the doctrine that the best evidence of which a case in its nature is susceptible must be produced, but the rule has been attacked as not being a sound one and as uninformative and unnecessary, and not applicable as a hard and fast one. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise Ev. chap. 11. It rests upon the presumption that where better evidence is withheld, there may be some sinister motive in withholding it. United States v. Reyburn (1832) 6 Pet. 352, 8 L. ed. 424; Taylor v. Riggs (1828) 1 Pet. 591, 7 L. ed. 275. The rule is said to rest upon the quality or grade, rather than upon the strength of the evidence. Minor v. Tillotson (1833) 7 Pet. 99, 8 L. ed. 621; Richardson v. Milburn (1860) 17 Md. 67; Robinson v. Mulder (1890) 81 Mich. 75, 45 N. W. 505; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stevenson (1889) 128 Pa. 442, 5 L.R.A. 515, 15 Am. Coryell* (1883) 58 Tex. 680.

In 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 216, it is said: "It is sometimes said that there is an exception to the rule requiring the best evidence, in the case of collateral writing and independent facts in issue; but these are cases in which the rule does not apply, rather than exceptions to the rule. There is a clear distinction between proving the existence of a fact which has been put in writing, and proving the writing or contents of the writing itself. If the essential fact to be proved is not the contents of a written instrument, but an independent fact, to which the writing is merely collateral, or of which it is merely an incident, there is no reason for the application of the rule. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In such cases the contents of the document are no part of the issue, and there is no understanding that the writing shall be the sole repository of the fact. When the parol evidence is as near to the fact testified to as the writing itself, then each is primary." In Gillett, Indirect & Collateral Ev. § 91, it is said: "While there may be some reason for requiring that the record of conviction should be produced, where it is sought to disqualify a person as a witness on the ground that he is infamous, because the question as to whether he was convicted of an offense which renders him infamous is, to some extent, a technical one, yet, where the only use that is sought to be made of the fact of conviction is to affect the weight of the testimony of a person as a witness, no good reason can be suggested why he should not be interrogated upon cross-examination as to that point." "The reasons for requiring record evidence of conviction have very little application to a case where the party convicted is himself upon the stand, and is questioned concerning it, with a view to sifting his character, upon cross-examination. The danger that he will falsely testify to a conviction which never took place, or that he may be mistaken about it, is so slight that it may almost be looked upon as purely imaginary, while the danger that worthless characters will unexpectedly be placed upon the stand, with no opportunity for the opposite party to produce the record evidence of their infamy, is always palpable and imminent." Clemens v. Conrad (1869) 19 Mich. 170.

In the case at bar the issuable fact was whether appellant had assaulted the officer. Whether the witness Moynahan was present was only a collateral and incidental fact, introduced by appellant by his testimony, and that of Moynahan. The material collateral fact was that he had been convicted of an assault, presumably at the same time, on the same officer, and the facts of that assault, and his conviction of it, were as well known to him, and his confession of it was of as high quality and probative force, as the record itself, and the reason for the rule requiring the record in this case we think entirely fails. The admission by parol was as near the fact as the record could be. Rules of evidence are adopted for practical purposes.

But there is another branch of the case as to which there can be no doubt from the evidence. Appellant admits that the officer put his foot into the doorway, and he shoved the officer out, and by the testimony of both appellant and the officer it is clear that there was a struggle, and that the officer grabbed appellant's suspender, and it is undisputed that the officer's face was scratched. Whether the witness Moynahan was present was wholly immaterial. Appellant admits that he was in the saloon on Sunday. He was conducting a license business, but one subject to police surveillance, and he cannot object that the officer, finding him there at a time when business was forbidden, demanded admittance. This, appellant denied him, and admits that he forcibly ejected him, which he clearly had no right to do. It is made the express duty of policemen to "detect and arrest offenders," and to arrest on view, and to "carefully observe and to inspect all places of business under license or required to have the same," and to "suppress and restrain all unlawful and disorderly conduct or practices, and enforce and prevent the violation of all ordinances and laws in force in such city," Burns 1908, §§ 8782, 8785, Acts 1905, p. 219, §§ 161, 164. The statute forbids all persons except the proprietor of a saloon and members of his family from going into such room on Sunday, and makes the fact of a person's going into such room prima facie evidence of the violation of the statute as to sales, and policemen are required to enforce the provisions of the act. Burns 1908, §§ 8328, 8330, Acts 1895, p. 248, §§ 3, 7. The act could only be enforced by inspection, and, being himself present, appellant was required to permit it, so that it is clear that his guilt is shown upon his own statement, and no error of which he can complain, or prejudice of his substantial right, is shown. Sibbery v. State (1897) 149 Ind. 684, 39 N. E. 936, 47 N. E. 458; Shears v. State (1897) 147 Ind. 51, 56, 46 N. E. 331, and cases cited; Reed v. State (1895) 141 Ind. 116, 40 N. E. 525; *Com. v. The judgment is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

WIRT ADAMS, State Revenue Agent, for Use of Board of Levee Commissioners for Yazoo-Mississippi Delta, Appt.,
v.

F. I. WILLIAMS et al.

(— Miss. —, 52 So. 865.)

Courts — jurisdiction — public officer — failure to account.

1. The secretary and treasurer of a board of levee commissioners is a public officer within the meaning of a constitutional provision giving the chancery court jurisdiction of suits on bonds of public officers for failure to account for public money received by them.

Action — party plaintiff — state revenue agent.

2. The state revenue agent may maintain 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

an action on behalf of the board of levee commissioners to hold the bond of its secretary and treasurer liable for public money received by him, under a statute making it his duty to investigate the accounts of levee board officers and to maintain suits against them.

Bond — official — failure of principal to sign — effect.

3. Failure of the principal to sign his official bond does not render it void in favor of the surety, where the statute provides that no irregularity shall render such bond void, if it is delivered as the official bond of the officer and serves as such, and it is joint and several in form.

Same — unnecessary requirements — effect.

4. The official bond of the treasurer of a levee board which has the conditions prescribed by law is not rendered void by the insertion of an additional condition relieving the surety from liability for loss of money deposited in the bank, such condition being merely surplusage and void.

Same — liability for interest earned.

5. The bond of a custodian of public money is liable to account for the interest which he receives upon it, where the statute makes him liable to safe-keep, account for, and pay over all money that may come into his custody in his official capacity, and all other money for which he is properly accountable as such officer, although the statute makes it unlawful for him to use such money for his own benefit.

Note. — Liability of public officer or his bond for interest received on public money.

As to right of public to fees unlawfully collected by officer for his own benefit, see note to State ex rel. Dunbar v. Dunbar, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1015.

The question whether an officer having custody of public funds who receives interest from the use or loaning of such funds may retain the interest as his own seems to have depended in many cases upon the further question, as to the nature of the liability of the officer who has charge of the public funds. In several jurisdictions the liability of the officer for the public funds is held to be absolute, and it seems he has even been considered the absolute owner thereof. In these jurisdictions the relations between the officer and the state or municipal corporation whose funds he has charge of is said to be that of debtor and creditor, and not that of trustee and cestui que trust, or that arising from a mere bailment from which it follows, as they hold, that, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the interest accruing on such public funds belongs to the one who has charge thereof.

State v. Walsen, 17 Colo. 170, 15 L.R.A. 456, 28 Pac. 1119, is perhaps the leading case supporting that view. It was there APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Coahoma County sustaining demurrers to a bill filed to compel defendant Williams to account to the Board of Levee Commissioners for Yazoo-Mississippi Delta for certain moneys alleged to have been received by him as interest on public moneys held by him as treasurer of such board. Reversed.

The fact are stated in the Chancellor's opinion.

Mr. O. G. Johnston, for appellant:

The revenue agent is the proper party to maintain this action.

State Revenue Agent v. Hill, 70 Miss. 106, 11 So. 789.

The bond was binding on all who signed it, without regard to its approval, and without regard to whether or not it was signed by the principal.

A bond taken in pursuance of a public statute is an official bond.

held that although the Constitution made him criminally liable for putting money out at interest or making a profit from it, a state treasurer cannot be compelled to account for interest or profits made by him from the public funds, in the absence of a statute charging him therewith, his liability for such funds being absolute, under the provisions of the Constitution.

In Com. v. Godshaw, 92 Ky. 435, 17 S. W. 737, it is held that a public official, in this case a trustee of a jury fund, being bound for the money at all hazards, unless he was required by law to place it in some safe depository as the money of the state, is in consequence not chargeable with interest collected on such fund. The court took occasion to say: "The whole theory of the public official being bound for the money at all hazards is that by the terms of his bond he agrees to pay the money over when collected, without any condition annexed to his liability, and that, as between the state and the official, in determining this liability, it must be treated as his money, and not that of the state. In what particular has Godshaw been guilty of a breach of his bond? He has paid over all the money and settled as the law requires. He could have mingled the money with his own, and perhaps did so, or could have deposited it in any other place than the bank. He and his sureties were liable for it, and when paid at the times required, there can be no breach of their obligation." It appeared in this case that afterwards, by a change in the law, the clerk was required to pay the money into the treasury after paying to the trustee of the jury fund a sum sufficient to pay the jurors. In the trial court this law was held not to repeal the former law under which the trustee derived his power, but the supreme court thought otherwise, and held that whatever interest the trustee had received on his deposits upon money received from the clerk or paid over to him under the order of the court since that law went into effect should be accounted for.

after coming to the conclusion that a county treasurer was not a mere agent, trustee, or bailee, and yet not an absolute insurer of the funds without relief under any circumstances, but was rather a special bailee subject to special obligations, held that interest received by him after he has gone out of office, on account of money deposited by him in a bank while in office, without any agreement for interest, cannot be recovered from him by the county, there being no statutory provision requiring him to account for such interest, and he being expressly prohibited by law from loaning the money, either with or without interest. The court said: "The legislation prohibiting county officers from using funds so as to accumulate profits thereon indicates an intention on the part of the legislature to provide against loss of the original fund, and also to prevent counties from assuming any responsibility for loss occasioned by the default and misconduct of its officers. If the law authorized county treasurers and collectors to loan the public funds that profits might accrue thereon, the public would be required to assume more or less responsibility for any loss which might occur, and the officer would then become a bailee or trustee, required to use only ordinary care and diligence of the public funds in his hands. The legislature has seen fit to provide against this divided responsibility, and therefore has provided for holding officers to a strict accountability for the original fund, and has made no provision whereby profits shall inure to the benefit of the county. This is substantially the construction given to similar laws in other states and by the courts of the United States. The basis of this rigid rule of accountability may be found in the evident purpose of the legislature to prevent the dissipation of the original fund; and enactment of the statute prohibiting the appropriation or use of the funds by custodian was deemed sufficient guaranty of the funds. It is true that the custodian may loan the funds in his hands, and receive interest therefor; but if he does so, he does it at his peril, and is subject to the criminal penalties provided by law, where the same is done by contract or by arrangement. It is no part of the legitimate funds of the county, however, and the sureties so on the official bond of the officer are not responsible for it to the county." The court in the above case evidently also found it necessary to distinguish United States v. Mosby, 133 U. S. 273, 33 L. ed. 625, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, and Richmond County v. Wandel, 6 Lans. 33 (infra), and in its attempt to do so said: "In the last two cases the interest was paid over to the treasury, and thus treated by the officer himself as public money; and in all such cases the courts hold that the officer cannot recover back the money. Even if there was a statute prohibiting an officer from loaning the public money, or using it in any way that profits might accrue, if the officer did loan or use the money, and did receive profits thereon, and pay the same into the treasury, the courts would refuse to give it back to the officer, because, in paying the same over he admitted it to be public money that he did not claim to be his own; and, also, as a voluntary payment, he could not recover it back. Therefore, these cases are not in point in this case, where the officer did not pay over the money, but claimed the same as his own, and where the statute prohibited the officer from so using the money that interest would accrue thereon."

In Shelton v. State, 53 Ind. 331, 21 Am. Rep. 197, it was held that a county treasurer, with respect to public funds in his hands, is not like a trustee or an agent, the mere bailee or custodian of such money, but the money becomes his own, and when he has accounted as required by law and by the terms of his bond, nothing further can be required of him, and therefore he cannot be required to pay over interest collected on such money when loaned to or deposited with a bank.

The weight of authority, however, supports what seems to be the better view, that the interest which attaches to the principal belongs to the state or municipal corporation, for failure to account for which 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the officer or his sureties may be held liable.

This rule has been applied in several cases, notwithstanding the fact that the officer's liability was held or assumed to be absolute; these cases holding with ADAMS v. WILLIAMS, that it is a complete non sequitur to say that because a public officer who has charge of public funds is an absolute insurer, he therefore is entitled to the interest accruing thereon. This view, of course, makes them directly opposed to the Walsen Case, and, so far as they are concerned at least, effectually disposes of the suggestion made in that case that the difference in the various jurisdiction in the nature of the liability of the officer was the distinction upon which all or nearly all adjudicated cases might be harmonized.

A case very similar to the ADAMS CASE, and upon which that case depended much for its holding, is State v. McFetridge, 84 Wis. 473, 20 L.R.A. 223, 54 N. W. 1, 908. In that case a state treasurer was sought to be held liable on his bond for interest collected on public funds. The defense rested on three propositions: First, it was contended that the legal title to the public moneys which came into the hands of the treasurer was in him, and not in the state; that the relation between him and the state was that of creditor and debtor only, and hence that it was no concern of the state what the treasurer did with the public money, or how much profit he made out of it, provided he accounted properly for what he received; that his obligations to the state were fully performed when he paid or delivered to the persons entitled thereto the amount of money which he received in the first instance; and hence that the sums received by him from the banks in which he deposited the public funds, as interest on such deposits, whether paid to him as a gratuity or pursuant to a previous agreement or understanding, belonged to him individually, as incident to the legal ownership of the money. Second, the deposit of the public funds in banks by the treasurer was without authority of law, and it was not in contemplation of the state or the suresties in his official bond, that he would make such deposits and receive interest thereon, and that hence liability for such interest, even though the state might recover it of the treasurer, was not within the true meaning of the condition of his bond. Third, conceding that the state was the owner of the public funds, the treasurer was still liable on his bond to account for and pay over to the persons entitled thereto, or to deliver to his successor in office, all such funds, and that, because he was thus absolutely liable therefor, the ordinary liability of a trustee to account to his cestui que trust for all profits made by him out of the trust money or property did not exist, and the money claimed by the state was not recoverable by it, but belonged to the treasurer individually. The court considered these three points in the order named. In regard to the first, after reviewing several statutes in regard to the duties, etc., of the state treasurer, it held that the legislature could never have intended to divest the state of its title to the public funds and the consequent control over those funds which results from ownership thereof; as to the second, it was held that the treasurer violated no law when he deposited such funds in banks, and stipulated for and received interest thereon; and as to the third, it was held that the absolute liability of the treasurer for the public moneys which come to his hands did not entitle him to the interest received from deposits thereof in banks. This case is freely quoted in the ADAMS CASE, and attention is called to that case for a further review thereof.

State v. Harshaw, 84 Wis. 532, 54 N. W. 17, a case similar to the McPetridge Case, depended upon the latter for its decision.

In Eshelby v. Cincinnati Bd. of Edu. 66 Ohio St. 71, 63 N. E. 586, the court, not thinking it expedient to establish a policy which would give to a treasurer any personal motive in selecting a place of deposit, held that a treasurer of a school district who, under favor of a statute permitting the deposit of "public funds," deposits such funds in a bank which allows interest on the average balance of the deposits, is required to account to the school district for such interest. The court in this case also said that it did not necessarily follow from the fact that the liability of the treasurer was absolute, and that it differed in that respect from that of the ordinary trustee or bailee, who may be exempt from liability on account of funds lost without his negligence or connivance, that the funds coming into the hands of the treasurer were his, or that, upon the receipt of money in his official capacity, the relation of debtor and creditor was established between him and the district. Said the court: "To the contrary it is quite clear that instead of being the debtor of the district he is its treasurer; the custodian of its funds; and that he acquires custody of the funds without acquiring title to them." In this case it was also said that whether such treasurer should be regarded as a bailee with express and extraordinary liabilities, or as a special trustee, was not material, since in either view he was the custodian of funds belonging to another.

Rhea v. Brewster, 130 Iowa, 729, 107 N. W. 940, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 389, is another case where a public officer, in this case a clerk of the court, was held not to become the owner of public funds in his hands, but a mere custodian thereof, and therefore accountable for interest which he received from a bank on public funds deposited therein. The court in this case also said: "The true test, as it seems to us, is not whether he is absolutely liable to account, but whether he is the owner of the funds in his hands. If he is not such owner, and the moneys coming into his hands belong to the county or someone else, any increment thereto is and should be treated as a part of the principal. This is the view approved in the better considered cases, and the only one consonant with sound public policy."

A similar case, and holding to the same effect, is Vansant v. State, 96 Md. 110, 53 Atl. 711. In this case there were many statutes which indirectly tended to show that the clerk of the court was not the absolute owner of the public moneys in his hands, but rather that he occupied a position of trust with reference thereto. There were also other statutes in regard to the salaries and fees of a clerk of the court, which, as the court said, if there were any doubt about the responsibility of the clerk for interest on other grounds, would seem conclusively to settle it.

Money received by an officer, by virtue of his office is money which such officer receives under the law of his office, not in violation of the law of the office; in right of his office, not in wrong; and does not include interest received by him on deposits of public money. For the former the bondsmen are liable, but not for the latter.

In Thompson v. Territory, 10 Okla. 409, 62 Pac. 355 (an action against the treasurer, the bondsmen not being parties), the court, after coming to the conclusion that territorial funds received by the treasurer of the territory remained the money of the territory until paid out according to law, and could not be treated as the money of the treasurer, held that although the treasurer might deposit such funds in a bank in his official capacity, and accept the interest thereon for daily balances, so long as the money remained absolutely under his control and subject to payment on his demand, since he could not appropriate the interest to his own use, it was earned by the funds of the territory. In this case it was contended by the treasurer that even if the moneys belonged to the territory, he was entitled to the interest, inasmuch as there was no provision of the statute for the treasurer to loan the funds, and that it would not follow that he was civilly liable for the interest merely because he might be amenable to the criminal law for an appropriation of the principal; and that if the funds were produced or accumulated by a criminal act by the treasurer, the territory could not accept the fruits of such crime. The court, however, said: "One might be criminally liable for a certain act, and still not be liable in damages civilly, but that is not the general rule; and, at any rate, in a case of this kind, even if the treasurer had committed a crime by accepting interest on the funds, he is estopped from saying that he had no authority to accept such interest. He used the moneys in such a way as to make them earn interest. For their use he admits he received a certain sum of money. The moneys of the territory earned these profits, and even if the transaction were an unlawful one, the treasurer will not be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong and reap the benefits thereof."

United States v. Mosby, 133 U. S. 273, 33 L. ed. 625, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, which was quoted in the ADAMS CASE, is in harmony with the above cases. In that case a United States consul, after paying into the treasury interest which he had collected on public money, thinking that he was entitled to it, sought unsuccessfully to recover it back.

A case also upholding the above doctrine, and seemingly of much stronger authority than many of the courts favoring the contrary doctrine have been willing to attribute to it, is Richmond County v. Wandel, 6 Lans. 33, affirmed on opinion below in 59 N. Y. 645. In that case an action was brought on a bond of a county treasurer binding him to pay, according to law, all moneys which should come to his hands as county treasurer. The language of the court, making the case one of importance, is sufficiently set out in the ADAMS CASE.

But see Maloy v. Bernalillo County, 10 N. M. 638, 52 L.R.A. 126, 62 Pac. 1106, supra, where the last two cases were sought to be distinguished.

In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. McCarty, Wilson Super. Ct. (Ind.) 205, by virtue of a statute a state auditor was authorized to deposit temporarily at interest, while awaiting investment, certain public funds in his hands. Evidently, notwithstanding this statute, he used the money for his own individual purposes and received a large amount of interest thereon. In an action to hold him accountable for the interest collected, it was said: "The people of the state, by virtue of the Constitution and of the statute, had a right to claim that the money in the auditor's hands, if placed at interest temporarily while awaiting investment, should be so placed as to secure to the school fund the interest that might be realized, and if the auditor did, as charged in the complaint, otherwise use it, and receive interest from such use, when he could have deposited it in bank at interest, to the credit of the fund, he is accountable for interest so received. And we are of opinion, further, that the Constitution, § 3, art. 8, by its own inherent force, makes all interest received from the sinking fund a part of the school fund; that, by virtue of that section itself, it was made the duty of McCarty to account for all interest he received; that as soon as it came to his hands, it became a part of the school fund, and if he has failed to pay the same to his successor, he and his sureties are liable in this suit on his official bond. If he used the money of the sinking fund in his own business or in speculative operations, the defendants should be held liable on their bond for such interest as would have accrued in case the money had been deposited according to law, but not for the profits of any business in which McCarty may have employed the funds, for no such liability could have been in the contemplation of the sureties when they signed the bond, nor does it seem to be contemplated in the law under which the bond was executed." In this case it was also urged by the auditor that, inasmuch as he was liable absolutely for the safety of the fund committed to his charge, he had the right to determine how it should be kept or employed while under his control, and that the money received by him was, while in his official charge, his money, and all that the state could demand of him was the return of an equal amount on the expiration of his term of office. The court, however, did not favor this view, but said that the embezzlement act placed the stamp of individuality on all public or trust funds received by the auditor and other officers therein named, and expressly prohibited them from using such funds "as their own," or in any manner not authorized by law.

That a public officer cannot retain interest made on public funds which, by act of Parliament, were intended to be paid over immediately upon their collection, was held in Craufurd v. Atty. Gen. 7 Price, 2.

In Baker v. Williams Bkg. Co. 42 Or. 213, 70 Pac. 711, it appeared that public funds had been deposited in a bank which afterwards became insolvent. Upon the claims made by the officers who made the deposits being allowed against the receiver, the question arose whether they were entitled to interest, under a statute providing that interest should be payable on all moneys after due, and on moneys received to the use of another and retained beyond a reasonable time without the owner's consent. It was contended by the objectors that such claims represented public funds deposited with the insolvent bank by the custodian thereof, and not the private funds of individual claimants, and for this reason no interest should be paid them thereon. The court in this regard said: "It is made a felony by statute for any person having in his possession any money belonging to the state, county, town, or other municipality, to convert to his own use or loan the same, with or without interest (Hill's Anno. Laws § 1772); and while a mere deposit in a bank for safe-keeping is not inhibited by this provision, it is manifest that, in case of the failure of the bank, the officer is not entitled to interest in his own right on the fund so deposited, whatever the right of the state or municipality might be in the premises. If, therefore, the claims are in fact for public money, as the objectors allege, no interest should be allowed thereon." The court then went on to hold that since some of the officers had accounted for the full amount of the public funds due, out of their own individual funds, and the claim against the bank thereupon assigned to them, there was no reason why they should not stand on exactly the same footing as other claimants against the bank. In regard to those, however, who had never made up the loss to the state, it was held that since the funds had never ceased to be public funds, no interest could be collected thereon by the officers.

In Hunt v. State, 124 Ind. 306, 24 N. E. 887, it was held that, conceding that a city treasurer could make a loan of funds in his hands upon his own individual responsibility, taking notes therefor payable to himself, and that he would then have been entitled to the usufruct, he could not loan

Williams cannot be held for the alleged interest charged to have been received by the money under the direction of the city council, and take notes therefor payable to the "treasurer of the city of Anderson," without making himself and his bond liable for the interest thereon.

Under a statute requiring "all fees, perquisites, and emoluments" to be paid into the county treasury, a sheriff cannot retain a certain sum of money received by him from a banking institution as compensation for the deposits he made therein of moneys which came into his hands as sheriff. Hughes v. People, 82 Ill. 78.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gault, 165 Ill. 233, 46 N. E. 256, it was held that a clerk of the court who retains a fund in his custody, for the use of which a bank paid him 2 per cent interest, when in fact, by an order of the court relieving him of the office of depository, he should have put it in a bank at 2½ per cent, cannot invoke the doctrine that if the fund was received by him by virtue of his office, he, as guarantor of its safety, was entitled to the interest. The court said: "The rule, if it exists as contended for, cannot apply, because the order designated another depository, and if complied with, the clerk would not have remained liable as guarantor or otherwise. It is plain that if Best had taken the certificate of deposit, he would not have been liable for the safe-keeping of the fund which the parties had stipulated, and the court had ordered, should be removed from his custody, and deposit for such safe-keeping elsewhere. He remained custodian by his own wrong, and should not be permitted to gain a benefit by disobedience." At the end of the clerk's term of office, it appeared that his successor received the money without any knowledge or information of the order of the court designating a certain bank as depository. Upon the question arising whether he also was liable for the interest received by him, the court said: "Still, the fund was in his hands in violation of the order of the court. The parties had agreed, and the court had ordered, that it should be deposited elsewhere. The Illinois Trust and Savings Bank had been designated as depository, and if the order had been obeyed, the fund would have produced interest. While it was in his hands it did actually produce interest at 2 per cent, and whatever his right to retain interest in other cases might be, we think that he could not be permitted to retain the interest so actually received, to the injury of appellant. He should be required to account for interest received by him."

In State v. McFetridge, supra, it was held that the omission of the term "perquisites" in the revision of a statute providing for the paying into the state treasury by the treasurer of all fees and perquisites does not entitle such treasurer to interest on the public funds as perquisites, where it is expressly provided by statute that his salary shall be "in full for all services rendered by him in his official capacity."

There are a few cases in which the decisions in actions upon the official bond turn upon the question whether the use of the money or the receipt of interest was colore officii or virtute officii, so as to fall within the condition of the bond.

A case of this nature, but generally cited as supporting the Walsen Case, supra, and other similar cases, is Renfro v. Colquitt, 74 Ga. 618, where it was held, Chief Justice Jackson dissenting, that, under a statute providing that the treasurer might, with the approval of the governor, deposit certain funds in any chartered bank of the state, subject to his draft as treasurer, and, with the governor, make such contract with the bank for the use of such funds as may be beneficial to the state, and another statute providing that the treasurer should not, under any circumstances, use himself, or allow others to use, the funds of the state in his hands, without incurring a penalty therefor,—interest received by him and others for the use of public funds in violation of such statute could not be regarded as received "by virtue of his office," and therefore a recovery would not be sustained for the benefit of the state on his official bond which bound him to pay over all money received by him "by virtue of his office." The court said: "Can the money made or received by the treas-him from the funds of the levee board which came into his hands while he was the secretary and treasurer thereof.

Mr. W. A. Alcorn also for appellees.

Whitfield, C., delivered the following opinion:

The facts in this case are as follows: F. I. Williams was duly elected secretary and treasury of the board of levee commissioners for the Yazoo-Mississippi Delta levee district, on the 13th day of March 1906, and thereafter, on the 17th day of May, 1906, the said Williams qualified to act as such treasurer in the following manner, to wit: The said F. I. Williams applied to the Ætna Indemnity Company of Hartford, Connecticut, to become surety for him on his official bond, which the indemnity company did. The condition of said bond, amongst other things, provided for the faithful performance and discharge of the duties pertaining to the office of the treasurer. The said indemnity company became surety on the said bond, at the instance of said Williams, and was paid a valuable consideration by the board of levee commissioners, to wit, the sum of $300 per annum, for which sum the said surety company presented its bill, which bill was duly approved and allowed, and regularly paid from the funds belonging to said board of levee commissioners, and the receipt warrant duly filed, and the payment of said sum audited and approved by the said levee commissioners. Said bond was delivered to said Williams, who was both the secretary and the treasurer of the said board, by the Ætna Indemnity Company. The said F. I. Williams failed to sign the bond, but he accepted the same as his official bond, and, in compliance with an act of the state legislature, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act to Incorporate the Board of Levee Commissioners for the Yazoo-Mississippi Delta and for Other Purposes," approved February 28, 1884, and "An Act to Change the Domicil of Said Board and for urer, or allowed to be made by others, by the use of the money of the state, be said to have come into his hands by virtue of his office? Money received by an officer by virtue of his office is money which that officer receives under the law of his office, not in violation of the law of his office, right of his office, not in wrong. In this case, the money received or made was by a wrongful use of the funds of the state; there was no virtue in it; it was wrongful, and a penalty was imposed for such wrong. There is no allegation that the treasurer had failed to perform the duties of his office; that he had misapplied or used the funds of the state; and that he had failed to account for and pay over any money that he had received by virtue of his office, whereby he became liable to the state; but the breach assigned is that the treasurer received himself, and permitted others to receive, from certain banks certain sums of money for and on account of the deposit of the funds of the state in those banks, it not being alleged that these deposits had been made under a contract between the banks and the treasurer, with the governor; so that this assignment is equivalent to alleging that the treasurer had received this money, and allowed others to receive money, by the use of the funds of the state himself and allowing others to use such funds. For such money so received by the treasurer, there can be no recovery on his official bond against him and his securities." It will be noted that in ADAMS v. WILLIAMS the receiving of the interest by the treasurer was held to be virtute officii, and attention is called to that case for the distinction made between it and the Renfro Case.

In Vansant v. State, 96 Md. 110, 53 Atl. 711, the court, after having decided that the clerk was responsible, turned to the question whether the surety on the bond was liable for the interest thus received, and in regard thereto it was said: "There was no law in this state prohibiting the clerk from depositing the public moneys received by him in the banks. On the contrary, as we said above, it might be assumed that it was contemplated that he would do so. When he thus deposited them, he did not only what he had the right to do, but what was clearly his duty to do, to put them in some safe place until he remitted to the treasurer, and there could perhaps be no safer place than banks of proper financial standing. He therefore not only received them, but deposited them in bank virtute officii, and, being of opinion that he was not the owner of them, such gains as attached to them by way of accretion or increment became a part of them, and must be accounted for to the state. It is true the law did not require him to place the money on interest, but it did not prohibit him from doing so, and, as he did, the interest should go with and become a part of the principal.

"This case does not present such questions as might arise if the clerk had used the money in speculation and earned profits in that way. That might be such a diversion of the public funds as would amount to embezzlement; but the receipt of this money was legal, and its deposit in bank was certainly not illegal, and everything up to that point, it must be admitted, was done virtute officii, and not merely colore officii. The deposits were not made in his individual capacity, but as

Other Purposes," approved January 19, 1886, said Williams filed said bond for record with the clerk of the chancery court of Coahoma county, and after the said bond had been regularly recorded, he, as secretary of the said board, received said bond and kept the same in its possession, among other records and papers belonging to said board, until the expiration of his term of office.

The original bill further alleged that, by virtue of said bond, which was ratified, accepted, and adopted by himself, he entered upon the discharge of the duties of the treasurer, and received the salary and compensation provided by law, and did not disclose to the board of levee commissioners the fact that his said bond had not been signed by himself; that said bond served as his official bond during his entire term of office, and was recognized and treated as such, by both Williams and the Aetna Indemnity Company, and the board of levee commissioners. The original bill further alleged that the said F. I. Williams deposited the money or funds belonging to said board of levee commissioners with various banking institutions; that the money was placed to his credit as treasurer of said board; that said banking institutions, with whom the said money was deposited or to whom it was loaned, paid to the said F. I. Williams interest on the public money so deposited; but, while the said Williams accounted to the said board for all moneys paid to him as treasurer by order of the board, he failed, neglected, and refused to account to the levee board for the money paid him as interest or commissions on the public funds. This interest he appropriated to his individual personal use, making no entry of the receipt thereof on the books of account, making no report thereof to the board of levee commissioners, and concealing from the said board the fact that he had received said interest. He never accounted to the board for the money so received by him, and now fails, neglects, and refuses to pay the sum over to the said board, or in any way to account for the same. These are the allegations of the bill which was demurred to; the demurrer, of course, admitting all the allegations of fact. The object of this suit was, of course, to compel Wil-a clerk, and the interest was paid on those deposits. He was required to do nothing more to earn it,—indeed, he claims he did not even have any agreement with the banks that interest should be paid, but they simply followed the custom with former clerks. Upon what principle then can it be said that it was not received by virtue of his office? It being so received, and the bond being comprehensive enough to include it, the surety is liable."

In State ex rel. Hanna v. Kimball, Wilson, Super. Ct. (Ind.) 174, it was held that where the loaning and depositing of public money by a state treasurer is made a felony, neither he nor his sureties is liable on the official bond for the failure to pay over interest acquired in violation of such law. The court said: "When all the funds which, by the terms of the law, are properly in the hands of the treasurer, have been fully accounted for and paid over, to hold the parties liable for other funds that have been acquired in violation of law, and in acquiring which the treasurer may be prosecuted in criminal actions, is extending the terms of the bond beyond anything that the parties could reasonably be held to contemplate at the time of its execution."

In Wilkes-Barre v. Rockafellow, 171 Pa. 177, 30 L.R.A. 393, 50 Am. St. Rep. 795, 33 Atl. 269, it was held that interest paid by a banker to himself as city treasurer, on money which he, in accordance with an agreement with the sinking fund commissioners, had borrowed from a fund in his custody, is held by him as "treasurer," and his failure to pay it over to his successor is a breach of his official bond.

treasurer conditioned, according to statute, that he would safely keep and faithfully disburse the school fund according to law, and pay such warrants as might be drawn on said fund by competent authority, would make the sureties upon such bond liable for any misappropriation of the school fund of any description, without reference to the source from which it might be derived, and therefore make them liable for the misappropriation by the treasurer of interest on bonds procured through the sale of school lands, or interest upon notes received for the purchase money of such lands.

The receiving by a state treasurer, for his private advantage, of interest upon state funds from banks with which the funds were deposited, was not an offense at common law. Re Breene, 14 Colo. 401, 24 Pac. 3.

A case of interest in this note, but not strictly in point, is New Haven v. Fresenius, 75 Conn. 145, 52 Atl. 823, where it was held that a city treasurer who, in contravention of a statute providing that all city funds shall be deposited in such bank or banks as shall be designated by the board of finance, deposits city funds in a bank which does not pay interest, when in fact the board of finance had designated as the depository an interest paying bank, is liable for the resulting damages to the city.

Another case equally interesting, but also not strictly in point, is Hamilton County v. Cunningham (Neb.) 127 N. W. 1060, holding that a county treasurer is not liable on his bond for interest which, because of his inability to find banks to take the public funds, he has been unable to collect.

liams to pay the board the moneys received by him as interest. To this original bill, Williams and the Aetna Indemnity Company filed separate and distinct demurrers. These demurrers were both submitted to the court below on one hearing, and are to be so considered by this court.

The questions presented for decision by these demurrers are as follows: First, are the matters involved in this allegation properly cognizable by a court of equity? Second, has the said revenue agent a right to maintain this suit, suing for the board of levee commissioners? Third, does the fact that the principal, Williams, failed to sign his official bond, render the instrument void as to the Aetna Indemnity Company, which did sign it? Fourth, if the bond in the case is void, does the chancery court lose its jurisdiction, or has it the power to determine the question as to the liability of the principal, without regard to the bond? Fifth, is the surety on this official bond liable for interest received on the public funds by the principal, Williams? Sixth, is the treasurer of the levee board required to pay into the treasury money received by him as interest on the funds intrusted to his keeping? We entertain no doubt whatever that, under § 161 of the Constitution, the chancery court had jurisdiction to try this case, it being a suit on the bond of Williams, a fiduciary and a public officer. Section 556 of the Code of 1906 is a re-script of § 161 of the Constitution of 1890. The proposition that the revenue agent is not the proper party to maintain this suit is answered completely by § 4730 of the Code of 1906, in which the duties of the revenue agent are described, and by which it is made the duty of the revenue agent to investigate the accounts of levee board officers, and to maintain suits against them. This power has been recognized by this court already. State Revenue Agent v. Hill, 70 Miss. 106, 11 So. 789.

Turning to one of the propositions now most seriously urged by the appellee to sustain the action of the court below, which sustained the demurrers and dismissed the bill, to wit, that the bond was void because Williams never signed it, we are clearly of the opinion that this contention cannot be maintained successfully under our statutes and decisions. It is to be noted that the surety in this case became such for a valuable consideration, $300 per annum. The case mainly relied on by the appellee is the case of State v. Martin, 56 Miss. 108. The case was decided in 1878 under the Revised Code of 1871. The Revised Code of 1880 materially changed the law regarding liability on official bonds. Section 403 of the Revised Code of 1880 provided the condition of official bonds, and then added that this provision was declaratory, only, and that a failure to observe the form therein prescribed should not vitiate any official bond, but that all official bonds should be valid and binding in whatever form they might be taken, whether in the proper penalty or without any penalty, whether correct or incorrect in their recitals of any kind, whether properly payable or not, and whether approved by the proper officer, or not approved at all, and whether irregular in any other respect whatever, if only such bonds should be delivered as the official bond of the officer and serve as such. This section expressly provided that such bonds should be obligatory on everyone who should subscribe them as such. This provision was not in the Revised Code of 1871. Section 403 of the Code of 1880 is § 3463 of the Code of 1906, and was § 3055 of the Code of 1892. The obvious purpose of the legislature in the passage of this section of the three Codes of 1880, 1892, and 1906, was to make an official bond binding on all who subscribed it, without regard to any irregularity whatever, and whether the instrument should be signed by the principal or not. This last point, which is conclusive of the contention here, was expressly held in Gloster v. Harrell, 77 Miss. 793, 23 So. 520, 941, 27 So. 609. This case is much stronger for appellants than the Gloster Case, in which also there was a demurrer, because in the Gloster Case it was admitted that the bond was not signed or adopted by the principal Ratchiff, and that he did not request the sureties to sign it, and that he did not even know that any of the sureties had signed it; whereas, in this case, the allegation, admitted by the demurrer, is that the Aetna Indemnity Company signed at the instance and request of Williams, and that Williams ratified and adopted the bond, and that he himself, for the board, paid the surety $300 per annum. The fact, therefore, that Williams failed to sign the bond is of no avail to the appellees.

It must be kept in mind that the bond in this case is a joint and several obligation, and this is an answer to several cases cited in brief of learned counsel for appellees; as for example, Sacramento v. Dunlap, 14 Cal. 421, and People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585, 82 Am. Dec. 758. The bonds in those two cases were joint, and not several, nor is the statute of California identical at all with our statute. Section 3463, of the Code of 1906. The liability of Williams as treasurer was fixed by the law, and was not affected by his failure to subscribe the bond. Under our statutes, the plain purpose of § 3463 in the Code of 1906 was to hold both the principal and the sureties on the official bonds liable without any regard to irregularities whatsoever, if only the bond served as the official bond during the term for which it was given. The purpose of the law was to declare emphatically that no official, and no surety on any official bond, should be relieved of liability thereupon, provided only that such bond was accepted, and that such bond served as the official bond intended by law. The statute is grounded in the highest possible considerations of justice and right. It is not to be tolerated that Mr. Williams, or the surety here, shall come into a court of conscience, when this official bond had served the same purpose precisely that the bond would have served had he signed it, and quibble about liability with the state or the levee board, whose treasurer he was and whose funds he handled. It comes with poor grace from the Ætna Indemnity Company,—this technical quibbling,—when it knew, or had every reason to know, that the bonds had not been signed by Williams, and when it was scrupulously careful to collect every year its $300 paid to it for its signature to the bond. There was not the slightest obstacle to its ascertaining the fact that Williams had not signed, by the exercise of the very slightest degree of care. We said, in the case of Gloster v. Harrell, and we reiterate now, that "it is not for the treasurer or his sureties, the money of the town being traced to his hands by other competent evidence, to find shelter under the absence of a mere receipt warrant, or the fact that his bond was approved by resolution instead of ordinance; neither he nor they can be heard to make such defense."

Another contention of learned counsel for appellees is that the bond is void because it contains conditions not prescribed by the statutes. In other words, because it contains the following conditions: "And it is further provided that the said surety shall not be liable to the obligee by reason of public moneys being now deposited, or hereafter placed or deposited with any bank depository or depositories it being the true intent and purpose of this bond to indemnify said obligee from any loss by reason of the personal acts only of said principal, to the extent of the penalty of this bond, subject to the terms, covenants and conditions thereof." But the bond had the proper condition, that said Williams "should properly account for and dispose of the money coming into his hands for the Yazoo-Mississippi Delta levee board, and should faithfully perform all other duties devolving upon him as such treasurer." The act of 1884 (Laws 1884, chap. 168), providing for the creation of the levee board and fixing the condition of this bond, provided that the treasurer should give bond "conditioned for the prompt and efficient discharge of the duties required by him, to be performed under the provisions of this act for the safe-keeping, accounting for, and paying over all moneys, property, or effects that may come into his custody." It is perfectly obvious that the condition of the bond as written is a substantial compliance with the condition prescribed above by the said act of 1884. The bond as executed had the condition the law required; and the addition to the condition of the bond, which we have hereinbefore set out, is mere surplusage. If the bond contained, as executed, the conditions which the law required, the sureties can neither add to, nor detract from, those conditions by anything they may choose to insert. The law fixed the liability of the treasurer and of the sureties, and the law prescribed the exact conditions on which liability should attach, and it is not for the principal nor for the sureties, nor for both, by any evasions or subtuges or adroit efforts to escape the law, to add anything that should have any effect on the conditions in the bond required by the law. The law declares all such surplus conditions absolutely void, and this is expressly laid down in the case of Johnson v. Erskine, 9 Tex. 1, cited by learned counsel for appellees. This case was decided after the case of Mays v. Lewis, 4 Tex. 1, and Lawton v. State, 5 Tex. 270. And in addition to all this, the express language of the § 3463 of the Code of 1906 ends all controversy along this line. So, as the conditions in the bond do not provide for the performance of an act in violation of the law, the form of the conditions is immaterial, provided only the bond served its office as his bond. In the case of State ex rel. Mitchell v. Smith, 87 Miss. 551, 40 So. 22, we said: "When one signs what purports and is intended to be an official bond, whether as principal, obligor, or surety, the law writes in all necessary recitals. No other interpretation of the statute can subsist without disturbing the whole governmental system, and ignoring the plain intentment of the legislative department." We think § 3463 applies to the bond of the levee treasurer as well as to all other official bonds, and it is immaterial as to whom the bond of the treasurer was payable, the state or the levee board. We held that this statute applied to a municipal treasurer, although his bond was payable to a municipality. Gloster v. Harrell, supra. There can be no sort of doubt, on any rational view, that this § 3463 of the Code of 1906 does apply to the bond of the treasurer of the levee board, and that such bond is an official bond, within the meaning of that section. See, in this connection, United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Union Trust & Sav. Co. 142 Ala. 532, 38 So. 177.

Consider for one moment the preposterousness of the claim of Williams and of his surety. This surety received the $300 per annum every year through Williams himself, as the secretary and treasurer of this board. Williams drew his salary regularly as such treasurer. He exercised full authority and control of the funds of this board, which were committed to his charge by virtue of this bond. In other words, from the beginning to the end of his term of office, he exercised in all respects the same authority and control over these funds, and in all other respects as treasurer, that he could possibly have exercised had he signed the bond, and had it been in absolutely perfect technical harmony with the statutes. He was bound to have known that he had not signed the bond, and, under the facts of this case, this surety company was also bound to have known that this bond had not been signed by Williams. To argue to the contrary is superficial to the last degree, and will not bear analysis.

Williams was both secretary and treasurer of this board. As secretary, he was the lawful custodian of all records, bonds, etc., belonging to said board. At his election, he applied to the Ætna Indemnity Company to become his surety. That company did so for a valuable consideration, and properly executed and delivered to Williams the bond. Upon receipt of this bond, Williams had it filed and recorded by the clerk of the chancery court of Coahoma county. When it was recorded, it was returned to him as secretary of the board, and was held by him until the expiration of his term of office. By authority of this bond, he collected his salary, received and controlled hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money, and enjoyed all the privileges of the office. Never once did he indicate to the board that he had failed to sign this bond. In the face of these facts it is worse than idle for either Williams or the surety company to attempt to escape liability on the ground that the bond was not signed by Williams. No such defenses will be tolerated in a court of conscience, on the facts in this record.

Since we hold that the bond was not void, it is, of course, unnecessary to discuss the question whether, if it had been void, and surety released, equity would have had any jurisdiction.

We come now, after disposing of these preliminary matters, to the real point in this case, the soul of the whole controversy, and that question is: Can Williams and his surety be held for the interest he received for the use of this money by the bank? The duty which the law—Act 1884, § 6—put upon Williams was, amongst other things, "to safely keep, account for, and pay over all moneys, property, or effects that might come into his custody as treasurer, under that act and by direction of said board, as said board might require or direct." This obligation the law wrote into his bond. In addition to the condition just above recited, it is further provided by § 6 of the act of 1884 (Laws 1884, p. 140, § 6) as follows: "In addition to the duties herein specifically required of him, it shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive, safely keep, and account for all moneys required to be paid to, or received by, him, by the provisions of this act or by the direction of said board; and all other moneys, property, and effects for which he is properly accountable as such treasurer." We think the necessary intendment of this concluding clause was to hold the treasurer liable for everything that might come into his hands by virtue of his office. The act first made him accountable for any money paid to him by virtue of any act of the legislature. It then made him accountable for all moneys which might come into his hands in the usual way, and then, out of abundance of caution, this last clause was added, providing that he should be liable for all other moneys for which he, as such treasurer, might be accountable.

The appellees contend that the interest collected by Williams came into his hands colore officii, that he got it as a result of wrongdoing, and that the surety cannot be held liable therefor, any more than the surety could be held liable for the act of the treasurer in robbing a bank or holding up a train. This court disposed of this contention as applied to the facts in this case in the following language in Lewis v. State, 65 Miss. 468, 4 So. 429: "There is much refinement and quibbling in the books in behalf of sureties on official bonds, who are sought to be held responsible for the misconduct of their principal, as to whether the act of the officer was done colore officii, or virtute officii. . . . While the liability of sureties is not to be extended beyond the terms of their engagement, the public is entitled to some consideration as well as the voluntary sponsors of unfaithful public officers, and it must be true that if an officer, under bond to faithfully discharge the duties of his office does an act as such officer injurious to the county or to others, in regard to a subject over which he has jurisdiction and control, his sureties cannot escape responsibility for the act no matter by what technical name it may be called."

In the same case, it is said, at page 472 of 65 Miss., speaking of the circuit clerk: "Construed according to its manifest scope and legal import, and with reference to the subject-matter to which it relates, the bond was a contract by which Bracey and his sureties covenanted and agreed, in effect, not only that he would faithfully perform the duties enjoined by law, but that he would not, by virtue or under color of his office, commit any illegal act, to the injury of the county or others. Indemnity to this extent is within the terms of the bond and the contemplation of the law which required it to be given." Again, in the same case, at page 473 of 65 Miss., the following passage is quoted with approval from the case of the People v. Treadway, 17 Mich. 480: "If such an officer is to be regarded as acting unofficially whenever he violates his duty, it is not easy to see what object there can be in requiring official bonds. They are not meant to be mere formalities, and they can only be made to secure against the consequences of some sort of misdoings. Their object is to obtain indemnity against the use of an official position for wrong purposes, and that which is done under color of office, and which would obtain no credit except from its appearing to be a regular official act, is within the protection of the bond and must be made good by those who signed it." We think this quotation states the principle which is the soul of the whole controversy on this subject. Neither the officer nor his sureties can be liable while he has violated no law; and if it is to be held that the mere fact that he has, in his official capacity, violated some law, constitutes the release of the sureties, then the very object for which the bond was given fails, and there had just as well be no bond at all.

The argument here, in large part, is that, because § 29 of the acts of 1884, approved February 28, 1884, made it a misdemeanor for anyone intrusted with the custody or disposition of any money intrusted to his care by virtue of his office, to use such money for his own benefit, therefore, the sureties are not liable if the treasurer violates this section; and this contention has two branches: First, that the condition of the bond itself is, as provided by law (§ 3463 of the Code of 1906), that official bonds shall be valid except "so far as they may be conditioned for the performance of acts in violation of the laws of the state;" and, second, "that it never could have been within the contemplation of the sureties that they should become liable for the acts of Williams, the treasurer, which amounted 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) to a violation of any law." So far as the first proposition is concerned, it has no application to the condition of the bond involved. Of course, if there was a condition in the bond providing for the violation of some law, the condition would be utterly illegal, and sureties would not be bound for a violation of such condition. This is not that sort of case. There is no statute prohibiting the treasurer from depositing the funds in a bank, nor was there any statute prohibiting his contracting for interest, provided he had done what he ought to have done, contracted for the interest to be paid to the levee board, which owned the money. The treasurer, in depositing the money in the bank, deposited it by virtue of his office, under authority of his office, and was fully within the right and law of his office, in so doing. His wrong consisted in abusing that power by making the interest payable to himself instead of to his principal, whose money he had loaned. The Renfroe Case, infra, decided in Georgia, is wholly unlike this case in this respect, on its facts, though we do not desire to be understood as approving the principle of that case in any respect.

As to the second proposition above, that it was not within the contemplation of the sureties in this case that they should become liable for an act of Williams in violation of the law, the answer is that the surety company accepted it with the knowledge of the law as set forth in § 6 and § 29 of the act of 1884 (Laws 1884, p. 140). Section 6 provided that the treasurer should execute a bond "for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, and also conditioned for the prompt and efficient discharge of the duties required of him to be performed under the provisions of this act, and for the safe-keeping, accounting for, and paying over all moneys, property, and effects that may come into his custody and possession under this act and by direction of said board, as said board might require; and it contained this further provision: "In addition to the duties herein specifically required of him, it shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive, safely keep, and account for all moneys required to be paid to, or received by, him, by the provisions of this act or by the direction of said board; and all other moneys, property, and effects for which he is properly accountable as such treasurer." The surety knew, when it signed the bond, that this was the law of the bond, and that Williams was, by the conditions aforesaid last recited, especially required to account for all other moneys for which he was properly accountable as treasurer, and to pay over to the board all moneys required to be paid over by the law.

These moneys coming into his hands, were the money and property of the board, and not his money, and the interest, which was a mere accretion on this money, was payable, like the property to which it was an accretion, to the board whose property the same was. Because thereof, the surety knew of these conditions in the bond, and because these conditions required the treasurer to pay over all increments on the fund to the levee board as well as the principal, this defense is unsound. The act of Williams in depositing the money in the bank was legal, and an act done virtute officii; the abuse being his applying the interest to his individual use in violation of § 29. The case of State v. Harney, 57 Miss. 863, and of Adams v. Saunders, 89 Miss. 784, 119 Am. St. Rep. 720, 42 So. 602, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 327, are direct authorities in support of this proposition, that the act of Williams in taking this interest for his own use was an illegal act, done however, by virtue of his office, and an act that could not have been done except by virtue of his office, and because he was such treasurer and handled this vast sum of money. What all the world knew, this court certainly knows, to wit: That the moneys which Mr. Williams deposited in the bank came from and through the levee board, whose property the money was.

One of the authorities chiefly relied on by the counsel for the appellees to show that the act of Williams in this case in taking the interest payable to himself was done colore officii, but not virtute officii, is the case of State, Allen, Prosecutor, v. Conover, 28 N. J. L. 224, 78 Am. Dec. 54, in which it was gravely held that a sheriff who, having an execution against A, levied upon the property of B, was not thereby guilty of a breach of his official bond, and that his sureties were not liable. Such nonsense as this has long since been exploded by the march of modern jurisprudence. Mr. Freeman, in his note to this case, at pages 64 and 65, states that the weight of authority clearly shows the contrary proposition from that laid down in the principal case, to be the law. There can be no rational doubt, on the allegations of this bill, that this money of the levee board was loaned by Williams, as treasurer, under and by virtue of his office, and because he was such officer, and the argument that it was not so done is wholly unsatisfactory on principle or sound authority. But the learned counsel for the appellees have two other contentions upon which they earnestly insist: First, "that Mr. Williams was an absolute insurer of all levee board money which came into his possession or under his control by virtue of his office, and therefore was not liable to account to his principal for this interest." And second, that the legal title to all moneys which thus came into his possession vested in him as an individual, and that, being an insurer of such money, the relationship of debtor and creditor immediately arose between him and the levee board, and therefore he was only legally liable to account for the exact amount so received by him, and not any interest.

The leading authority in support of these views is the case of the State v. Walsen, 17 Colo. 170, 15 L.R.A. 456, 28 Pac. 1119. Indeed, this is the only case directly in support of these views. The states of Indiana, Kentucky, Colorado, and the territory of New Mexico, in effect, sustain this doctrine, resting their decisions, however, not on general principle wholly, but upon their particular statutes. The Georgia case (Renfroe v. Colquitt, 74 Ga. 618) rested in part upon a special statute, but may be classed as substantially supporting this view. All the authorities along this line are reviewed in the case of McFetridge, 84 Wis. 473, 20 L.R.A. 223, 54 N. W. 1, 098, and this whole line of reasoning repudiated as utterly unsound. The courts of the states of New York, Ohio, and the territory of Oklahoma, and Wisconsin, held the direct opposite of the Colorado supreme court, and, after a most careful examination and comparison of these conflicting authorities, we announce our approval of the doctrine of the McFetridge Case, and our repudiation of the doctrine of the court of Colorado as announced in the Walsen Case. See Richmond County v. Wandel, 6 Lans. 33; Eshelby v. Cincinnati Bd. of Edu. 66 Ohio St. 71, 63 N. E. 586; Thompson v. Territory, 10 Okla. 409, 62 Pac. 355; McFetridge Case, supra. And see also specially United States v. Mosby, 133 U. S. 273, 33 L. ed. 625, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, in which the United States Supreme Court approves the doctrine of the McFetridge Case. The Supreme Court of the United States said that the moneys in that case were public moneys, and that any interest on them was an increment belonging to the owner of the funds, the government, and it expressly stated that, whilst the counsel in that case was not required to put the funds out at interest, yet, if in fact he did, the accretion belonged to the government. The supreme court of New York, in the Wandel Case, supra, said very pertinently: "The notion that a public officer may keep back interest which he has received upon a deposit of public moneys, as a perquisite of office, is an affront to law and morals [and such act] . . . is nothing less than embezzlement." The great underlying principle here is that the interest on this money logically, legally, and necessarily belongs to whoever owns the money. The use of that money earns the interest. The interest is a mere increment to the principal fund, and it is impossible, on any clear thinking in logic or in law, to escape the conclusion that the interest is necessarily payable to the owner of the principal fund. Whenever, therefore, the question is settled as to who owns the principal fund, all the rest follows without difficulty. Nothing more is necessary to show who is the owner of this fund than a reading of our statutes. Always and everywhere, public money is referred to and treated as the property of the state or the county, or the levee board, etc., etc. In no just legal sense can it be possible to say that the treasurer, Williams, was the owner of this money; that he had the legal title to this money in the sense that the money was his absolutely. He is the custodian of the money. He handles the money, he deals with it, but he has the custody, he handles it, deals with it for and on account of his principal, the levee board. The money is the money of the levee board. If Williams died, the money would not go to the administrators of his estate as Williams's money. It would pass into the hands of his administrator temporarily only; but it is made the statutory, legal duty of his administrator to promptly pay over the money to the proper authorities. Sections 3485 and 3486 of the Code of 1906. See Fogg v. Bank of Friar's Point, 80 Miss. 750, 32 So. 285, a case which supports the appellant, not the appellee, and shows that the money is the property of the levee board.

It is a very singular confusion of mind into which some courts have fallen, when they say, as is argued for appellee, that, if an officer is absolutely bound as an insurer, therefore any interest which he receives on the money is his, and not the state's. As well remarked by Judge Newman, quoted in the McFetridge Case: Nobody ever heard of the claim that a common carrier, by reason of its absolute liability, became the owner of the goods it carried. And in the main case (84 Wis., at page 517) the court says: "While such absolute liability of the treasurer will be assumed for the purposes of the case, it seems to us that no such conclusion necessarily results therefrom. The treasurer may well be held liable absolutely for all moneys of the state coming to his hands, and be held liable also for interest on the deposits in question. Stated in another form, such absolute liability does not necessarily estop the state to maintain that such interest was received by the treasurer by virtue of his office, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) belongs to his office." And this we think is plainly sound. It is a complete non sequitur to say that, because Williams was an absolute insurer, therefore the interest belonged to him. The two principles have no relation whatever to each other. Once settled clearly and definitely whose money the principal sum was, and the interest necessarily belongs to that person as an increment to the principal fund, and to argue to the contrary is simply to lose one's self in a metaphysical fog of sophistry, failing to give effect to the central principle of right and justice making the interest the property of the party who owned the principal sum. As said by the court in the case of McFetridge again: "It has already been held herein that the public funds were lawfully deposited by Treasurer McFetridge with the banks, and that he lawfully received from such banks compensation by way of interest for the use of such deposits." Under those circumstances, and in the absence of any statute separating the interest from the funds and diverting it to other uses, such interest was an accretion or increment to the fund, thus becoming a part of it, and logically and necessarily belongs to the owner of the fund, to wit, the state.

It is immaterial that the treasurer stipulated for interest on the deposits, or that the banks paid him such interest, or that both the treasurer and the banks thought he should retain the interest as his own, believing that he was entitled thereto. Such intention and belief cannot affect the ownership of the interest, or its essential character as a portion of the public funds in the hands of the treasurer. Notwithstanding such intention and belief, the interest was, in fact, paid to the said treasurer, and belonged to his said office, within the meaning and intention of the bond in suit. A lawful act cannot be rendered unlawful merely because the actors intended to follow it by an unlawful act. So, when the treasurer lawfully received money which of right belonged to his office, he received it by virtue of his office, and cannot, by forming and executing an intention to retain the money as his own, devert the act of receiving the money of its official character. It remains that he received it virtute officii. In the light of these principles, the contentions above referred to by the learned counsel for the appellee all fall to the ground. In the Furlong Case, 58 Miss. 717, the act was illegal. The act there of depositing the money was not illegal, and the citation of the Furlong Case is beside the mark. In the Eshelby Case, supra, it was said: "It does not necessarily follow [from the absolute liability of the treasurer] that funds coming into the hands of the treasurer are his, nor that upon the receipt of money in his official capacity the relation of debtor and creditor is established between him and the district. To the contrary, it is quite clear that instead of being the debtor of the district, he is its treasurer, the custodian of its funds, and that he acquires custody of the funds without acquiring title to them."

Speaking of its own statutes, which for this purpose are just as our own, the court, in the McFetridge Case, supra, says: "From beginning to end, they are entirely inconsistent with the theory that the legislature intended by the enactment of any of them to vest the state treasurer with the legal ownership of the public moneys which come to his hands, thus making him merely the debtor of the state in respect thereto. If such were his relation to the state, it would be difficult to show that such funds were not subject to be seized for his debts, or, in case of the death of the treasurer in office, that the same would not go to his administrator as part and parcel of his estate; the state being, perhaps, a preferred creditor. It is inconceivable that any legislature could intend such results, and there is nothing in any statute which forces the conclusions that they did so. A close analysis of the above statutes, or any extended discussion of them, is quite unnecessary, for a perusal of them is sufficient to carry conviction to the mind that the legislature never intended to divest the state of its title to the public funds in the hands of its treasurer, and the consequent control over those funds which results from ownership thereof."

The learned counsel on both sides in this case have filed briefs of signal ability, showing the most exhaustive research. It follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrers of the defendant Williams and the defendant the Ætna Indemnity Company. These decrees are therefore both reversed, both demurrers overruled, and the cause remanded, with leave to answer within thirty days from the filing of the mandate in the court below.

Per Curiam: The above is adopted as the opinion of the court.

Reversed and remanded.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JAMES SMITH, Appt.,
v.

W. E. FIELDS.

(— Ky. —, 129 S. W. 325.)

False Imprisonment—advice of attorney—bias.
30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

1. Advice by an attorney to his client during a trial, that an adverse witness is guilty of false swearing, is not so unbiased as to justify the client in acting upon it in procuring the arrest of the witness for such offense.

Same—suppression of facts.

2. Advice by a reputable attorney that a witness was guilty of false swearing will not constitute probable cause to justify the securing of a warrant for his arrest, if all the facts bearing upon the question were not stated to the attorney.

(June 17, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fleming County entered on a directed verdict for defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas D. Slattery and Paul Heflin, for appellant:

Advice of counsel is not a defense to an action unless the facts are fully and fairly laid before the counsel.

Gatz v. Harris, 134 Ky. 550, 121 S. W. 462.

A party who consults an attorney at law in regard to his legal right to bring an action against another, when the attorney is interested in the subject-matter of the suit, and known by him to be so interested when consulted, cannot show the opinion of the attorney as a probable cause for bringing the suit, although the opinion is honestly given.

Newell, Malicious Prosecution, p. 314; Bartlett v. Hawley, 38 Minn. 308, 37 N. W. 580.

Messrs. J. H. Powers and O. R. Bright for appellee.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by appellant for damages for the malicious prosecution of him without probable cause. The facts leading up to the prosecution of appellant occurred, in substance, as follows: Dr. J. J. Cook in his lifetime owned a farm adjoining appellee's. There was a division fence between the farms, which was erected before either Cook or appellee became the owners of their respective places. This fence had become somewhat dilapidated, and Cook tore half of it down, and put up a wire fence. Two or three years after this, appellee instituted an action in the Mason county quarterly court against Cook's exexecutrices, he having died, for the value of the rails thus removed by Cook, appellee claiming that the whole fence belonged to him. The executrices answered, and denied the claim of appellee, and filed a counterclaim for $150 in damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the failure of appellee to erect a fence on his half of the line; that, by reason of such failure, appellee's stock went over the old fence and destroyed Cook's crops. The main issue was as to who owned the fence. The representatives of Cook claimed that it was a partnership fence, and appellee claimed that it was his. Cook purchased his land from Betsy Browning, and appellee, Fields, bought his from W. J. Hendrick. It was conceded by the parties that Hendrick erected the fence, and for that reason appellee claimed the whole of it. The representatives claimed that Hendrick erected the fence under a contract with Mrs. Browning by which she became a one-half owner thereof. Appellant in this action was introduced as a witness in that action in behalf of Cook's representatives. He testified that he lived upon and worked the Browning farm for many years; that Mrs. Browning asked him to see Mr. Hendrick about rebuilding this fence; that the old fence had rotted down and the line grown up in briers and bushes; that he saw Mr. Hendrick and he agreed to rebuild the fence upon condition that she would have the old fence removed and the briers and bushes cleared away, which was agreed to; that he, the witness, cleared away the briers and bushes and removed the old fence, and that Mr. Hendrick built the fence; that the work was done within a few weeks after the agreement was made with Mr. Hendrick. For the purpose of showing that no such conversation occurred between the witness and Mrs. Browning and that no contract was made with Hendrick, as stated, appellee testified in that case and also in the one at bar, that Betsy Browning died in the fall of the year 1891, and that the fence was built by Hendrick in the year 1892. He introduced a record, a copy of the petition filed in March, 1892, for the purpose of settling Mrs. Browning's estate, in which it was alleged that Mrs. Browning departed this life in the year 1891. He introduced another witness, at least in this case, who testified that he built the fence for Mr. Hendrick in the year 1892, and fixed the date of the birth of one of his children. It appears that two or three other witnesses testified in the Mason quarterly court that the fence was erected by Hendrick in the lifetime of Mrs. Browning, and that one or two colored men built it. Several witnesses testified in this action to the same effect. It appears that the trial in the Mason quarterly court resulted against the claim of appellee, and Cook's representatives recovered on their counterclaim. Appellee appealed from that judgment, and on the day he did this he made an affidavit before a justice of the peace in that county, and obtained a warrant of arrest against appellant for false swearing in that he testified to a conversation with Mrs. Browning at a time when she was dead. Appellant was arrested in Fleming county, placed in jail there for a few hours, and then carried to Mason county and placed in jail until he could execute bond, which he did within a few hours thereafter. He waived an examining trial. The grand jury heard the evidence, but failed to indict him.

At the conclusion of the evidence in this case, the court gave the jury a peremptory instruction in behalf of appellee. The propriety of this instruction is the only question necessary to be considered. It will be observed from the above statement of facts that a sharp issue was made by the testimony, as to whether or not appellee had probable cause for having the warrant of arrest issued. If, in fact, Hendrick erected the fence in 1892, then appellee had probable cause to believe that appellant had sworn falsely and corruptly to the alleged conversation with Mrs. Browning; but, on the other hand, such may not be the case if the fence was erected in the lifetime of Mrs. Browning. We are of the opinion that the court did not give the instruction upon this ground, however, but upon the testimony which we will now consider. Appellee testified that, before causing the warrant to issue, he submitted the facts to an attorney who represented him in the case in the Mason county quarterly court, and also to a reputable attorney in Flemingsburgh, and they advised him that he had probable cause for the issual of the warrant. The attorney of Mason county testified that he represented appellee in the quarterly court trial, heard the evidence, and told appellee, during the trial, that Smith, appellant, was guilty of false swearing, but did not remember that he advised the issual of the warrant. He admitted that he had said to the attorneys for appellant about the time or before this action was brought that he had advised appellee against having the warrant issued. He also testified that he had a contract with appellee for a fee, whereby he was to get $10 either way the case was decided, and $15 if he won the case. The law is that, when a party institutes a prosecution on the advice of counsel properly obtained, the proof of such advice is a defense to an action like this. We do not mean to impune the motives of this attorney, but we are of the opinion that the advice given in the way it was and under the circumstances related did not show as a matter of law that it was given by a wholly disinterested and unbiased attorney, and was given during the excitement of the trial. His advice under the circumstances did not authorize the lower court to give the peremptory instruction. The other attorney consulted was a reputable lawyer in Flemingsburgh, Kentucky. Appellee testified that he did not remember whether or not he told this attorney all the facts testified to on the trial in the Mason quarterly court with reference to the issue above named; nor was the attorney able to state what facts appellee told him, but remembered that he told him what appellant testified and about obtaining a copy of the petition in the suit to settle Mrs. Browning's estate, and that appellee told him that the fence was erected in 1892, and, upon these facts, he gave it as his opinion that appellant had sworn falsely. He did not remember, however, that he advised the issue of the warrant.

In the case of Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 299, 36 S. W. 521, this court said: "Before bringing the action against Langston, Lancaster consulted a competent attorney, and, as he claimed, laid all the facts before him, who advised him that he had a cause of action and was entitled to the remedy pursued. Lancaster claims that he acted in good faith upon the advice which his counsel gave him. It was proper for the court to submit the question to the jury as to whether he obtained such advice from counsel, and as to whether he obtained it fairly and in good faith, acted upon it." In the case of Gatz v. Harris, 134 Ky. 550, 121 S. W. 462, the court said: "Advice of counsel is not a defense in an action for malicious prosecution unless the facts are fully and fairly laid before the counsel. If the real facts are not laid before the counsel, his opinion is no defense to an action for malicious prosecution. Crawford v. Keyser, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 693; Burke v. Rhodes, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 431; Anderson v. Columbia Finance & T. Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1790, 50 S. W. 40; Ahrens & O. Mfg. Co. v. Hoeher, 106 Ky. 692, 51 S. W. 194. In addition to this, the advice of counsel will constitute probable cause only when reasonable diligence is used to learn the facts on which the advice of counsel is sought. In the case last referred to, the court said: 'He who consults an attorney about a matter affecting a third person ought to use that care which men of ordinary prudence would ordinarily use in matters of like magnitude. Less than this would not show good faith. Of course, it is absolutely necessary in questions of this sort that people should act upon the advice of counsel; but they must exercise, in 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

doing so, reasonable care to get the truth before the counsel.' Upon the evidence it was a question for the jury whether Dr. Harris laid the facts fully and fairly before his counsel, and whether he had used reasonable diligence to learn what the actual facts were when he laid the matter before his counsel. The advice of counsel, when properly obtained, is a defense to an action like this, however erroneous the advice may be." Under the facts of this case and the authorities cited, the court erred in giving the peremptory instruction.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Chancery in complainant's favor in a suit to rescind a contract and to recover the amount which had been paid thereon. Reversed.

Statement by Garrison, J.:

By a deed dated July 1, 1908, which was acknowledged and recorded on July 9, 1908, the appellants conveyed to Kate Faulkner, the respondent, a house and lot in the town of Irvington, subject to certain restrictions that were set forth at length in the deed, and which the grantee had been told by the grantors were also set forth in all deeds previously made for lots in the same tract. On the following day—i. e., July 10, 1908—Albert Faulkner, the husband of the grantee, who attended to the business for his wife, learned that this statement was untrue, and at once spoke to the vendors about it, intimating that he could make trouble, to which their reply was to "go ahead." The case shows that by August 1, 1908, at the latest, the grantee was fully aware of the falsity of her vendors' statement and of all the facts upon which her right to elect to rescind the sale arose. No election to rescind was made until Mrs. Faulkner filed her present bill announcing such election and offering to deliver back the property with certain additions and improvements contract of purchase. If he elect the latter remedy, he must rescind promptly, and thereafter consistently adhere to that course. It is fatal to the right to rescind unreasonably to delay taking steps to that end, or thereafter to treat the property as his own, or recognize the validity and binding effect of the contract. *Boyce v. In Grymes v. Sanders, supra, Mr. Justice Swayne thus stated the rule: "Where a party desires to rescind upon the ground of mistake or fraud, he must, upon discovery of the facts, at once announce his purpose and adhere to it. If he be silent and continue to treat the property as his own, he will be held to have waived the objection, and will be conclusively bound by the contract, as if the mistake or fraud had not occurred. He is not permitted to play fast and loose. Delay and vacillation are fatal to the right which had before subsisted."

In Knight v. Houghtalling, supra, the rule was thus stated: "He who would rescind a contract to which he has become a party must offer to do so promptly on discovering the facts that will justify a rescission, and while he is able of himself, or with the aid of the court, to place the opposite party substantially in statu quo; he must not only act promptly upon the first discovery of the fraud, if fraud be the cause assigned for the rescission asked, but he must act decidedly, so that his vendor may certainly know his purpose, and thereby have the opportunity afforded him to assent to the rescission, resume the property, and look out for another purchaser. In no case is he permitted to rescind when made by her, for which repayment was demanded of the vendors in the following paragraph of the bill:

"Acting upon the faith of such representations, your orator changed her position, and did pay and lay out necessarily the following payments, repairs, and expenses in good faith upon the property so purchased by your orator, to wit: Cash paid for house and lot $3,600, extra ground purchased to one side as part of same transaction $175, building $175, grading, sodding, hedges, and clothes poles $20, wood-bin shelves and benches in cellar $25, staining floor $35, window screens and doors $75, awnings $75, window shades $25, carpet (fitted to rooms) $250, hose connections $10, moving into house from Jersey City and prospective moving out $100, connecting gas stove $5, time and labor making repairs and alterations $150, fence across extra ground $10, ground and porch chairs $10, water meter $14, making a total of $5,154 paid out by your orator in purchase and establishing her family in and upon said lot and house, in addition to which your orator has been damaged and put to trouble and expense and time, lost opportunities of getting other residence property at a reasonable figure, and has been otherwise damaged and incommoded by reason of having been unsuccessful (by reason of fraud) in establishing herself and family in a neighborhood where the adjoining and other lots are fully restricted; and in being compelled to break up and move elsewhere."

he has continued to treat with his vendor upon the basis of the contract, after his discovery of the fraud practised upon him; and neither is it allowed him to rescind in part and to affirm in part, but if done at all, it must be done in toto."

In Richardson v. Lowe, supra, it was said: "Rescission of a contract on the ground of fraud is not a mental process undisclosed and unacted upon. It requires affirmative action immediately on its discovery. Some overt act and outward manifestation of the intention to clearly apprise the other party to the contract of the right asserted."

In Precious Blood Soc. v. Elsythe, supra, the court asserted that promptitude on the part of a purchaser of real estate, in order to rescind the purchase, was required; and added that once having disaffirmed, that course must be adhered to; vacillation is fatal to the right. A vendee cannot disaffirm and affirm. If he does any material act with knowledge of the fraud, which assumes that the transaction is valid, he will be presumed to have waived the fraud.

II. Mere delay.

a. In general.

The right of rescission may be lost to a purchaser of real estate by his failure to manifest an election to disaffirm the contract within a reasonable time after discovery of grounds therefor. What constitutes a reasonable time is determined from the circumstances of the case. Generally undue and unnecessary delay in exercising the power of rescission is evidence of an election to treat the sale as valid, and may, where not explained, be conclusive against the purchaser's right of rescission, especially where he is in possession of the real estate. Orendorff v. Tallman, supra; Coleman v. First Nat. Bank, 115 Ala. 307, 22 So. 84 (seven years); Southern P. R. Co. v. Choate, 132 Cal. 278, 64 Pac. 292 (seven years); Evans v. Duke, 140 Cal. 22, 73 Pac. 732 (four years); Brown v. Gordon-Tiger Min. & Reduction Co. 44 Colo. 311, 97 Pac. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

1042 (twenty-one months); Dishrow v. Jones, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 102 (several months); Hunt v. Blanton, 89 Ind. 38 (five months); Lewis v. Brookdale Land Co. 124 Mo. 672, 28 S. W. 324 (six months); Cox v. Montgomery, 36 Ill. 396 (eighteen months); Dundee Mortg. & T. Invest. Co. v. Goodman, 36 Or. 453, 60 Pac. 3 (over three years); Smith v. Detroit & D. Gold Min. Co. 17 S. D. 413, 97 N. W. 17 (fifteen months); Hagan v. Taylor, 110 Va. 9, 65 S. E. 487 (eighteen years); Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 32, 27 S. E. 831 (two years,—in the meantime innocent third person had acquired purchaser's note for purchase price); Thomas v. McCue, 19 Wash. 287, 53 Pac. 161 (five years); Williams v. Maxwell, 45 W. Va. 297, 31 S. E. 909 (three years); Akerly v. Vilas, 21 Wis. 88.

The effect of delay on the right of rescission was given considerable attention by the court in Wicks v. Smith, 21 Kan. 412, 30 Am. Rep. 433, which, however, involved the right of a vendor of real estate to rescind for fraud practised upon him by the purchaser. The question as to the effect of delay was, however, considered as applicable to that right generally, without reference to which party of the contract was seeking to exercise it. On this point the court said: "It is generally true that where anything of value has been received by the defrauded party, he must not only tender back all he has received, but the rescission must be prompt or within a reasonable time after the fraud is discovered; but mere delay in rescinding the fraudulent contract does not take away the right,—such delay being material principally as it furnishes evidence of an election to affirm." As sustaining this proposition, the court also quotes with approval from Clough v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 26, as follows: "In such cases the question is, Has the person on whom fraud was practised, having notice of the fraud, elected not to avoid the contract, or has he elected to avoid it, or has he made no election? We think that so long as he has made no election, he retains the right to determine it either way, subject to this, that if, in the

The decree of the court below was that the complainant was entitled to the relief sought for, and that "the prayer of her bill be and the same is hereby granted," that the sale be rescinded, and that the defendants repay to the complainant the purchase price with interest, and, in addition thereto, a further sum for improvements and so forth, to be ascertained by a reference to a master. From this decree the defendants have appealed.

The following is the opinion of Howell, V. C. (orally):

"This bill is filed by Mrs. Faulkner, the wife of Alfred Faulkner, against John Wassmer and Henry M. Radcliffe, for the purpose of rescinding a deed of conveyance of lands on Smith street, in the village of interval whilst he is deliberating, an innocent third party has acquired an interest in the property, or, if, in consequence of his delay, the position of the wrongdoer is affected, it will preclude him from exercising his right to rescind. Lapse of time without rescinding would furnish evidence that the defrauded party has determined to affirm the contract, and when the lapse of time is great, it probably would in practice be treated as conclusive evidence to show that he has so determined."

While the two cases immediately preceding state the general rule applicable alike to proceedings by a defrauded party to a contract, whether relating to realty or personalty, to rescind, as affected by his delay, it should be remembered, in applying this general principle to the right of a purchaser of real estate to rescind, that generally he is in possession of the real estate and receiving the fruits and benefits therefrom, and, hence, it is his duty promptly to exercise the right after obtaining knowledge of the facts authorizing it.

It is of the essence of the right of rescission that prompt action to that end be taken by the purchaser after obtaining knowledge of the facts upon which he relies for that relief (Evans v. Duke, supra); such right must not be slept upon. Prompt action is essential (Slothower v. Oak Ridge Land Co. 2 Va. Dec. 506, 27 S. E. 406); an unreasonable delay in rescinding after knowledge of the fraud is a waiver of the right (Leiker v. Henson [Tenn.] 41 S. W. 862); rescission will not be granted a purchaser of real estate guilty of inexcusable delay in seeking relief (Hagan v. Taylor, supra); he must rescind as soon as he discovers the defect; otherwise he will be deemed to have waived his right to do so (Owen v. Pomona Land & Water Co. 131 Cal. 530, 63 Pac. 850, 64 Pac. 253); and he must show that he has exercised reasonable diligence in ascertaining the facts and in seeking his remedy after discovery of the fraud (Patten v. Stewart, 24 Ind. 332).

But mere delay of three and one-half months, where possession of land is not taken by the purchaser and there is no

Irvington. The deed was dated on the 1st day of July, 1908, was acknowledged on the 9th day of July, 1908, and was recorded on the same day. It conveys to Mrs. Faulkner a lot of land on Smith street subject to certain restrictions which are fully set out in the deed, and are fully copied in the bill of complaint. The evidence shows that Mr. Faulkner first saw the land in question about the 4th day of May, 1908, and that within a day or two after that he saw Mr. States, who is a real-estate agent, and who was specially authorized by Mr. Wassmer and Mr. Radcliffe to make sales of the lands in question. The bill charges that Mr. Wassmer and Mr. Radcliffe were partners in the enterprise, although the lands which they were disposing of were held in severalty proof of any change of conditions which will make a rescission inequitable, does not constitute a waiver. Lightcap v. Nicola, 34 Pa. Super. Ct. 189.

Where the purchaser of real estate was a stranger and a resident of another state at the time he discovered that the title to the property was not as represented, and at that time yellow fever was prevalent in the locality of the land, a delay of about seven months is not a waiver of his right to rescind. Orendorff v. Tallman, 90 Ala. 441, 7 So. 821.

A delay of about three years is not a waiver of the right to rescind, where the purchaser rescinded as soon as he had knowledge of the fraud practised upon him, and it did not appear that the rights of third parties had intervened, nor the position of the vendor substantially changed. Grosh v. Ivanhoe Land & Improv. Co. 95 Va. 161, 27 S. E. 841.

A delay of about four years after entering into possession of the purchased land does not constitute a waiver of the right to rescind for fraudulent representations as to the quantity thereof, where the offer to rescind was made within eight months after the purchaser had caused a survey of the land to be made, and thus for the first time obtained accurate knowledge of the fraud. Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 Pac. 96.

A delay of six months is not unreasonable where it does not appear that the fraud was sooner discovered. Concord Bank v. Gregg, 14 N. H. 331.

What is a reasonable time or undue delay in rescinding a contract for purchase of real estate, where the facts are not in dispute, is a question of law for the court; of course, when the facts are in dispute, the question is for the jury. Davis v. Stuard, 99 Pa. 295.

b. When delay excused.

1. Dismissal of prior suit.

Delay in rescinding a purchase of real estate by the purchaser does not always by them. Mr. Faulkner had notice that the lands were restricted. He saw a large sign on one of the lots near the corner of Smith street and Clinton avenue, which contained the information that the land in that neighborhood was restricted land. In order to ascertain what the restrictions were, he went to see Mr. States, who showed him a typewritten copy of the restrictions, and stated to him that the land in that neighborhood was restricted in that manner; and Mr. Faulkner says in addition to that that Mr. States told him that the restrictions were matters of record. Some days after that, one evening while Mr. and Mrs. Faulkner and their daughter were examining the premises, Mr. Wassmer appeared, and there was still further conversation about the restrictions, and on those occasions, one or more of them, the extent of the tract of land owned by them and so restricted was talked about, and the extent and area of the restrictions discussed. The evidence indicates to my mind that probably Mr. Wassmer and Mr. Radcliffe intended to restrict the whole tract by a general scheme which was embodied in the typewritten statement that they gave to Mr. States to show to intending purchasers. Now that was the situation at the time that Mr. Faulkner paid the first $25. That I think was on the 5th day of May, 1908, and Mr. Faulkner is chargeable with notice of restrictions of some sort or other by the receipt which he took at that time, because that states that the conveyance was to be made subject to restrictions, amount to a waiver, but such delay may be explained by showing that the delay was consistent with his right to disaffirm the contract, and inconsistent with the theory of thereby affirming it. Thus, a bill by a purchaser of real estate to rescind a purchase is not demurrable for laches where it shows that a prior bill for the same relief was filed within three months from the discovery of the fraud; that this bill was dismissed for want of proper parties, and within a reasonable time thereafter the bill demurred to was filed. Henninger v. Heald, 51 N. J. Eq. 74, 26 Atl. 449.

The fact that a suit to rescind, commenced upon the day the purchaser obtained knowledge of grounds for rescission, was dismissed about a year thereafter, does not constitute laches where a new suit was commenced the day of the dismissal of the prior one. Hartwig v. Clark, 138 Cal. 668, 72 Pac. 140.

A delay of about three months on the part of a purchaser of real estate in commencing a proceeding to rescind a purchase is excused by showing that a similar suit was previously commenced in the United States court and discontinued upon a plea by defendant to the jurisdiction of the court. California Farm & Fruit Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 91 Pac. 593.

2. Pending litigation.

Where a defect in title depends upon a question of fact, and litigation with reference thereto is assumed by the vendor, the vendee is entitled to await the outcome of such litigation before exercising his right to rescind for such defect. Nealon v. Henry, 131 Mass. 153.

And a purchaser of real estate who is merely a party with the vendor to a proceeding affecting the title thereto is not required in such suit to assert his right to the same; it is sufficient if he commences proceedings after the termination of the suit wherein the invalidity of the title of his vendor is determined. Olschewske v. King, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 474, 96 S. W. 665.

The mere assertion of an adverse claim to real estate by a stranger does not justify a purchaser thereof in pronouncing the title bad, and thereupon rescinding his contract of purchase; and where an action is brought upon the adverse claim, and the vendor assures the purchaser that there is nothing in the claim, and after an adverse judgment in the lower court, he makes similar representations and gives the purchaser to understand that he has appealed from such judgment, and that, upon such appeal, he will establish his title, a delay by the purchaser of three months after the rendition of the judgment, before rescinding, does not show that he had not exercised reasonable diligence in his rescission. Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 588, 20 Pac. 220; Lattin v. Wilcox (Cal.) 29 Pac. 228.

Under very similar circumstances, in Read v. Loftus, 82 Kan. 485, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 108 Pac. 850, the court said that the question whether the purchaser of real estate had waived objections to the title was clearly one of fact, and added: "The mere circumstance that he took and held possession of the property is not conclusive. Possession was expressly stipulated for in the contract, and his continuance in holding it is explained by the repeated promises of the defendants to remove the objections. The nature of the remedy which they proposed, namely, a suit to quiet title, would necessarily require time, and a reasonable delay for that purpose should not be construed as a waiver until some act was done or notice given evincing an intention to refuse to comply with the promise."

3. Acts of vendor, negotiations, etc.

The failure to obtain knowledge of a defect in the title of real estate purchased, for about four years after the purchase, and a delay thereafter of about nine months before commencing proceedings to rescind, do not constitute laches, where the land is located in another state, and the vendor has lulled the purchaser in a false security by repeated representations that the title is all right. Campbell v. Spears, 120 Iowa, 670, 94 N. W. 1126.

a copy of which had been previously shown to him by Mr. States in his conversation with Mr. States; but I think, on the whole, that Mr. Faulkner, acting on behalf of his wife, and Mrs. Faulkner, acting on her own behalf, were justified in believing that the tract of land which was pointed out to them by Wassmer and by States as the tract of land that was owned by Wassmer and Radcliffe was restricted throughout in accordance with the restrictions that were shown to them by Mr. States. They were under no obligation (as contended by the complainant) to go to the public records to find out whether the restrictions were on record. They had the right to rely on the statements made to them by Mr. States and the owner of the property.

"Now I take it that there was a representation made by Mr. Wassmer and Mr. Radcliffe, either personally or through their agent, that this whole tract was restricted in accordance with the plan of restrictions disclosed by Mr. States. I think that was a statement which led the Faulknors to make the purchase. I think that was a statement of material fact, and that a misrepresentation in regard to it would entitle them to relief. Now what is meant by restrictions, restrictions of the whole tract? Why surely not something that is temporary, but something that is permanent, something that runs with the land, something that is enforceable by somebody, and in this case I should say enforceable by Mrs. Faulkner, the purchaser of a portion of the

Where the vendee of land under an executory contract paid all of the purchase price except $1, which was to be paid when the deed thereto was executed by the vendor, which was to be executed when he filed a plat of the land, a delay by the vendee of about eight years is not a waiver of his right to rescind, where he was waiting for the vendor to execute the deed and file a plat of the land, he commencing his action to rescind within about a year from the denial by the vendor of his right to a deed according to the plat, which the vendor also refused to file. Isaacs v. Bardon, 114 Wis. 142, 89 N. W. 913.

So, where the purchaser of real estate, after obtaining knowledge that a fraud had been practised upon him in the sale of the property, notified the vendor of his repudiation of the contract, and invited him to test in an action at law its validity, if he was unwilling to take the property back and release the purchaser, it did not constitute laches defeating the right to rescind, for the purchaser to await action on the part of the vendor, although for a period of some time. Barnard v. Riendeau, 31 Can. S. C. 234.

And if the vendor in effect suggests that if time is given him, the misrepresentation complained of by the purchaser will be cured, and he put in as good position as if the representation had been true, a delay on the part of the purchaser thus induced does not waive his right to rescind upon the vendor's failure to make good his suggestion. Tibbatts v. Boulter, 73 L. T. N. S. 534.

A delay of about fifteen months, during which time the parties were negotiating for settlement of the matters constituting the grounds upon which the purchaser based his right to rescind, is not a waiver of the right. Clapp v. Greenlee, 100 Iowa, 586, 69 N. W. 1049.

So, a delay of five months during which there are negotiations for settlement is not fatal to the right to rescind. Rackemann v. Riverbank Improv. Co. 167 Mass. 1, 57 Am. St. Rep. 427, 44 N. E. 990.

Compare with Follett v. Brown, 188 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ill. 244, 58 N. E. 943, which holds that a delay of six months after knowledge of fraud authorizing the purchaser to rescind a purchase of real estate, together with the exercise by him of acts of ownership over the property, is a waiver of his right to rescind, although within about a month after discovering the fraud, he approached the vendor with reference to the matter, and he agreed to take the property back in about six months, without, however, agreeing as to the terms.

III. Delay coupled with other acts.

As already seen, mere delay by a purchaser of real estate to assert his right to rescind may amount to a waiver thereof, so delay when coupled with affirmative acts on his part recognizing the validity of the contract or its binding effect is conclusive evidence of a waiver of his right to rescind, unless explained by him. Scheffelt v. Hays, 7 C. C. A. 308, 19 U. S. App. 220, 58 Fed. 457 (delay of three years and making claim on vendor for damages for the fraud); Delano v. Jacoby, 96 Cal. 275, 31 Am. St. Rep. 201, 31 Pac. 290 (two years and making payments upon purchase price); Houston v. Hurley, 2 Del. Ch. 247 (several years and paying taxes assessed against the property); Provident Loan Trust Co. v. McIntosh, 68 Kan. 452, 75 Pac. 498, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 906 (three years and collecting rents from the property); Haldane v. Sweet, 55 Mich. 196, 20 N. W. 902 (over six years, making payments on purchase price and changes in the property); Wylie v. Gamble, 95 Mich. 564, 55 N. W. 377 (over two years and obtaining time for payments on purchase price and attempting to contract with the vendor to lumber the land); Bennett v. Hickey, 112 Mich. 379, 70 N. W. 900 (six months and making payments on the contract of purchase); Mestler v. Jeffries, 145 Mich. 598, 108 N. W. 994 (over a year and making payments on the contract of purchase); Eibel v. Von Fell, 55 N. J. Eq. 670, 38 Atl. 201 (two and one-half to three and one-half years and leasing the property and paying upon a mortgage givrestricted land. And it becomes a very material fact in the case, I think, to determine just exactly what is meant by the statement that was made to them by Mr. States and by the owners. I think that there was a statement made that the whole tract was restricted, and that they had a right to act upon the statement and to pay their money and close up the deal, believing that that statement was true.

"Now what was the situation at the time the statement was made? The statement was made I believe in the early part of May, 1908. At that time a lot had been agreed to be sold to Mr. Krah by an agreement in writing which contained no restrictions whatever. I do not see how I can keep the Krah Case out of this case. It was tried before me by counsel who is engaged in this case. The defendants were the same persons who are the defendants in this case, and I hardly see how I can say that I do not know about it. That case came to a final hearing, and under the circumstances and under the evidence in that case, the opinion of the court was that Mr. Krah was entitled to a deed containing no restrictions. Now, it appears, also, that at that time (that is, at the time of the delivery of the Faulkner deed) a conveyance had been made to Mr. Williams, also without restrictions. It also appears by the testimony in this case that there were three mortgages made upon three separate parcels of land belonging to this tract to three several building and loan associations. Those three mortgages for a portion of the purchase price); Kaufmann v. McLaughlin, 24 Misc. 803, 54 N. Y. Supp. 160 (one year and collecting the rents and making payments on a purchase price mortgage); Annis v. Burnham, 15 N. D. 577, 108 N. W. 549 (six months and expressly recognizing the validity of the contract); Kenner v. Goodloe, 2 Handy (Ohio) 283 (four years and offering to pay in a manner different from contract); Max Meadows Land & Improv. Co. v. Brady, 92 Va. 71, 22 S. E. 845 (over a year and paying instalment on purchase price); State Bank v. Brown, 142 Iowa, 190, 134 Am. St. Rep. 412, 119 N. W. 81 (about three years and selling portion of the land); Deutschnann v. Kuntze (Iowa) 125 N. W. 1007 (five months and paying on purchase price); portion of it before discovering that he had been defrauded in its purchase is not a waiver by the purchaser of the right to rescind, where he can restore the property to the vendor. Jandorf v. Patterson, 90 Mich. 40, 51 N. W. 352.

Listing the property for sale prior to ascertaining that vendor would not furnish a good abstract of title, according to his contract, does not estop the purchaser for rescinding, it not appearing that the vendor was misled thereby to his prejudice. Fagan v. Hook, 134 Iowa, 381, 105 N. W. 155, 111 N. W. 981.

V. Leasing, etc.

A purchaser's right to rescind a purchase of real estate is deemed to have been waived if he, with knowledge of the facts authorizing a rescission, exercises such rights of ownership over the property as the leasing of it. Shappirio v. Goldberg, 192 U. S. 232, 48 L. ed. 419, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 259 (collecting rents and negotiating for the future rental of the property); Precious Blood Soc. v. Elsythe, 102 Tenn. 40, 50 S. W. 759; Pollock v. Smith, 49 Neb. 864, 69 N. W. 312. And see Scott v. Walton, supra.

Also by renting a dwelling house upon the property, making valuable improvements, and allowing a default judgment to be taken against him for the purchase price. Lockridge v. Foster, 5 Ill. 569.

But where the purchaser of real estate had informed the vendor of his repudiation of the contract on the ground of fraud, and had invited him to test the validity of the contract in an action at law, if he was unwilling to rescind, he did not waive his right of rescission, and ratify the contract, by remaining in possession of the property and collecting rents while he was awaiting action on the part of the vendor. Barnard v. Riendeau, supra.

VI. Expressly recognizing contract.

A purchaser of real estate will lose his right of rescission if he, with knowledge of the facts entitling him to rescind his purchase, affirmatively recognizes the validity

IV. Selling or offering property for sale.

It is fatal to the right to rescind for the vendee to delay for about three months after obtaining knowledge of the facts, where the delay was at a time when the real-estate market was feverishly active, and during which time he attempted with reasonable hope of success to sell the property at an increased price (Kornblum v. Arthurs, 154 Cal. 246, 97 Pac. 420); the right to rescind for failure by the vendor to furnish an abstract according to his agreement is also waived by offering the property for sale (Boulware v. Crohn, 122 Mo. App. 571, 90 S. W. 796); and offering the property for sale at public sale, listing it with brokers for sale, and paying a mortgage thereon, is also a waiver (Marshall v. Gilman, 47 Minn. 131, 49 N. W. 688; Colyer v. Thompson, 2 T. B. Mon. 16); so, also, is the leasing of the property, collecting the rents, and endeavoring to sell or dispose of the property (Scott v. Walton, 32 Or. 460, 52 Pac. 180); or by contracting for the sale of a portion of the realty (Smith v. Busby, 15 Mo. 388, 57 Am. Dec. 207); or selling the land to a third person (Colyer v. Thompson, supra); or a portion of it (Akerly v. Vilas, 21 Wis. 88).

gages were put in evidence, and it appears upon an inspection of them that they contained no restrictions. It also appears by the evidence of Mr. Wassmer himself that there are upon the tract or were then upon the tract other mortgages, and that the whole number put by them upon the property was thirteen or fourteen, and that none of them contained any restrictions. I consider that a very important element in this case. While it is true, as is argued on behalf of the defendant, that mortgages are mere security for the repayment of moneys loaned on the faith of them, it is likewise true that at law the mortgagee has an additional right, namely, to take possession of the property mortgaged in case of a default. In such case he may foreclose his mortgage, and the person who takes the sheriff's deed would take title free and clear of all the restrictions, unless it could be shown positively and directly that the building and loan association was duly informed of the restrictions at the time it took its mortgage. That brings up another question, too,—whether, by the making of those mortgages without restrictions, the defendants evinced an intention to abandon the restrictions. It is difficult to say whether it would have that effect, whether it would have the effect of an abandonment, from the view point of their intention; but from the view point of actuality, is it not an abandonment? Is it not a giving up by them of their right to control these mortgaged premises? Although they may have of the contract by doing some act based thereon or making some claim thereunder; as by asserting his title in a collateral suit (Akerly v. Vilas, supra); or defending his right to possession in an action against him by the vendor (Corbett v. Schulte, 119 Mich. 249, 77 N. W. 947); or defending the foreclosure of a purchase price mortgage without offering to put the vendor in statu quo (National Bank v. Levanseler, 115 Mich. 372, 73 N. W. 399); also by requiring a subsequent purchaser to furnish an abstract of title, and negotiating with him in reference to future payments on the contract of purchase (Kreibich v. Martz, 119 Mich. 343, 78 N. W. 124); or by entering into additional stipulations with vendor in reference to the contract (Griggs v. Woodruff, 14 Ala. 9); or extending the time to the vendor to prove his title, making payments on the purchase price, and making important alterations in the premises (Caswell v. Black River Cotton & Woolen Mfg. Co. 14 Johns. 453); or executing renewal mortgages (Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 53 Pac. 304); also by arbitrating the question of fraud and executing to the vendor a note due him according to such arbitration (Edwards v. Roberts, 7 Smedes & M. 544).

But payment of a note held by third person given for portion of purchase price does not deprive the purchaser of the right to prosecute his suit then pending for a rescission of the purchase. Breaux v. Sarvoie, 39 La. Ann. 243, 1 So. 614.

The purchaser does not waive the fraud arising from a defective title, by sending a deed to an insurance company to enable them to obtain a description of the land in order to examine the title. The fact that, without his consent or knowledge, the company caused the deed to be recorded is of no significance. Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 77 Pac. 954.

Merely demanding from the tenant of the vendor the possession of the premises, where the demand was made without full knowledge of the fraud, does not constitute an election by the vendee to affirm the fraud, where immediate steps were taken to rescind as soon as full knowledge of the fraud 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was had. Annis v. Ferguson, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 56, 84 S. W. 553.

VII. Acceptance of deed with knowledge of defect in title.

If the purchaser of real estate, with knowledge of a defect in the vendor's title, accepts a deed with covenants of title, he thereby waives his right to rescind on that ground. Royster v. Shackleford, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 228; Russell v. Handy, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 933, 59 S. W. 320; Gale v. Conn, 3 J. J. Marsh. 538; Beck v. Simmons, 7 Ala. 71; Kingman & Co. v. Stoddard, 29 C. C. A. 413, 57 U. S. App. 379, 85 Fed. 740.

If the vendee had an opportunity to investigate the title, and did not do so, it will be presumed that he relied upon the warranties in his deed, and his relief will be restricted to such warranties. Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq. 321.

VIII. Miscellaneous.

A purchaser of real estate, by making improvements thereon after knowledge of facts authorizing him to rescind the purchase, waives his right so to do (Vaughn v. Smith, 34 Or. 54, 55 Pac. 99); also, where he takes possession of the property, keeps it for many years, and confesses judgment in an action on the notes given for the purchase price (Roach v. Rutherford, 4 DeSauss. 126, 6 Am. Dec. 606); or remains in possession, enjoying the advantages and benefits therefrom, without complaint or offer to rescind, until required to perform the obligations of the contract of purchase (McCourt v. Johns, 33 Or. 561, 53 Pac. 601); or continues to work a mine in the property for a number of years (Richardson v. Lowe, 79 C. C. A. 317, 149 Fed. 625); or pays monthly instalments upon the property as they fall due, until the rental value has decreased about one half (Hudson v. Waugh, 93 Va. 518, 23 S. E. 530).

Merely giving one reason for refusing to carry out a contract for the purchase of real estate is not a waiver by the purchaser of other objections. Boulware v. Crohn, 122 Mo. App. 571, 99 S. W. 796.

been conveyed subsequently to the making of the mortgages, subject to restrictions, would not a foreclosure of the mortgage cut out the restrictions? I mean actual restrictions put in a deed after a mortgage was made, wouldn't a foreclosure of a mortgage cut out those restrictions? That I understand is the situation. There may be some doubt as to whether the intention that Mr. Wassmer and Mr. Radcliffe had in mind to restrict this property was given such publicity and efficiency as to bind people who should purchase a portion of the property. Of course, I do not think it would bind people to whom no notice of it ever came; but it could hardly be said that Mr. Wassmer could have restricted his property by keeping in his own mind the fact that he did restrict it, and that he intended to restrict it, without doing something to actually restrict it. What did he do when the building and loan associations came to examine the property? He remembers one case in which he notified the examining committee of the building and loan associations, that the property was restricted; but they were very careful not to put any restrictions in their mortgage; and I doubt whether notice to the committee would be notice to the building and loan associations anyhow.

"So that I am very clear that there was a representation made by the defendant Wassmer of a material fact, which, at the time it was made, was untrue, and that the complainant is entitled to a rescission of the contract upon equitable terms.

"The defendants say that the bill is filed for the purpose of recovering damages,—no, not for the recovery of damages, much less for the recovery of unliquidated damages, because, if there are any damages following in the trial of this transaction as set out in the bill, they are not unliquidated damages. It is very well settled in New Jersey now by the recent decision of our court of appeals, that this court will not entertain a suit for unliquidated damages, but will entertain a suit for liquidated damages, damages that can be liquidated, damages of a variety that do not have to go to a jury.

"There are some expenditures here which seem to me to be chargeable against the two defendants, and I say the two defendants because they are charged in the bill as partners, and they admit by the answer that they are partners in this whole enterprise; and therefore whatever personal claim would run against anybody would run against both of them. Therefore I say that the complainant, on the rescission of this deed of conveyance, would have a right to charge against both of these parties whatever amount of

By pleading fraud and misrepresentation in an action by the vendor on notes given for the purchaser price, and not seeking a rescission of the purchase on that ground, but professing to be anxious to keep the property if the title is perfected, the vendee waives his right to rescind on that ground. American Land & Improv. Co. v. Crawford, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 376, 40 S. W. 672.

IX. What is sufficient knowledge.

Where the purchaser of real estate has evidence sufficient reasonably to actuate him to rescind, and on which he has once acted, any subsequent discovery of cumulative evidence cannot operate to excuse his waiver of the fraud, if one has in the meantime occurred, or to revive a once lost right of rescission. Richardson v. Lowe, supra; Brown v. Gordon-Tiger Min. & Reduction Co. 44 Colo. 311, 97 Pac. 1042.

But where the full extent of the fraud is not immediately discovered by the purchaser, and not until sometime after taking possession of the property, his retaining possession after a partial discovery of the fraud, and demanding of the vendor that he remedy the defects discovered, is not a waiver of his right to rescind after complete discovery of the fraud, although he also, while retaining possession, made payments upon the purchase price. Culver v. Avery, 161 Mich. 322, 126 N. W. 430.

his title is not a waiver by the purchaser of his right to rescind at the expiration of the time as extended, where time is of the essence of the contract and the vendor failed to perfect his title. Garrett v. Cohen, 63 Misc. 450, 117 N. Y. Supp. 129.

A judgment affecting the title of real estate does not entitle the purchaser thereof, prior to such judgment, under an executory contract, to rescind, as the vendor may procure the title evidenced by such judgment; hence, it is not laches if the purchaser continue under his contract after rendition of the judgment. Latimer v. Capay Valley Land Co. 137 Cal. 286, 70 Pac. 82.

That the purchaser of real estate permitted some three months to elapse after his suspicions were aroused that the wrong land had been pointed out to him by the vendor, before causing a survey to be made, the weather in the meantime being inclement, does not show a waiver of the right to rescind. Freeman v. Gloyd, 43 Wash. 607, 86 Pac. 1051; Freeman v. Gloyd, 43 Wash. 716, 86 Pac. 1053.

Where the purchaser of the lot by ordinary diligence might have ascertained its boundaries before putting valuable improvements thereon, he cannot, after a delay of years, rescind the sale for deficiency, and require the vendor to pay for the improvements which were evidently made in bad faith. King v. Sharp, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 307.

money was paid out by her, necessarily paid out by her, on the faith of the instrument, because I am going to limit it to the necessity,—necessarily paid out by her in consequence of the making of the contract and the deed.

"It is impossible from the testimony for me to tell now just what those items would be, and it will have to be referred to a master for the purpose of ascertaining the same, unless counsel can agree.

"One of the defenses that is set up is defense of acquiescence, and consequently of laches. The doctrine relating to that question is pretty well settled in New Jersey in the case of Dennis v. Jones, 44 N. J. Eq. 513, 6 Am. St. Rep. 899, 14 Atl. 913. In Dennis v. Jones there was an attempt made to set aside a chattel mortgage on the ground of fraud, and there the question of laches was discussed, and it was held that in case of a rescission the party rescinding the contract must bring his suit at the very earliest possible moment. But I do not think a delay from August until November is such a delay as would admit the defense of laches. It is not shown that during that period the defendants' situation was changed at all, and it does not appear that the delay has caused the defendants any damage.

"I will advise a decree in accordance with these views."

As to the duty of the defrauded party to rescind promptly see—

Messrs. Osborne & Astley, for respondents:

Rescission before action is not necessary.

Du Bois v. Nugent, 69 N. J. Eq. 145, 60 Atl. 339.

Garrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We agree with the learned vice chancellor that Mrs. Faulkner purchased the lot in question upon an untrue representation of such a nature that, upon the discovery of its untruth, she was entitled to elect to rescind the sale. We do not, however, agree that such election was still open to her four months later, when the present bill of complaint was filed declaring for the first time her election to rescind. At this time, viz., November 28, 1908, her right to elect, which arose on or about July 10, 1908, no longer existed, not upon the doctrine of laches, discussed in the conclusions filed in the court below, but upon the ground that the lapse of such a length of time under the circumstances afforded plenary proof of an election by her not to rescind, to which conclusive effect should have been given.

The learned vice chancellor was in error in testing the complainant's right to elect solely by the doctrine of laches, and notably so in conceiving that the decision of this court in Dennis v. Jones, 44 N. J. Eq. 513, 6 Am. St. Rep. 899, 14 Atl. 913, turned upon that doctrine, which in point of fact was not even mentioned in the opinion of Chancellor McGill in this court. Dennis v. Jones was decided, not upon the quasi estoppel that is involved in the doctrine of laches, but upon a totally different ground, viz., that of conduct evidence.

Authorities cited by Chancellor McGill had settled the law "that the defrauded party to a contract has but one election to rescind, that he must exercise that election with reasonable promptitude after discovery of the fraud, and that when once he elects, he must abide by his decision." Other cases cited in the opinion had held that "delay in the rescission of the contract is evidence of a waiver of the fraud and an election to treat the contract as valid." The approval and adoption of both of these lines of decision by this court resulted, in Dennis v. Jones, in our holding "that after the appellants had knowledge of all the substantial features of the alleged fraud, and were fully aware of the deceit which had been practised upon them, they so acted as to afford plenary evidence of an election to abide by their contract," and that "their election thus made was irrevocable."

It is this rule, and not the doctrine of laches, that Dennis v. Jones lays down and illustrates.

To the same effect is the more recent case of Clampitt v. Doyle, 73 N. J. Eq. 678, 70 Atl. 129. The rule of Dennis v. Jones is so clearly stated by Chancellor McGill that in actual practice the only question likely to arise is whether or not the delay was such as to warrant its application, i. e., whether the vendee's failure to act extended beyond the period within which one would naturally act, who knew that to act effectually he must act promptly. The question in itself is not peculiar to this class of cases. It is present in all cases involving a reasonable time, concerning which it is admitted that no hard and fast rule obtains, and also that the difficulty that exists in cases that lie close to the line disappears with the lapse of time that has been permitted to intervene. Thus, the question whether a landowner who is under a duty to make repairs upon notice is in default on the very day he had notice or the day after may present difficulties that entirely disappear if he has suffered weeks and months to elapse. The case before us is of this latter character, in that an election that could in reason have been made within a few days or at most a few weeks after the right to make it arose was, without any adequate excuse that was consistent with promptitude of action, delayed for months. It is precisely this conduct that (as we decided in Dennis v. Jones and Clappitt v. Doyle) affords plenary proof of an election to abide by the contract, which is irrevocable. For this reason, the bill of complaint should have been dismissed by the court of chancery, and for this reason the decree of that court must be reversed.

This result renders it unnecessary to do more than allude to the fact that the prayer of the complainant's bill, with respect to the several sums to be paid to her by the defendants in excess of purchase price, interest, insurance, and taxes, is made up for the most part, if not wholly, of items for which a court of equity upon the rescission of a contract gives no compensation, as to some of them because they are in the nature of unliquidated damages, and as to others because of the essential difference in this respect between the rescission of a contract and an action for deceit based thereon.

To obtain the former, the complainant must show a material misrepresentation not necessarily untrue to the knowledge of the defendant; whereas the gist of the action for deceit is such conscious falsification. Hence the injured party may not, by selecting the action that is the more easily proved, obtain in equity the measure of redress that is recoverable only when the more onerous burden has been sustained in a court of law. This distinction is pointed out in Redgrave v. Hurd, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 1, Newbigging v. Adam, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 582, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 308, and is treated extensively in the notes in 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. pp. 754 et seq.

The theory of the complainant's bill as exemplified by its specific prayer for relief is entirely indefensible, and the decree therefore granting such relief in general terms is upon its face erroneous.

The learned vice chancellor, however, in his conclusions expressly disavowed the purpose of allowing unliquidated damages, and confined his order of reference to such improvements as were the "necessary and proper consequences" of the sale that was set aside. Inasmuch, however, as "necessary" is quite generally construed to mean "suitable" rather than "indispensable" (State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., Prosecutors, v. Hancock, 35 N. J. L. 537; State, Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co., Prosecutors, v. Woodruff, 36 N. J. L. 94; State, Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., Prosecutors, v. Love, 37 N. J. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

L. 60), it may be doubted whether the error of the decree was thereby removed or rendered harmless to the defendant. The matter, however, need not be further pursued, since the decree must be reversed, and the bill dismissed for the reason first given. To this end, the decree is reversed.

C. P. HANNAH, by Next Friend.

Appeal — verdict contrary to law — reversal.

1. A verdict should be set aside when it clearly appears to be contrary to law.

Same — reversal — contributory negligence.

2. Where contributory negligence prevents recovery, and it clearly appears from the evidence that the negligence of the plaintiff so contributed proximately to the injury complained of that it would not have occurred but for the plaintiff's negligence, a verdict awarding damages should be set aside.

Contributory negligence — minor.

3. Where contributory negligence is a complete defense, a minor may be guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery by him where his age, intelligence, and experience, and the surrounding circumstances, render him capable of appreciating and avoiding obvious dangers.

Same — recovery — at common law.

4. At common law a plaintiff could not recover for injuries to himself, caused by the negligence of another, if he in any appreciable way contributed to the proximate cause of the injury, upon the theory that there is no apportionment of the results of mutual negligence.

Master — duties owed to employee.

5. It is the duty of the master to use due diligence in providing a reasonably safe place for the servant to work in, and also to inform the servant of any dangers in the employment that are not of such a character that the servant would know of them, and to warn young and inexperienced employees of dangers in their employment as to which they have no knowledge or appreciation.

As to presumption and burden of proof as to capacity of minor servant to comprehend and avoid danger, see note to Ewing v. Lanark Fuel Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487.

Servant — injury — contributory negligence — effect.

6. If a servant fails to exercise ordinary care for his safety, he cannot in general recover damages for an injury.

Master — obvious dangers — necessity of warning capable servant.

7. Where dangers are obvious, and the servant is capable of appreciating them, a warning as to such dangers by the master is unnecessary.

Same — injury to minor — contributory negligence.

8. Where an employee nineteen years of age, of at least ordinary intelligence and experience, and accustomed to working in a sawmill, needlessly subjects himself to an obvious danger, he cannot recover for injuries to himself that apparently would not have occurred but for his own lack of ordinary care for his safety.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Escambia County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John C. Avery, for plaintiff in error:

A servant in the performance of his duties is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, or that degree of care which prudent persons so exercise under similar circumstances, and if he is injured by failing to exercise such care the master is not liable.

The plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, barring recovery.

Flowers v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 55 Fla. 603, 46 So. 718.

If plaintiff did not actually know of the defect, he knew the risk, and voluntarily exposed himself to it.

Messrs. Reeves & Watson, for defendant in error:

The presumption is that the servant exercised ordinary care, and was free from contributory negligence.

So far as a minor is concerned, ordinary risks are treated as extraordinary.

1 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 703, 1074.

A master is under the absolute duty of providing reasonably safe equipment and a reasonably safe place to work, and if he tenders it unsafe, or for any reason there are abnormal risks of which the servant may be excusably ignorant, he is under the duty of warning the servant against such risks.

Plaintiff acted in good faith, and reasonable and prudent persons would, under like circumstances, in all human probability, have adopted the course which he took.

In order to show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the act which he did must have been one which he could reasonably anticipate would result in his injury.

Whitfield, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error was taken to a judgment awarding damages for personal injuries sustained by Hannah while working in the lumber company's sawmill. The plaintiff was assisting in repair work about the mill, and was told by the man with whom he worked, alleged to be "his superior workman," to ask Mr. Thomas, who was in charge of the work, for a babbitt ladle to be used in the repairing being done. Plaintiff asked Mr. Stokes, the foreman of the mill, for Mr. Thomas, and was told where he could be found. While looking for Mr. Thomas, the plaintiff went up a ladder, and, in going along a board about 10 inches wide used by the oilers and mill-wrights in their duties, passed over a rapidly revolving shaft. In returning the same way the plaintiff's pants caught in a set screw that projected 5/16 or 1/2 of an inch out from a safety collar on the revolving shaft, and the plaintiff was seriously injured.

The negligence of the defendant, as alleged, is that it "negligently suffered said set screw to project above the surface of said collar aforesaid; and through said superior workman negligently directed the plaintiff to seek and find said ladle, and to make inquiries for same of persons in the lower part of said mill, without giving him any warning whatever as to the unsafe and dangerous condition of said set screw." Pleas of not guilty, and of the plaintiff's sole and contributory negligence, were filed. The question to be determined is whether the plaintiff so contributed to the proximate cause of the injury as to preclude a recovery by him.

A verdict should be set aside when it clearly appears to be contrary to law. Where contributory negligence prevents recovery, and it clearly appears from the evidence that the negligence of the plaintiff so contributed proximately to the injury complained of that it would not have occurred but for the plaintiff's negligence, a verdict awarding damages should be set aside. Where contributory negligence is a complete defense, a minor may be guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery by him where his age, intelligence, and experience, and the surrounding circumstances, render him capable of appreciating and avoiding obvious dangers.

At common law a plaintiff could not recover for injuries to himself caused by the negligence of another, if he, in any appreciable way, contributed to the proximate cause of the injury, upon the theory that there is no apportionment of the results of mutual negligence. Where both plaintiff and defendant are at fault, the law does not in general interfere. The common-law rule that there can be no recovery by those guilty of contributory negligence has not been changed by statute in this state except in certain cases of injuries by the operation of railroads. Stearns & C. Lumber Co. v. Fowler, 58 Fla. 362, 50 So. 680; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. McCormick, 59 Fla. 121, 52 So. 712; Florida R. Co. v. Dorsey, 59 Fla. —, 52 So. 963.

It is the duty of the master to use due diligence in providing a reasonably safe place for the servant to work in, and also to inform the servant of any dangers in the employment that are not of such a character that the servant should know of them, and to warn young and inexperienced employees of dangers in their employment as to which they have no knowledge or appreciation. A failure in the performance of these duties renders the master liable in damages for injuries proximately resulting from such breach of duty, where the servant has not so contributed appreciably and proximately to his own injury as to be guilty of contributory negligence. James v. Rapides Lumber Co. 44 L.R.A. 33, and notes (50 La. Ann. 717, 23 So. 469); 10 Current Law, 731; Bare v. Crane Creek Coal & Coke Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 284, 123 Am. St. Rep. 966, and notes (61 W. Va. 28, 55 S. E. 907); Burnside v. Peterson, 43 Colo. 382, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 76, 96 Pac. 256; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Vt. 791, 70 L.R.A. 999, 22 S. E. 869; Camp v. Hall, 39 Fla. 535, 22 So. 792. If a servant fails to exercise ordinary care for his safety, he cannot in general recover damages for an injury. Green v. Sansom, 41 Fla. 94, 25 So. 332.

Where dangers are obvious and the servant is capable of appreciating them, a warning as to such dangers by the master is unnecessary. 10 Current Law, 753. Whether warning is necessary depends upon the age, capacity, intelligence, and experience of the employee, as well as upon the nature of the danger and the surrounding conditions and circumstances. Davis v. Augusta Factory, 92 Ga. 712, 18 S. E. 974; Ryan v. Armour, 166 Ill. 568, 47 N. E. 60; Mackin v. Alaska Refrigerator Co. 100 Mich. 276, 58 N. W. 999; Williams v. Churchill, 137 Mass. 243, 50 Am. Rep. 304; Bollington v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 125 Ky. 186, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1045, 100 S. W. 850; Noden v. Verlenden Bros. 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 367, and notes (211 Pa. 135, 60 Atl. 505); Mundhenke v. Oregon City Mfg. Co. 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278, and notes (47 Or. 127, 81 Pac. 977); German-American Lumber Co. v. Brock, 55 Fla. 577, 46 So. 740. These principles are not questioned, but difficulty frequently arises in applying them to the facts of particular cases.

In this case the plaintiff was nineteen years of age and of at least ordinary intelligence. He had worked about the mill for more than nine months, usually assisting in repair work, and had worked all over the mill. The order given him was to get the ladle and to ask Mr. Thomas for it. He was told by the foreman where he could find Mr. Thomas, but he was not told to go any particular way to find him. He was not warned of the danger in the projecting set screw in the rapidly revolving shaft, but he was not told to go by or over the shaft to find Mr. Thomas, and it was not necessary for him to do so in the discharge of his duty. It appears that the foreman simply answered plaintiff's question as to where he could find Mr. Thomas, and that there was at least one other ordinarily used way of going to the place where Mr. Thomas was supposed to be that could have been safely used. The plaintiff was evidently familiar, at least in a general way, with the machinery of the mill, though he had not been at that point before. He was of a somewhat mature age, and had had other experience in such mills. It is clear that the place where the injury occurred was intended for and used by only those engaged in using or repairing the machinery, and was not the usual means of passage from one part of the mill to the other. In taking this course and in passing over the rapidly revolving shaft, the taking of risks and the existence of real dangers must have been obvious to the plaintiff, even though he had not been warned as to the dangers of the place, and could not have seen the projecting set screw in the shaft. In going that way he subjected himself to risks and dangers that were not warranted by the orders given him or by the general nature of his employment. Even if it be conceded that the lumber company had failed to do its full duty as to furnishing a safe place for its employees, this employee was not required to be in that place. In being there and in unnecessarily passing within $\frac{5}{16}$ or $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch of a rapidly revolving shaft, which was dangerous even without the projecting set screw on it, the plaintiff so contributed to the proximate cause of the injury to himself that he cannot on the evidence here presented recover damages. Apparently his injury would not have occurred if he had not needlessly gone into the dangerous place and actually allowed his clothing to come in close proximity to an object that was patently dangerous. His age, experience, intelligence, and instincts of self-preservation, and the surrounding circumstances, should reasonably have kept him from this needless exposure to an obvious danger and he cannot recover compensation for injuries to which he so directly and needlessly contributed. The facts here are quite unlike the cases of Camp v. Hall and German-American Lumber Co. v. Brock, supra. It is not a case of using one of several usual means for discharging a duty, as in Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Lassiter, 59 Fla. 246, 52 So. 975. But it is a case of the use of an obviously dangerous means when safe means were available to him, as in Mobile & O. R. Co. v. George, 94 Ala. 199, 10 So. 145.

It is clear from the evidence as a whole that the defense of contributory negligence was established, and the verdict should have been for the defendant on the case as here made.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial awarded.

Shackleford and Cockrell, JJ., concur.

Taylor, Hocker, and Parkhill, JJ., concur in the opinion.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down November 16, 1910:

A petition for rehearing suggests that the court failed to consider testimony that there was no way designed for a walk way which the plaintiff could have used; that the route taken was the quickest and plainest, but not the safest; that the plaintiff did not know of the projecting set screw; that the collar on the revolving shaft was designed for a safety screw, and not a projecting one; that of the many set screws used in the mill only eight or ten projected; that a projecting screw is more dangerous than one not projecting, and that the plaintiff knew of no other way to use.

All the testimony in the transcript was carefully considered. As contributory negligence of the plaintiff was clearly indicated by the facts and circumstances in evidence, it was not necessary to state more than the conclusions and the legal effect of the evidence. The plaintiff's age, intelligence, experience, and most ordinary observation, should have made him know and appreciate the risks and dangers of the conditions that surrounded him. Even if there was negligence in permitting the set screw to project $\frac{5}{16}$ of an inch from the safety collar on the revolving shaft, the defendant was under no duty to warn the plaintiff of it when he was not required or expected to go near it. The plaintiff's experience and observation while working "all over the mill," as he testifies, should reasonably have made him assume the risk he took. Whether the plaintiff knew of the projecting set screw or not, he contributed directly to the efficient cause of his own injury by needlessly going where he did without being required to do so, and in allowing his clothing to come within 5/16 of an inch of a safety collar on a rapidly revolving shaft.

The main opinion cites and approves the Lassiter Case, which followed the cases of Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Mooney, 40 Fla. 17, 24 So. 148, Id., 45 Fla. 286, 110 Am. St. Rep. 73, 33 So. 1010.

The danger of the route taken was obvious, and, under the facts and circumstances in evidence, the plaintiff reasonably should have known of and appreciated the different ways and the conditions actually existing, as he "had worked all over the mill" for several months, and, by the exercise of the ordinary care for his own protection that the law requires of him, he could readily have anticipated self-injury from his action.

A rehearing is denied.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF INDIANA EX REL. EDGAR O. HUNTER, Appt.,
v.

THOMAS A. WINTERROWD, Building Inspector, et al.

(— Ind. —, 91 N. E. 956.)

Mandamus — statutory duty — attacking constitutionality.

The constitutionality of a statute cannot be attacked in a mandamus proceeding to compel performance of an act which an official refuses to perform because of the statute.

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Supreme Court for Marion County sustaining a demurrer to a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the building inspector of the city of Indianapolis to approve certain building plans and to issue a permit for the erection of a building in accordance therewith. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles O. Roemler, H. O. Chamberlin, Charles W. Smith, John S. Duncan, H. H. Hornbrook, and Albert P. Smith, for appellant:

Mandamus generally does not lie if the relator has any other legal remedy which is specific and adequate. The remedy, however, must be one which is adequate, that is, one which reaches the end intended, and actually compels the performance of the duty refused.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel appellee Winterrowd, as building inspector of the city of Indianapolis, to approve certain plans for an apartment house, and to issue a permit for the erection of the same in said city. Appellees waived the issuance of an alternative writ, appeared, and filed a demurrer to the petition, on the ground that the facts therein stated were insufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was sustained, and, appellant declining to amend, final judgment was rendered in favor of appellees. The only error assigned is the sustaining of appellees' demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint averred that on April 20, 1909, the city of Indianapolis had a population of more than 100,000 inhabitants, according to the last preceding census of the United States, and that Thomas A. Winterrowd then was and still is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting building inspector of said city; "that, under and by virtue of a certain ordinance, duly passed by the common council of said city and approved by the mayor thereof, now, and for many years last past, in full force and effect therein, entitled 'An Ordinance Providing for All Matters Concerning, Affecting, or Relating to the Construction, Alteration, Repairs, or Removal of Buildings, Structures, and Appurtenances Thereof, Erected and to be Erected in the City of Indianapolis, Indiana,' said Thomas A. Winterrowd, as such building inspector, is authorized and required to examine and inspect the plans for all buildings proposed to be erected in said city, and, in the event he shall approve the same, to issue to the person so presenting said plans a license or permit to proceed with the erection of such proposed building; that by such ordinance it is further provided that it shall be unlawful for any person to proceed to erect any building in the city of Indianapolis, until he shall have caused plans to be prepared for its erection, and until he shall have submitted the same to such building inspector for his examination, and until such building inspector have approved the same, and issued to the person proposing to erect such building his permit as such building inspector for the erection of said building;" that on said date the relator was, and ever since has been, and still is, the owner of a certain described lot in said city, upon which he desires to erect an apartment house, and to that end he caused certain plans for such building to be prepared and presented to said building inspector, and requested him to inspect and approve such plans, and to issue a permit authorizing the erection of the proposed building; that said plans complied in every respect with the building ordinances of the city of Indianapolis; that appellee Winterrowd examined said plans, as requested, and found and declared the same to be in compliance with the building ordinances of said city, and that the designed building, if erected, would be safe, be supplied with abundant light and air, and provide commodious and convenient apartments; but he declined to approve said plans and to issue the requested building permit, because said plans did not comply with certain requirements of an act of the general assembly of the state of Indiana, entitled "An Act Relative to the Construction and Maintenance of Tenement, Lodging, and Apartment Houses," approved March 3, 1909 (Acts 1909, chap. 47), in ten specified particulars. It is then averred that the legislative act above mentioned is in conflict with certain provisions of the state Constitution and the 14th 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It was manifestly the purpose of appellant's counsel to invoke the judgment of the courts upon the constitutional validity of the tenement, lodging, and apartment house law of this state, approved March 3, 1909. The constitutional question suggested has been fully and ably briefed, and we have no inclination to evade or postpone its decision, but, upon mature consideration, have concluded that the question is not properly presented for decision in this proceeding. It is provided by statute in this state that "writs of mandate may be issued to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person, to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, or a duty resulting from an office, 'trust, or station.'" Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, § 1225. Appellees' counsel challenge the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint to show a legal right in the relator to the thing demanded and a clear duty on the building inspector to do the act requested. The allegations of the complaint respecting the provisions of the city ordinance and the plans submitted for approval are indefinite and faulty; but, waiving these defects, we are of opinion that the writ was rightly denied by the trial court. The writ of mandamus was originally of a high prerogative character, and in no sense a writ of right. The writ is authorized in certain cases by statute in this state, as above shown; but it has always been and is still regarded as an extraordinary one, and in a sense discretionary. Relief by writ of mandamus may be had only in the absence of any other adequate remedy. The issuance of the writ is justifiable only in favor of a petitioner who shows a clear legal right to the thing demanded and an imperative duty on the part of the respondent to do the act required. State ex rel. Hatfield v. Cummins, 171 Ind. 112, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 85 N. E. 359; Auburn v. State, 170 Ind. 511, 83 N. E. 997, 84 N. E. 990; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law p. 725; 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 151. Courts have generally been unwilling to extend the operation of this writ, and its use has been kept within its own narrow limits. It will be denied when the object sought is an adjudication upon some question or right which may as well be settled in an ordinary action or according to usual procedure. In other words, this form of proceeding cannot be employed to adjudicate and establish a right or define and impose a duty, but only to enforce an existing legal right and the performance of a duty specifically enjoined.

Conceding that the terms of the building ordinance of the city of Indianapolis required appellee to approve the plans submitted, the complaint discloses that a statute of this state prohibits the erection of a building in accordance with such plans. The statute is paramount, and it is elementary that a municipal ordinance, in so far as it conflicts with the statute law of the state, is void. The relator is not asserting a clear legal right, but merely a claim of right, which he is seeking to have the courts in this action establish by striking down a legislative enactment prohibiting the thing which he desires to do. The respondent was not requested to perform a duty enjoined by law, but to do an act in plain disregard of the provisions of a public statute, which it is the duty of every officer and citizen to obey until repealed or judicially overthrown in a proper proceeding. It was not the province of appellee as building inspector to pass upon the constitutional validity of the statute; but his duty was unquestioningly to obey its mandates. The alleged neglected duty is not clear and plain, but will only appear in case the courts first establish the supremacy of the municipal ordinance over the statute, by declaring the latter invalid and void. The duty charged to appellee, performance of which is sought to be enforced herein, is not enjoined by law, pre-existent and imperative, but must in this proceeding be created, ascertained, and imposed. The validity of an objectionable statute should be litigated in an appropriate civil action between adversary parties, and in our opinion a petitioner for a writ of mandamus may not require the court to declare such statute unconstitutional in that proceeding as a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ demanded. State ex rel. Lytle v. Douglas County, 18 Neb. 506, 26 N. W. 315; Maxwell v. Burton, 2 Utah, 595; State ex rel. Port Royal Min. Co. v. Hagood, 30 S. C. 519, 3 L.R.A. 841, 9 S. E. 686; Ex parte Lynch, 16 S. C. 40; People ex rel. Bradley v. Stephens, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 348; Wright v. Kelley, 4 Idaho, 624, 43 Pac. 565; People ex rel. Hall v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 591; 2 Spelling, Inj. § 1443; 26 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 156; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 763.

In the case of Wright v. Kelley, supra, the supreme court of Idaho declared mandamus to be not only an extraordinary, but in some respects a summary, remedy, and that it cannot be made an instrument for giving a court jurisdiction of litigation on collateral matters in an irregular way, and that the writ will not be granted to test collateral questions or the validity of an act of the legislature. The supreme court of New York, in the case of People ex rel. Bradley v. Stephens, supra, held "that it is rarely, if ever, proper to award a mandamus in a case in which it can only be done by declaring an act of the legislature unconstitutional. That should be done in a more solemn mode of adjudication, upon a full trial, and not on an ordinary motion." In the Lynch Case the supreme court of South Carolina said: "That can hardly be considered a duty 'certain,' and allowing of 'no discretion,' which can only be made to appear by ignoring the law as it stands." The same court in the case of State ex rel. Port Royal Min. Co. v. Hagood, supra, said: "We have just seen that mandamus only lies for the enforcement of a plain ministerial duty, but it is not obvious how that can be a plain duty which is only made to appear by declaring an act of the legislature unconstitutional. It is not the province of the board of agriculture to determine the constitutionality of laws defining their own powers; nor will the courts, upon summary proceedings in mandamus, determine as to the constitutionality of statutes affecting the rights of third persons." In the case of Maxwell v. Burton, the supreme court of Utah said: "We find that there is a law on our statute books in reference to registration, compelling the respondent to do what we are now asked to compel him to undo. We cannot, for the purpose of this proceeding, inquire into its validity." In the cases of Brooks v. State, 162 Ind. 568, 70 N. E. 980, and State ex rel. McKell v. Robins, 71 Ohio St. 273, 69 L.R.A. 427, 73 N. E. 470, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485, and others which we have examined, the courts, without challenge or question of their right in that behalf or of the propriety of so doing, proceeded to determine the constitutionality of a legislative act preliminary to the issuance of a writ of mandamus. These cases are not regarded as decisive authority contrary to our conclusion and the holdings in the cases above cited.

It seems to us a manifest hardship to impose upon a petty ministerial officer the burden of determining at his peril and defending the validity of a law which he is required and willing to obey. He may have no personal interest in the law assailed, and be provided with no means to make a defense for the benefit of others. We conclude, therefore, that the relator in this proceeding cannot require the court to pass upon the constitutionality of the act called in question, and that no error appears in sustaining appellees' demurrer to his complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM McINTOSH, Resp.,
v.

(— S. C. —, 69 S. E. 159.)

Street car — passenger — hand baggage — ice.

1. A passenger cannot be said as matter

Note. — Right of passenger to carry baggage or packages in street car.

The right of passengers on street cars to carry reasonable baggage and packages seems to have been assumed in some cases.

Thus in Schalscha v. Third Ave. R. Co. 19 Misc. 141, 43 N. Y. Supp. 251, a passenger was allowed to recover for damage done to his violin through the starting of the car before he had boarded it, and the consequent impact of the violin case with a pillar of the elevated road.

So, in Morris v. Third Ave. R. Co. 1 Daly, 202, which was an action against a railway for delivering a bag, left on a car, to the wrong person, the court said that the company did not engage for the carriage of such property, and did not incur respecting it the extraordinary liability imposed upon common carriers; but it was held that the compensation paid by the passenger was sufficient to constitute the carrier a bailee for hire and to render it liable for the wrongful delivery.

And in some cases, the companies, apparently recognizing the passengers' right to carry some articles, have established rules excluding certain specified things.

Thus a rule of a street railway company that "passengers must not be permitted to take into the cars packages or goods that are cumbersome or dangerous, such as barrels, boxes, trunks, gas pipe, lumber and panes of glass," has been held as a matter of law a reasonable regulation, and it was held error to leave the question of reasonableness to the jury. Dowd v. Albany R. Co. 47 App. Div. 202, 62 N. Y. Supp. 179.

And where one entered a closed car in which there were passengers, carrying in his hand a valise and two rifles, with bayonets attached, it was held that the court should instruct the jury that the conductor was entitled to eject him. Ibid.

And a bird cage 2 feet square and from 2 to 2½ feet high is, as a matter of law, a "cumbersome" package within the meaning of the foregoing statute. Ray v. United Traction Co. 96 App. Div. 48, 89 N. Y. Supp. 49.

In Daniel v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 64 N. J. L. 603, 46 Atl. 625, where a passenger carrying a small goat in his arms was refused admittance to a car, it was held that the reasonableness of a rule of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of law not to be entitled to carry upon a street car, as personal baggage, a small piece of ice wrapped so as not to drip.

Damages — punitive — exclusion of ice from street car.

2. Punitive damages may be awarded against a street car company for refusal to permit a passenger to take into the car as personal baggage, a small piece of ice wrapped so as to prevent dripping, which is needed by a sick person, notice of which has been given to the conductor.

company forbidding the carrying of live animals in its cars was for the trial court, and that it was error to leave it to the jury.

In Morris v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 552, 22 N. E. 1097, where the railway company had a rule requiring an extra charge for each package "too large to be carried on the lap of the passenger without incommencing others," and a passenger boarded a car carrying a package of picture frames about 2 feet long and 20 inches wide, it was held that the court could not hold that the package was within the meaning of the regulation, and that the conductor's judgment was not conclusive, but that the question as to whether the particular package came within the regulation was for the jury.

While as a matter of law the decision of a conductor as to whether a certain package is prohibited by a rule of the company is not conclusive, yet it should have great weight, and his action should not be reversed by a jury unless it is a case of wilful or unreasonable judgment on his part. Ray v. United Traction Co. supra.

In Vlasservitch v. Augusta & A. R. Co. 85 S. C. 291, 67 S. E. 306, where the upper court only had power to determine whether there was any testimony to sustain the finding of the lower court, the judgment of the latter court holding that a graphophone horn about 5 feet long and from 18 to 24 inches across its mouth was personal baggage which the passenger might carry was affirmed, there being testimony tending to show that it did not come within the rules of the company prohibiting the carrying on its cars of specified property "or other articles too long or heavy to be taken with the passenger in car seat," the plaintiff having testified that he had at another time carried a similar horn to his seat and occupied it with another passenger.

In Snerry v. Consolidated R. Co. 79 Conn. 563, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 907, 118 Am. St. Rep. 169, 65 Atl. 962, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 190, an action to recover for the loss of a suit case handed to the conductor by a woman upon entering the car, and placed by him in such a position as to be within her sight and control, the company was held not liable where the suit case was carried away by a man of ordinarily respectable appearance who was seated near it. Messrs. Croft & Croft for respondent.

Jones, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from the judgment of the circuit court affirming judgment of a magistrate for $75 in an action for actual and punitive damages for unlawful and wanton refusal to allow plaintiff to board defendant's car.

It appears that on the 5th day of July, 1908, plaintiff attempted to board one of the electric passenger cars of the defendant at Langley, in Aiken county, having in his hand five cents' worth of ice wrapped in a sack. The plaintiff had bought the ice for a sick man at Bath, South Carolina, and was hastening to carry it to him. The conductor refused to allow plaintiff to board the train with the ice, testifying that the ice was in a crocus sack, and was leaking through the sack so that water would run over the floor of the car. The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show that the ice was fully wrapped, and was not leaking. This issue was found in favor of plaintiff by the magistrate and affirmed by the circuit court; hence it must be regarded as settled that the ice was wrapped in a sack, and was not leaking.

The defendant appellant contends that there was no evidence of any breach of duty, and that motion for nonsuit as to the entire cause of action, and especially as to punitive damages, should have been sustained. In arguing these propositions, contention is made that ice is not personal baggage. We cannot say as matter of law that a small piece of ice carried under the circumstances stated is not personal baggage. But the rule of the defendant company and the instructions given to its conductor assumed that it may be so regarded under certain circumstances. Rule No. 16 of the defendant company for carrying packages provided, "Passengers must not be allowed to carry bulky or dangerous packages aboard cars," and the verbal instructions to conductor were not to accept anything like ice which was not wrapped or boxed so as to prevent melting or leaking over the floor. Hence the rules of the company did not prevent the acceptance as baggage of a small piece of ice wrapped so as not to leak over the floor.

The circuit court concurred with the magistrate in finding that there was some evidence of wilful invasion of plaintiff's right. We think there was not a total failure of evidence on this point, and therefore the finding of the circuit court cannot be disturbed. There was testimony that plaintiff and the conductor had a previous difficulty; that plaintiff was attempting to board the car in a proper manner and with proper personal baggage; that he informed the conductor of the urgency of his carrying the ice to the sick man; that plaintiff offered to stay upon the platform with the ice and to pay for its transportation, but that nevertheless the conductor rudely shut the gate, and would not let him get aboard; that the conductor following on next train permitted plaintiff to board the car with the ice wrapped in the same manner, without objection.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MARGARET ASHER, Appt.,
v.

JULIUS PEGG, Admr., etc., of Elias W. Pegg, Deceased.

(— Iowa —, 123 N. W. 739.)

Election of remedy — widow's claim — claim for services.

1. The assertion of a claim to a widow's share in a decedent's estate which fails for lack of proof of marriage is not an election of remedy so as to bar a claim against the estate for services rendered.

Note. — As to effect of choosing by mistake remedy not legally available, see notes to Clark v. Heath, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 144, and Harrill v. Davis, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1153.

As to right to recover for household services rendered while the parties were living in illicit relations, see note to Emmerson v. Botkin, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787.

Decedent's estate — claim — delay.

2. An equitable excuse for failure to file a claim for services against a decedent's estate within the time required by statute is shown where claimant was to within a reasonable time before presenting her claim prosecuting before the courts a claim to share in the estate as decedent's widow.

Same — meretricious claim.

3. A judgment denying the claim of a widow to share in the estate of decedent as his widow, on the ground that the marriage was not proved, does not of itself require the rejection of her claim against his estate for services, which was not presented within the time required by statute, on the ground that equity would not interfere because the relations between the parties were meretricious.

(December 15, 1909.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Harrison County disallowing a claim against the estate of Elias W. Pegg, deceased, for compensation for services rendered deceased during his lifetime. Reversed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

A claim in probate in favor of plaintiff against the estate of Elias W. Pegg, deceased, for $10,500 as compensation for services rendered by plaintiff to defendant in his lifetime, was disallowed by the trial court, and the plaintiff appeals.

Mr. S. H. Cochran, for appellant:

The assertion of a claim to a widow's share was not an election of remedy, barring a subsequent claim for services.

Zimmerman v. Robinson, 128 Iowa, 72, 102 N. W. 814, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 960.

Plaintiff was not required to file the claim until her status or relation to decedent was determined.

Lamm v. Sooy, 79 Iowa, 593, 44 N. W. 893; Senat v. Findley, 51 Iowa, 20, 50 N. W. 575.

Messrs. Roadifer & Arthur and C. A. Bolter for appellee.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claimant is the same person who, under the name of Margaret Pegg, asserted the right of a widow's share in the estate of Elias W. Pegg, deceased, in the case which was before us on appeal, entitled Pegg v. Pegg, 138 Iowa, 572, 115 N. W. 1027, where it was decided, affirming the decision of the lower court, that plaintiff was not the widow of deceased, not having been formally married to him, and not having occupied toward him the relation of wife under a common-law marriage. Plaintiff now asks 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that she be allowed compensation for the services rendered by her to deceased during the period of about twenty-two years, during which she lived with him, keeping house for him and assisting him in carrying on his farm, as the employee of deceased and for wages under an express contract, the evidence of which has been lost, or under an implied contract, but, in either event, not as a member of his family. This claim was resisted in the lower court on the grounds that it was not filed within the statutory period for filing claims, and that, plaintiff having elected to assert as against the estate of deceased and his heirs that she was his wife during the time these services were rendered, an assertion wholly inconsistent with her right to have compensation for such services, she cannot in this proceeding against the estate have an allowance therefor.

1. It cannot properly be said that the prior action and proceeding in which plaintiff alleged that she lived with deceased as his wife was an election of remedies precluding her from now taking a position in this action as to the facts which is inconsistent with her position formerly taken. Plaintiff could not have two remedies, or two rights of recovery, for her services, the election of one of which would preclude her from afterward resorting to the other. There is no identity whatever, either of law or of fact, between the claim asserted in the former action and the one which is now being asserted. Plaintiff entirely mistook her remedy in the former action and asserted a state of facts which did not exist; that is, which was subsequently found in the proceeding not to be established by the evidence. This was a plain case of mistake of remedy, and not election of remedy. We do not understand that it is material, in determining that there is no election where a mistaken remedy is resorted to, that it should be found the claim first asserted was in good faith. If a claim is made which, as developed in subsequent proceedings, does not exist, then the claimant is not barred from asserting in an independent action that an inconsistent claim existed entitling him to legal redress. Zimmerman v. Robinson, 128 Iowa, 72, 102 N. W. 814; William W. Pierce v. Hutchins, 205 U. S. 340, 51 L. ed. 828, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524; Water, Light & Gas Co. v. Hutchinson, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 219, 90 C. C. A. 547, 160 Fed. 41; Sullivan v. Ross, 113 Mich. 311, 71 N. W. 634, 76 N. W. 309; Bandy v. Cates, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 38, 97 S. W. 710; Calhoun County v. Art Metal Constr. Co. 152 Ala. 607, 44 So. 876.

2. It is agreed that the present claim was not filed within one year from the giving of notice of appointment by the administrator of the estate, as required by Code, § 3349; but it is agreed that the claim was filed within a reasonable time after the adjudication in this court on the appeal that plaintiff was not a common-law wife. It is contended that the pendency of the former action in the lower court, or on appeal, constituted such a peculiar circumstance as to entitle complainant to equitable relief under the exception provided in that section. It appears that the estate of deceased is solvent and remains unsettled, and we think it clear that an equitable excuse for not sooner filing the claim is made out. It cannot be said that plaintiff was negligent in not sooner filing her claim, when she was proceeding in court apparently in good faith to assert against the estate the right as widow. Sankey v. Cook, 82 Iowa, 125, 47 N. W. 1077; Wickham v. Hull, 102 Iowa, 469, 71 N. W. 352. And in general, as supporting the conclusion that under the circumstances plaintiff was entitled to equitable relief as against the statutory bar, such relief being expressly authorized by the statute, see: Lamm v. Sooy, 79 Iowa, 593, 44 N. W. 893; Senat v. Findley, 51 Iowa, 20, 50 N. W. 575; Security F. Ins. Co. v. Hansen, 104 Iowa, 264, 73 N. W. 596; Easton v. Somerville, 111 Iowa, 164, 82 Am. St. Rep. 502, 82 N. W. 475; Henry v. Day, 114 Iowa, 454, 87 N. W. 416.

But the lower court refused equitable relief to plaintiff on the ground that the peculiar circumstances justifying such relief as against the bar of the statute must be such as to appeal to the conscience of a court of equity, and justify the allowance of the claim in the furtherance of right and justice, and that the delay of plaintiff in filing her claim while she was attempting to establish a fictitious and fraudulent claim as common-law wife constituted no excuse for failing to file her claim within the statutory period, as she might have done. No doubt the court may refuse to entertain a claim not filed in time, although there is a reasonable excuse for not so filing it, if the claim itself is not such as to entitle the claimant to any relief. Lamm v. Sooy, supra. It does not appear, however, in this case, that the former action was prosecuted in bad faith. True it is that in deciding the former case on appeal this court held on the evidence before it that the pretended marriage between plaintiff and the deceased was a mere blind, and that plaintiff had not regarded herself during the lifetime of deceased as his lawful wife, although she had cohabited with him; but it is not contended in argument that the decision in the former case was an adjudication binding on the parties in this case, and no such claim could well be made, for the two proceedings are wholly distinct as to subject-matter. The point adjudicated in the former case was that the marriage relation did not exist between plaintiff and deceased. The question as to whether there had been illicit cohabitation between them was purely collateral, and not necessarily involved. There might have been a pretended marriage without such cohabitation as to render the entire subsequent relations meretricious and defeat the right of plaintiff to recover quantum meruit for lawful services actually rendered. In the absence of any other evidence than that afforded by the adjudication in the prior case that plaintiff was not the wife of deceased, the lower court was not, we think, justified in holding that the relations between the parties, so far as involved in this record, had been such as to require the denial of equitable relief to the plaintiff as against the statutory bar to her claim. As already indicated, the court denied relief to plaintiff on her own allegations.

The disallowance of plaintiff's claim by the lower court on the ground that there were no equitable circumstances warranting the court in considering it as against the plea of the statutory limitation is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in the probate court in harmony with this opinion.

Reversed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN
v.
JOHN CURRY.

(— Mich. —, 128 N. W. 213.)

Intoxicating liquor — directed verdict — question of law.

The court cannot, in a prosecution for making an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, direct a verdict of guilty, and cause the clerk to enter it, without giving the jury a chance to disobey the instruction, although the court acts upon the theory that the facts proved present the question whether or not in contemplation of law there has been a violation of the statute.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to the direction by the Circuit Court for Ionia

Note. — As to right of court in criminal case to direct a verdict of guilty, see note to Konda v. United States, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 304.

County of a verdict of guilty on the trial of an indictment charging him with violating the local option law. Conviction reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr John Nichol for defendant.

Messrs. Dwight C. Sheldon and John E. Bird, Attorney General, for the People.

Blair, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A number of young men of Ionia county, where the local option law was in force, arranged to obtain a quantity of lager beer from Grand Rapids, where such law was not in force. The arrangement was, according to the undisputed testimony, that each of the parties thereto, including respondent, was to contribute $1 to a fund which was to be used by respondent in purchasing beer, cigars, and sandwiches, and paying respondent's expenses. The refreshments, when secured, were to be delivered to the contributors at the fair grounds in the city of Ionia. In accordance with the arrangement, respondent went to Grand Rapids and purchased a half barrel and a case of beer, which was consigned and shipped to him by express, received by him, and by him caused to be transported to the grand stand at the fair grounds, where any of the contributors to the fund helped himself to as much as he chose and as often as he chose, without reference to the proportion that he had paid for. The record is silent as to whether respondent paid the dollar which he was to pay, or whether he drank any of the beer, although he remained at the fair grounds until the next morning, and shipped the empty half barrel and bottles to Grand Rapids. The circuit judge directed a verdict of guilty, and from such verdict respondent appeals, on the ground that the court should have directed a verdict of not guilty.

Respondent's counsel takes the position that since the purchase of the beer was made in a county where such purchase was lawful, and the evidence shows, as he alleges, that the respondent merely acted as the agent of the others in the shipment and delivery of the beer, he was guilty of no offense and was entitled to an instructed verdict. There would be force in this contention if the evidence disclosed that respondent had no interest in the beer and merely purchased with the money furnished to him by individuals, and delivered to each of such individuals the amount of beer paid for and belonging to him. People v. Converse, 157 Mich. 30, 121 N. W. 475. Such was not this transaction.

The witness Miller testified: Curry was to go down and get the beer.

Q. What was he to get out of it?

A. He wasn't to get nothing out of it. He was to get his expenses. He was to contribute the same as the rest of us, $1. I think we got a rebate for it, 10 cents, something like that. Somebody gave it to me the next day at Lynes's. I am not sure, I got 10 or 15 cents. He figured out the expense of the hack and everything and gave us the rebate. I don't know what the beer cost, nor what the hack hire was, and I never asked Curry his expenses. . . .

Q. As I understand it, you boys were to put up $1 apiece and somebody was to go down to Grand Rapids and get some beer?

A. Yes, sir. It was agreed that whoever went should be paid his expenses. At the time we put up the dollar apiece I didn't expect to get any money back. It was to pay for the picnic and the expenses of the parties who purchased the beer and sandwiches and cigars. That was what the dollar apiece was contributed for. The money was placed in the hands of either Bowersox or Curry. Each man helped himself to the beer he wanted. I don't know whether any beer was left in the keg or whether there wasn't. Each man had what he wanted. I considered it my own beer I was drinking. I didn't purchase any beer from John Curry, nor did he give me any, or furnish me any except as he ordered it from Grand Rapids.

Q. By Mr. Sheldon: No attempt whatever at any equitable distribution of this beer, was there?

A. No, sir.

It is clear therefore, that, under the agreement, respondent had the same interest in the beer, sandwiches, and cigars that the others had; and the testimony of all of the participants demonstrates that it was not the intention that the beer should be proportionately divided between them, but should be drunk, indiscriminately by all, in accordance with their respective thirsts and holding capacity. It is clear that if each of the parties had received individually a certain number of quarts or bottles of beer as his own property, and each had poured such beer into a receptacle to be drunk in common, he would have been guilty of furnishing such beer to the others, in violation of the local option act. People v. Myers, 161 Mich. 40, 125 N. W. 701.

It seems equally clear to us that where, as in this case, the beer is undivided and drunk in common, each person is furnishing a portion of the beer paid for by him to others, and that each of the parties to the agreement engaged in drinking the beer in question was guilty of a violation of the local option law. We are also of the opinion that, whether respondent had any pecuniary interest in the beer or not, or whether he drank any of it, he would be equally guilty with the others, if he procured the beer for them to be used as it actually was used.

We feel obliged to reverse this case, however, for the reason that in directing the verdict the court invaded the constitutional rights of respondent. In his instructions to the jury the court said, among other things: "The Court: I think the way the case stands, gentlemen, it is one for the court to dispose of. I would much rather submit the matter to the jury if based upon any facts that might warrant the court in submitting it. . . . In the judgment of this court the title and control of that property was in Mr. Curry, and by permitting others to take from what was then, in part at least, his individual property, it has been a violation of the law, and it would be your duty to return a verdict of guilty on all three counts. Take the verdict, Mr. Clerk. (Verdict received.) The Court: I think, in view of what our court have held in this class of cases, there will be an order entered giving you until the first day of next term of this court to have this matter passed upon by the supreme court; in the meantime, the respondent will remain upon the same recognizance for his appearance here until the first day of the next term of this court." These instructions really made the verdict that of the court, and not of the jury, and compel a reversal of the conviction. People v. Doyle, 160 Mich. 423, 125 N. W. 358. In view of the important nature of the constitutional right invaded, we have felt it to be our duty to consider the point, although it is not raised by respondent.

The conviction is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

McAlvay, J., concurs.

Stone, J.: I concur in the result, because of the directed verdict.

Ostrander, J., concurred with Stone, J.

Hooker, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Blair, upon the ground that, in directing the clerk to enter a verdict directed without giving the jury an opportunity to retire, the learned circuit judge gave the jury no opportunity to consider the case and disobey the instruction. The case of People v. Collison, 85 Mich. 105, 48 N. W. 292, is a case directly in point, and established the rule in this 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) state that, in a case of misdemeanor, a party has a right to expect, if not to ask, a jury to disobey the instructions of the court to find a verdict of guilty, and that the trial court must give the jury the opportunity of doing so, though we have held that a defendant was not entitled to an instruction that they might disobey the instruction of the court to find a verdict of guilty, in the case of a misdemeanor. See People v. Gardner, 143 Mich. 116, 117, 106 N. W. 541. The Collison Case has been followed since. See People v. North, 153 Mich. 616, 117 N. W. 63.

I am not convinced that where several persons send one of their number to purchase beer at a city where the purchase is lawful, and it is received by them via an express company, the one who purchased becomes liable for furnishing to one of their number, who drinks more than his proportionate share, as measured by the cost of the beer and their several contributions to the fund expended for the beer; nor am I sure that the evidence warrants the conclusion that one or more did so. The beer being owned in common, each had a right to help himself to his share, and another would not be liable as a furnisher of beer merely because one took more than he paid for. Apparently, my Brother Blair's opinion rests upon the expectation of the parties that this beer, paid for and owned jointly, would or might not be accurately divided,—a proposition that I doubt. On the other hand, I am not sure that I would withhold my assent to the doctrine that one who causes beer to be shipped to himself, or himself and others, with the understanding with his fellows that it is to be divided in proportion to their respective contributions or to be used in common, might not be guilty of unlawfully furnishing beer, if the beer was so delivered and shared by himself and others. I am unable to distinguish such a case from People v. Lapham (Mich.) 127 N. W. 366. Such would seem to be a clear case of furnishing wherever he might get the beer.

I think, also, that such act is not within the decision in the case of People v. Converse, 157 Mich. 30, 121 N. W. 475. That case holds that the shipment by express from a county in which the selling of beer is lawful, to a purchaser residing in a county where it is prohibited, and the delivery there by the agent of the express company in the due course of business, does not make such express agent the keeper of a place where liquor is given away and furnished, or of unlawfully furnishing the same, which were the charges upon which the defendant was tried. It does not hold that a private citizen living in a "wet" county may by agreement go and procure liquor, in his own county, or anywhere else, and bring it or have it brought into the "dry" county, and deliver or cause it to be delivered therein to another, and not be guilty of "furnishing" within the local option act. The Converse Case protects the agent of the express company, but it in no way sustains the claim that a party procuring and delivering liquor personally or in any other way within the dry county may escape the law against furnishing, because he does it at the request of or under employment by the person for whom it is procured, and therefore was an agent. An agent may violate the law against furnishing as well as another, in my judgment. The acts done in the "dry" county constitute the breach of the law. The case holds that the law, being penal, cannot be extended to the act of the express company and its agent in the course of business. This follows the rule requiring strict construction of penal statutes.

The conviction should be set aside, and a new trial ordered.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

FRANK L. STAPLES

v.

ALTON E. WAITE.

(30 R. I. 516, 76 Atl. 353.)

Limitation of action — change of residence — conflict of laws.

A debtor who, after contracting in the state of his residence, where his creditor continues to reside, takes up his residence in another state, may, when suit is brought there on the contract, set up its statute

Note. — See note to Thomas v. Clarkson, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 658, on the general subject of the law governing limitation of actions on contract. Upon its facts STAPLES v. WAITE seems to come clearly within the rule which obtains in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, that the limitation of actions is governed by the law of the forum, inasmuch as the exceptions made by the local statutes to this general rule were plainly inapplicable.

As to construction and effect of statute of the forum admitting bar of statute of state or country in which cause of action arises or accrues, see notes to Doughty v. Funk, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1029, and Bruner v. Martin, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 776. And see in this connection Moran v. Moran, post, 898.

of limitations, although the action is not barred by the statute of the state where the contract was made.

CERTIFICATION by the District Court for Providence County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a question arising upon the trial of an action brought to recover compensation for services rendered as an attorney. Affirmative answer returned and cause remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John P. Beagan for plaintiff.

Mr. Harry P. Gross, for defendant.

The defendant's plea of the statute of limitations of Rhode Island bars the plaintiff's action.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the provisions of § 478, court and practice act, the following question has been certified to this court by the district court of the sixth judicial district, viz.:

"In assumpsit brought in Rhode Island on a debt contracted in the state of Maine, both the plaintiff and defendant at the time said alleged debt accrued being residents of Maine, is a plea of the statute of limitations in Rhode Island a good plea in bar,—it appearing that the plaintiff, since such debt was contracted in Maine, has always been, and was at the time of bringing his 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

action, a resident of Maine; that the defendant was continuously for more than six years after such cause of action accrued, and prior to the bringing of said action, in Rhode Island, a resident of Rhode Island; and that, under the law of Maine, such debt is not barred, because a debtor's absence from that state interrupts the running of its statute of limitations?"

Sections 250, 252, and 253, court and practice act, are as follows:

"Sec. 250. All actions of account, except on such accounts as concern trade or merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors and servants; all actions on the case, except for words spoken and for injuries to the person; all actions of debt founded upon any contract without specialty, or brought for arrearages of rents; and all actions of detinue and replevin, shall be commenced and sued within six years next after the cause of action shall accrue, and not after."

"Sec. 252. If any person against whom there is or shall be cause for any action hereinbefore enumerated, in favor of a resident of the state, shall at the time such cause accrue be without the limits thereof, or, being within the state at the time such cause accrues, shall go out of the state before said action shall be barred by the provisions of this chapter, and shall not have or leave property or estate therein that can be attached by process of law, then the person entitled to such action may commence the same within the time before limited after such person shall return into the state in such manner that an action may with reasonable diligence be commenced against him by the person entitled to the same.

"Sec. 253. If any person at the time any such cause of action shall accrue to him shall be within the age of twenty-one years, or of unsound mind, or imprisoned, or beyond the limits of the United States, such person may bring the same within such time as hereinbefore limited after such impediment is removed."

When the cause of action is in favor of a resident of this state, § 252, supra, extends the time as therein provided, and as decided by this court in Cottrell v. Kenney, 25 R. I. 99, 103, 54 Atl. 1010, 1011, wherein it is said by Douglas J., in construing the similar provisions of chapter 205, Pub. Stat. 1882: "The true meaning of the statute is expressed in very plain language. The first four sections of the chapter prescribe the periods within which various common-law actions may be brought after the several causes of action accrue. This section provides for a different computation of the period of limitation in two specified cases: First, when the cause of action accrues when the defendant is out of the state; secondly, when the defendant goes out of the state after the cause of action has accrued, and before the limited time for bringing the action has expired. In both cases a new time is fixed at which the statute begins to run i. e., when the defendant comes or returns into the state in such manner that the plaintiff can begin his action against him. Under this section the coming or return into the state is analogous to a new promise in an action of assumpsit. It does not add a certain increment to so much of the prescribed period of limitation as has already passed, but it fixes a new time for the prescribed period of limitation to begin."

But, even if the plaintiff had been continuously a resident of this state from the time the cause of action accrued, he would now be barred by the six years' residence of defendant in Rhode Island, and, by the express provisions of the question submitted, the plaintiff was not a resident of this state, but was a resident of Maine at the time the cause of action accrued in his favor; nor has he ever been a resident of this state. His right of action, therefore, in this state, is dependent upon the provisions of § 250, supra, and is barred by the lapse of six years' residence of the defendant in Rhode Island after the cause of action accrued, whatever may be his right in the state of Maine, or in other jurisdictions having other statutory provisions. Having been a resident of Maine, and thus not having been without the limits of the United States, he is not aided by the provisions of § 253, supra.

The case of McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81, 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 666, 17 N. E. 75, 80, cited by the plaintiff, seems to have been placed on his brief by mistake, inasmuch as it is directly opposite to his contention. In that case the defendant made a promissory note in Maine, and then, before the statute of limitations of Maine had run, the defendant moved to New York, where he resided for more than six years. Subsequently, he was sued in Massachusetts, and Devens, J., in considering whether the action was barred in Massachusetts under the statute of that state, observes: "When this bill was brought, any action by the plaintiff in the courts of New York was there barred, as the statute of limitations of that state is found to exist; Randall [the defendant] having resided there more than six years."

been determined in other jurisdictions. Thus, in Bruce v. Luck, 4 G. Greene, 143, it was held as follows: "This suit was commenced by Thomas Bruce and others against L. P. Luck on the transcript of a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace on a promissory note in the state of Missouri in 1834. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations of 1843. To this the plaintiffs replied that they and the defendant were not residents of this state at the time the note was made; and that, although the defendant had been for many years a citizen of Iowa, still they, the plaintiffs, had continued to reside in Missouri; that said note and judgment had not been subject to the laws of Iowa until the commencement of this suit; and that therefore their right of action ought not to be barred by defendant's plea. Defendant's demurrer to this replication was sustained, and judgment rendered in his favor. On this ruling errors are assigned. It is objected that the statute of limitations is not applicable to foreign contracts or notes and nonresident plaintiffs. If the laws of other states are to prevail over the remedial statutes of our own state, if the law of the place where the contract was made is to govern in all matters affecting the remedy, there would be good reason for this objection. The doctrine seems to be settled beyond controversy that the lex fori must prevail in all matters merely remedial. In this connection no rule is better settled than that the statute of limitations of the state in which the action is brought is to prevail, and not that of the state in which the contract was made,"—citing cases. "It is not pretended that the defendant in this case was not a resident of the state from the time the statute commenced to run until the limitation had expired. The replication rested entirely upon the facts that the plaintiff had been a nonresident during that time, and that the contract was made in another state. So far as those facts are concerned, we are fully confirmed in the opinion that they cannot remove this case from the effect of the statute. Judgment affirmed." See also Home L. Ins. Co. v. Elwell, 111 Mich. 689, 70 N. W. 334; Brown v. Stone, 4 La. Ann. 235; Beardsley v. Southmayd, 15 N. J. L. 171, affirmed in Wood v. Leslie, 35 N. J. L. 472. And see Crocker v. Arey, 3 R. I. 178; Townsend v. Jemison, 9 How. 407, 13 L. ed. 194.

The cause will be sent back to the District Court of the Sixth Judicial District, with the decision of this court certified thereon, for further proceedings.

VIRGINIA RICHARDS, Appt.

SAME

v.

FRANK B. MORAN, Appt.

Conflict of laws — limitation of action — note.

1. Where, in response to notification by a person resident in one state, that he will lend money to one residing in another state, upon receipt of a note for the amount, the latter forwards the note, and the former upon receiving it sends the money, the contract is made in the state where the lender resides, and a suit upon it is governed by its statute of limitations, and not by that of the state where the maker resides.

Limitation of actions — foreign debtor.

2. The statute of limitations of the state where the maker of a note resides when it falls due does not govern an action brought upon it in the state where it is in fact payable, where the statute of that state, although prohibiting actions in its courts upon causes of action which are fully barred by the laws of the country where defendant had previously resided, states that the provisions shall not apply to causes of action arising within the state.

Will — forbidding contest — validity.

3. A provision in a will forfeiting the share of one who contests it is valid and enforceable.

Same — asserting independent title — effect.

4. An attempt to assert title to property embraced in testator's will, under an independent title, is within a provision forfeiting the share of one who contests the will, if its success would effectually upset and destroy the whole plan which testator had formed for the disposition of his estate.

Messrs. Albroom & Lundy for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In February, 1904, Selby B. Moran, a resident of Hardin county, Iowa, died testate, leaving surviving him Iowa L. Moran, his widow, and Selby A. Moran, Lee Moran, Virginia Richards, Frank Moran, George W. Moran, and Eldon Moran, children by a former wife, his only heirs at law. His will, which was duly probated, consists of seven paragraphs, as follows:

Paragraph 1 is formal only, and need not be here set out.

Paragraph 2 gives to his wife in her own right all his personal property, moneys, and credits.

Paragraph 3 is in the following words: "I devise, give, grant, and bequeath unto my said wife, I. L. Moran, in fee simple, my home farm, upon which I now reside, and described as follows: The south half of the northwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section seventeen, township eighty-seven, range nineteen west of the 5° P. M., in Hardin county, state of Iowa, to have and to hold the same as her own absolutely."

Paragraph 4 gives to his wife the use of all the rest of his real estate for one year after the testator's death.

Paragraph 5 directs his executrix to sell all the real estate not devised to his wife for the best obtainable cash price, and to distribute the proceeds, as follows: "She shall pay to my son Selby A. Moran the sum of $500, to my son Lee Moran the sum of $500, to my daughter, Virginia Richards, the sum of $500, to my son Frank Moran the sum of $500, to my son George W. Moran the sum of 500, and shall pay to my son Eldon Moran the remainder of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the net proceeds of the sale of said described premises."

Paragraph 6 is in the following words: "I further declare and provide that in case any of the legatees named as beneficiaries in this instrument shall contest the same, such beneficiary or legatee, or beneficiaries or legatees, making such contest, shall forfeit thereby his right to any portion of my estate, and the provision or legacy provided in this will for such beneficiary or legatee or legatees shall by such act become the property of my said wife, I. L. Moran, absolutely, in her own right."

Paragraph 7 appoints Iowa L. Moran the executrix of his will without bond.

After the probate of said will, Virginia Richards, Lee Moran, Frank Moran, and George W. Moran united in beginning an action in equity in the district court of Hardin county, against Iowa L. Moran, alleging that the plaintiffs therein were heirs at law of Miranda Moran, first wife of Selby B. Moran, who died intestate in the year 1885, seized of a tract of land which Selby B. Moran afterward pretended to devise to his second wife by the third paragraph of the will, hereinbefore referred to, when, in truth and in fact, said Selby B. Moran had no right, title, to, or interest in said lands which he could lawfully devise to anyone, and that his will, by which he attempted to devise or dispose of said lands, was of no force or effect against said plaintiffs, who inherited the same from their mother. This claim was based upon the allegation that the lands had been conveyed by a former owner to the said Miranda Moran by a good and sufficient warranty deed, and that Selby B. Moran, without her knowledge and consent, had fraudulently erased her name as grantee in said deed, and inserted his own in place thereof, which forged and altered deed he caused to be recorded, and, after her death in ignorance of said wrong, he had fraudulently procured a decree of the district court quieting his title in said lands against her children, all of whom, by his fraud and concealment, had been kept in entire ignorance of their rights in the premises until after his death. Upon these allegations, they sought to have the will adjudged inoperative and of no effect, so far as the same purported to devise or dispose of any of the lands alleged to have been owned by Miranda Moran, and their own title quieted thereto, against the said Iowa L. Moran. The litigation thus begun terminated in a decision by this court sustaining the devise to the second wife. Richards v. Moran, 137 Iowa, 220, 114 N. W. 1035.

While the action above referred to was still pending, Iowa L. Moran, as executrix of her husband's will, began an action against George W. Moran to recover the amount of a promissory note given by him to Selby B. Moran July 25, 1896, due six months after date, for the sum of $100, with interest at 7 per cent. By a second count of her petition therein, she pleaded the provision of the will of Selby B. Moran for a legacy of $500 to the said George W. Moran, and asked that the amount due the estate upon the said promissory note be indorsed and allowed as a payment or set-off against said legacy. By a later amendment to her petition, she further set up the sixth paragraph of the will, providing for a forfeiture of all benefits under said will by any heir contesting said instrument, and alleged that said George W. Moran, by uniting in the action above mentioned, to dispute the effectiveness of the provisions of said will, had forfeited all right to demand and recover said legacy, and asked that it be so adjudged and decreed by the court. Said Iowa L. Moran also instituted other proceedings against Virginia Richards and Frank B. Moran to have their legacies under the will of Selby B. Moran declared forfeited alleging the same grounds therefor as were assigned by her in her petition against George W. Moran. To the claim on the promissory note, George W. Moran answered, denying the execution of the instrument sued upon. In a second count he alleged that the note was made and delivered in the state of Michigan, where he then lived and has ever since resided, and that plaintiff's cause of action on said instrument is fully barred by the statute of limitations of that state, as well as by the statute of limitations of this state. George W. Moran, Frank B. Moran, and Virginia Richards severally entered their denial of the alleged forfeiture of their right to demand and receive the legacies provided for them by the will of Selby B. Moran. On the trial the executrix, in support of her claim that defendants had forfeited their legacies under the will, introduced the records and files of the action in equity hereinbefore referred to. In support of her claim upon the promissory note of George W. Moran, she introduced the instrument, which is in the following form:

July 25th. 1896.

Six months after date I promise to pay to the order of S. B. Moran one hundred dollars at 7 per cent interest. Value received.

Geo. W. Moran.

The defendant, George W. Moran, offered evidence tending to disprove the genuineness of the signature to said note, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) and plaintiff in rebuttal offered other evidence tending to sustain it. It was also shown without dispute that by the statutes of Michigan actions upon promissory notes are barred if not commenced within six years after the cause thereof accrues. On the record thus made, the district court found the plaintiff entitled to recover from George W. Moran the amount of the note sued upon, and entered judgment accordingly. Upon the issue involving the alleged forfeiture of the legacies to George W. Moran, Frank B. Moran, and Virginia Richards, the court further found that the prosecution of the action first above mentioned was a contest of the will, within the meaning of that term in the sixth paragraph thereof, and that the legacies which would otherwise have been payable to said George W. Moran, Frank B. Moran, and Virginia Richards were thereby forfeited. The defendants severally appeal. Though the issues between plaintiff and the several defendants were kept distinct and separate in the court below, we think the appeals can be disposed of without confusion in a single opinion.

The appeal of George W. Moran from the judgment rendered against him on the promissory note is submitted upon the single proposition, variously stated, that the trial court erred with respect to the operation of the statute of limitations. Our general statute governing the time within which actions may be commenced provides that claims for recovery upon promissory notes may be begun at any time within ten years after the "causes of action accrue." Code, § 3447. By Code, § 3452, it further provides that "when a cause of action has been fully barred by the laws of any country where the defendant has previously resided, such bar shall be the same defense here as though it had arisen under the provisions of this chapter; but this section shall not apply to causes of action arising within this state." The note in suit fell due December 25, 1896, and action was begun thereon November 3, 1906. It was therefore barred by the Michigan statute before the death of Selby B. Moran, and whether it is barred in this state depends upon whether it falls within the general provision of § 3452 above quoted, as contended by appellant, or within the exception mentioned in the italicized clause thereof, as contended by the appellee. As bearing upon the question whether the note is an Iowa contract, we may say that the evidence fairly tends to show that in the summer of 1896 the appellant applied to his father by letter to borrow $100. Appellant was then at his home in Detroit, Michigan, and his father at his home in Eldora, Iowa.

In response to this request, Selby B. Moran wrote to appellant under date of July 23, 1896, saying that he had no money himself, but after some effort had found where he could borrow $100. He then proceeded: "Now, George, write me as soon as you get this, and let me know if that $100 will answer your purpose, and, if you want it, you can send your note to me, and I will get it and send you draft on New York, for $100 for six months at 7 per cent." It would appear that immediately upon receipt of this letter appellant executed the note as directed, and forwarded it to his father, who then remitted the promised amount. Under such circumstances, we are quite clear that the note should be regarded as an Iowa contract, even though it was, in fact, written and signed in Michigan, and forwarded to the payee by mail. The place where the parties agree upon the terms of their contract, or where the written evidence of the agreement is prepared, is not necessarily the place of contract, within the meaning of the law. The intention of the parties with respect thereto will ordinarily prevail, and that intention may be found from the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Bigelow v. Burnham, 83 Iowa, 120, 32 Am. St. Rep. 294, 49 N. W. 104; Id., 90 Iowa, 300, 48 Am. St. Rep. 442, 57 N. W. 865; Bell v. Packard, 69 Me. 105, 31 Am. Rep. 251; Lawrence v. Bassett, 5 Allen, 140; Barrett v. Dodge, 16 R. I. 740, 27 Am. St. Rep. 777, 19 Atl. 530.

It is said, however, on authority of the case last above cited, and Tharp v. Thero, 112 Iowa, 573, 84 N. W. 709, that the contract is completed when the delivery of the note is complete, and that the deposit of the note in the mail operates as such delivery at the place of mailing. That this proposition is correct under some, and perhaps most, conditions, will be admitted, but it is certainly not a rule of universal application. Whether the contract is completed by the mailing of the note depends upon the nature of the transaction and the intent of the parties. In the Tharp Case the debt had been contracted long before the note was given, and the defendant, a resident of Colorado, proposed to plaintiff, a resident of Iowa, to transfer to him in settlement of the claim the note of a third person, and to give his own note for the remainder. The offer was accepted, and defendant made his note in Colorado, payable in Iowa, and sent it to plaintiff by mail. After the right of action had been barred by the Colorado statute, suit was brought on the note in this state, and we held that, if defendant deposited the note in the postoffice to be transmitted to the plaintiff, "intending such deposit as a delivery," it was a sufficient delivery in law to make the note a Colorado contract, and in such case the bar of the Colorado statute would operate also as a bar to the action in this state. In the instant case, however, there was no antecedent debt. The direction given by Selby B. Moran to the appellant was to make the note and send it to him in Iowa, and, on its receipt, he would obtain and remit the money. The making and mailing of the note were the incipient steps in a transaction which was to be completed in Iowa after the receipt of the paper here. No obligation rested upon the payee until that paper came to his hands. The appellant made use of the postal service as his own agent or convenience in bringing about the desired loan. The case is not materially unlike Bell v. Packard, supra, decided by the supreme court of Maine. There the plaintiff, a resident of Maine, holding an overdue note of the defendant, a resident of Massachusetts, wrote the latter, offering to surrender the note to him on delivery of a new note with surety. A new note was accordingly made and sent to the plaintiff by mail, and it was held to be a delivery in Maine and governed by its laws. It has also been held that a contract made by correspondence or negotiations between parties residing in different states is to be treated as a contract in the state where the last act is done which is necessary to give the contract validity. 3 Page, Contr. § 1718; Ivey v. Kern County Land Co. 115 Cal. 196, 46 Pac. 926. Applying this test to the case before us, the note must still be held an Iowa contract, for it had no validity and represented no obligation to pay, until presented to the payee here and the promised loan had been made. If we understand counsel correctly, they further contend that, even conceding the contract to have been completed in Iowa, yet, as the appellant was a resident of Michigan when the note fell due, the cause of action is one arising in that state, and not in Iowa. The argument is that no cause of action arises on a note until due, and it arises then only in the jurisdiction where the maker may then be sued. From this premise the conclusion is sought to be reached that as appellant was and at all times since the giving of the note has been in the state of Michigan, and might have been sued in the courts of that state immediately upon the maturity of the debt, the cause of action cannot be said to have "arisen" in Iowa. Of the authorities cited in support of this provision, none is directly in point upon the question as here presented. We must concede, however, that some of the reasoning employed in Luce v. Clarke, 49 Minn. 356, 51 N. W. 1162, and Hyman v. McVeigh, 87 Ill. 708, an unreported Illinois case, cited in Strong v. Lewis, 204 Ill. 35, 68 N. E. 556, goes far to sustain the appellants' theory; but in neither case was the court considering the effect of a foreign statute of limitations upon a domestic contract, though it does go to the extent of saying, in effect, that a cause of action "arises," within the meaning of the statute of limitations, in the jurisdiction where the defendant resides when the contract becomes enforceable by suit. We are unable to find such meaning in the language of our statute, and think the course of our own decisions compels us to another interpretation. As we have already noted, our general statute of limitations provides that "actions may be brought within the times herein limited respectively after their causes of action accrue." After further providing for giving effect to foreign statutes of limitations, it excepts therefrom "causes of action arising within this state," thus leaving this cause of action to be governed solely by the limitations of our own state. While technically speaking there is perhaps no such thing as a "cause of action" on a promissory note until it is due, and the holder is entitled to sue thereon, there is a sense in which such cause exists from the moment when the promise becomes a legal and binding obligation. True, it is an imperfect or inchoate right, but it is none the less real. The right to institute action "accrues" when, by maturity of the note and default in payment, the holder may maintain a suit thereon, but it "arises" or has its origin in the transaction which brought the obligation into existence. The two phrases—"cause of action accrues" and "cause of action arises"—are both used in our statute, and in a manner which clearly indicates an attempt to express different ideas, and the distinction we have above indicated effectuates what we think was the apparent legislative purpose. We are not without precedents in point. In Emerson v. The Shawano City, 10 Wis. 434, it is said: "A cause of action may be said to arise when the contract out of which it grows is entered into or made." Also in Steele v. Rutherford, 70 N. C. 139, a statutory phrase, "where the cause of action arose," was held to mean where the debt was contracted, and not the place of failure to pay the debt. In Lloyd v. Perry, 32 Iowa, 144, the defendant executed a note in Ohio to a citizen of that state, but moved to Iowa before the debt was due. He remained here two years, during which time the note matured, then removed to Kansas, living there long enough 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for the statute of that state to bar an action in its courts upon this obligation. Returning then to this state, suit was brought on the note, and he set up in defense the bar of the Kansas statute. The plaintiff attempted to avoid the effect of this plea by arguing that the cause of action "arose" in this state during the defendant's former residence here; hence he could not avail himself of the defense of the statute. It will be seen at once that this objection was perfectly sound if appellant's theory of the construction of the statute is correct. But the court refused to so rule, holding that "the cause of action did not arise in this state." The last clause of Code, § 3452, "but this section shall not apply to causes of action arising within this state," had its origin in chapter 167, p. 206, Acts 13th Gen. Assem. The court had occasion to cite that provision in Thompson v. Read, 41 Iowa, 48, and in construing its terms Mr. Justice Beck, writing the opinion, says: "It is presumed that the language was intended to apply to actions arising upon contracts executed in this state, and it is so construed." The same effect is given the statute in Goodnow v. Stryker, 62 Iowa, 224, 14 N. W. 345, 17 N. W. 506, and Bradley v. Cole, 67 Iowa, 652, 25 N. W. 849. It follows from these conclusions that the trial court did not err in overruling the appellant's plea of the statute of limitations.

2. We now come to the question of chief importance in this controversy,—the rights, if any, of these appellants under the will of Selby B. Moran. The first proposition of counsel is that the provision contained in the sixth clause of the will is void and of no effect, as being contrary to public policy. Testamentary provisions of this kind have received judicial consideration both in England and the United States. Upon some phases of the discussion there is no little confusion in the decisions. In this country, however, we find no authority going to the extent of holding that a testator may not under any circumstances impose upon the acceptance of his bounty a valid condition against an attack upon his will by the legatee. Without taking time to cite the cases, it may be said that some courts incline to the view that such conditions are valid only in cases where the testator names some third person to receive the legacy in the event of a breach of the condition by the legatee first named. Others sustain all such conditions attached to devises of real estate, but hold there must be a gift over upon its breach in order to make valid a condition of the same kind attached to a bequest of personality. A few courts have held the condition inoperative where the beneficiary has probable cause for the contest of the will, while still others reject all these distinctions as arbitrary, and hold the condition valid and enforceable in all cases, whether the gift be of realty or personalty, and without regard to the cause or ground of contest. The latter view appears to be the one now generally held, and to our minds is most in consonance with reason and sound principle. Bradford v. Bradford, 10 Ohio St. 546, 2 Am. Rep. 419; Thompson v. Gaut, 14 Lea, 310; Re Bratt, 10 Misc. 491, 32 N. Y. Supp. 168; Hoit v. Hoit, 42 N. J. Eq. 388, 59 Am. Rep. 43, 7 Atl. 856; Donegan v. Wade, 70 Ala. 501; Sackett v. Mallory, 1 Met. 355. The objection that such conditions are against public policy has frequently been made; but we do not find that it has ever been upheld by any court of this country. In Mallet v. Smith, 6 Rich. Eq. 12, 60 Am. Dec. 107, the only case cited by counsel for the appellant, the writer of the opinion, Chancellor Wardlaw, expressing his individual opinion, favors the view that public policy is opposed to such restriction upon the rights of the beneficiary of a will. But the court declined to follow the learned writer of the opinion to that extent, but held that such condition is valid where there is a gift over upon breach thereof. For ourselves we cannot believe that public interests are in any manner prejudiced, or the fundamental rights of any individual citizen in any manner violated, by upholding a gift or bequest made on condition that the donee waive or release his claim to some other property right, or even upon condition that he observe some specified line of personal conduct not in violation of law or contrary to good morals. The donee is under no compulsion to accept the gift. He is free to elect. The question he has to decide is the ordinary one which arises in nearly every business transaction,—whether the thing offered him is worth the price demanded. The owner of property may give or refrain from giving. He may attach to its offer such lawful conditions as his reason, caprice, or malice may dictate, but he is dealing with his own, and the donee, who claims the benefit of the gift, must take it, if at all, upon the terms offered. The rule is well expressed in Rogers v. Law, 1 Black, 253, 17 L. ed. 58. Dealing with a will which made provisions for certain heirs on condition that if they should assert any claims under certain deeds mentioned in the will, the legacies in their favor should become void, the court there says: "We entertain no doubt as to its force and validity. The condition is lawful, and one which the testator has a right to annex in the disposition of his own property. The legatees are not bound to accept the bequest, but, if accepted, it must be subject to the disabilities annexed. It must be taken cum onere, or not at all." This view of the law appeals to us as eminently sound, and the objection to the validity of the condition prescribed in the sixth clause of the will in controversy cannot be sustained.

We have left only to inquire whether the suit instituted and prosecuted by the appellants, asserting title in themselves, independent of the will, to a large part of the estate which the testator had undertaken to dispose of by that instrument, was a breach of the condition against a contest. While "contest," as used in statutes, may be treated as a "word of art," it is hardly such in ordinary use and signification. The definition by Webster is "to make a subject of dispute; to call in question; to dispute." It is frequently used in the sense of "to litigate," "oppose," "to challenge," "to resist," and, as applied to legal proceedings, it ordinarily implies a dispute between parties plaintiff and defendant before a court, which is to decide the question put in issue. It is the contention of appellant that the words "shall contest the same," as employed by the testator in the will before us, ought to be construed as referring to a direct assault upon the entire instrument as a will, upon grounds which, if established, would render it void in all its parts. That such an attack would be a contest of the will is certain, but that an attack upon the validity of a material part of the will which, if successful, would destroy the integrity of the plan adopted by the testator for the distribution of the estate, is not also a contest within the fair meaning of the words, cannot be conceded. It is argued with much earnestness that in the litigation referred to the validity of the will was not made an issue; the only question there considered being the disputed title to certain real estate. But in a very essential respect the statement is misleading. It is true the validity of the will as a will, generally speaking, was not there called in question. But that the litigation had its genesis and purpose in the proposed defeat of the will as to a large portion of the estate which it purported to devise is perfectly clear. The widow was made a party thereto both in her own right and as executrix of the will. It was alleged that she claimed title under the will, but that said devise was void and of no effect because Selby B. Moran's title to the property was fraudulent and void as against the heirs of his former wife, who was the true owner of the land at the time of her death. The land thus sought to be recovered constituted 100 of the 120 acres devised to the wife by the third clause of the will, and with this provision defeated, the whole plan and scheme which the testator had framed for the disposition of his estate would be even more effectually upset and destroyed than would have been the case had the will been refused admission to probate. Evidently the first thought of the testator was to make suitable provision for his wife. The relations between himself and some of the children had become strained, if not hostile, and, while not desiring to repudiate their claims upon his bounty, he proposed as far as possible to secure his widow in the property given her against assault by his heirs. In view of the family history in relation to this land, it is not at all improbable that in attaching a condition to the legacies given his children, he was seeking to fence against the very claim which was asserted by them in the action referred to. The suit so brought could be successfully maintained only by proof of the invalidity of the devise to the wife. The appellants therein disputed, challenged, contended against, put in issue, and sought to invalidate, an essential part of the will, and take out from under its operation a material part of the estate of which it purported to make disposition; and this, we think, was a contest of the instrument within the evident meaning of its terms. The case of Smithsonian Inst. v. Meech, 169 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. 793, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, is here quite in point. The testator, having no direct heirs, gave certain legacies to relatives of his wife, but devised the bulk of his estate to the Smithsonian Institute, including certain real estate, the title to which was in the name of his wife, whose death preceded his own. He further provided that the several legacies provided for in the instrument were made upon condition "that the legatees acquiesce in this will, and I hereby bequeath the share or shares of any disputing this will to the residuary legatee hereinafter named." After the death of the testator, certain heirs of his deceased wife, who were also legatees under his will, asserted title by descent from the wife, to the property standing in her name at the date of her death, and which her husband had undertaken to devise to the institution. They do not appear to have instituted any action to enforce their alleged rights; but, the question having been raised by them, the institution brought an action to establish its right to the property, and asked that the legacies given to the parties claiming the land adversely to the will be declared forfeited. To this action the legatees appeared and asserted title in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

themselves as heirs of the testator's wife. The court of last resort held that the act of the legatees in resisting the operation of the will according to the intent of the testator was a breach of the condition, and that the legacies were forfeited. In nearly every essential respect this precedent is directly in point with the case before us. There, as here, the husband devised lands alleged to have belonged to a deceased wife, and at the same time provided certain legacies for the wife's heirs. There, as here, those heirs sought to avoid, not the will as such, but only so much thereof as disposed of this particular property, and this was held to be a breach of the condition provided for forfeiture of the legacies. The only distinction between them urged upon our attention by counsel is in the language of the condition imposed. In the case at bar the condition is: "In case any of the legatees named as beneficiaries shall contest the same, such legatee making such contest shall forfeit thereby his right to any portion of my estate;" while in the cited case the condition is "that the legatees acquiesce in this will, and I hereby bequeath the share or shares of any disputing this will to the residuary legatee." It would be allowing the intention of the testator to be overthrown by indulgence in very finely drawn distinctions, to say that one who refuses to "acquiesce" in a will, and invokes the aid of a court to "dispute" the validity and effectiveness of one of its material provisions, does not in very obvious sense "contest" the same. The same thought has been variously expressed, but in practically every instance has been given effect. For example, a condition that if a legatee prevents or opposes the carrying out of a will, he shall forfeit his right to benefits under the instrument, is held to be violated by the act of the legatee in bringing suit against the executor individually for the conversion of property bequeathed to other legatees, but claimed by the legatee. Re Bratt, 10 Misc. 491, 32 N. Y. Supp. 168.

In another case a testator, after giving legacies to his children, devised land of which he was tenant in tail to his wife, and provided that the gifts to the children should "be void if they attempted to dispossess their mother." After the testator's death, the son, who was heir in tail, sold the land to a third party, who brought ejectment against the mother, and this was held to work a forfeiture of his legacy. Harper v. Little, 2 Am. L. Reg. 185. A contest by a husband of the legatee is a breach of such condition, where the latter takes no steps to repudiate the responsibility for the proceeding, and silently permits it to be prosecuted. Evanturel v. Evanturel, L. R. 6 P. C. 1. A legatee who unites in an agreement to reimburse another legatee in case the latter, by contesting the will, shall lose his legacy under a condition against contest, is held to have violated the condition, although not a party to the proceeding. Re Stewart, 1 Connoly, 412, 5 N. Y. Supp. 32. It will thus be seen the tendency of the courts is to look to the essence of the condition imposed upon a legacy, and give effect to the lawful intention of the testator, and they will therefore decline to put any strained or overtechnical construction upon the verbiage employed, to enable a legatee to occupy the position of one who affirms a will so far as it is to his own profit, and at the same time repudiates the validity of its provisions for the benefit of others. Such a position is inequitable. The doctrine of equitable election is not perhaps a controlling consideration in this case, but it is so nearly akin to the rule we have here affirmed that it should not be passed without notice. That doctrine is stated in Beall v. Schley, 2 Gill, 181, 41 Am. Dec. 415, and quoted in the Meech Case, supra, as follows: "From the earliest case on the subject, the rule is that a man shall not take a benefit under a will, and at the same time defeat other provisions of the instrument. If he claims an interest under an instrument, he must give full effect to it as far as he is able to do so. He cannot take what is devised to him, and at the same time [claim as his own] what is devised to another, although but for the will it would be his; hence he is driven to his election to say which he will take." In other words, he must take what the will gives him, and relinquish all claim to what the will gives another, even though it be his own property; or he must relinquish all claim to the benefits provided for him in the will, and take his chance of making good his claim to the estate or some part thereof in opposition to the will. He cannot occupy both positions; and, having chosen one and defended it to an unsuccessful conclusion, he cannot return and take advantage of the other. Hoit v. Hoit, 42 N. J. Eq. 388, 59 Am. Rep. 43, 7 Atl. 856; Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 221; Hainer v. Iowa, L. H. 78 Iowa, 250, 43 N. W. 185.

Upon the probate of their father's will, either of three courses was open to the appellants. They could yield to its terms, and by accepting the legacies abandon all claims of right in hostility to the will, or they could by proper action in court seek to have the will decreed invalid in its entirety, upon allegation of proper grounds 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

therefor, or, without asserting the invalidity of the instrument as a will, they could bring action to defeat its provisions by claiming ownership in themselves of the property of the estate independent of the will. They chose the latter course, denying the testator's title to the land, and impeaching the validity of the devise thereof by the will, and this election we think was a breach of the condition which the testator annexed to his gifts. It follows that the trial court did not err in holding the legacies to have been forfeited.

The decree appealed from in each of the entitled cases is therefore affirmed.

Evans, Ch. J., dissenting:

Upon one branch of this case I am not able to concur in the majority opinion. The question whether a provision in a will forbidding any contest thereof, under penalty of forfeiture of all legacies therein, should be given unqualified effect, is one upon which there is a diversity of opinion in the courts. The cases on the subject are comparatively few. It is perhaps true that the numerical majority of the courts which have passed upon the question have adopted the affirmative of the proposition, but some of these have done so with reluctance. I am convinced that the real merit of the argument is with the other view, and that such provision in a will is contrary to public policy, unless it be limited in its application to those contests wherein an element of bad faith enters. Under the law no will can become effective in any of its provisions until it shall have been admitted to probate by the court. Before admitting it to probate, it is the duty of the court to investigate the facts and circumstances attending its execution and bearing upon its validity, and to find judicially therefrom that such will was executed in due form, voluntarily, and understandingly by the purported testator. If the court should find otherwise, it must reject the will and refuse its probate. This duty is often, perhaps usually, performed in a formal and perfunctory manner. But the duty itself is more than formal. It is substantial and imperative, and as sincere and solemn as any other judicial investigation and determination. Manifestly, in order to attain true judicial results, the court has need to learn true facts. These must come, if at all, from those who are or were in a position to know them. In obedience to the law, a day of hearing is fixed, and notice thereof is published to the world. If the court is to learn the truth from outside sources of information, it is manifestly important that the highway of information to the court be kept open, and that there shall be no lion in the way. But here is a forfeiture provision in the purported will itself, which may be a roaring lion intended to terrorize every beneficiary of the will. Its demand is that no adverse evidence be volunteered. Its tendency is necessarily to suppress material facts, and thus to impede the administration of the law according to its true spirit. A good faith contest of a will is in strict line and in strict consistency with the duty of judicial investigation and determination imposed on the court by the law. It differs from an ex parte investigation in no sense except in degree. In the one case the court is too often compelled to grope in the dark; in the other the lights are made to burn. A contest intensifies an investigation, and adds to it zest and thoroughness; but the duty of the court remains the same. A contest in good faith is necessarily based upon facts material for the consideration of the court in determining the validity of the instrument as a will. It does not change the essential quality of the investigation, nor of the judicial determination resulting therefrom. It is not a sound answer to this argument to say: "Thus saith the testator." Did he say it? That is the very question under investigation by the court in the contest. It is necessarily involved in the question of the genuineness and validity of the alleged will. If the purported will of a purported testator should contain a proviso forbidding that it be presented for probate to any court or judge thereof and that it should be deemed the genuine will of the testator without other proof or probate proceeding, doubtless no lawyer would say that such proviso could have any effect. The question would still remain for judicial determination, whether the instrument was his will or not. If such purported will should contain a further provision forfeiting legacies therein made in the event that the first provision should be violated, doubtless again we would find unanimity of opinion as to the invalidity of such provision. The law guarantees to the living and to the dead that no instrument shall be deemed the will of the purported testator, until a judicial investigation and determination of such fact be first had. This is the law's protection to the dead and to his estate, as well as to the living. From the very nature of the case, no testator can waive it nor forbid it nor make it the basis of penalty or forfeiture. By the same logic he cannot direct the form or method of such judicial investigation, nor its extent nor its degree of thoroughness. Why, then, should he be deemed to speak through an unprobated instrument, and deemed thus to foil a thorough investigation by forbidding contest before the court,—the most practical means known to judicial experience for the disclosure of the truth?

To give unqualified effect to such provision in a will can serve no very useful purpose to the great body of wills, which can always bear investigation. Its real efficiency consists in the protection which it will afford to an instrument of doubtful validity against a free and unhampered examination. It is into this class of instruments that this provision will find its way. The number of wills which are actually contested constitutes an exceedingly small percentage of the whole number of wills presented for probate, and it is only an occasional will that is defeated for invalidity. I know there is a popular impression to the contrary, but this is a mistake in fact. For every will which is defeated hundreds are admitted to probate. When it is considered that vast property interests are carried by these instruments, and that they are often executed under different circumstances and in the last days of the last sickness, it is quite to be expected that a small percentage of them should prove to be invalid. And it does sometimes happen in very truth that a will regular in form, bearing the genuine signature of the testator in the presence of witnesses is nevertheless not his will. On the contrary, it was framed and dictated by another, and the dying man may have put to it his listless hand without knowledge to comprehend or will to resist. Into such a will the proviso under consideration will hereafter surely find a place. The dictator of such a will will be more likely to incorporate such a provision in the will than would the testator himself. On principle, therefore, and in the interest of good public policy, it seems clear to me that the contest of a will in good faith and for probable cause should not be forbidden nor penalized, nor should it be permitted to work a forfeiture of a legacy. Where a contest is in bad faith, and intentionally vexatious without probable cause, a different situation arises. This view is supported by the following authorities: Jackson v. Westfield, 61 How. Pr. 399; Rhodes v. Muswell Hill Land Co. 29 Beav. 560; Powell v. Morgan, 2 Vern. 90; Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 404; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344. In Chew's Appeal, 45 Pa. 232, the following language is used in relation to such conditions: "Undoubtedly, I think, no provision could be formed to oust the supervisory power of the law over such conditions and limitations, to control them within their legitimate sphere, which is generally to prevent vexatious litigation." In Smithsonian Inst. v. Meech, 169 U. S. 413, 42 L. ed. 800, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 402, Justice Brewer says: "When legacies are given to persons upon conditions not to dispute the validity of or the dispositions in wills or testaments, the conditions are not in general obligatory, but only in terrorem. If, therefore, there exists probabilis causa litigandi, the nonobservance of the conditions will not be forfeitures."

2. I dissent from the majority opinion for the further reason that in the case under consideration there was no contest of the will. This was the only condition specified in the will, the breach of which should work the forfeiture. The legatees were children of the testator by his first wife. What they did do was that they asserted title as heirs of their mother to an undivided interest to certain land which they claimed belonged to their mother at the time of her death. The will in question devised such land to the testator's widow. The will contained no declaration of fact as to the nature or extent of testator's title. It is held in the majority opinion that this was in effect a contest of the will because it aimed to disturb the distribution of property therein provided for. To my mind such a construction of the will enlarges its provisions, and imposes conditions as a basis of forfeiture which were omitted therefrom by the testator. A condition in a will forbidding a contest thereof, and a condition requiring the relinquishment of other rights arising to the legatee outside of the will, are essentially different from each other. And this distinction is important to be observed in this case. A condition attached to a legacy that the legatee shall receive the same in satisfaction of a claim, or that he shall relinquish certain rights, real or apparent, existing independent of the will, is clearly valid. It has in it no element repugnant to public policy, and the authorities are uniform in the support of such a condition. Such a case was Rogers v. Law, 1 Black, 253, 17 L. ed. 58, which is cited in the majority opinion. The legacies in that case were made upon condition, not that the legatees should not contest the will, but that they should relinquish all claim of right under certain specified deeds which existed independent of the will, and prior to its execution. In the case under consideration, if the testator had incorporated a condition to the legacies that the legatees should relinquish all claim of right to the real estate in question, such condition would have been clearly valid. He did not do so. The only condition imposed was that they should not contest the will. The contest of a will is a proceeding well defined and well understood. There is no room for fair argument as to what is meant by it. In the quieting title suit the plaintiffs tried no issue, nor tendered any, which could have been tried or tendered in a contest of the will. As respects the condition imposed, the language of the will is direct and free from ambiguity. Instead of following the elementary rule that a strict construction will be interposed against a claim of forfeiture, the majority opinion adopts a construction which is much broader than the language of the will. In support of this construction, Smithsonian Inst. v. Meech, 169 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. 793, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, is relied upon as a controlling precedent. But a careful reading of the opinion in that case will disclose the fact that it does not support the conclusion of the majority at this point. On the contrary, it is quite adverse to it in all its reasoning. I have already quoted from such opinion, The facts in that case were that the testator claimed to own certain real estate, the legal title to which rested in the name of his deceased wife. The will contained a recital of facts to the effect that the testator did own such property, and stating the circumstances of the purchase, and that the title was taken in the name of the wife in trust for himself, and making reference to certain affidavits and other evidence in support of his assertion of title. He first executed a will making certain legacies therein to his wife's relatives on "condition that no attempt be made to break the will." This condition was afterwards changed by substituting therefor the condition "that the legatees acquiesce in this will." And this latter condition is the one that was construed by the court. The court declared a distinction between the latter condition and the former. It was held, in effect that this latter condition was not only a condition against the contest of the will, but that it called upon the legatees to "acquiesce" in the recitals of fact contained in the will. By such construction the case was put into that class of cases wherein the legatee is required to relinquish rights arising independent of the will, such as Rogers v. Law, already referred to. I urge, therefore, that the majority opinion has no support in the cited case, and that it presents a marked departure from safe rules of construction. I think, therefore, that upon this branch of the case there ought to be a modification of the decree entered below.

Will — executory devise — destruction.

1. Under a devise in trust to one for

Note. — Will remainder contingent upon child surviving parent vest, upon death of parent during lifetime of child, but before the determination of a precedent estate outstanding in a third person.

Cases are omitted where the remainder is given to the child as an alternative remainder only in case the parent does not live to take the remainder, as, for example, where a devise is to testator's wife for life, remainder to testator's son in fee, but if he dies before life tenant, then to his issue, and in default of issue, over.

As to the time to which the contingency of the death of a legatee or devisee without child or issue, upon which a gift is conditioned, is referable, see note to Smith v. Smith, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1045.

As to character of remainder created by grant or devise to one for life, with remainder to his children, see note to Robertson v. Guenther, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 888.

The decision in LEWIS v. PAYNE finds support in Delony v. Delony, 24 Ark. 7. In that case the owner of a slave made a deed of gift thereof to her son in trust (1) for the use of grantor for life, (2) at her decease for the support of her son and his children during his life, (3) at the son's death the slave was to belong to a named daughter of the son and such other children as should survive him, and (4) if, at the son's decease, he should leave no child or grandchild surviving, then the slave was to belong to a named grandson. The son died during the existence of the grantor's life estate, leaving a daughter who survived the grantor, and then died. Although the son died during the lifetime of his mother, it was held that at the moment of his death his daughter took the slave absolutely, and that the contingency on which the grandson was to take never happened.

But the question of vesting or not vesting of a remainder depends upon the intent of the testator or grantor, and this is not 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

life, remainder to his daughter for life, remainder to her children in fee, if she leaves issue, and if she dies without issue to testator's heirs at law, the death of the daughter leaving issue vests the property in such issue, and will destroy all interests of testator's heirs, although such issue dies before the first life tenant.

Same — codicil — reference to provision in will — effect.

2. Where one, after devising property to one for life, remainder to his daughter for life, remainder to her issue in fee, gives in a codicil certain other property to the first taker, subject to the same conditions as stated in the will, the daughter and her issue take under the codicil the same interest that they took under the will,—at least where the will indicates an intention to dispose of all of testator's estate.

to be determined by an arbitrary, invariable rule, but is to be ascertained from the whole instrument; and in Paget v. Melcher, 21 Misc. 190, 47 N. Y. Supp. 244, it was held that, under the provisions of the grant there under consideration, the remainder to the child did not vest on the death of the parent during the existence of the particular estate. In that case the owner of realty conveyed it in trust for the grantor's wife for life, remainder to the grantor for life, and upon the death of the survivor of them, "to convey the said lands . . . to the children of the said . . . [grantor] in fee, the issue of any child of the said . . . [grantor] who shall have died leaving issue living at the death of the survivor of the said . . . [grantor and his wife], to take the same share the parent would if living; and, in default of issue of the said . . . [grantor] living at the time of decease of the survivor of said . . . [grantor and his wife], then to convey the same to the heirs at law of the said . . . [grantor]." The grantor died before his wife, leaving two daughters and a son, the latter of whom died before grantor's wife without having married and without leaving issue. The two daughters survived the grantor's wife. It was held that it was not the grantor's intent that any estate should vest in his children until the death of both himself and wife, and hence that a will made by the son before his decease to his mother and one of his sisters was of no effect, and that the two daughters would share the remainder equally. This case was affirmed in 26 App. Div. 12, 49 N. Y. Supp. 922, so far as this question was concerned, though modified on another point; and also affirmed in the court of appeals in 156 N. Y. 399, 51 N. E. 24. In the latter case the court said that "the provisions of the deed directing the trustee to convey to the heirs at law of . . . [grantor] in case none of his children or their issue survive, of necessity, indicate that it was not intended that the children should take a vested remainder." R. A. E.

CONSOLIDATED APPEALS by complainant and certain defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore City dismissing a bill filed for the construction of the will and distribution of the estate of Joseph Zane, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Milnes Maloy and George Moore Brady, for appellants Lewis et al.:

A testator may, in making his will, fix the absolute vesting of the different estates created by it at such times as he sees fit, within the period allowed by law, and when he has done this with reasonable certainty, the courts, in construing his will, will give effect to his wishes.

Following the life estate to Sarah Clarinda Zane is an alternative bequest which in real estate would be termed a remainder with a double aspect, but in a bequest of personal property is a quasi remainder.

The taking by Sarah Clarinda Zane being postponed until the death of the life tenant, the taking by her children being postponed until her death, no change in circumstances, such as the death of Sarah Clarinda Zane before the death of Joseph Zane, could accelerate or make transmissible the interest of children who might survive her. It would still be necessary that these children should outlive Joseph Zane. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

2 Jarman, Wills, 446; Re Rogers, 97 Md. 674, 55 Atl. 670.

The life estate to Joseph Zane is manifestly to end before any future estate is taken. To the gift to the children of Sarah Clarinda Zane, time is annexed not to the payment only, but to the gift itself.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joseph Zane of Boston, Massachusetts, died leaving a last will and testament and codicil, which were duly admitted to probate in the probate court of Suffolk county, Massachusetts, and in the orphans' court of Baltimore city. The will, which was executed the 31st of March, 1896, disposes of a large estate to his wife, brother and sister, nieces and nephews, grandnieces and grandnephews, and certain nieces of his wife. Among the numerous devises and bequests is the following provision for his nephew, Joseph Zane, of Baltimore city, and said nephew's daughter and her children: "I give, devise, and bequeath to John Grace Suman, of Baltimore, Maryland, my real estate corner of Baltimore and Carey streets, in said Baltimore, containing about 1,500 square feet of land, and the buildings thereon, and the sum of $20,000 in trust, nevertheless, for the uses and purposes following, to wit: The annual income of said real estate and of said $20,000 shall be paid by said trustee quarterly to my nephew, Joseph Zane of said Baltimore, for the full term of his natural life, and after his decease, the remainder of said real estate and said $20,000 shall go to Sarah Clarinda Zane, daughter of said Joseph Zane (my grandniece), during the term of her natural life, and to her children in fee simple, if she leaves issue; but if she dies without issue, at her decease said real estate and said $20,000 shall go to my heirs at law, discharged of all trusts." The residuary clause of the will is as follows: "All the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of which I shall die seised and possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at my decease, I give, devise, and bequeath to my heirs at law and their heirs by right of representation, in fee simple," etc. In March, 1899, the testator executed a codicil in which he confirms his said will, "so far as this codicil is consistent therewith," and, after a number of devises and bequests therein, disposes of the entire remainder of his estate as follows: "All the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, wheresoever it may be found and of whatsoever it may consist, I desire it to be divided into three equal parts, and disposed of as follows: To my nephew, Joseph Zane, one part, subject to the same trusteeship and conditions as stated in my will of March 31, 1896. To my niece, Ellen Amelia Zane Clairage, one part. To my niece, Georgianna Kelly, one part."

John Grace Suman declined to accept the trust created by the above provisions of the will and codicil, and William J. O'Brien, Jr., of Baltimore city, was by the probate court of Suffolk county, Massachusetts, appointed trustee in his place, and the entire trust estate created by said provisions of the will and codicil, consisting, as now invested, of Baltimore city ground rents and mortgages on property in Maryland, and amounting to about $65,000, was in possession of said substituted trustee at the time of the filing of the bill in this case, and until he was, by an order of the court below in this case, appointed receiver to take and hold the same until the further order of said court. Sarah Clarinda Zane, the daughter of Joseph Zane, of Baltimore City, referred to in the above paragraph of the testator's will, who survived the testator, married Pinckney T. Payne, had one child, Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., and died on the 15th day of July, 1905, leaving her said child, an infant, and her husband surviving. Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., the infant, also died in the lifetime of Joseph Zane of Baltimore, leaving surviving him his said father, Pinckney T. Payne. Joseph Zane of Baltimore is now dead, and after his death the trustee of one of the heirs at law of the testator filed the bill in this case against the testator's other heirs at law, William J. O'Brien, as trustee and as executor of a deceased heir at law, and Pinckney T. Payne, alleging, among others, the facts we have stated, claiming the property devised and bequeathed to Joseph Zane by the will and codicil, and asking for a construction of said will and codicil, the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, and for a partition of the same among those entitled thereto. Pinckney T. Payne demurred to the bill, and the three appeals in the record in this case are by different defendants from the decree of the court below sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill.

The contention of the appellants, in respect to the property mentioned in the above paragraph of the will, is that Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., the infant child of Sarah Clarinda Payne, having died before the expiration of the equitable life estate of Joseph Zane of Baltimore, the estate he would have taken had he survived his grandfather passed by the terms of the will to the heirs at law of the testator; and in respect to property devised and bequeathed to Joseph Zane of Baltimore by the codicil, that the testator did not intend that, after the death of Joseph Zane, it should go to said nephew's daughter and her children, according to the provisions of the will relative to the property therein given to said nephew.

It is insisted that Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., did not, at the time of his death, have a vested interest in the property; but in this we think the appellants are clearly wrong. The will gave alternative contingent remainders, first, to the children of Sarah Clarinda Zane, if she left any, and, if she died without leaving issue, then to the testator's heirs at law. During the life of his mother, the interest of Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., was contingent, depending for its vesting upon his surviving her, and the remainder in favor of the testator's heirs at law was contingent upon Sarah Clarinda Payne's dying without issue. Upon the death of Mrs. Payne leaving a child, the only contingency upon which the remainder in favor of her children depended by the terms of the will had happened, and her child took a vested remainder, thereby destroying all possibility of a future interest in the heirs at law of the testator, whose remainder was limited to take effect only upon the death of Mrs. Payne without issue. It is said in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 417, that "the rule that a remainder cannot be limited after a fee simple does not forbid the limitation of two or more remainders in fee simple, as substitutes or alternatives the one for the other; that is, on such contingencies that only one of the remainders can possibly vest. Such limitations are variously called contingencies with a double aspect, or gifts on a double contingency, or gifts or devises on two alternative contingencies. Each of such fees is a remainder in regard to the particular estate, but none is a remainder in regard to any other of them." The same rule is stated in 2 Washburn on 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Real Property, 6th ed. § 1575, as follows: "Notwithstanding a remainder limited after a remainder in fee would be void, yet two remainders may be so limited, though each a fee, as to be good, provided this is done that only one is to take effect; the one being a substitute for, and not subsequent to, the other. The consequence is that, if the first takes effect and becomes vested, the other at once becomes void. Such limitation is said to be of a fee with a double aspect."

In the case of Demill v. Reid, 71 Md. 175, 17 Atl. 1014, the testator devised certain property to his son, Henry J. Willett, in trust for his grandson, John Willett Belt, for life, "and from and immediately after the decease" of said grandson, to the children of said Belt, to be "divided between them as tenants in common." His will further provided: "But in case the said John Willett Belt should depart this life without leaving a child or descendant thereof living at the time of his death, or in case he should have a child, children, or descendants of the same living at the time of his death, and such child, children, descendant, and descendants should all subsequently depart this life under lawful age, and without issue living at the time of his, her, or their decease, then in trust that the said principal estate and property shall go to and become the property of the children of my said son, Henry J. Willett," etc. Judge Miller, in disposing of that case, said: "As to the character of the estates thus created, we have no difficulty. It is a clearly established general rule in the construction of wills that a limitation which may operate as a remainder shall not be construed an executory devise. Here there is first a life estate given to the grandson, Belt, and upon his death alternative contingent remainders in fee are limited, first, to the child or children of Belt, if he leaves any which shall attain lawful age, or die before that time leaving issue, and failing this then to the children of the testator's son Henry. If Belt had left a child who attained the age of twenty-one or died before that time leaving issue, the fee would have vested in such child or issue, and such vesting would forever have excluded any possible future interest in the children of Henry J. Willett. Their interest took effect only upon the failure of the preceding contingency. There are, therefore, here two contingent fees, not limited to take effect the one upon or after the other, but the one to take effect to the entire exclusion of the other, and the falling out of the contingencies is to decide which of the two is to take effect."

Demill v. Reid is so conclusive as to the character of the estates with which we are dealing in this case, and has been so frequently cited and relied on in this state, that it is not necessary to do more than refer to some of the cases. Larmour v. Rich, 71 Md. 369, 18 Atl. 702; Re Banks, 87 Md. 425, 40 Atl. 268; Nowland v. Welch, 88 Md. 48, 40 Atl. 875.

It is claimed, however, that these cases do not apply because of the outstanding life estate of Joseph Zane of Baltimore, and that the remainder in favor of the child and of Mrs. Payne could not become vested until after the death of the first life tenant. But that view is not warranted by any reasonable construction of the will. By its terms it was to be determined at the death of Mrs. Payne which of the alternative remainders was to take effect. If she left issue, they were to take to the exclusion of the heirs at law of the testator. No other time was appointed, and the remainder to her children was not dependent upon any other contingency. It could not, of course, vest in possession until after the death of Joseph Zane of Baltimore, but the right of Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., to the possession of the estate after the death of the life tenant, became a certain and vested right upon the death of his mother. The fact that his possession of the property had to await the determination of the preceding life estate did not make the remainder a contingent remainder. It is said in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 389, that "the true criterion of a vested remainder is the existence in an ascertained person of a present fixed right of future enjoyment of the estate limited in remainder, which right will take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the precedent estate, irrespective of any collateral event, provided the estate in remainder does not determine before the precedent estate." In Cox v. Handy, 78 Md. 108, 27 Atl. 227, 501, Judge Bryan, after stating the test by which a vested remainder may be known, given in 1 Preston on Estates, 70, adopts the following statement of the rule by the chancellor in Moore v. Lyons, 25 Wend. 144: "For where a remainder is so limited as to take effect in possession, if ever, immediately upon the determination of a particular estate, which estate is to determine by an event which must unavoidably happen by the afflux of time, the remainder vests in interest as soon as the remainderman is in esse and ascertained, provided nothing but his own death before the determination of the particular estate will prevent such remainder from vesting in possession." In Fearne on Contingent Remainders, vol. 1, Butler's ed. *216, the author says: "It is not the uncertainty of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ever taking effect in possession that makes a remainder contingent, for to that every remainder for life or in tail is and must be liable; as the remainderman may die, or die without issue, before the death of the tenant for life. The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested remainder from one that is contingent."

Applying the rule as stated to the remainder of Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., if the preceding life estate had determined any time after his mother's death and before his death, he would have come into possession of the estate, and his remainder after his mother's death was, therefore, a vested remainder, and, being in fee, upon his death before the expiration of the life estate of Joseph Zane, it passed, so far as it is real estate, to his heirs at law, and, to the extent that it is personal property, to his personal representative, subject to said life estate. Cox v. Handy; Re Rogers, 97 Md. 674, 55 Atl. 679; Roberts v. Roberts, 102 Md. 131, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 782, 111 Am. St. Rep. 344, 62 Atl. 161, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 805.

In respect to the one third of the residue of the estate devised and bequeathed by the codicil to Joseph Zane, "subject to the same trusteeship and conditions as stated in my will of March 31, 1896," it is claimed by the appellants that these words do not mean that Joseph Zane's daughter and her children were to have the property after his death according to the terms of the devise and bequest to them in the will; but we think they are also wrong in this contention. By his will the testator gave all the rest and residue of his estate to his heirs at law. This provision of his will was, as was said in O'Brien v. Clark, 104 Md. 30, 64 Atl. 53, changed by his codicil, in which, after making a number of additional bequests, he directed all the rest and residue of his estate, of every kind, to be divided into three equal parts, and one of these parts he gave to his said nephew, Joseph Zane, as stated, and the other two parts he gave to his two nieces, one part to each. He thereby intended to dispose of his entire estate, and to give the whole residue thereof, after the devises and bequests previously made, to these two nieces and his said nephew; yet, if the contention of the appellants be sound, the testator did not dispose of the remainder of the third given to his nephew after the expiration of his life estate, and to that extent he died intestate, for it must be conceded that his said nephew took only an equitable life estate in the third devised and bequeathed to him. There is nothing in the will to justify the suggestion that the testator only intended to dispose of a life estate in the third given to his nephew; on the contrary, the whole tenor of his will and codicil clearly indicates his intention to dispose of his entire estate, and to give to his nephew's daughter and her children, if she left any, the share he was to enjoy for his life only. What, under the circumstances, do the words "subject to the same trusteeship and conditions stated in my will of March 31, 1896," naturally suggest? Can we infer that the testator, when disposing of his entire estate, meant to limit the devise and bequest to a life estate? There is nothing in either the will or codicil indicating a desire on the part of the testator to withhold from his nephew's daughter and her children the share intended for him. The only reasonable conclusion, in the absence of some provision in the will or codicil indicating a contrary intention, is that the testator, in disposing of the residue of his estate, and desiring his nephew to have one third of it, had in mind the provisions of his will relative to the previous gift to him, and that he intended all of those provisions to apply also to his share of the rest and residue of his estate. In Lavender v. Rosenheim, 110 Md. 154, 132 Am. St. Rep. 420, 72 Atl. 670, Judge Pearce quotes the following statement of Judge Alvey in Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 75, 19 Atl. 146: "It is very clear from all the provisions of the will, that the testator intended to dispose of all his estate, and that he did not contemplate the possibility of a state of intestacy as to any part of his estate, with respect to any event or for any interval of time. . . . As said by Lord Alvanley, M. R., in Booth v. Booth, 4 Ves. Jr. 407: 'Every intendment is to be made against holding a man to die intestate, who sits down to dispose of the residue of his property.'"

The appellants rely mainly on the case of Buchanan v. Lloyd, 64 Md. 306, 1 Atl. 845, 6 Atl. 171. In that case Governor Lloyd by his will, after making provision for his widow, disposed of his estate to his sons and daughters and his daughters' children. The shares of his daughters were left in trust. He devised and bequeathed to his three sons, Edward, James M., and Daniel Lloyd, in trust for his daughter Elizabeth Tayloe Winder for life, with remainder to her children, a farm and $5,000. Similar provisions were made for his other daughters, and, after various bequests of personal property, the testator, by a residuary clause of his will, bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to his three sons, to be equally divided between them. By a codicil the testator, after ratifying his will except so far as altered by the codicil, bequeathed to his two sons, Edward and James M. Lloyd, "in special trust, agreeably with the provisions of my said will, the sum of $5,000 (in addition to the $5,000 devised in my said will); . . . for the use and benefit of my said daughter, Elizabeth Tayloe Winder." After Mrs. Winder's death her children claimed the $5,000 bequeathed to her by the codicil. Judge Alvey interpreted the words "in special trust, agreeably with the provisions of my said will," to mean "upon the same trust as that specified in the will, namely, to hold for the life of Mrs. Winder, and no longer," and then says: "And the question is whether, upon the will and codicil together, there is any such manifest intention, by implication or otherwise, that the property thus bequeathed by the codicil for the life of Mrs. Winder should go to her children at her death, as in the preceding devise by the will, and thus withdraw the property from the operation of the residuary clause of the will. Of course, it is very clear that, if there be no such limitation over in favor of the children, the property passed under the residuary clause; for it is too obvious to admit of serious question that Mrs. Winder did not take more than an equitable life estate in the property given her by this particular clause of the codicil. It is certainly a well-settled principle that the will and codicil are to be construed together as one instrument, and are to be reconciled as far as practicable. But what is plainly given by the will is not to be revoked or withdrawn by doubtful or ambiguous expressions employed in the codicil. Here the effort is by construction, and in total absence of plain words expressive of any such intention, to give an effect and operation to a clause in the codicil whereby the residuary clause of the will must be curtailed of the subject-matter of its operation."

It is apparent that there is a marked difference in the words employed in the two wills. Following the construction adopted by Judge Alvey, if the testator in this case had said, "subject to the same trusteeship as stated in my will of March 31, 1896," it would have been interpreted to mean that the property was to be held in trust for the life of Joseph Zane. But that is not what the testator said. The gift to his nephew was not subject to the same trusteeship as stated in the will, but subject to the same trusteeship and conditions as stated in the will. If "subject to the same trusteeship as stated in the will" would have meant that his nephew was only to have an equitable life estate, what significance is to be given to the additional qualification, that it was to be subject also to the same conditions as stated in the will? It can only mean that the devise and bequest was to be subject to all the terms and provisions contained in the will relating to the property there given to his nephew. Moreover, in the case referred to the effect of the claim of Mrs. Winder's children would have been to withdraw the $5,000 from the operation of the residuary clause of the will, by which the testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his sons, and it was that feature of the case that largely controlled the court in reaching its conclusion. Here the effect of the contention of the appellants would be not only to withdraw the fee in the third given to Joseph Zane from the operation of the residuary clause of the codicil, but to also defeat the obvious purpose of the testator to dispose of his entire estate. So, if we adopt the reasoning of the court in Buchanan v. Lloyd, it furnishes ample authority for withholding our assent to the claim of the appellants in this case; and in the later case of Buchanan v. Lloyd, 88 Md. 642, 41 Atl. 1075, the court, in construing a somewhat similar clause in the codicil to said will in favor of another daughter of the testator, held that the name of the legatee in the codicil was used in a representative sense and meant the legatee and her children.

After carefully considering all the provisions of the will and codicil in this case, we can reach no other conclusion than that Pinckney T. Payne, Jr., the infant child of Sarah Clarinda Payne, took, at his mother's death, a vested remainder in the property devised and bequeathed by the will and codicil in trust for Joseph Zane of Baltimore city, for life, etc., and that the heirs at law of the testator have no interest in this property. The decree of the court below, sustaining the demurrer of the appellee and dismissing the bill, must therefore be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs, in each appeal.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

DRUSILLA A. MORSE

v.

ALFRED OSBORNE, Guardian of Doris A. Morse.

(— N. H. —, 77 Atl. 403.)

Parent and child — adoption — issue.

An adopted child is not issue within the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

meaning of a statute giving a widow certain rights in her husband's estate in the absence of issue of the marriage, although the statute provides that an adopted child shall, for the purpose of inheritance by it and all other legal consequences and incidents of the natural relation of parents and children, be deemed the child of the parents by adoption.

Note. — Do terms "child," "children," "issue," etc., in statutes governing distribution of decedent's estate include adopted children.

As to whether the terms "child," "children," "issue," etc., in a will, include adopted children, see note to Re Leask, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1159.

As to the right of an adopted child to inherit property from a relative of its adoptive parent, see note to Hockaday v. Lynn, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 120.

As to right of child adopted in another state to take under local statute of descent and distribution, see notes to Irving v. Forc, 65 L.R.A. 186; Brown v. Finley, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 679; and Finley v. Brown, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1285.

As to the legal status of an adopted child in general, see note to Warren v. Prescott, 17 L.R.A. 435.

The terms "children," etc., include both children by birth and by adoption in a number of states (see N. D. Rev. Code 1899, § 5112; S. D. Civ. Code 1903, § 2446; Okla. Rev. Laws 1903, § 2785), but as the purpose of this note is simply to compile the adjudication on the question under annotation, no attempt has been made to collect the statutes which themselves define the meaning of the terms involved.

Cases of legitimation of a bastard child are included only in case the child is treated as having been adopted.

The cases involving the questions under discussion have arisen principally in four different classes of cases, namely: Those in which statutes defining the rights of the surviving wife were involved; those respecting statutes providing for the revocation of a will by birth of issue, etc.; those construing statutes involving the right of the adopted child, himself, to inherit; and those in which an attempt has been made to include an adopted child in the terms "child," "children," etc., as used in collateral inheritance tax laws; and the cases will be taken up in the order mentioned.

In general the statutes of descent and distribution must be understood as laying down general rules of inheritance, and not as completely and accurately defining how the status is to be created which gives the capacity to inherit. Generally, they do not undertake to define the various terms used, or to state what is necessary to constitute the various legal relations involved. Since these requisites must be looked for elsewhere, the statutes of adoption, which usually define, at least to some extent, the status

TRANSFER by the Superior Court for Hillsboro County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of an appeal by plaintiff from a decree of the Probate Court in plaintiff's favor for less than was demanded in a proceeding for a division of the real estate of Joseph G. Morse, deceased. Appeal sustained.

Plaintiff's husband, Joseph G. Morse, died leaving as his only heirs his wife, Drusilla A. Morse, and defendant's ward, Doris A. Morse, an adopted daughter. Plaintiff executed a release of her dower and homestead rights in the estate of her deceased husband, and under Public Statutes, chapter 195, §§ 10, 11, claimed title in fee to one half of such real estate, on the ground that the deceased left no issue whatever surviving of the child adopted, must be looked to, in order to determine the rights of an adopted child under the statutes of distribution. However, statutes of adoption, which define the rights of adopted children, are not included in this note, except in so far as a consideration of such cases has been necessitated by questions arising upon the distribution of a decedent's estate, as to the scope of the terms "child," "children," "issue," etc. The statutes of adoption, being in derogation of the common law, are, of course, strictly construed, and to this fact the decisions which limit the rights of adopted children under the statutes of descent and distribution are undoubtedly due.

As interpretations of statutes depend almost entirely upon the peculiar statutes involved, a decision considering one statute is of little value in considering another, and for this reason the cases are set out rather fully, and where important, the essential part or parts of the statute or statutes involved have been given.

As affecting right of surviving widow.

The decision in MORSE v. OSBORNE is not supported by the weight of authority. On the other hand a decided majority of the cases hold an adopted child to be within the meaning of the words "children," "issue," etc., as used in the statutes of descent and distribution.

Thus, the terms "children" and "issue," as used in a statute providing that the lands and personality of an intestate descend "first to his children," but "if an intestate leaves issue, his widow shall have one third, and if no issue" one half, of the surplus personality, and the use for life only of the lands, include adopted children, which have inheritable rights, so that the surviving widow is only entitled to one third of the surplus personal state. Drain v. Violet, 2 Bush, 155.

An adopted child, which has "all the rights of a child and heir," and is entitled to share the inheritance with the natural born children, if any, of the adopting parent in case of intestacy, "as if all had been 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

him. The probate court held the adopted child to be issue within the meaning of the statute, and decreed plaintiff to be entitled to a one-third interest only.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Branch & Branch, for appellant:

The statutory definition of the word "issue," as well as its natural definition, excludes adopted children from its meaning.

the lawful children of the same parent," is issue, within a statute limiting the widow's interest in the adopting husband's estate to a one third in case he died intestate leaving issue, she having refused to take under a will, and having elected to take the share of the estate to which she would be entitled had her husband died intestate, the court saying that to hold otherwise would be to disregard the plain provision and evident purpose of the act, and to render the adoption of no effect. Rowan's Estate, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 461, affirmed in 132 Pa. 299, 19 Atl. 82.

And an adopted child is issue, under a statute providing that, as to surplus personality, "if the intestate leaves issue" his widow shall have one third, where the adoption statute makes the adopted child capable of inheriting as though the child of the adopting parents, and this is not affected by the fact that the adoptive father left a will, if the widow renounces its provisions. Atchison v. Atchison, 89 Ky. 488, 12 S. W. 942.

And an adopted child is "issue," within the meaning of a statute providing that where a husband dies intestate, and "leaves no issue living," his widow shall receive a certain portion of his land, the adoption statute providing that an adopted child shall inherit from his adopting parent as if born to such parent in lawful wedlock. Buckley v. Frazier, 153 Mass. 525, 27 N. E. 768, cited in MORSE v. OSBORNE.

An adopted child of the husband is a child capable of inheriting, within the meaning of a statute providing that where the husband die without any child or other descendants in being, capable of inheriting, his widow shall be entitled to one half the husband's real and personal estate absolutely, where, under the adoption statute, the adopted child becomes, for all purposes of inheriting from the adopting parents, their lawful child, so as to prevent the widow taking one half under the statute. Moran v. Stewart, 122 Mo. 295, 26 S. W. 962, cited in MORSE v. OSBORNE, and approved on subsequent appeal in 132 Mo. 73, 33 S. W. 443. The decision is also ap-affirmed in 161 N. Y. 11, 76 Am. St. Rep. 238, 55 N. E. 311; Jenkins v. Jenkins, 64 N. H. 407, 14 Atl. 557.

Mr. Alfred Osborne in propria persona.

Parsons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The status of an adopted child, unknown to the common law, may now be created in nearly all the states by proceedings authorized by legislative action. 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 917. As such status is entirely created by statute, the numerous and conflicting decisions with reference thereto, based upon the varying language found in the different enactments, are of little value in the present inquiry.

Is an adopted child "issue" within the proved in Moran v. Moran, 151 Mo. 558, 52 S. W. 378.

An adopted child is a child, within the meaning of a statute giving the widow of a testator the right to renounce the will and elect to take one half the property in lieu of dower, where the testator leaves no child, where the adoption statute provides that the child adopted shall be deemed the lawful child of the testator for the purpose of inheritance. Sayles v. Christie, 187 Ill. 420, 58 N. E. 480.

In Markover v. Krauss, 132 Ind. 294, 17 L.R.A. 806, 31 N. E. 1047, cited in MORSE v. OSBORNE, the words "children alive, by a former wife," were held to include a child adopted by a man and such wife, within the meaning of a statute limiting the interest of a subsequent childless wife of such man to a life estate.

But a child adopted by a man after the death of his wife and their child is not, as to a wife whom he married after the adoption, a child of the former marriage, within the meaning of such a statutory provision limiting the interest of the subsequent wife upon his death. Isenhour v. Isenhour, 52 Ind. 328.

In Stanley v. Chandler, 53 Vt. 619, cited in MORSE v. OSBORNE, where, by special legislative act, a child was adopted by the husband and made his legal heir at law, to which proceeding, as well as to the adoption, the wife did not consent, it was held that such child was neither "child" nor "issue," within the meaning of the general statutes of decents, so as to allow him to inherit as a natural child to the exclusion of the widow. The decision seems to have been based on the question of the legislative power to deprive a wife without her consent of her inchoate interest in her husband's property, and therefore should not be regarded as in conflict with the authorities holding a child adopted with the consent of the wife to be issue.

As effecting revocation of will.

The decisions are conflicting as to whether the adoption of a child will effect a revocation. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

meaning of §§ 10-13, chap. 195, Pub. Stat., which give the surviving husband or wife certain rights in the estate of the deceased wife or husband, dependent upon whether such deceased left issue of the marriage or no issue whatever surviving? Under § 11 of the chapter the appellant upon the facts stated is entitled in fee to one third of her husband's real estate if he left issue by her surviving him, and to one half "no issue whatever surviving him." "The word 'issue' means child, grandchild, or other lineal descendant." Kimball v. Penhallow, 60 N. H. 448. In common understanding the word includes natural descendants, and not children by adoption. Jenkins v. Jenkins, 64 N. H. 407, 14 Atl. 557; Stanley v. Chandler, 53 Vt. 619; New York L. Ins.

cation of a previously drawn will in the same manner as subsequent birth of issue.

A child adopted after a will is made is within the meaning of a statute of distribution providing that, on the birth of a child after the making of a will, unless an intention to disinherit it shall appear from the will, the devises and legacies shall be abated in equal proportions, to raise a portion for such child equal to that which such child would have been entitled to receive out of the testator's estate had he died intestate, where, by statute, an adopted child, for the purpose of inheritance, is declared to be in law the child of the parents the same as if he had been born to them in lawful wedlock. Flannigan v. Howard, 200 Ill. 396, 59 L.R.A. 664, 93 Am. St. Rep. 201, 65 N. E. 782.

And a will is revoked by the testator's subsequent adoption of a child, under a statute which provides that the subsequent birth of a legitimate child to the testator before his death will operate as a revocation of his will, where the adoption statute, without exception or qualification, declares that all rights, duties, and relations between the parent and child by adoption, shall be the same that exist by law between parent and child by lawful birth. Hilprie v. Claude, 109 Iowa, 159, 46 L.R.A. 171, 77 Am. St. Rep. 524, 80 N. W. 332.

Marriage and adoption of a child will revoke a will in favor of a third person not made in contemplation of marriage, where marriage and birth of issue would do so, where the statute provides that an adopted child shall be deemed, for purposes of inheritance and succession and all other legal consequences and incidents of the natural relation of parents and children, the same, to all intents and purposes, as if he had been born in lawful wedlock of such parents of adoption. Glascott v. Bragg, 111 Wis. 605, 56 L.R.A. 258, 87 N. W. 853.

And in Sandon v. Sandon, 123 Wis. 603, 101 N. W. 1089, it was held that a child adopted under the statute set out in Glascott v. Bragg, supra, subsequent to the making by the adopting father of a will in no way

& T. Co. v. Viele, 161 N. Y. 11, 20, 76 Am. St. Rep. 238, 55 N. E. 311; Phillips v. McConica, 59 Ohio St. 1, 69 Am. St. Rep. 753, 51 N. E. 445. "The word 'issue,' as applied to the descent of estates, shall include all the lawful lineal descendants of the ancestor." Pub. Stat. chap. 2, § 20. Upon the question whether an adopted child is issue, the statutory definition gives but little aid, for the question is whether by force of the act of adoption the child has acquired the status of, or has become, a lawful lineal descendant of the adopting parents. In Jenkins v. Jenkins, supra, the statute appears to have been regarded as defining the word "issue" to mean "heir of the body." The question in that case was the meaning of the word "issue" in a will probated long before either the adopting or defining statutes were passed; and, inasmuch as the legislative definition was given for use in the construction of statutes (Pub. Stat. chap. 2, § 1; Comm'rs' Rep. R. S. p. 1, note), the reliance thereon in Jenkins v. Jenkins adds but little support to the undoubtedly sound result reached. But the judicial view therein taken in 1887 is doubtless entitled to some weight in ascertaining the meaning given to the word when introduced in 1891 into the statute defining "the rights of the husband or wife surviving, in the estate of the deceased husband or wife."

The statute providing for the adoption of children was enacted in 1862. Laws 1862, chap. 2603. Section 4 is: "A child so referring to such child, was within the meaning of a statute providing that any child "born after the making of his parent's will," in which no provision is made for him, shall have the same share as if he had died intestate, unless it shall be apparent from the will that it was the intention of the testator that no provision should be made for him.

But in Davis v. Fogle, 124 Ind. 41, 7 L.R.A. 485, 23 N. E. 860, it was held that a child adopted after the making of a will was not born legitimate issue of the testator, within the meaning of statutes giving the adopted child all the rights and interest in the estate of the adopting father, by descent or otherwise, that he would have if the natural heir, and providing that if, after the making of his will, the testator shall have born to him legitimate issue, such will shall be deemed revoked, unless provision shall have been made in such will for such issue, although no provision was made in the will or otherwise for the adopted child.

In Re Comassi, 107 Cal. 1, 28 L.R.A. 414, 40 Pac. 15, it was held that the adoption of a stranger in blood is not equivalent to having issue of a marriage, within the meaning of a statute respecting the effect of issue to work a revocation of a will.

In Theobald v. Fugman, 64 Ohio St. 473, 60 N. E. 606, it was held that designated heirs not of the blood of the testator, who by statute were deemed and held to stand in the same relation, for all purposes, to the declarant as if born in lawful wedlock, were not "issue of the body," within the meaning of a statute declaring any devise and bequest to charity made less than one year before the testator's death, void, if he left any issue of his body.

And if a natural child would have been cut off by a will not mentioning it, an adopted child is likewise cut off, where by statute the legal effect of an adoption is to put the person adopting and the child adopted in the relation of parent and child, accompanied by all the legal consequences of that relationship. Re Gregory, 15 Misc. 407, 37 N. Y. Supp. 925. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

As determining right of adopted child to inherit.

In Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321, Chief Justice Gray said that the terms "children," "child," "issue," "if he leaves no issue," and "kindred," as used in the general statutes of descent in force in Massachusetts in 1873, which provided that the realty of an intestate shall descend "in equal shares to his children, and to the issue of any deceased child by right of representation; and if there is no child of the intestate living at his death, then to all his other lineal descendants, etc. 'Second. If he leaves no issue, then to his father. Third. If he leaves no issue nor father, then in equal shares to his mother, brothers, and sisters,' etc. 'Eighth. If the intestate leaves a widow and no kindred, his estate shall descend to his widow; and if the intestate is a married woman and leaves no kindred, her estate shall descend to her husband. Ninth. If the intestate leaves no kindred, and no widow or husband, his or her estate shall escheat to the commonwealth,'" included an adopted child, which by the adoption statute was deemed, for the purpose of inheritance and other legal consequences of the natural relation of parent and child, to be the child of the parent by adoption, so as to allow it to inherit from its adoptive father in preference to a brother of such father.

In California, where by statute an adopted child is "regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting," and is to "have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of the legal relation of parent and child," the word "issue," as used in a statute providing that if the decedent leave no surviving husband or wife, but leave issue, the estate goes to such issue, "issue" being used in the sense of "child" or "children," was held in Re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, 16 Pac. 887, to include an adopted child.

In Power v. Hailey, 85 Ky. 671, 4 S. W. 683, it was said that the words "kindred" and "children," as used in the statutes laying down the general rules of inheritance, adopted shall be deemed, for the purposes of inheritance by such child, and all other legal consequences and incidents of the natural relation of parents and children, the child of the parents by adoption, the same as if he had been born to them in lawful wedlock; except that he shall not be capable of taking property expressly limited to the heirs of the body or bodies of the parents by adoption." Substantially the same language, with some verbal changes and an addition immaterial upon the present question, forms the existing statute. Pub. Stat. chap. 181, § 5. The purpose of the statute is to define the status of, and to confer the right of inheritance upon, the adopted child,—not to regulate the rights of the surviving adopting parent in the estate of the one deceased.

In 1842, in the Revised Statutes the husband's common-law right of curtesy was recognized in the provision for the descent of real estate subject to that right. Rev. Stat. chap. 166, § 1. The only other statutory reference thereto prior to 1862 appears to be in the reservations to the husband of such right in the acts in relation to married women. Laws 1846, chap. 327; Laws 1860, chap. 2342. Subsequent enactments enlarging the property holding capacity of married women contain similar reservations, while the present statute gives the husband an estate by the curtesy "when he would be entitled to hold as tenant by the curtesy at common law." Pub. Stat. chap. 195, § 9. As the common law did not recognize the status of an adopted child, it seems clear that the statutory adoption of a child was not intended to invest the husband with the common-law right of curtesy. It was so held in a recent case. Murdock v. Murdock, 74 N. H. 77, 65 Atl. 392.

included adopted children, which are by statute made the legal children of their adopted parents.

A legally adopted child, which is made by statute to all intents and purposes the child of its adopters, the same as if born to them in lawful wedlock, is a "lineal descendant" of them, within the meaning of a statute providing that in case a legatee mentioned in a will shall die before the testator, his share shall not lapse, but go to his lineal descendants. Warren v. Prescott, 84 Me. 483, 17 L.R.A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370, 24 Atl. 948.

In Thomas v. Maloney, 142 Mo. App. 193, 126 S. W. 522, it was held that an adopted child was entitled to the rights of a "permitted heir," under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 4611, so as to entitle her to a distributive share of the estate of her adoptive father, which he had willed to another without mention of the adopted child, notwithstanding the absence of a specific agreement that such child should inherit in like manner as a natural offspring.

In Clarkson v. Hatton, 143 Mo. 47, 39 L.R.A. 748, 65 Am. St. Rep. 635, 44 S. W. 761, it was held that "children" and "heirs" of a life tenant to whom a remainder was given by statute, under a deed to a person and his "bodily heirs," do not include an adopted child, where there was no law authorizing an adoption of children at the time of the enactment of such statute, and the adoption was not made until after the life estate vested. The decision was upon the ground that a life tenant could not destroy the vested right of all statutory heirs by an adoption, and therefore is not in conflict with either Moran v. Stewart or Moran v. Moran, supra.

But in Barnes v. Allen, 25 Ind. 222, it was said that children adopted by the husband only were not the "children by marriage" of his widow, within the meaning of a statute providing that, in case of her subsequent marriage and death, real estate coming to her by the former marriage should go to her children by that marriage; and also that they were not children of the first marriage, within the statutory provision for a reversion to the children of such marriage after the death of the subsequent wife of the adopting father.

And in Keith v. Ault, 144 Ind. 626, 43 N. E. 924, it was held that an adopted child of a deceased husband, but not of the wife, is not entitled to the protection of a statute providing that in case of the widow's subsequent marriage and death, real estate coming to her by the former marriage should go to her children by that marriage, notwithstanding the statutory provision that an adopted child shall receive all the rights and interest in the estate of the adopting father which a natural heir would be entitled to.

But in Patterson v. Browning, 146 Ind. 160, 44 N. E. 993, it was held that a child adopted alone by the wife's deceased husband is her forced heir, within the meaning of a statute providing that if a man marry a second or subsequent wife, and has by her no children, but has children alive by a previous wife, the land which at his death descended to such wife shall at her death descend to his children, the adoption statute providing that an adopted child shall have all the rights and interest in the estate of the adopting father which a natural heir would be entitled to. The court states that its conclusion is not inconsistent with Kirth v. Ault, supra, for the reason that such case was founded on a different statute. But notwithstanding this, the principle involved is practically the same, and it would seem that the present law of Indiana is as laid down in this case. It should also be noted that in the Patterson Case a dissenting opinion was rendered in which objection was made to extending the doctrine to a case where the wife did not join in the adoption.

In Phillips v. McConica, 59 Ohio St. 1,

In 1862 the widow's share in her husband's estate, in addition to homestead and dower, depended in part upon whether or not the husband left a lineal descendant. Comp. Stat. 1854, chap. 175, §§ 2, 9, 12. As it is clear the legislature did not understand that the husband's right in his wife's real estate was increased by the capacity of inheriting from the wife conferred upon an adopted child, it is reasonable to conclude that it was not understood the wife's right in her husband's estate was diminished by the capacity of the adopted child to inherit from the husband. The child was rendered capable of inheriting from each, but the rights of husband and wife in the property of the other were not disturbed.

The term "lineal descendant," in the statute determining the right of the wife in the husband's estate, appears in Gen. Stat. 1867, chap. 183, §§ 7-12. In the General Laws, in similar provisions, for "lineal descendant" was substituted "child or the issue of any child." In this revision the provisions on the subject in behalf of both parties are first grouped together. Gen. Laws, chap. 292. That the change from "lineal descendant" to "child or the issue of any child" was not made for the purpose of including adopted children appears from the history of the section directly involved (§ 11), under which the right claimed depends upon a release of dower and homestead by the widow. Nute v. York, 66 N. H. 541, 23 Atl. 420. This section originated in 1892. By that act the widow of every person, whether leaving lineal descendants or not, by waiving her dower and homestead and the provision by will in her favor, if any, and releasing her distributive share, could take one third of the estate after payment of debts and expenses. Laws 1872, chap. 41. This act was in addition to the provisions of the General Statutes

69 Am. St. Rep. 753, 51 N. E. 445, cited in MORSE v. OSBORNE, an adopted child was held not to be "issue," within the meaning of a statute providing that when a legatee dies before the testator, the legacy lapses, unless such legatee was a child or relative of testator, and left issue surviving, on the ground that issue in such case must be of the blood of the testator and of the deceased child or other relative by birth, although the adoption statute provided that an adopted child "shall be to all intents and purposes the child and legal heir of the person so adopting him or her, entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to all the obligations, of a child of such person begotten in lawful wedlock."

As affecting inheritance tax.

Cases construing inheritance tax laws which expressly exempted children adopted in conformity of law (as, for example, Re Butler, 58 Hun, 400, 12 N. Y. Supp. 201, and Re Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 Pac. 10), and those persons standing in the "mutually acknowledged relation" of children to the deceased, such as Re Spencer, 1 Connoly, 208, 4 N. Y. Supp. 399, have been excluded.

The collateral inheritance tax laws are without exception construed strictly against adopted children, and in no known instance has an adopted child been construed to be within the meaning of the general terms "child," "children," "issue," etc., as used in such laws.

Thus in Re Miller, 110 N. Y. 216, 18 N. E. 139, affirming 47 Hun, 394, it was held that the word "children" in a statute exempting "children" born in lawful wedlock from the payment of a collateral inheritance tax did not include an adopted child. However, the New York statute (Laws 1885, chap. 483) has been by amendment 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(Laws 1887, chap. 713) changed so as expressly to include adopted children in the exemption.

In Com. v. Nancrede, 32 Pa. 389, an adopted child having the right to inherit was held not exempted, within the meaning of a collateral inheritance tax law exempting property devised to children and lineal descendants, the court saying that giving an adopted son a right to inherit did not make him a son in fact.

And the same is true of an adopted child which by statute was made capable of taking and inheriting any estate from the adopting parents as fully and effectually as if he were their own child born in lawful wedlock. Tharp v. Com. 58 Pa. 500; Packard's Appeal, 37 Phila. Leg. Int. 135; Com. v. Ferguson, 137 Pa. 595, 10 L.R.A. 240, 20 Atl. 870.

And the same is true where the adopted child is invested with "all the legal rights of a legitimate daughter and legal heir." Wayne's Estate, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 93.

An adopted child not of the testator's blood is not "lineal issue," within the meaning of an act imposing a succession tax on legatees and distributees classified with reference to their degree of blood relationship to the deceased, lineal issue being in one class and strangers in blood being in another, although such child was entitled to all the rights of heirship of a child born in lawful wedlock. Kerr v. Goldsborough, 80 C. C. A. 177, 150 Fed. 289.

An adopted child which by statute has all the rights of a legitimate child in the estate of the adopting person, when not related by blood to him, is neither an ascendant nor a collateral, within the meaning of a law imposing an inheritance tax upon inheritances to ascendant and collateral relatives of deceased whose estate is being distributed. Frigalo's Succession, 123 La. 71, 48 So. 652.

G. J. C.

in her favor. Colby v. Cate, 64 N. H. 476, 13 Atl. 864.

In 1877 the act of 1872 was modified by the provision that it should not be in force "if there are any children of the testator or intestate by any former wife, or the issue of any such children, living at the time of his death." Laws 1877, chap. 38, § 1. As the law then was, nothing stood in the way of the widow's taking one third of the estate upon execution of the prescribed waivers and release, except the existence of children of the husband by a former wife, or the issue of such children. The commissioners preparing the revision known as the General Laws, in compiling these provisions, made the widow entitled to one third the real estate in fee under the same circumstances, "when the husband leaves any child or the issue of any child surviving him, and to one half when he left no child or issue of any child surviving him." Comm'rs' Rep. Gen. Laws, chap. 196, §§ 9, 10. The commissioners apparently intended to restore the act of 1872, giving the widow the right to take one third of her husband's estate in every case, and to make a new provision giving her one half of the estate when he left no child or issue of a child surviving him; but the legislature substituted for § 9 the provision making the right to take one third in fee dependent upon the existence of a child of the marriage. In the language of the statute, she could take one third when the deceased left "any child by her, or the issue of any child by her, surviving him" (Gen. Laws, chap. 202, § 9), while the adoption of § 10 as proposed by the commissioners gave the widow the right to take one half if the deceased left no child or issue of a child surviving him. It seems probable that the same meaning would be attached to the word "child" in each section dealing with subjects so closely connected.

Referring to the act of 1877, it is apparent that the child surviving the widow not her own, which would prevent her taking one half the estate, was a child of the deceased by a former wife. Whatever rights of inheritance the statute of adoption gives the adopted child, the child by adoption cannot, without doing violence to the ordinary meaning of English words, be spoken of as the child of one of the parents by the other. Neither can an adopted child be said to be the child of the deceased husband by a former wife. It is probable the words were used in their ordinary sense, and so they must be interpreted, in the absence of evidence tending to show a contrary purpose. There is nothing here to justify the conclusion that when a natural child was described, an adopted child was also intended. The word "issue" was substituted for "child or the issue of any child," in the Public Statutes, without intent to change the meaning. Comm'rs' Rep. Pub. Stat. chap. 194, §§ 10, 13. An adopted child is not issue within the meaning of §§ 10, 11, chap. 195, Pub. Stat., and, as the intent of the legislature was to give the husband the same rights in the estate of the wife that she would have in his, were he dead and she living (Gen. Stat. 1807, chap. 164, § 4; Hayes v. Seavey, 69 N. H. 308, 46 Atl. 189), the same word has the same meaning in §§ 12 and 13. The conclusion in Murdock v. Murdock, 74 N. H. 77, 65 Atl. 392, is reaffirmed. In case of adoption, the adopting parents take the same part of the other's estate upon the death of either that they would have taken if they had not adopted the child.

The contrary conclusion in other jurisdictions has not been overlooked. In Missouri, where the right of the widow to take one half in fee in lieu of dower is dependent upon the husband's dying without leaving a child capable of inheriting, it is clear that an adopted child, being made capable of inheriting, is within the statute. Moran v. Stewart, 122 Mo. 295, 26 S. W. 962. The Massachusetts statute that the word "child" shall include adopted child helps the conclusion in Buckley v. Frasier, 153 Mass. 525, 27 N. E. 768. Other cases not so readily distinguishable are not of sufficient weight to overthrow the plain meaning of the simple words of the statute. The vigorous dissent in Markover v. Krauss, 132 Ind. 294, 17 L.R.A. 806, 31 N. E. 1047, upon the ground that "by no course of legitimate reasoning can the conclusion be reached that a child by adoption is a child by a former wife," does not seem open to logical answer.

LUELLE HOLMES.

Probate court — decree — recital of jurisdiction — necessity for.

Homestead — childless widow — rights against heirs.

2. When a husband dies seised in fee of land occupied and used by himself and family as a homestead, his surviving wife, although without children, is entitled, by reason of § 1607, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, as against his heirs, to occupy and possess the whole of such homestead as long as she preserves its homestead character by maintaining a home thereon.

Same — rights of heirs to partition.

ERROR to the District Court for Kingfisher County to review a judgment dismissing a petition for the partition of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. W. Hinch, for plaintiffs in error:

A single individual cannot claim the right to a homestead.

Rock v. Haas, 110 Ill. 528; Dendy v. Gamble, 64 Ga. 528; Woodworth v. Comstock, 10 Allen, 425; Woodbury v. Luddy, 14 Allen, 1, 92 Am. Dec. 731; Betts v. Mills, 8 Okla. 351, 58 Pac. 957.

Note. — When homestead deemed "otherwise disposed of according to law" within statute providing for its continuance until that time.

The decision in HOLMES v. HOLMES, holding that under a statute providing for the continuance of a homestead until "otherwise disposed of according to law," the right of the surviving spouse to the homestead is not terminated by the final administration of the deceased spouse's estate, is based on the decision in Fore v. Fore, 2 N. D. 260, 50 N. W. 712, where a like holding was made under a statute containing an identical provision.

In Iowa a like provision is in force, and in that state a subsequent section enacts that "the setting off of the distributive share of the husband or wife in the real estate of the deceased shall be such a disposal of the homestead as is contemplated in the preceding section."

In Nicholas v. Purcell, 21 Iowa, 265, 89 Am. Dec. 572, it was held under this statute that a wife surviving her husband was entitled to possess and occupy the whole homestead without partition by the heirs of the husband, and that that right was not affected by the words of the statute "until it is otherwise disposed of according to law." To the same effect is Dodds v. Dodds, 26 Iowa, 311. In the former case the court said: "That language may refer to cases where the homestead is liable for an antecedent debt, as provided for in § 2281 [1249] of the Revision; or to cases where the title of the owner is less than a fee, and terminates under conditions annexed to the title by contract or by law; or to cases of alienation, by the parties having right to convey, or other cases not needful to mention."

So the surviving widow does not take a fee in the homestead property and the homestead right is terminated by an attempted conveyance in fee, and her grantee will not become invested with the possessory homestead right which the widow would have had if she had not sold it and had remained in possession. Size v. Size, 24 Iowa, 580.

It is held that in order to make the subsequent section operative the distributive share must be set apart during the survivor's life and an attempt to claim this right in the will of the surviving spouse in lieu of the homestead, is of no effect where such spouse resided on the homestead until his death. Darrah v. Cunningham, 72 Iowa, 123, 33 N. W. 445; Mobley v. Mobley, 73 Iowa, 654, 35 N. W. 691.

And where a surviving husband occupies the homestead premises until his death the homestead character of the estate is not lost although he had commenced proceedings to have his distributive share set apart, and the proceedings were pending at the time of his death. Burdick v. Kent, 52 Iowa, 583, 3 N. W. 643.

Continued occupancy of the homestead by a surviving spouse, in the absence of an election to take a distributive share, will be deemed an election to claim the homestead right. Holbrook v. Perry, 66 Iowa, 286, 23 N. W. 671; Thomas v. Thomas, 73 Iowa, 657, 35 N. W. 693.

But the surviving spouse has a reasonable time in which to make an election between a distributive share or a right of homestead. Cunningham v. Gamble, 57 Iowa, 40, 10 N. W. 278.

It has been held that the occupancy by a surviving spouse of the premises as a homestead for more than ten years amounts to an election to take a homestead for life. Conn v. Conn, 58 Iowa, 747, 13 N. W. 51.

And where a surviving wife occupies the homestead premises for six years she elects to retain the homestead notwithstanding the fact that in the meantime she began and abandoned proceedings to have her distributive share set apart, and executed a mortgage on her undivided share to secure a debt, and just prior to her death she proposed to execute another mortgage. Zwick v. Johns, 89 Iowa, 550, 56 N. W. 665.

In Smith v. Zuckmeyer, 53 Iowa, 14, 3 N. W. 782, the surviving spouse elected to take his homestead right in lieu of his

The surviving wife, where there are no minor children, can continue to hold as a homestead what was prior to the death of the decedent the homestead of the husband or wife.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs in error, who originally brought this action in the district court of Kingfisher county, seek by it to obtain a decree adjudging them as the heirs of Edwin M. Holmes, deceased, to be each the owner of an undivided one-fourteenth interest in 80 acres of land situated in Kingfisher county, and grant them a partition thereof. The judgment of the trial court was against them and dismissed their petition. Judgment was rendered upon the pleadings without the introduction of any evidence.

It is not necessary to set out the pleadings in full, and only such parts will be stated as are necessary to present the question of law which we are asked by this proceding to decide. For several years prior to the 5th day of September, 1905, defendant in error, Lucella Holmes, resided with her husband, Edwin M. Holmes, upon the land in controversy as their homestead. The fee simple title thereto was owned by the husband. On said mentioned date, Edwin M. Holmes died intestate, and left surviving him his wife, defendant in error, without children. Plaintiffs in error are the brothers of the deceased. In November, 1905, an administrator of the estate of the deceased was appointed, and upon application of defendant in error the land in controversy was set aside to her as a homestead. The administration of the estate was proceeded with, and all the debts of decedent were paid from his personal estate. Whereupon notice of final settlement was given, at which time plaintiffs in error appeared before the probate court, made proof of their heirship, and obtained a judgment of that court decreeing them to be each the owner of an undivided one-fourteenth interest in said land. Since the death of Edwin M. Holmes, defendant in error has continued to occupy the land as her homestead. The pleadings disclose that she alone occupied said premises at the time of the institution of this suit. Plaintiffs in error contend in their brief that the order setting aside the homestead to defendant in error like mortgage, and one on the undivided interest of one of the heirs which she had acquired, and then filed a petition to have her distributive share assigned and a decree therefore was entered but set aside on petition of the heirs, she cannot then claim the homestead and defeat the mortgage liens. Wilcox v. Wilcox, 89 Iowa, 388, 56 N. W. 517.

Where a surviving wife has her dower set off in such a way as to include the dwelling house and part of the land comprising the homestead she cannot maintain a claim for the balance as a homestead right. Meyer v. Meyer, 23 Iowa, 359, 92 Am. Dec. 432; Whitehead v. Conklin, 48 Iowa, 478.

Where a widow appealed from a decision of the court requiring her to elect between her distributive share and her homestead right before the amount of the debts of the husband's estate were ascertained, the theory being that she had elected to hold under her homestead right by remaining in possession of the premises, it was held that her appeal arrested the proceedings in the case so far as to forbid the court to then require the widow to make her election. Thomas v. Thomas, 73 Iowa, 657, 35 N. W. 693.

error was void, because it was made without notice to them.

Whether the order of the probate court setting aside to defendant in error the homestead was made without notice to the heirs is not presented by the pleadings. No allegation to that effect is made in plaintiffs' petition. Defendant attaches to her answer as an exhibit said order, and the order fails to recite that notice was given; but failure of the order to recite that notice was given to the heirs, if such notice to them is jurisdictional (which we do not decide), does not impeach the order, for, by § 1478, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, it is provided that the proceedings of a probate court are to be construed in the same manner and with like intendments as the proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction, and records, orders, judgments, and decrees shall be accorded like force, effect, and legal presumption as the records, orders, judgments, and decrees of district courts. And the orders and decrees of the probate court need not recite the existence of facts or the performance of acts upon which the jurisdiction of the court depends. Section 1780, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. It is sufficient, except as otherwise provided, that the order contains the matters ordered or adjudged, and there is no provision of the statute requiring that the order setting aside the homestead to the surviving wife or husband shall recite that notice was given to the heirs. In order for plaintiffs to have raised the questions whether notice to them of application for the order setting aside the homestead was jurisdictional, it was necessary for them to have alleged such failure of notice. The record does not disclose what facts relative to defendant in error's then being the head of the family were before the probate court when the order setting aside to her the homestead was made; and we are not informed whether the order was made upon the theory that she was then the head of the family because of having someone dependent upon her, or that she is entitled to occupy and use the homestead as the surviving wife, although she be without children or other persons dependent upon her. The pleadings do disclose, however, that she is at this time occupying the premises alone, without anyone dependent upon her; and the question now presented for decision is: Has the surviving wife, without children, the right to retain possession and occupy the whole homestead, the title to which was owned by her deceased husband? A decision of this question incidentally involves the question: To whom did the title to the homestead descend upon the death of Edwin M. Holmes? If, as contended by counsel for defendant in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

error, the surviving wife succeeded to the title to the land, it is then immaterial what her homestead rights therein are, for plaintiffs in error would have no interest which would authorize them to maintain this action. By §§ 6894 and 6895, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. it is provided that property, both real and personal, of one who dies intestate, shall pass to the heirs of the intestate subject to the control of the probate court; and, when any such intestate shall have title to any estate not limited by marriage contract, it is succeeded to and must be distributed, except as otherwise provided in the Code and the chapter on Probate Courts, in the following manner: First, where there are children, the estate goes to the surviving husband or wife and the children. The share each receives is dependent upon the number of children, and is fixed by the statute. Second, where decedent leaves no issue, that estate goes in equal share to the surviving husband or wife and to decedent's father; but if there be no father, then one half goes to the surviving wife or husband and the other half to the brothers and sisters of decedent; and if he leaves a mother also, she takes equal shares with the brothers and sisters. Subsequent paragraphs provide for succession, if decedent leaves surviving no issue, husband or wife, or father or mother, etc.

By reason of said § 6895, defendant in error as the wife of decedent succeeded to one half of all his estate, both real and personal, and plaintiffs in error to the other half in equal shares, unless their rights are affected by other statutes, which is the case. Section 1607, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. reads: "Upon the death of either husband or wife, the survivor may continue to possess and occupy the whole homestead until it is otherwise disposed of according to law; and upon the death of both husband and wife, the children may continue to possess and occupy the whole homestead until the youngest child becomes of age. And in addition thereto, the following personal property must be immediately delivered by the executor or administrator to such surviving wife or husband, and child or children, and is not to be deemed assets, namely: First. All family pictures. Second. A pew or other sitting in any house of worship. Third. A lot or lots in any burial ground. Fourth. The family Bible and all school books used by the family, and all other books as a part of the family library not exceeding in value $100. Fifth. All wearing apparel and clothing of the decedent and his family. Sixth. The provisions for the family necessary for one year's supply, either provided or growing, or both; and fuel necessary for one year.

Seventh. All household and kitchen furniture, including stoves, beds, bedsteads, and bedding, not exceeding $150 in value. The executor or administrator must make a separate and distinct inventory of all the personal property specified in this section, by articles, and opposite each article give the appraised value of the same, in dollars and cents, as given in the general inventory of the appraisers appointed by the court, and return the same to the probate court, and no such property shall be liable for any prior debts or claims whatever." Section 1608 provides that, in addition to the property mentioned in § 1607, there shall also be allowed and set apart to the surviving wife or husband, or the minor child or children of the decedent, all such personal property or money as is exempt by law from levy and sale on execution, to be, with the homestead, possessed and used by them. Section 1613 provides that, when the personal property is set apart for the use of the family in accordance with §§ 1607 and 1608, the same shall become the property of the surviving wife or husband, if there are no minor children; and if there are minor children, one half of the same shall become the property of the widow or surviving husband and the other one half shall go to the minor child, if there be one; and if there be more than one, then one third of such property belongs to the surviving widow or husband and the remaining in equal shares to the minor children. This section determines to whom the title of the personal property which is set aside from the estate for the use of the family shall go; but it makes no provision relative to the title to the homestead or any other real estate of a decedent. Section 1607 does not provide that the title shall pass to the surviving husband or wife or to the children; it provides only that the husband or wife, and upon the death of both of them, the children, shall have the right to continue to possess and occupy the whole homestead for the time therein provided; and no other section of the chapter on Probate Courts or of the Code provides who shall succeed to the title to the homestead. The descent of such title, therefore, is governed by § 6895; and in this case, there being no children, the decedent leaving no father or mother, plaintiffs in error, as his surviving brothers, succeed each to one-fourteenth interest in the fee of the homestead, and defendant in error, as his surviving wife, succeeds to the other one-half interest. Do they succeed to such interest subject to any homestead right of decedent's family and the members thereof? If so, what is the extent of that right? In the language of § 1607 is found the answer to this question: 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The surviving wife or husband "may continue to possess and occupy the whole homestead until otherwise disposed of according to law; and upon the death of both husband and wife, the children may continue to possess and occupy the whole homestead until the youngest child becomes of age."

It is contended by counsel for plaintiffs in error that the phrase "until it is otherwise disposed of according to law" limits the right of the surviving husband or wife to occupy the homestead to the period during the administration of the estate; and that it is contemplated that when the estate is finally administered, that right ceases, and the homestead is to be partitioned as the other real estate of the decedent. What was intended by this language of the statute is not entirely clear, but that it was not intended that the homestead should become a part of the estate subject to administration and to the payment of the debts and liabilities of the decedent is made manifest by § 1610, which provides that the homestead shall not be subject to the payment of any debts or liabilities contracted by or existing against the husband or wife, or either of them, previous to or at the time of the death of such husband or wife, except as provided in the law relating to homesteads. As was said by the court in Fore v. Fore, 2 N. D. 260, 50 N. W. 712, in construing a statute of that state in the identical language of § 1607, there are various ways by which, under the law, the right of occupancy of the homestead may be terminated. It may be sold for taxes, or upon foreclosure of any mortgage thereon executed by both husband and wife, or upon execution to enforce judgment for the purchase price or any part thereof, or in the enforcement of a mechanics' lien. A termination of the homestead right under any of the foregoing procedures would be a termination thereof within the meaning of the phrase "until it is otherwise disposed of according to law;" and we think the legislature in the use of such language had in contemplation the termination of the homestead right by such methods, rather than intended to provide that the right of use and occupancy conferred by § 1607 should be only temporary and be terminated with the administration of the estate. It is clear that it was not intended that such right should be terminated upon the death of both husband and wife, when there are children; for it is provided that such right shall continue until the youngest child becomes of age.

But it is insisted that the surviving wife must be the head of the family in order to be entitled to possess and occupy the homestead, under the provisions of § 1607; and the case of Betts v. Mills, 8 Okla. 351, 58 Pac. 957, is cited as deciding this question favorably to the contention of plaintiffs in error. In the second paragraph of the syllabus to that case, it is held that the provisions of § 1607 do not confer upon the single survivor of the family, husband or wife, the right to continue to occupy and possess the whole homestead; that such right is dependent upon the survivor's being the head of the family. This conclusion was reached after it had been found that the evidence in the case established that the homestead claimant had abandoned the premises claimed by him as his homestead, and for that reason he would not be entitled to hold the same as exempt from execution, even though his not being the head of a family did not defeat his right to continue to hold his homestead upon the death of his wife. The question decided by the court in the syllabus was presented by the issues in the case; and, although a decision thereon was not absolutely necessary to dispose of the case, such decision is not dixtum. Florida C. R. Co. v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 118, 26 L. ed. 327; Clark v. Thomas, 4 Heisk. 421; Kane v. McCown, 55 Mo. 181. But we think that because the first question decided disposed of the case and required an affirmance of the case, regardless of the conclusion reached by the court upon the question decided in the second syllabus, the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court in that case reached his conclusion without giving to the question that consideration and investigation which characterize his opinions and the importance of the question demanded. He announces his conclusion without citing or referring to any authority upon the real question decided. The authorities cited in the opinion all go to the question of what constitutes a family, and as to what is essential to make one the head of a family. We think the construction given the statute in that case is within neither its letter nor spirit. The exemption of the homestead is a creation of statutory law; and the provisions of the statutes of the various states thereon are by no means uniform, and it is somewhat difficult to make a strict classification of the decisions upon this or any other question arising under the homestead statutes. It is the almost uniform rule that an existence of a family is essential to the acquisition of a homestead; but when a homestead has once been acquired, there is some division among the authorities whether the continuation of the homestead depends upon the continuation of the family, and is destroyed by the breaking up of the family by death of the wife or husband, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) without children, or by the children departing from the homestead.

There is nothing in the letter of § 1607 that makes the right of the surviving wife or husband to use and occupy the homestead depend upon the decedent's leaving children surviving him or her. The language of the statute is: "Either the husband or wife, the survivor, may continue to possess," etc.,—not, "either the husband or wife, the survivor, if there are children, may continue," etc. At the time of the decision in the case of Betts v. Mills, supra, the exemption of the homestead of the family was reserved to the head of the family. Section 2985, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. Under this statute it was held that a wife was not entitled to a homestead out of her own land, nor the husband entitled to a homestead belonging to his wife; and that the exemption thereof was a right conferred only upon the head of the family, and applied only to property the title to which was owned by the husband. McGinnis v. Wood, 4 Okla. 499, 47 Pac. 492. Section 2985 was amended by an act of the territorial legislature, approved March 15, 1905 (Sess. Laws 1905, p. 255), so as to provide that the homestead shall be reserved to every family as exempt, instead of the head of the family, whether the title to the same is lodged in or owned by the husband or wife. We do not consider, however, that this change in the statute has any effect upon the question involved here, because the existence of a family under both statutes is essential to an acquisition of a homestead. The beneficent purpose of both statutes is to preserve and protect the home in the possession and enjoyment of not only the head of the family, but all the members thereof, against the exaction of creditors, the improvidence or misadventure of the head of the family, upon whom the members thereof are dependent for support. It seems to us that it would be a construction strained and foreign to the spirit of the statute, to hold that it was intended, so long as the husband, who may by labor support his wife, to protect the wife against the misfortune of being deprived of her home to satisfy the debts of the husband, who perhaps has suffered a business failure or financial loss; but when the hour of death comes, with its sorrow and the expenses that sickness and death entail upon the family, the law will then withdraw from her the shield that protected her in her home while her husband lived, and let the accumulated misfortunes or improvidences of the husband, that the law has withheld until the dark hour of his death, be then visited upon her. This would indeed be converting that which was intended for a shield into a sword. Not only do we think the decision in Betts v. Mills, supra, against both the spirit and letter of the statute, but, so far as we have been able to ascertain from an investigation of authorities, it is against the weight of authority construing statutes the same or similar to the one under consideration. In Arkansas, where the exemption of the homestead is reserved to a person who is married or the head of the family, it is held that the existence of a family is necessary to the acquisition of a homestead, but that, when once acquired and still occupied by the owner, it is not lost by death of his wife and the arrival of the children at the age of maturity, or their removal from the premises. Stanley v. Snyder, 43 Ark. 429; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wooster, 66 Ark. 382, 74 Am. St. Rep. 100, 50 S. W. 1000; Baldwin v. Thomas, 71 Ark. 206, 72 S. W. 53.

In Taylor v. Boulware, 17 Tex. 74, 67 Am. Dec. 642, where the statute exempts "the homestead of a family," the death of the wife without children does not terminate the homestead exemption in behalf of the husband, where he continued to reside thereon. In Silloway v. Brown, 12 Allen, 30, it is said: "Although a homestead estate cannot be acquired except by a householder having a family, yet when once acquired and still occupied by him, it has been held not to be defeated or lost by the death or absence of his wife and children. Doyle v. Coburn, 6 Allen, 73. Any other construction would render a husband who had been deprived of his family by accident or disease or by their desertion, without any fault of his, liable to be instantly turned out of his homestead by his creditors." "It seems to be settled, on general principles, that a homestead once acquired by the head of a family will not be defeated or lost by the death or absence of his wife and children, if he continue to occupy it." Beckmann v. Meyer, 75 Mo. 333. Fore v. Fore, 2 N. D. 260, 50 N. W. 712, is another case in point. In construing a statute the same as § 1607, it was held that when the decedent leaves a widow, but no minor child, and dies seised in fee of land occupied and used by himself and family at the time of his death, his surviving widow is entitled, as against his heirs or devisees, to occupy and possess the whole of such homestead as long as she preserves the homestead character by maintaining a home thereon. Other cases either in point or containing reasoning that supports the rule which we here adopt are: Palmer v. Sawyer, 74 Neb. 108, 103 N. W. 1088, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 715; Wilkinson v. Merrill, 87 Va. 513, 11 L.R.A. 632, 12 S. E. 1015; 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 253; Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134, 24 Pac. 853; Burns v. Keas, 21 Iowa, 257; Ellis v. Davis, 90 Ky. 183, 14 S. W. 74; Holder v. Holder, 120 Ky. 802, 87 S. W. 1100; Weaver v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Kan. 540, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110, 123 Am. St. Rep. 155, 94 Pac. 273; Cross v. Benson, 68 Kan. 495, 64 L.R.A. 560, 75 Pac. 558. To the class of cases holding the contrary view, the following cases belong: Heard v. Downer, 47 Ga. 629; Benedict v. Webb, 57 Ga. 348; Hill v. Franklin, 54 Miss. 632.

In so far as views herein expressed are in conflict with Betts v. Mills, 8 Okla. 351, 58 Pac. 957, that case is overruled; and we conclude that upon the death of Edwin M. Holmes, his heirs succeeded to the title to all his real estate, including his homestead, as provided by § 6895, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat., subject, however, to the right of defendant in error to use and occupy the same as a homestead so long as she resides thereon and makes it her home. While she occupies said premises as her home and homestead, the same is not subject to be partitioned at the suit of the heirs. Miller v. Hassman, 24 Okla. 381, 103 Pac. 577; Funk v. Baker, 21 Okla. 402, 129 Am. St. Rep. 788, 96 Pac. 608.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the alleged violation of a lease. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell & Ramsey, for appellant:

As the lease does not expressly give plaintiffs the right to have the passageway kept open, or refer to any appurtenances; their right to have it kept open must rest upon the fact that it was necessary to the beneficial use of the demised premises.

114 N. Y. Supp. 716, the plaintiff was the lessee of premises for the purpose of starting and conducting a moving picture show. Shortly after the execution of the lease he ascertained that the existence of a rear exit was a prerequisite to the securing of a license to maintain the business. Thereupon the lessor made affidavit that he thereby granted permission to the lessee to use the rear of the premises for the purposes of an exit. It seems that the exit was obstructed by a locked iron gate, and for this reason the authorities refused to issue a permit. The lessee brought suit to restrain the lessor from maintaining the locked gate. In determining that such relief could not be granted, the court said: "There is no contention that the lease embraces the premises whereon this exit exists, or that it contemplates the use of such exit in connection with the leased premises. It does not even appear that, at the time of the execution of the lease for the use of the premises for a moving picture show, it was in the contemplation of the parties that such use necessarily required the use of the exit in question. The lease is not in the record. The plaintiff points out that the lease provided that the repairs should be done according to the laws of the building department, but the requirement by that department for an exit into a street, which admittedly must pass through property outside of the lease, is hardly to be construed into a covenant that the plaintiff perform of his lease, shall have such right of passage." 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Walker v. Clifford, 128 Ala. 67, 86 Am. St. Rep. 74, 29 So. 588; Patterson v. Graham, 140 Ill. 531, 30 N. E. 460; Oliver v. Dickinson, 100 Mass. 114; Hill v. Shultz, 40 N. J. Eq. 164.

A mere convenience is not sufficient to create or convey a right or easement, or impose burdens other than those granted as incident to the grant.

Barrett v. Bell, 82 Mo. 110, 52 Am. Rep. 361; Walker v. Clifford, supra; Cummings v. Perry, 169 Mass. 150, 38 L.R.A. 149, 47 N. E. 618; Ward v. Robertson, 77 Iowa, 159, 41 N. W. 603; Gale v. Heckman, 16 Misc. 376, 38 N. Y. Supp. 85; Howell v. M'Coy, 3 Rawle, 256; Re New York, 83 App. Div. 513, 82 N. Y. Supp. 417.

The fact that the defendant or its predecessors in title permitted plaintiffs to use the passageway for some time did not establish the right of the plaintiffs to have it kept open.

Cummings v. Perry, supra.

The evidence as to the injury to the floors and walls of the leased building was insufficient to enable the jury to compute the damages with reasonable certainty.

Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Hartman, 49 C. C. A. 244, 111 Fed. 96; Bowen v. Illinois C. R. Co. 70 L.R.A. 915, 69 C. C. A. 444, 136 Fed. 306.

Moreover, the plaintiff in his affidavit but deposes that such exit could only 'be conveniently' (therefore not necessarily) 'had through the land adjoining the said stores, and which adjoining land belongs to this defendant.' There is no contention that this permission, given about a month after the execution of the lease, to permit passage through this exit across the land of the defendant into the street, was granted upon any express consideration, and the defendant deposes that there was none. I cannot see that there is any consideration for such user. For aught that appears, such permission was a mere license, revocable at the pleasure of the defendant, which conferred no rights on the plaintiff after such revocation. . . . I think that the injunction order, in so far as it interferes with the defendant in the control of any of his property upon his own land, exclusive of the premises subject to the lease, was wrong, and that, therefore, it must be modified accordingly."

See Lindbloom v. Berkman, 43 Wash. 356, 86 Pac. 567, which is sufficiently set out in the JEMO CASE.

Messrs. John E. Ryan and C. K. Poe for respondents.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant owns and conducts the Tourist Hotel, situate on the corner of Occidental avenue and Main street in the city of Seattle, and fronting on Occidental avenue. On April 1, 1905, its predecessors in title leased to respondents for the term of three years a room, to be used as a restaurant, on the ground floor of the hotel building, adjoining the rotunda of the hotel and connected therewith by a doorway, and fronting and having its entrance on Main street. It was described in the lease as "the room situated on the ground floor of 156 Main street." The respondents entered into the possession of the leased premises, and began and continued to conduct a restaurant therein, with the slight interruption hereafter noticed, until the expiration of the lease. In November, 1906, the appellant closed the doorway between the hotel rotunda and the restaurant. After the expiration of the lease the respondents commenced this action, seeking to recover damages on two counts. The first cause of action is predicated on the loss of patronage arising from the closing of the door between the hotel rotunda and the restaurant. The second cause of action proceeds from certain alleged injuries to the interior of the restaurant, caused by the appellant in repairing and changing the hotel building. The appellant demurred to the first cause of action upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer being overruled, issue was joined and the cause tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict for respondents on both causes of action, upon which a judgment was entered, from which this appeal was taken. At the close of the case, the appellant moved the court to instruct the jury that there could be no recovery.

The respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal because the appeal bond was not given or filed within five days after the service and filing of the notice of appeal, nor within ninety days after the motion for a new trial was denied. The record shows that the verdict was filed January 13, 1909; that a motion for a new trial was filed January 15, denied January 30, and a judgment rendered upon the verdict on the motion of the respondents February 3, and filed February 4. The notice of appeal and the appeal and supersedeas bond were served and filed May 3. Upon the record this appeal was taken within the ninety 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) days provided by law. 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 6502 (Pierce's Code, § 1050). However, the respondents assert that the clerk at once entered a judgment as provided by law (Laws 1903, chap. 148, p. 285, § 1); that on February 9th the notice of appeal was filed and a defective bond filed the following day; that the second notice of appeal and the appeal bond were served and filed more than ninety days after the denial of the motion for a new trial, but within ninety days after filing the last judgment. We will assume the record to be as the respondents state, and the question then presented by the motion is whether the time for taking an appeal commenced to run on January 30, when the motion was denied, or on February 4, when the last judgment was entered. If the appeal was from the judgment entered by the clerk, then it should be dismissed for two reasons: (1) Because not taken within ninety days from the denial of the motion; (2) because the notice of appeal states that it is taken from the judgment entered February 4. We have seen that the last judgment recites that it was rendered on the motion of the respondents.

In Herzog v. Palatine Ins. Co. 36 Wash. 611, 79 Pac. 287, we held that when the respondent caused the later judgment to be entered, he estopped himself from asserting that it was not the final appealable one. However, the respondents assert that a different view was taken in the later case of Chilcott v. Globe Nav. Co. 49 Wash. 302, 95 Pac. 264. In this case the clerk entered a judgment on the day the verdict was returned. Thereafter a motion for a new trial was denied. One month later a judgment was entered at the instance of the losing party. We held that the defeated party could not extend the time for taking an appeal by having a subsequent judgment entered. It was not the intention of the court to modify the rule announced in the Herzog Case, as is shown by the reasons stated in the opinion and the fact that the case was not referred to. We think that, where a judgment has been entered by the clerk, and later a motion for a new trial made and denied, and a new judgment entered by the court upon the motion of the successful party, he is not only estopped to deny that it is the final judgment, but that in effect it vacates and supersedes the former judgment. The motion is therefore denied.

Upon the first cause of action, we find that the lease did not in terms include the right to use the door between the rotunda of the hotel and the restaurant. If the right exists at all, it arises by necessary implication. We have seen that the restaurant fronted, and had its entrance, on Main street. A right of way by implication arises only from necessity, and never from convenience. If it exists in the instant case, it must rest upon the fact that the doorway was necessary to the beneficial use and enjoyment of the demised premises. It is urged that the closing of the door lost the respondents a considerable patronage which had theretofore passed from the lobby of the hotel into the restaurant, furnishing a substantial part of respondents' business, and that appellant is liable in damages for this loss. Stated in the fewest words, the contention means that the respondents had a right of way through the door into and through the lobby of the hotel, and through its main entrance as well, as an easement appurtenant to the restaurant, and that the appellant was required to maintain and operate the hotel as a hotel during the life of the lease. The full effect of the respondents' position is that the hotel was a servient estate, and that the appellant owed them an implied duty to carry on a hotel business so as to furnish them customers, without regard to the effect upon it or its property, for the loss alleged was that they no longer receive the patronage of the guests of the hotel. It would seem that the bare statement of the contention demonstrates its fallacy. If the appellant is liable in damages for closing the door in question, it would have been liable if it had closed the front door. That the doorway was a convenience to respondents none will deny, but it was not necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the property, and was therefore not an appurtenance. While not stated in direct terms in any of the cases, the doctrine of an implied easement is founded on the intention of the parties, not expressed, but to be gathered from all the surrounding circumstances. If the right claimed is necessary to the enjoyment of the property, as contradistinguished from beneficial, it will be implied. Applying this principle to the case at bar, it becomes clear that the landlord did not intend to make the hotel servient to the restaurant. Cases may arise in which the question of an appurtenance is one of mixed law and fact, but in this case it is clearly one of law. The respondents urge that the court would have been justified as a matter of law in instructing the jury that the doorway was necessary to the beneficial use of the property, and that, therefore, it was included in the lease as an appurtenance to the restaurant. We agree with them that the determination of the question was one of law, but disagree with them as to the further part of their contention.

Our view is supported by the following cases: Ward v. Robertson, 77 Iowa, 159, 41 N. W. 603; Walker v. Clifford, 128 Ala. 67, 86 Am. St. Rep. 74, 29 So. 588; Cummings v. Perry, 169 Mass. 150, 38 L.R.A. 149, 47 N. E. 618; Gale v. Heckman, 10 Misc. 376, 38 N. Y. Supp. 85; Patterson v. Graham, 140 Ill. 531, 30 N. E. 460; Oliver v. Dickinson, 100 Mass. 114; Hill v. Shultz, 40 N. J. Eq. 164; Barrett v. Bell, 82 Mo. 110, 52 Am. Rep. 361; Howell v. M'Coy, 3 Rawle, 256; Re New York, 83 App. Div. 513, 82 N. Y. Supp. 417. In the Walker Case the owner of certain property leased to another a part of it, known as the Florence Hotel building, including the hotel rotunda therein, for occupancy as a hotel, excepting therefrom certain stores in the building. Prior to the lease he had leased to another certain portions of the building, including the saloon and billiard hall agreeing that all doors between the hotel and the last-described property should be kept open for the use of the latter lessee. The hotel building was built especially for hotel purposes, and the saloon and billiard hall were accessible from the hotel rotunda by means of doors. A door opened from the saloon to the street, and the billiard hall could only be reached by passing through the saloon or the hotel corridor, and only through the latter when the former was closed. The lessee of the saloon and the billiard hall asserted that the lessee of the hotel took the lease with knowledge of such facts and subject to an easement, and sought to enjoin the latter from closing the doors leading from the rotunda into the billiard hall. A temporary injunction was granted, and latter was dissolved on the ground that no easement or right of way had been reserved by implication or otherwise. On appeal the decree was affirmed, on the ground that the facts did not disclose an implied easement. The court said that the saloon and billiard hall were easily accessible from the street, and that the way claimed was not a way of necessity, but merely of convenience, and that an implied easement could only arise from necessity. In the Ward Case certain wholesale druggists had leased the north part of a block fronting on a street, in which to carry on their business. The lessor owned the entire block, the south side of which was bounded by another street, upon which there was a line of railroad, and which had been leased to another. The lessees of the north rooms claimed a right of way through the south room to the railroad street, for the purpose of unloading freight and carrying it through the south room, thence through a doorway leading to their place of business, as an easement appurtenant to the use of their property. The court held that the right claimed was only a convenience, and not necessary to the beneficial use and enjoyment of their property, and that it could not arise by implication. In the Gale Case the plaintiff had let to the defendant an apartment on the second story of a building known as the Hotel San Remo. At the time the lease was made, the lessor carried on a restaurant in the same building with the demised apartment, but the lease was silent as to the restaurant. The lessee vacated and refused to pay rent because the restaurant had deteriorated in appointments, management, and purveyance. Upon the trial evidence tending to show the existence of the restaurant and its deterioration was admitted. Upon appeal it was held that the evidence was incompetent and irrelevant, and the judgment was reversed.

The respondents cite and rely upon Lindbloom v. Berkman, 43 Wash. 358, 86 Pac. 567, Snow v. Pulitzer, 142 N. Y. 263, 30 N. E. 1059, and Kitchen Bros. Hotel Co. v. Philbin, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 340, 96 N. W. 487. In the Lindbloom case the appellants leased to the respondents the second, third, and fourth floors of a building located at the corner of Occidental avenue and Washington street in the city of Seattle, to be used as a hotel and rooming house, reserving the right in the lessors to change, alter, or repair the stairway leading to the leased premises on Occidental avenue. The only entrance to the leased premises was one from Occidental avenue through a large and attractive hall to the elevator. At the time of the execution of the lease, the hall was unoccupied, but thereafter the appellants let a part of the hallway to a huckster who, over the objection of the respondents, entered therein with his wares and greatly impeded the ingress and egress to and from the leased premises. Later they changed the stairway, moving it from near the center of the hallway to one side, and from time to time thereafter leased the space thus made to hucksters and dealers in cheap wares, and left them in possession until forbidden by an injunctive order of the trial court. This court held that, while the hall was not a part of the second, third, and fourth floors, it was the only means of going to and from them, and that it passed as an appurtenance to the property leased. In the Snow Case a party erected a seven-story building in the city of New York. Subsequently another person erected an adjoining four story building, and still later another owner erected another adjoining building; thus making three buildings in one block, each having independent walls. Subsequently the first builder acquired the three properties and converted them into a hotel called French's Hotel; the three being used together as one building. Thereafter the owner of the entire property leased the first story of the four-story building, and then conveyed the entire property, describing it as French's Hotel, subject to the lease. Thereafter the owner tore down the four upper stories in the seven-story building, when it was found that the wall of the four-story building was supported by the adjoining wall of the seven-story building, and that it could not stand without such support, and it began to crack and break, and there was imminent danger of its falling. Upon discovering this fact the owner discontinued the work. Thereafter the four-story building was condemned by the city, torn down, and the tenant was deprived of the benefit of his lease and ousted from the property. In an action for damages, the owner contended that the tenant was not entitled to have the building in which his store was situated supported by the adjoining wall of the seven-story building; that there was no easement in that wall for the support of the wall of the four-story building. It was held that, if the wall of the four-story building could not stand of itself, then the tenant was entitled to the support of the wall of the seven-story building; that the two walls constituted the wall of the leased building, and that the owner had no right to remove the support so as to drive the tenant from his store; that he had no more right to remove the supporting wall than he would have to tear down the demised building or remove its roof. These cases do not in our opinion support the respondents' contention. In the Kitchen Bros. Hotel Co. Case it was held that, where the owner of a hotel leased a storeroom upon the ground floor of the hotel building, to be used as a ticket broker's office, the room fronting upon and having a front door opening on a street, and also a back door opening into a hall leading to the hotel rotunda, the closing of the latter door by the lessor was a breach of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, and rendered him liable in damages. We cannot yield our assent to the view announced in this case, and it is not in harmony with the other authorities to which reference has been made. We think the court overlooked the vital distinction between a necessity and a convenience. As was said in Hill v. Shultz, 40 N. J. Eq. 164: "Since the parties did not adjudge it important enough to contract respecting the use of this platform in plain terms, is the necessity so strong as to make the demands . . . appear reasonable?" We think not. The guests of the hotel could, by passing through the main hotel entrance into Occidental avenue and around the corner a few steps, enter the respondents' restaurant. The first cause of action must therefore fail.

Passing to a consideration of the second cause of action, we find that the respondents' evidence tended to show that the appellant, in repairing the hotel, tore up the floors, tore the paper on the ceiling and the walls, and broke the plastering of the restaurant to such an extent that it became necessary for them to close the restaurant for a period of about seventeen days, and repair the interior at an expense of $500 or $600. The respondents did not produce any of the bills pertaining to the repairing, but estimate the expenses as stated. The verdict was of $250 on this cause of action. The appellant urges that the verdict was based on speculation and conjecture, and that there is no substantial evidence to support it. "Damages," briefly defined, means compensation for the legal injury. It is a word easy to define, but often exceedingly difficult of application. Whilst it is true that a verdict for damages must not rest upon speculation or conjecture, it is likewise true that damages need not be shown with precision and accuracy, but approximately. Kruegel v. Kitchen, 33 Wash. 215, 74 Pac. 373. The testimony of the respondents makes it reasonably certain that the walls and floor of the restaurant were damaged by the negligence of the appellant, and it will not be permitted to escape liability because the amount of the damage or the cost of the repairs cannot be stated with exactness. It suffices if the loss sustained can be reasonably estimated from known or approved data. The respondents repaired the entire floor and walls at an expense of about $1,100. They estimated that about one half of this expense was required on account of the acts of the appellant. Had they produced the bills, they would only have shown the expense as an entirety. The part for which the appellant should compensate them would still be provable only by estimate and comparison. The accounts have been lost. Not taking into account the damages claimed for loss of profits on the business, which has no basis on the evidence stronger than conjecture, we think there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the verdict on the second cause of action.

The judgment will be modified and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment for the respondents for $250, with interest from date of such judgment. The appellant will recover its costs.

NORA L. WOODSON, Resp't.,

v.

METROPOLITAN STREET RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Appts.

(224 Mo. 685, 123 S. W. 820.)

Appeal — absence of evidence — assumption of parties.

1. Failure to show that the street on which an accident occurred for which a municipal corporation is sought to be held liable was a public street within its limits is not reversible error, where both parties assumed at the trial that it was so.

Evidence — judicial notice — location of streets.

2. Courts cannot take judicial notice of the location, use, and control of streets.

Pleading — variance — obstruction of sidewalk.

3. An allegation of an obstruction of a sidewalk is sustained by evidence that the obstruction was on the parking between the pavement and the curbing.

Highway — obstruction — contributory negligence.

4. It is negligence as matter of law for one fully cognizant of the facts to attempt to cross the streets by climbing over an obstruction between the pavement and the curbing of a sidewalk, when a few steps in either direction would have carried him around the obstruction.

Note. — As to liability of municipality for defects or obstructions in streets, see note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 513.

For contributory negligence as affecting liability of municipality for defects and obstructions in streets, see note to Lerner v. Philadelphia, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 614.

As to care required from one of defective sight in using streets, see note to Keith v. Worcester & B. V. Street R. Co. 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 648.

Upon the general question of anticipation as an element of proximate cause, see note to Kreigh v. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684.

And as to obstructions in highway as proximate cause of an injury notwithstanding intervening cause. see note to Louisville Home Teleph. Co. v. Gasper, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 548.

Same—vertigo—effect on liability.

5. That one subject to vertigo is seized with an attack while walking on a sidewalk, and staggers against an obstruction negligently placed upon the walk, a fall upon which causes his death, will not destroy the liability for the accident of the one responsible for the obstruction.

Appeal—new theory—admissibility.

6. A judgment cannot be affirmed on a theory not presented in the pleading and proofs.

(December 23, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, which was alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John H. Lucas, and Charles N. Sadler, for appellant Metropolitan Street R. Co.:

Plaintiff must prove that Charlotte street, at the point where this accident occurred, is a public street, and that the part on which the accident occurred was actually thrown open to travel by the public.

Cities are not compelled to keep all parts of their streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition for persons traveling thereon, but only such part as they have thrown open for public use.

Coffey v. Carthage; Pueschell v. Kansas City Wire & Iron Works; and Fockler v. Kansas City,—supra.

A person using that space left between the sidewalk and street curbing cannot presume such space is free from all obstructions.

Fockler v. Kansas City, supra; Coffey v. Carthage, 186 Mo. 573, 85 S. W. 532.

The owner of abutting property owes no duty to maintain the sidewalk or street in front of his premises in a safe condition, and is not responsible for any defects therein or obstructions thereon not caused by his own wrongful act.

Injury resulting from either of two causes, for one of which defendant is liable, plaintiff must show with reasonable certainty that the cause for which defendant is liable produced the result; and if the evidence leaves it to conjecture, the plaintiff fails.

Messrs. Edwin C. Meservey, and W. H. H. Platt, for appellant Kansas City:

The fall of deceased occurred in broad daylight, and the obstruction which plaintiff claims caused the fall was in plain view of the deceased. There was nothing to distract his attention therefrom, and his action in stumbling over said obstruction, if he did stumble, was negligence per se.

Vendig, 166 Pa. 582, 31 Atl. 349; Knight v. Baltimore, 97 Md. 647, 55 Atl. 388.

The defendant city owed the deceased the duty only of keeping in a reasonably safe condition for him to walk upon and over that portion of the street which it had improved and put in condition for the use of pedestrians.

Defendants are not liable for an accident which could not be reasonably anticipated. It cannot be said that a person exercising ordinary care, and traveling in the ordinary modes on the street, could reasonably be expected to meet with such an accident as claimed in this case.

Graves, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, the widow of Maj. Blake L. Woodson, brings this action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of her husband, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The accident which resulted in the death of Maj. Woodson occurred on the west side of Charlotte street, between Twelfth and Thirteenth streets, and, as alleged, at a point 175 to 200 feet south of the southwest corner of Twelfth and Charlotte streets. On that side of the street practically all of the block between Twelfth and Thirteenth streets was occupied by a power house and shops belonging to the defendant railway company. It is charged: "Now comes the plaintiff, and for her cause of action against the defendants states that the defendant Metropolitan Street Railway Company is and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned a street railway company, organized and existing under and by virtue of the Constitution and laws of the state of Missouri, and operating a large number of lines of electric and street railway in Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and particularly a certain line of cable railway known as the Twelfth street line in said city; that at all of the times hereinafter mentioned said defendant Metropolitan Street Railway Company had for its use in connection with said Twelfth street line a certain building or power house located at the southwest corner of Twelfth and Charlotte streets in Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri; that defendant Kansas City is and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned a municipal corporation; that Charlotte street in said city, from Twelfth street to Thirteenth street, is, and was, at all the times hereinafter mentioned, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) a public street and highway of Kansas City, Jackson county Missouri; that all the times hereinafter mentioned plaintiff was the lawfully wedded wife of Blake L. Woodson, now deceased; that all the times hereinafter mentioned it was the duty of the defendant Kansas City to use ordinary care to keep said street and the sidewalks thereof in a reasonably safe condition for travel and free from all obstructions which would render said street not reasonably safe for use of the traveling public; that at all times it was the duty of defendant Metropolitan Street Railway Company not to render said streets and said sidewalks unsafe and dangerous by placing or permitting obstructions to exist thereon by its act; that on or about the 16th day of March, 1902, the sidewalk upon the west side of Charlotte street between Twelfth street and Thirteenth street, aforesaid, and immediately adjacent to the power house of defendant Metropolitan Street Railway Company, was unsafe and dangerous in this: that the defendants had placed and permitted to remain thereon a large number of iron or steel rails, said iron or steel rails lying in various positions upon said sidewalk, and forming a dangerous obstruction to travel thereon; that said sidewalk was in such defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition upon said day, and had been for a long period of time, to wit, for many months, so that the defendants, and each of them, had notice of said defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition on account of the obstructions aforesaid, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have known of such condition for a time reasonably sufficient to have removed said rails and remedied said defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition before the happening of the catastrophe hereinafter mentioned, but that both of said defendants carelessly and negligently failed and omitted so to do."

By admissions of the parties it appears that on the west side of Charlotte street there was a brick sidewalk 6.2 feet wide; that to the building line from this sidewalk was 4.1 feet; that from the east edge of the sidewalk to the curbing it was 5.8 feet. It was shown that there was a row of trees between the curbing and the sidewalk, and admitted that the tree near the point of accident was 2.7 feet from the curbing, and that the trees in the row were 20 feet apart. That these rails, such as were used in the construction of street railway tracks, had been there for some months, the evidence clearly shows. They were not on the brick pavement, but between the pavement and the curbing, and one witness says some were in the street. The evidence shows that there was at least one curved rail, and for the plaintiff it was made to appear that one end of this curved rail came within 5 or 6 inches of the brick pavement.

On the day of the accident, which was Sunday, and about 11 in the forenoon, the deceased was walking north on the brick portion of the sidewalk, leisurely smoking a cigar, when, according to plaintiff's theory, he started across in a northeast direction to a drug store on the opposite side of the street, where he had occasionally traded, when he stumbled and fell, the back of his head striking the sharp edge of one of these rails, which cut a gash therein back of the left ear, and from the shock of this blow he then and there within a few minutes died. Plaintiff's theory is that his foot struck this curved rail, and that as he stumbled forward he reached for a tree near by, and, whether he grasped the tree or not, he so checked the forward movement as to be thrown backward in a manner to strike the rail as aforesaid. An autopsy was held, and from that it was developed that deceased was suffering from Bright's disease. Defendants' witnesses say deceased was walking in the middle of the brick pavement, when all at once he began to stagger, as a drunken man, and finally fell upon this rail. They also say he tried to catch to the tree, and one of them seemed to think his hand touched the tree. The medical testimony, as is usual in such cases, differs widely, save and except that the deceased had Bright's disease. Plaintiff's medical testimony was that it was chronic, and deceased might have lived for some time but for the shock of the blow. On the other hand, defendants' experts were of the opinion that deceased was practically a dead man before he struck the iron rail. Defendants also proved that several months prior thereto the deceased had been attacked by dizziness in the court room during the trial of a case, and remained at home some two or more weeks thereafter. On the other hand, it is shown that on the morning of the accident the deceased was hale and hearty as usual, being a man of strong physique, although advanced in years; that he ate his breakfast as usual, and after reading the morning papers started down town. He had gone but a few blocks when the end came.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, from which both defendants have duly appealed. This, in a general way, states the case.

Defendants press with great force the failure of the trial court to give their respective peremptory instructions, offered both at the end of plaintiff's case and at 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the end of the whole case. The disposition of the several points made against the trial court for this failure will require more details of the evidence, but these we will give in the course of the opinion.

1. There are some matters upon the question of the demurrers to the testimony which are common to both defendants, and others which only go to one or the other of them. To better understand the questions, we will state the character of the answers. The street railway filed a simple general denial. The city admitted its corporate capacity, and denied all other allegations of the petition in the first paragraph of its answer, and in the second paragraph was the usual plea of contributory negligence.

It is first urged that there is no proof that Charlotte street was one of the public streets of Kansas City, or was within the corporate limits of said city. This would be a very serious question were it not for the conduct of counsel throughout the trial, and even later in this court. In the very recent case of Vonkey v. St. Louis, 219 Mo. 37, 117 S. W. 733, we had occasion to condemn this method of trying a case. We there said: "There are at least two good reasons for sustaining the action of the trial court in this cause. In the first place, there are three streets mentioned in the evidence, to wit, Ewing avenue, Washington avenue, and Locust street, as being at or near the locus of the accident. One witness, Fraudenstein, testified: 'I am in the laundry business, 2907 Pine street. I have lived there for about thirty-five years. I know the locality of Ewing, between Washington avenue and Locust street. It has asphaltum on the street. I know it to be a street at least twenty-five years.' This is all we find in the entire record as to whether or not these streets are in the city of St. Louis, or that the accident occurred within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis. Counsel for plaintiff seem to have proceeded upon the theory that not only the lawyers engaged in the case knew that the streets were in the city of St. Louis, and therefore the accident occurred in said city, but, further, that both the trial court and this court were fully advised as to the locus of the accident and these streets. The trial court could not take judicial cognizance of the fact that these three streets were within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis. This was a matter of proof, and the issue was made by the general denial. Nor can this court take judicial cognizance of such fact, if it be a fact. For this reason, if for no other, the demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained. This loose method of trying cases in the large cities should be stopped. A few lines of testimony or a short admission in the record will suffice, but we cannot strain the doctrine of judicial cognizance to the extent of entertaining judicial knowledge of the existence of streets in municipalities, and will not do so." In that case the trial court had forced a nonsuit, and plaintiff appealed. There, of course, were not the things in the conduct of the case, showing that both sides assumed that the street was one under the control and in the possession of the city, as in this case. The city, in the case at bar, only raises the question in the reply brief. In its first brief, the city says: "The sidewalk constructed by the city for the use of pedestrians was, at the time, absolutely safe, and the obstruction on the parking was in plain view, and all the conditions were perfectly obvious to the deceased."

The defendant railway, as tending to show its attitude in the matter, asked the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the petition in this case charges that the defendants, Kansas City and the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, carelessly and negligently permitted certain iron rails to remain on the sidewalk on the west side of Charlotte street at a point about 187 feet south of Twelfth street, which rendered said sidewalk unsafe and dangerous for travel thereon, and that Blake L. Woodson was, by reason of said condition, thrown to the ground and killed. The court instructs you that if you believe that this contention on the part of the plaintiff be true, then both the defendants are liable; but if you should believe that the defendant Metropolitan Street Railway Company negligently placed said rails upon said sidewalk, and that the city negligently permitted them to remain there, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and your verdict will be for the defendants." Other things throughout the record might be cited as tending to show that both sides in the trial of this case assumed that Charlotte street was within the corporate limits of Kansas City, and was a public street over which the said city was exercising control. In this the facts are different from the Vonkey Case, supra. We are of opinion that there is clear evidence in this record that both sides assumed Charlotte street to be a public street under the control of the city, and, such being the situation, counsel will not be permitted to change attitude in this court. This contention will be ruled against the defendant. Knight v. Kansas City, 113 Mo. App. 561, 87 S. W. 1102. We repeat, however, that courts cannot take judicial notice of the location, the use, and control of streets, and whilst, under the peculiar state of this record, we find that both sides assumed these things to be true and as proven, yet this loose method of trying cases was properly condemned in the Vonkey Case, supra, and would be held fatal to this case but for the reason assigned above.

2. Point was made in the argument before this court that the obstruction complained of was not on the sidewalk, and therefore there is a variance between the pleading and proof. It should be noticed that the petition, a part of which is in the statement quoted, does say that it was the duty of the defendant city to keep Charlotte street and the sidewalk in question free of obstructions; but when the petition gets to the point of charging the negligent act, it leaves out the street, and confines the negligent act to an obstruction of the sidewalk. The language used in this connection is: "That on or about the 16th day of March, 1902, the sidewalk upon the west side of Charlotte street . . . was unsafe and dangerous in this: that defendants had placed and permitted to remain thereon a large number of iron or steel rails lying in various positions upon said sidewalk and forming a dangerous obstruction to travel thereon; that said sidewalk was in such dangerous condition upon said day, and had been for a long period of time," etc.

It thus appears that the obstruction charged is one upon the sidewalk, and not elsewhere. The variance urged is that the proof shows that the obstruction was not on the sidewalk, but on the parking between the sidewalk and the curbing. We are not impressed with this contention. As distinguished from the street proper, all of the space between the curb line might be denominated the sidewalk. In this instance, and in many instances, a space of level grass plot was left upon each side of the brick walk. Yet it would not do to say that these strips were withdrawn from public use, except so far as the city had exercised its right to place things of ornament or public use therein, in which case the traveler on or across the spaces would be bound by the uses to which the city had thus placed the spaces, and would have only the right to use them subject to the uses theretofore properly fixed thereon by the city. Trees might be planted at such places; a hydrant might be placed there; in fact, anything of this character; and the traveler would have to use the spaces with the inconveniences and risks thus imposed. It has been said that the word "sidewalk" has no strict legal interpretation, and what constitutes the sidewalk, as contradistinguished from the street must be determined from the facts. Porter v. Waring, 69 N. Y. 250; Graham v. Albert Lea, 48 Minn. 201, 50 N. W. 1108. It is usually recognized as that part of the street upon either side thereof that has been arranged for foot passengers, and not intended for use by vehicles and horsemen. In Elliott on Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 20, it is said: "There are cases in which the term 'street' will be construed to mean only that part of the way which lies between the parts especially intended for footmen. These parts are usually placed on either side of the way and are commonly called sidewalks. It often becomes important to distinguish between the part of the way intended for horsemen and vehicles, and that part intended especially for the use of pedestrians, and the term 'sidewalks' has come to be generally used in this country for the purpose of designating this part of the way; and as the term is an expressive and convenient one, it is likely to find a permanent place in legal terminology." And in Wabash R. Co. v. De Hart, 32 Ind. App. 65, 65 N. E., loc. cit. 193, the term is thus defined: "The word 'sidewalk' has a well-understood meaning. We understand ex vi termini, that a part of the street is meant. It is the public way, generally somewhat raised, especially intended for pedestrians, and adapted to their use, usually constructed in this country as a part of a street, at or along the side of the part thereof especially designed and constructed for the passage of vehicles and animals; there being often, if not generally, a gutter, also constituting a portion of the street, between such parts; and when a sidewalk is spoken of as being on a specific side of a designated street, it is to be understood to be a part so reserved of that street, at or along the specific side of the roadway." We are of the opinion that all of that portion of the street from the building line to the curbing can properly be called the sidewalk of Charlotte street. Pedestrians have a right to use it all unless some portion thereof is specially restricted by ordinance. This use was fully recognized in the case of Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga., loc. cit. 158, 38 S. E. 389. This contention is therefore ruled against the defendants.

3. It is next contended that the demurrers should have been sustained because that the alleged obstruction was open and obvious, and the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in undertaking to pass over the brick sidewalk to the street over such obstruction. It was a bright forenoon. The sun was shining, but the day was windy. Defendants urge that if deceased was not affected at the time by dizziness resulting from his disease, he was clearly guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar plaintiff's recovery, and they further say that if he was thus affected, and fell by reason thereof, and was injured on the rails, that such a case was not one which could have reasonably been anticipated as the result of the alleged negligence, and on that score the demurrers, should have been sustained. The plaintiff challenges both contentions. Of these, therefore, in their order.

(a) If deceased was at himself, and undertook to cross over at the point of this obstruction, was he guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law? Usually contributory negligence is a question for the jury, but there are many cases where the evidence is so much one way that it becomes the duty of the trial court to declare the conduct negligent as a matter of law. Is this such a case? We think so. It appears that this street was on the route of deceased from his home to the city. His nephew, who lived with him, used the street. It appears that the deceased was in the habit of stopping and buying cigars at a drug store across and a little north from the place of injury. His residence was but a short distance therefrom, and he had resided at the one place for seventeen years. This pile of railroad rails had been there for at least five months, if not much longer. At that season of the year the grass had not grown up on the little plot between the bricks and the curb. The pile of rails was such an obstruction as could have been seen had deceased been in the exercise of ordinary care for his own protection. Even grant it that it was his desire to go to this drug store (of which fact there is no evidence, but is a mere surmise in the case), yet he had two ways open to him,—one a dangerous one, the other a safe one. By going up the brick sidewalk, which was unobstructed, to a point beyond the pile of rails, he could have crossed with safety.

In the case of Wheat v. St. Louis, 179 Mo., loc. cit. 581, 582, 64 L.R.A. 292, 78 S. W. 792, this court said: "In short, the rule is supported not only by the almost universal trend of authority, both English and American, but also by the plainest principles of right and justice. While the city owes the citizen the duty to keep the highways reasonably safe for persons to pass over, the citizen owes the city the duty to use his God-given senses, and not to run into obstructions that he is familiar with, or which by the exercise of ordinary care he could discover and easily avoid. And while the city may be negligent in the discharge of its duty, the citizen may also be negligent in the discharge of his duty. And if both are negligent and their negligence contributes to the injury, there can be no recovery. And if the plaintiff's negligence necessarily contributes to the happening of the injury, there can be no recovery." To a like effect is Kaiser v. St. Louis, 185 Mo., loc. cit. 374, 84 S. W. 21:

"Moreover, the plaintiff had driven along that particular part of the street every day for at least ten days, and he therefore knew, or could have known by the exercise of ordinary care, that the pile of earth was there, and as it was no larger than a bucket, he could have easily avoided it, if he had used his senses and the degree of care that is required of one who drives a wagon on a public highway."

The italics in the foregoing quotations are ours. We simply desire to impress that it is the duty of a traveler to exercise ordinary care in traveling upon the public highways.

Again in Coffey v. Carthage, 186 Mo., loc. cit. 585, 85 S. W. 535, the rule of conduct of a traveler upon the highway or sidewalk (in that case a sidewalk) is thus stated:

"The law upon this proposition may thus be briefly stated: If plaintiff had no knowledge of the defect or hole in the sidewalk, then she had the right to assume that the sidewalk was in a reasonably safe condition. But while she was entitled to act upon this assumption, still she must exercise that degree of care and caution in walking on said sidewalk which a prudent person ordinarily employs under similar circumstances. If, by the exercise of a reasonable degree of care and caution, she could have discovered the defect or hole in the sidewalk, and avoided the injury, it was incumbent upon her to do so; and if she failed to comply with this duty that every citizen owes the city, and proceeded carelessly and without paying any attention to where she was walking, then there can be no recovery."

In Cohn v. Kansas City, 108 Mo., loc. cit. 393, 18 S. W. 974, Judge Black said: "While in general it is for the jury to say whether the plaintiff used ordinary care, and this question they are to determine from all the circumstances, still it often occurs that the court may declare the plaintiff wanting in due care on given facts. One who attempts to cross over a sidewalk as part of a road, known to him to be dangerous, when the dangerous place could have been easily avoided, as by passing around it, or taking another side of the road, is wanting in due care, and the court may so say as a matter of law."

The Iowa court puts the rule thus in the case of Yahn v. Ottumwa, 60 Iowa, loc. cit. 433, 15 N. W. 259: "It was not claimed that the husband's attention was in any manner diverted from properly driving the team after he took his seat in the wagon. The accident happened in broad daylight. Now, if the stone was in full view of the husband when he started the team, it was his plain duty to have seen and avoided it. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff's husband to use care in driving, and to look where he was driving, and to avoid all obstacles which were dangerous in their character, and which were plainly visible and not obscured, and if he failed to do so, and the plaintiff was thereby injured, then she cannot recover." This instruction was refused. We think this, or some other explicit instruction applicable to this view of the facts of the case, should have been given. Where an obstruction is in the street in plain view of the driver of a vehicle, and his attention is in no manner diverted, so as to excuse him for not seeing the obstruction, and he drives against it or into it, he is clearly guilty of contributing proximately to any injury which may result."

It is not worth while going to other states for authority. The rule could not be more clearly stated than in the Coffey Case, supra, as to the duty of travelers to exercise ordinary care in walking over sidewalks. Now plaintiff's testimony shows that these rails were easily seen, and that deceased was leaving the usual pathway to go upon that part of the space not especially prepared for travel, although deceased had the right to travel it. We are satisfied that, if deceased was at himself at the time, the exercise of ordinary care upon his part would have avoided the accident. The cases, supra, are the latest utterances of this court upon the question, and it would serve no good purpose to further review the case law of the state, or of other states. To the mind of the writer it would appear that these last expressions of the court lose sight of the idea that a pedestrian can assume whilst walking over a sidewalk that the city has performed its duty, and that the sidewalk is reasonably safe for travel. But both divisions of the court have concurred in the doctrine of these late cases, and we feel that they should be followed.

(b) But plaintiff urges that, concede it to be true, as defendants say, and as their evidence strongly tended to prove, that deceased became affected and staggered from the brick walk to the sodded portion thereof, and in that condition received an injury which hastened his death, yet plaintiff is entitled to recover. We shall consider this question, first, upon the merits of the contention without reference to the pleadings. We start with the proposition that, under the evidence, there was a dangerous obstruction upon the sidewalk, and the same had been there for such length of time that the law presumes notice upon the part of the city, and for that reason its maintenance there at the date of the accident was negligence upon the part of the city. As to the other defendant, we will discuss that later. Now, under these facts, with a part of the sidewalk negligently obstructed by the city, let us proceed with proper caution to get the case properly stated upon the theory that deceased was overcome by vertigo or some other condition superinduced by disease which was preying upon his vitals. The case made may be thus stated:

Deceased was leisurely walking along on that portion of the sidewalk which had been paved, and which was not obstructed. Suddenly he is seized with vertigo or something of that character. In his desperation he staggers toward the little tree and tries to grasp it, but fails, and falls upon the obstruction negligently there maintained by defendant city. He strikes his head with such force as to cut through to the skull bone for the length of an inch and a half. The plaintiff's physicians say that the shock from that blow was the cause of his death at that immediate time; that whilst subsequently he would inevitably have been overcome by the disease, but that the symptoms revealed were not such as to indicate this early demise, save and except as the diseased condition was augmented by the shock. Under the evidence, but for the obstruction, the fall of deceased would have been upon the soft grass-plot. Under these facts, is there liability upon the part of the city? The city says not, because it was an injury which was not to be reasonably anticipated as a sequence to its negligent act. Is this true? Under these facts, it cannot be said that deceased was negligent. A man blinded by vertigo, or suffering from some other similar condition, cannot be said to be negligent if he grasps for support a little tree planted by the city in a portion of the sidewalk. The proximate cause of his injury could consist of two acts, one coming from him in a dazed condition, and not negligent, and one coming from the city, in permitting an obstruction upon the sidewalk which act was negligence. It oft-times occurs that the proximate cause of an injury is of double character. In other words, there may be two or more causes uniting to produce the injury. In such case, if the act of the plaintiff, which is one of the causes, is not negligent, and the act of the defendant, which is the other of such causes, is negligent, then there can be a recovery by the injured party or the one to whom the cause of action goes, if death results from the injury. Musick v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 58 Mo. App. 322. This case was discussed and approved by this court in Huss v. Heydt Bakery Co. 210 Mo., loc. cit. 53, 108 S. W. 66. It is true that we distinguished the Musick Case from the Huss Case, but we fully recognized the soundness of the law announced in the Musick Case. In distinguishing the cases we used this language: "Here we have a record full of evidence that the plaintiff had neglected one of his duties in permitting the passageway to become slippery. The slippery condition occasioned his fall, and, as a result of the fall, his injury. The case is not on all fours with Musick v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. supra, relied upon by the plaintiff. In the Musick Case the fall of plaintiff was occasioned by a slippery floor, and, by the fall, the plaintiff was thrown into an uncovered vat of hot water and burned. There was no evidence in that record to the effect that the slippery condition was the result of a neglect or failure upon the part of Musick, and therein lies the distinction between that case and the case at bar. In other words, Musick had been guilty of no negligence which contributed to his own injury, as a proximate cause thereof, or as one of the proximate causes thereof. Here the jury could readily find that the fall upon the slippery floor, at least one of the proximate causes of the injury, was occasioned by the neglect of the plaintiff, and in that way his own neglect contributed to the jury received, and was one of the producing causes thereof. There may be a combination of causes producing an injury. In this case, but for the slippery floor (a condition superinduced by the negligence of the plaintiff), there would have been no fall, and consequently no injury. On the other hand, there might have been the fall and no consequent injury, had the machinery been guarded. The injury was not, therefore, entirely dependent upon one cause, but upon a result of the two combined, one of which was the product of plaintiff's neglect of duty and want of due care for his own safety."

In the case at bar, if the plaintiff fell for the reasons urged by defendants, there was no negligence in this act, which was one of the two causes which produced the injury. The other contributing cause is practically the conceded negligence of the city. So that, on the evidence introduced by defendant, plaintiff was entitled to recover, if the result was one which could have reasonably been anticipated to flow from the negligent act. Because deceased was diseased, he was not precluded from walking upon the sidewalk. Nor is it a stretch of imagination to say that the city must know that afflicted persons of all kinds walk upon sidewalks. This court has taken broad grounds as to what cases may be considered as falling within the rule of reasonable anticipation of results from negligence in different cases. In Dean v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. R. Co. 199 Mo. 386, 97 S. W. 910, we have a case where the defendant had negligently overloaded the tender of its engine with coal, and in speeding along its tracks a lump thereof was thrown off and struck and injured the plaintiff's knee. We held defendant liable. In so doing we approved a rule of law announced by the Iowa court. In that case (199 Mo., loc. cit. 411), we said: "The fact that the effect in this case was somewhat unusual cannot defeat a recovery. The fact that but few accidents of this sort are recorded in the books cannot save the situation for defendant; for it is self-evident that the question of injury to a man's knee from a flying chunk of coal depends alone upon the coal and the knee coming in contact. If the knee was not there, the knee would not be injured; if the knee was there, then it is another story. In this case both the man and his knee were at a proper place, at a place defendant's lessee had reason to anticipate their presence. The rule of law controlling in this particular is thus formulated: 'The liability of a person charged with negligence does not depend on the question whether, with the exercise of reasonable prudence, he could or ought to have foreseen the very injury complained of, but he may be held liable for anything which, after the injury is complete, appears to have been a natural and probable consequence of his act or omission.' Fishburn v. Burlington & N. W. R. Co. 127 Iowa, loc. cit. 492, 103 N. W. 485 et seq., and cases cited."

The doctrine of this case was cited with approval by the court in banc in Zies v. St. Louis Brewing Asso. 205 Mo., loc. cit. 651, 104 S. W. 99. Upon this theory, we believe, there is substance in plaintiff's claim, the cause is one which should be submitted to a jury. But it does not follow from this that it was properly submitted under the pleadings and instructions herein.

(c) But grant it that there is a right to have the jury pass upon this theory of the case, can this verdict and judgment stand? We think not. Plaintiff, neither by her petition nor instructions, presents this theory to the jury. Even if it be said that the petition is broad enough to cover this theory of the case, and we hardly think it is, yet the instructions for the plaintiff, and upon which the verdict was procured, presented no such theory. We have recently had occasion to review such a condition in the case of Degonia v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 224 Mo. 564, 123 S. W. 807. That case is so recent, and being from the court in banc after full consideration of two opinions from division, that we will not go over the matter again here. For the reasons expressed fully in that case, this verdict and judgment should not be affirmed; but we are of opinion that the case should not be reversed outright, but that it should be reversed and remanded, in order that it might be proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed, and if need be, that the petition may be amended so as to include the theory of the case discussed in this paragraph.

4. The defendant railway urges that there is no evidence that the rails which occasioned the injury were put there by it, and for that reason its demurrer should have been sustained. Plaintiff, to prove that fact, placed upon the stand one of this defendant's employees, and the evidence, when considered as a whole, is not of much probative force. It is extremely questionable as to whether the plaintiff had sufficiently connected this defendant, but inasmuch as we have concluded to remand the case, we reserve that question and leave it open for proof upon a new trial.

The above conclusions obviate the discussion of other points made. The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, to be further proceeded with in accordance with the views hereinabove expressed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF DAVID HERMAN LANDO, Deceased.

ADOLF LANDO, Resp't.,

v.

IDA LANDO, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 127 N. W. 1125.)

Conflict of laws — marriage — Americans in Germany.

1. Respondent, the father of David H. Lando, deceased, filed a petition for his appointment as administrator of the estate of his deceased son. Appellant, Ida Lando, whose maiden name was Oberg, appeared and objected to the appointment, claiming that she was the widow of the said deceased.

Deceased and appellant, residents of Minnesota, there exchanged mutual promises to marry in the future. Subsequently at Hamburg, Germany, they exchanged matrimonial consents before, and were pronounced husband and wife by, a man believed by appellant to be a minister of the Gospel. She then, and at all times thereafter, in good faith believed that she and said deceased were thereby married to each other. Thereafter, and up to the time of the death of the deceased, in Vienna, deceased and appellant lived and cohabited as husband and wife in Austria, held themselves out as husband and wife, and were reputed to be husband and wife among their friends and acquaintances in Vienna and in Minnesota. They never lived or cohabited as husband and wife in this state, or in any of the United States. There was no other marriage ceremony. The person who performed the ceremony in Hamburg was not a civil magistrate or registrar, and was not a person authorized by the law of Germany to celebrate a marriage between German subjects.

It is held:

The validity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the place where the ceremony is performed. A marriage regular where solemnized is valid everywhere. A marriage void where it is celebrated is void everywhere. The validity of the marriage here in question was determined by the law of Germany then in force.

Foreign laws — pleading — proof — judicial notice.

2. A foreign law is a fact, which must be pleaded and proved like any other fact. This court does not take judicial cognizance of the German law applicable to this case.

Conflict of laws — marriage — Americans in Germany — German laws — construction.

3. It was stipulated that such German law was correctly translated as follows:

"Art. 13. The contraction of a marriage (otherwise translated 'entering into'), even if only one of the parties is a German, is determined in respect of each of the parties by the laws of the country of which he (or she) is a subject (otherwise translated 'to which each respectively belongs'). The same rule applies to an alien who concludes a marriage within the Empire.

"The form of a marriage which is concluded within the Empire is determined exclusively by German law."

That stipulation concerned a matter which is here of fact, and not of law.

Neither the construction of the German Code as a whole, nor the relevant authorities, determine the construction to be placed on this equivocal translation.

The literal significance of the terms of the translation leads to the construction that, under the first paragraph of the article, the deceased and appellant were "aliens who had concluded a marriage within the Empire;" that such marriage was determined by the law of the country of which they were subjects; that, the parties being residents of Minnesota, the attempted marriage was governed by the law of that state; and that the last paragraph is a direction to German officials as to the manner in which they must celebrate marriages in Germany between German subjects.

Same — validity — presumptions — burden of proof.

4. When a marriage has been shown in evidence, whether regular or irregular, the law raises a strong presumption of its legality; not only casting the burden of proof upon the persons objecting, but requiring them throughout, to make plain, against the constant pressure of this presumption, the truth of law and fact that the marriage was irregular and void. The evidence to repel that presumption must be strong, distinct, and satisfactory.

In view of this presumption, the translated law as stipulated is held to have been satisfied by this marriage, valid under Minnesota law.

APPEAL by objector from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County reversing a judgment of the Probate Court which appointed a disinterested administrator for the estate of David Herman Lando, deceased, and appointing petitioner as such. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

In this connection attention is called to the fact—although the point is not alluded to in the headnote by the judge who wrote the opinion—that it appears from the opinion in State v. Hand, supra, that there is an express statutory provision in Nebraska to the effect that all marriages contracted without the state which would be valid by the laws of the country in which the same were contracted shall be valid in all courts and places in the state. This statute, however, merely enacts the rule that is commonly recognized as a matter of comity even in the absence of the statute; and the implication of the opinion seems to be that, notwithstanding the statute, a foreign marriage may be denied recognition, if it is clearly opposed to the distinctive policy of Nebraska, just as when the recognition of foreign marriages is left to the ordinary principles of comity.

Mr. Otto Kueffner, with Messrs. Young & Stone, for appellant.

Mr. H. D. Frankel, with Messrs. Harris Richardson and Harold C. Kerr, for respondent:

The validity or invalidity of a marriage is determined by the law of the place where the ceremony is performed.

Jaggard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, Adolf Lando, filed a petition in the probate court of Ramsey county, for his appointment as administrator of the estate of his son, David H. Lando, deceased. The appellant, Ida Lando, appeared and objected to the appointment, claiming that she was the widow of deceased. On appeal to the district court, the essential issue was tried and determined, namely, whether David H. Lando at any time during his life married the appellant. If she was his legal wife, she is entitled to appointment as administrator, and, under the intestate law, to the property of the deceased; if she was not his wife, the respondent is entitled to administration, and the family of the deceased to inherit his estate. The deceased, at the time of his death and for many years prior thereto, had been a resident of the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, and engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery therein. The appellant, whose maiden name was Ida Oberg, is twenty-seven years of age, was born in Sweden, but has resided in St. Paul since early childhood. She had been a trained nurse, and associated with Dr. Lando in that capacity. In September, 1907, the doctor and the nurse left separately for New York, but sailed on the same ship to Hamburg.

The trial court was not only justified in finding, but was required by the evidence to find, that "on the 25th day of September, at Hamburg, Germany, they exchanged matrimonial consents before, and were pronounced husband and wife by, a man believed by respondent to be a minister of the Gospel. Respondent then and there, and at all times thereafter, in good faith believed that she and said David H. Lando were thereby married to each other." Cohabitation followed. The wedding ring and the watch, with the initials thereon, which the doctor gave her, were significant of that relationship. The parties then left for Berlin and went to Vienna. The doctor renewed his studies at the Viennese General Hospital, under the patronage of the distinguished surgeon, Baron von Eiselberg, who entertained the doctor and appellant as his wife. The evidence is abundant that they lived together openly as husband and wife, and were reputed to be such in Vienna. It is true that while the parties were in New York a St. Paul newspaper published an account of their marriage in New York. Dr. Lando wrote from Vienna, demanding a retraction of all these statements. There was also evidence, however, that he wrote to a friend in America: "In my endeavor to become quietly married, the newspaper furor was intense, and I now regret that we did not announce our intentions before reaching New York. It would have sufficed to have kept many mouths shut. If I had ever known that a quiet marriage would have produced so much uncalled-for comment, I would have been married in the open space of Seven Corners before a public crowd." The record contains an abundance of letters written by the deceased in his life, which refer to appellant as his wife. He sent to the University of Minnesota an application for the position of professor of surgery, in which he stated that he was married.

The trial court properly found: "The respondent and said David H. Lando, at St. Paul, Minnesota, prior to September 25, 1907, exchanged mutual promises to marry in the future. . . . From and after September 28, 1907, up to the time of the death of David H. Lando, he and respondent lived and cohabited as husband and wife in Vienna, Austria, and held themselves out to be husband and wife, and were reputed to be husband and wife among their friends and acquaintances in Vienna, Austria, and in Minnesota. They never lived as husband and wife or cohabited in this state, or within any of the United States." The trial court also found, and was required by the evidence to find, that the marriage was not performed by any person authorized by the law of Germany to perform the celebration of a marriage. The learned trial judge thereupon concluded as matter of law that respondent never was the wife of David H. Lando, deceased, is not his widow, and is not entitled to letters of administration.

1. The validity of the marriage is to be determined by the law of Germany, where it was celebrated. It is a generally accepted principle of interstate and international law that the validity or invalidity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the place where the ceremony is performed; that a marriage legal where solemnized is valid everywhere; and that a marriage void where it is celebrated is void everywhere. If the law of the place of trial were to control, a marriage might be valid in one state and invalid in another. It is obviously essential to the welfare of mankind that a marriage valid in one place should be valid everywhere. In Hills v. State, 61 Neb. 580, 57 L.R.A. 155, 85 N. W. 836, most of the cases will be found analyzed. And see McHenry v. Bracken, 93 Minn. 510, 101 N. W. 960; Garcia v. Garcia (S. D.) 127 N.

W. 586. Cf. Schuster, Principles of International Law, p. 481.

This rule applies to cases where the parties attempting to marry are mere sojourners in the place where the marriage ceremony is claimed to have been performed. State v. Shattuck, 69 Vt. 403, 40 L.R.A. 428, 60 Am. St. Rep. 936, 38 Atl. 81; Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505; Re Chace, 26 R. I. 351, 69 L.R.A. 493, 58 Atl. 978, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1050; True v. Ranney, 21 N. H. 52, 53 Am. Dec. 164. But see contra, Stull's Estate, 183 Pa. 625, 39 L.R.A. 539, 63 Am. St. Rep. 776, 39 Atl. 16; Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L.R.A. 703, 10 Am. St. Rep. 648, 10 S. W. 305.

2. The decisive question in the case is whether the parties were married in accordance with the German law. The court does not take judicial cognizance of the law on this point. It is elementary that foreign laws must be pleaded and proved like any other fact. 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 542; 3 Words & Phrases, 2886; 10 Current Law, 1184, note 15; Hoyt v. McNeil, 13 Minn. 390, Gil. 362; Crandall v. Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 190, 85 Am. St. Rep. 458, 86 N. W. 10; Myers v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 69 Minn. 476, 65 Am. St. Rep. 579, 72 N. W. 694; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Palmer, 52 Minn. 174, 178, 38 Am. St. Rep. 536, 53 N. W. 1137; Rev. Laws 1905, 4698, 4701. Cf. §§ 2601, 4766.

In this case it was stipulated between the parties "that the German law, which was in force from September 21, 1907, to May 19, 1908, so far as here applicable, is correctly translated by and in the 'schedule' which is hereto attached, hereby referred to and expressly made a part of this stipulation, the same . . . [which] may be received and read in evidence upon the trial of this proceeding with the same force and effect as though the provisions of law therein referred to were proven in the usual form by a duly authenticated copy of the Civil Code of Germany and its laws governing marriage in force on and between the dates [here involved]." This schedule set forth a number of provisions of the German Code relative to marriage, and in particular this stipulated translation:

"Art. 13. The contraction of a marriage (otherwise translated 'entering into'), even if only one of the parties is a German, is determined in respect of each of the parties by the laws of the country of which he (or she) is a subject (otherwise translated 'to which each respectively belongs'). The same rule applies to an alien who concludes a marriage within the Empire.

"In respect to the wife of an alien declared dead under article 9, ¶ 3, the conclusion of a new marriage is determined by German law.

"The form of a marriage which is concluded within the Empire is determined exclusively by German law."

(The original German words for the contraction of a marriage, at the beginning of the first paragraph, are Die Eingehung der Ehe, for "who concludes a marriage," at the end of that paragraph, are eine Ehe eingehen).

The proper interpretation of the provision abounds in doubt and uncertainty. That the original language, properly translated and interpreted in the light of the Code construed as a whole, is a clear and consistent provision, is most highly probable. That Code was prepared with the greatest care and the most consummate skill. "Unlike the Code Napoleon," says Mr. Chung Hue Wang in the introduction to his translation, "the German Civil Code is the most carefully worded and scientifically arranged Code extant, representing no less than twenty-two years of careful study and research by the most eminent German jurists." The late Professor Maitland referred to it in his Political Theories in the Middle Ages, § 17, as being "the most carefully considered statement of a nation's laws that the world has ever seen;" While Dr. A. Pierce Higgins speaks of it as being "a standing object lesson to all states that are looking forward to a scheme of codification."

The present controversy, however, does not concern the correct philological interpretation of the original language. The question comes before this court restricted by the stipulation. The parties have agreed that the translation is correct. Counsel for appellant insists upon the limitations which the translation imposes. That stipulation concerns a matter which is here of fact, and not of law. We must respect it. We are therefore not called upon to decide the abstract or general question, but the particular question of the interpretation of the statute as thus translated. We are not called upon to consider what the law meant in the German language, in which it was formulated, but what is the significance of the English words, into which it has been correctly translated.

One possible construction is that, under the first paragraph of this article, Dr. Lando and Ida Oberg were "aliens who had concluded a marriage within the Empire:" that such marriage was determined with respect to "each party" by the laws of the country of which (he or she) was a subject (or to which each respectively belongs); and that each of these parties belonged to America, and were therefore governed by American laws, under which the attempted marriage was undoubtedly valid. In this view, the last paragraph is a consistent direction to German officials as to the manner in which they must celebrate a marriage in Germany between German subjects. For this view appellant contends. Another possible construction is that the form of a marriage concluded in Germany is always governed by the German law; that the first paragraph of this article refers, not to the formal celebration of a marriage, but to the capacity of the parties to enter into a contract of marriage (that, in other words, the first paragraph refers to 'the contraction,' 'the entering into,'—has to do with the impediments to marriage; the last paragraph with the ceremony); and that the attempted marriage, in this case confessedly not in conformity with the German form, was not a marriage in law. For this view respondent contends.

Neither construction is clear nor free from objection. Neither party has satisfactorily answered the consideration urged by the other; and this is no fault of either counsel. It is necessarily the situation. The German Code must be construed as a whole, in order that the doubt may be resolved. We have considered the arguments of counsel in this connection, and have made our own independent investigation into other and related parts of the Code. The result, restricted as it must be by the stipulation, is not significant, and does not substantially tend to determine the controversy.

The authorities on this subject, which the exceptional industry of counsel in their briefs have exhausted, are not in themselves cogent. Their consideration of the particular controversy before this court is not direct. See for example, Mr. W. W. Smithers' valuable article in 41 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 685, 42 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 14, 26; 33 Am. Law Rev. 396-399; 35 Am. L. Rev. 190-202; 4 Canadian L. Rev. 372-378; 1 Annual Bulletin Comparative Law Bureau, American Bar Asso. 36-38. Nor are any authorities to which respondent refers founded upon the necessary condition of this opinion, namely, the correctness of the translation previously set forth. It is therefore immaterial, for example, that Dr. Schuster deplors that Dr. Wang did not refrain from coining new expressions in his translation, some of which were eminently calculated to mislead English readers. Dr. Schuster's interpretation of this part of the German law does not discuss the inconsistency in the translation of article 13 here urged by counsel, and does not proceed upon the hypothesis which controls this case. Compare page 482, § 409, and subd. 5, p. 490, with note 15, p. 89. And see Meili's International Law, 173-177, 212, etc. No clear, convincing, or satisfactory conclusion is justified by the authority on this subject. The historical argument on this section tends to confirm appellant's view. Compare § 41, German Statute of 1875, with article 13; and see 42 Suffert's Archives, 303. The appellant is not without some, but inconclusive, authority. See Kent v. Burgess, 11 Sim. 361; Newbury v. Brunswick, 2 Vt. 151-161, 19 Am. Dec. 703; 2 Beal's Cases, 103; Bar, International Law, 358-361; Riding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 371; Bishop, Marr. & Div. 360; Wharton, Ev. § 83, p. 81.

The natural and literal meaning of the translation is that for which appellant contends. These parties were in fact aliens who had concluded a marriage within the Empire. The words of the first paragraph declare that they should be governed by the law of their own state. Neither the words "capacity to contract," nor "impediments to marriage," nor any equivalent expression, appears in this paragraph. The language used does not purport to deal with competency to marry. On the contrary, it expressly and in appropriate terms concerns the conclusion of a marriage. To sustain respondent, new terms must be introduced or substituted by construction. No legal justification for such a construction appears.

The primary rule of interpretation, which we regard as controlling in this situation, is the familiar one, Semper presumitur pro matrimonia. "Every intendment of the law leads to matrimony," says Mr. Bishop, Marriage, Divorce & Separation, 956. "When a marriage has been shown in evidence, whether regular or irregular, and whatever the form of the proofs, the law raises a strong presumption of its legality,—not only casting the burden of proof upon the person objecting, but requiring him throughout in every particular to make plain against the constant pressure of this presumption the truth of law and fact that it is illegal and void. . . . It being for the highest good of the parties, of the children, and of the community that all intercourse between the sexes in form matrimonial should be such in fact, the law, when administered by enlightened judges, seizes upon all probabilities, and presses into its service all things else which can help it, in each particular case, to sustain the marriage, and repel the conclusion of unlawful commerce." In Piers v. Piers, 2 H. L. Cas. 331, there was a well-known declaration that "the question of the va lidity of a marriage cannot be tried like any other question of fact which is independent of presumption, for the law will presume in favor of marriage," and it is to be remembered that in this case the foreign law was a question of fact, and not of law. Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "My Lords, I have not found that the rule of law is anywhere laid down more to my satisfaction than it is by Lord Lyndhurst in the case of Morris v. Davies, as determined in this House (5 Clark & F. 163). It is not precisely the same presumption as exists in the present case, but the principle is strictly applicable to the presumption which we are considering. He says (see p. 265) 'The presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probability. The evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive.' No doubt, every case must vary as to how far the evidence may be considered as 'satisfactory and conclusive;' but he lays down this rule that the presumption must prevail unless it is most satisfactorily repelled by the evidence in the cause appearing conclusive to those who have to decide upon that question." The celebrated Lord Brougham said in the same case, on 369: "I should say, 'clear, distinct, and satisfactory evidence.' I am not quite prepared to use the word 'conclusive.' I think some doubt may arise upon that, which it is unnecessary to raise, because, if the evidence required be clear and satisfactory, that is quite sufficient for me. I do not like ever to lay down the rule that evidence must be 'conclusive,' because that gives occasion very frequently to needless and inconvenient doubt." There is much more and familiar authority to the same effect.

In the case at bar the evidence of an attempted marriage and of a marriage valid under the laws of this state is certain and plenary. This woman believed, and under the laws of nature and under the laws of this state was justified in believing, that this man was her lawful spouse; that their intercourse was hallowed as between husband and wife, and not prostituted as between libertine and wanton; and that possible offspring would be legitimate, and not bastardized. It does not seem to us justifiable for the law, despite this presumption, to impose an uncertain construction upon this foreign law which would brand the dead with betrayal and the living with dishonor. We are unable to perceive why the presumption of validity of an attempted marriage should be denied to these parties, both innocent of moral wrong, and the presumption of innocence extended to the most confirmed recidivist. Certainly the considerations relied upon to repel that presumption are not clear nor satisfactory, nor at all conclusive. We are therefore constrained to hold that the marriage in question, conforming as it did to the Minnesota law, conformed also to the German law as its translation has been here agreed upon.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to amend its conclusions of law, and to enter judgment for appellant in accordance with this opinion. So ordered.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

STEPHEN SMITH, Appt.

(152 N. C. 798, 67 S. E. 508.)

Intoxicating liquor — liability for sale.

One cannot escape punishment for illegal sale of intoxicating liquor because it was made to one employed by the police department to procure it, such department furnishing the money to pay for it.

(March 23, 1910.)

Note. — Instigation or consent to crime for the purpose of detecting criminal as a defense to prosecution.

For a statement of the principles underlying this subject, and cases prior to those cited in this note, see notes to Connor v. People, 25 L.R.A. 341, and Com. v. Hollister, 25 L.R.A. 349.

Illegal sale of liquor.

Since the earlier note, numerous cases have arisen in which it has been urged as a defense to a prosecution for the illegal sale of liquor, that the liquor was purchased for the very purpose of having the defendant prosecuted for its sale, and it has been almost unanimously held in such cases that such fact is no defense. Thus, in Borck v. State (Ala.) 39 So. 580, the court said: "If the defendant sold the whisky on Sunday, no matter to whom, he violated the statute, which admits of no exception. The fact that . . . [prosecuting witness] was an officer of the law can make no difference, since an officer could not, by giving his consent to the sale, any more justify the act on the part of the defendant than would be the consent of any pri-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County affirming a judgment of the Raleigh Police Court convicting him of selling whisky in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Douglass & Lyon, for appellant:

As the action of the chief of police of the city of Raleigh was not to detect a crime, but amounted to a part inducement and solicitation to commit the crime for which defendant was convicted, the criminality of the sale was destroyed.

Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 32 L.R.A. 139, 43 N. E. 710; Wilcox v. People, 17 Colo. App. 109, 67 Pac. 343; Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 109; Saunders v. People, 38 Mich. 220; vate person." And other cases holding that it is no defense that the sale upon which the prosecution is based was made to a public officer who purchased for the purpose of having the defendant prosecuted are State v. Gibbs, 109 Minn. 247, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449, 123 N. W. 810, and Caveness v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 729, 109 Pac. 125.

Cases to the same effect, in which the purchases upon which the prosecutions were based were made by others, at the request of public officials and with money furnished by them, for the purpose of laying foundations for such prosecutions, are STATE v. SMITH; Evanston v. Myers, 172 Ill. 266, 50 N. E. 204; De Graff v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 519, 103 Pac. 538; and State v. O'Brien, 35 Mont. 482, 90 Pac. 514, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1006, where the court said: "It is no defense to a prosecution of this kind that the purchase was made by a spotter, a detective, or hired informer."

So, it has been held no defense to a prosecution that the sale upon which it was based was made to detectives employed to discover illegal sales (Gordon v. State, 7 Ga. App. 691, 67 S. E. 893; People v. Everts, 112 Mich. 194, 70 N. W. 430; People v. Rush, 113 Mich. 539, 71 N. W. 863); nor that the purchase was made by the prosecuting witness at the instance of public officers, and for the purpose of instituting a prosecution (Stack v. State [Okla. Crim. Rep.] 109 Pac. 126; Moss v. State [Okla. Crim. Rep.] 111 Pac. 950; nor that the prosecuting witness was paid by the state for the purpose of inveigling the defendant into selling him whisky, in order that he might be prosecuted by the state, and that such witness might appear against him for that purpose (Taggart v. State [Okla. Crim. Rep.] 111 Pac. 959; Cunningham v. State [Okla. Crim. Rep.] 111 Pac. 959).

In State v. Lucas, 94 Mo. App. 117, 67 S. W. 971, where the prosecuting witnesses were furnished money by citizens for the purpose of buying whisky at the place in question, with a view to prosecuting the seller, and they bought the whisky in ques-

United States v. Whittier, 5 Dill. 43, Fed. Cas. No. 16,688.

Mr. T. W. Bickett, Attorney General, for the State.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted for retailing whisky. The evidence for the state tended to show that J. P. Stell, the chief of police of Raleigh, furnished certain money to witness Hammock with which to buy liquor, and also additional pay for his services in the matter, and, under orders of the chief of police, he went to the defendant, in company with one Pope, a city policeman, and purchased intoxicating liquor of the defendant, with the view of having him indicted with the money so furnished, the court said: "To discover and bring to justice those who subtly, clandestinely, and illegally dispense liquors, the methods resorted to in this case are sometimes indispensable, and when nothing more than the truth is elicited and the guilty are brought to justice through their efforts, a valuable service to the community will have been rendered." And to the same effect is State v. Quinn, 94 Mo. App. 59, 67 S. W. 974, affirmed in 170 Mo. 176, 70 S. W. 1117.

So, in State v. Feldman (Mo. App.) 129 S. W. 998, following State v. Lucas, supra, it is held that it is no defense to a prosecution for an illegal sale of liquor to a minor, that the liquor dealer was enticed into selling illegally by a detective in the employ of the anti-saloon league, to discover and induce violations of the liquor laws, and who had been furnished money by that league with which to buy and so induce sales for the purpose of having the sellers prosecuted.

In Colorado, a somewhat different view seems to be taken, although most of the Colorado cases seem to be in the nature of civil actions by cities to recover penalties for violations of ordinances against certain sales of liquor. Thus, in Ford v. Denver, 10 Colo. App. 500, 51 Pac. 1015, where a city was instrumental in procuring a sale of liquor for the purpose of laying the foundation for a suit in which a judicial opinion as to what would constitute a violation of an ordinance against certain sales of liquor might be procured, though its purpose was unknown to the seller, the court said: "It was as much responsible for the sale of the liquor as the defendant, and it will not be permitted to replenish its treasury from penalties incurred at its instigation. It cannot be heard to complain of an act, the doing of which is solicited."

So, in People v. Braisted, 13 Colo. App. 532, 58 Pac. 796, it was held that an action by a town in the name of the people, to recover a penalty for a sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of a town ordinance, cannot be maintained where the town attorney instructed the complaining witness ed and punished in the court of the police justice of the city of Raleigh.

The sole question presented by the appeal is whether this conduct on the part of the chief of police is a bar to the prosecution. In McClain on Criminal Law, § 118, it is said: "A question analogous to that discussed in the preceding section, and yet depending for its solution on somewhat different principles, is as to whether one who has been decoyed into the commission of a criminal act for the purpose of securing his detection and punishment is relieved from criminal liability by that fact. It is sometimes suggested that it is very improper and unworthy conduct on the part of prosecuting officers to induce men to be criminals for the purpose of securing their conviction, and such conduct has been criticized; but it is a well-settled principle that the wrongful acts of the officers of the state in connection with a prosecution will not be imputed to the state so as to excuse the defendant from criminal liability for what he actually does."

Evanston v. Myers, 172 Ill. 266, 50 N. E. 204, is directly in point. "A driver of a beer wagon who sells beer in violation of a city ordinance is liable to punishment, though the city furnished the money and employed the purchaser as a detective to discover violations of the ordinance, where no fraud or deceit was used in the purchase or any inducement offered other than a willingness to buy." In Rater v. State, 49 Ind. 508, it is held that "the fact that a to purchase the liquor, giving him money to pay for it, for the sole purpose of involving the defendant in a violation of the ordinance, in order that a prosecution might be instituted against him and a penalty recovered. The court said: "It would be contrary to good morals to allow the plan to succeed. Public policy will not permit a municipality to derive profit from unlawful acts which are deliberately instigated and contrived by its officers."

And in Walton v. Canon City, 14 Colo. App. 352, 59 Pac. 840, where a deputy marshal of a city, part of whose official duty it was to find out where liquor was being sold, in behalf of the city, instructed a witness to purchase beer at defendant's place, giving the witness money to pay for it, for the purpose of involving defendant in a liability to the city through a violation of one of its ordinances, the court said: "We have held that public policy will not permit a municipality to derive a profit from acts which are instigated by its officers. . . . Conceding that he did violate the ordinance, his act was induced by the city through its officer, and the city cannot be allowed, by taking money out of his pocket, to turn the act so committed to its own advantage."

So, Wilcox v. People, 17 Colo. App. 109, 67 Pac. 343, holds that one cannot be convicted for selling liquor in violation of a town ordinance, where the prosecuting witness purchased the liquor at the instigation of the town, for the purpose of laying a foundation for the prosecution.

But in People ex rel. Sterling v. Chipman, 31 Colo. 90, 71 Pac. 1108, where a town attorney employed a private detective for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the liquor ordinances of the town were being violated, and the detective gave a witness money with which the latter bought liquor from the defendant, the supreme court, distinguishing Ford v. Denver, supra, as not being applicable to the facts of this case, and People v. Braisted and Walton v. Canon City, supra, on the ground that in those cases, "witnesses were furnished money by the officers of the town with instructions to buy liquor from the defendants," said: "We do not understand that the court of appeals has gone to the extent of saying that a municipal officer cannot employ persons to ascertain whether the ordinances are being violated, and that prosecutions cannot be supported by testimony procured in the way shown in this case; although, if carried to its logical conclusion, the doctrine announced in the two cases referred to might include this case. However, we are not prepared to announce as a doctrine that town attorneys are to be so handicapped in the performance of their duties that prosecutions may not be sustained by the testimony obtained in the manner the testimony in this case was obtained."

Illegal use of mails.

Prosecutions for illegal use of the mails are similar to those already considered in that the particular offense instigated, or for which the opportunity is offered, is generally only one of a kind habitually committed, and, further, in that the offenses are more against the public generally than against the prosecuting witness. In these cases, therefore, it has been uniformly held to be no defense to a prosecution that evidence of the illegal use was obtained by means of decoy letters sent to defendant by government employees. Thus, in Grimm v. United States, 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470, a prosecution for the illegal use of the mails for sending letters conveying information as to where obscene matter could be obtained, where such letters were sent in response to letters written by a postoffice inspector and signed with fictitious names, for the purpose of securing evidence against the defendant, and were directed and mailed to fictitious persons, the court said: "The law was actually violated by the defendant: he placed letters in the postoffice which conveyed information as to where obscene matter could be obtained, and he placed them there with a view of giving such information to the person who should actually receive those party was deceived into violation of the law by one who was employed as a detective will not be a justification." In People v. Rush, 113 Mich. 539, 71 N. W. 883, it is held: "The fact that a witness to whom an unlawful sale of liquor was made was employed by the prosecuting attorney as a detective, with a view to respondent's prosecution, is no defense." Many other cases are to the same purport. Among them Grimm v. United States, 156 U. S. 604, 39 L. ed. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470, where a detective suspecting a person was using the mail for sending out obscene matter wrote a letter in response to which the defendant mailed such matter. It was held that the defendant could not set up the defense that but for such application he would not have sent out this response. In People v. Everts, 112 Mich. 194, 70 N. W. 430, and People v. Rush, supra, it was held no defense in an indictment for an unlawful sale of liquor, that it was made to a detective sent by a prosecuting attorney that he might use such purchase and sale as evidence. Indeed, the authorities are numerous, and it would cripple the effective enforcement of the criminal law if it were not permissible to thus procure evidence.

There are some seeming exceptions, for instance in larceny, whenever the conduct of the owner amounts to a consent that his property may be taken. The reason is that in larceny it is an indispensable element of the offense that the property shall be taken "against the will of the owner." Also in letters, no matter what his name; and the fact that the person who wrote under these assumed names, and received his letters, was a government detective, in no manner detracts from his guilt."

And on the authority of Grimm v. United States, supra, it was held in Rosen v. United States, 161 U. S. 29, 40 L. ed. 606, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434, 480, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 251, to be no defense to a prosecution for mailing an obscene paper, that it was mailed in response to a decoy letter.

So, it is no defense to a prosecution for mailing obscene letters that they were sent in answer to letters written under an assumed name by a government detective, for the sole purpose of obtaining evidence from the defendant upon which to base the prosecution. Andrews v. United States, 162 U. S. 420, 40 L. ed. 1023, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798.

And it is no defense to a prosecution for the mailing of obscene publications that they were sent to the government inspector who instigated the prosecution, in response to decoy letters written by him for the purpose of discovering the fact whether or not defendant was engaged in violation of the law, and asking defendant to send them to him through the mail. Price v. United States, 165 U. S. 311, 41 L. ed. 727, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366.

Likewise, it has been held no defense to a prosecution for abstracting and embezzling money from the mails, that it was taken from a decoy letter addressed to a fictitious person, and mailed by an inspector, for the purpose of detecting defendant if he should commit the crime. United States v. Jones, 80 Fed. 513. The court said, however, in this case: "There is something repugnant in the idea of the government, by art and contrivance, entrapping one of its citizens into the commission of crime in order to subject him to criminal prosecution; and such prosecutions have been felt by the courts to be more or less objectionable in morals and in policy. The 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

use of decoy letters for the purpose of discovering who the mail robbers are is in itself probably necessary, and, if objectionable, is at least tolerable, on the ground of necessity. But to go further, and, after the citizen has been seduced by the government into robbing the mail, to prosecute him criminally for the act, is more or less offensive to public sentiment. I should have been disposed to follow the rulings of some of the circuit courts in discouraging these prosecutions, but I think the Supreme Court has decided, unmistakably, not only that the use of decoy letters is necessary to the detection of certain offenses, but that criminal prosecutions based on decoys must be sustained."

So, in Goode v. United States, 159 U. S. 663, 40 L. ed. 297, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136, the court said: "That the fact that the letter was a decoy is no defense is too well settled by the modern authorities to be now open to contention."

And in Montgomery v. United States, 162 U. S. 410, 40 L. ed. 1020, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, on the authority of Goode v. United States, supra, it was held no defense to a prosecution for embezzling and stealing letters containing money which had come into defendant's hands as a railway postal clerk, that such letters were decoys and had been mailed for the purpose of detecting him.

To the same effect are Hall v. United States, 168 U. S. 632, 42 L. ed. 607, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, and Scott v. United States, 172 U. S. 343, 43 L. ed. 471, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209, where the court said: "A decoy letter is not subject to the criticism frequently properly made in regard to other measures sometimes resorted to, that it is placing temptation before a man, and endeavoring to make him commit a crime. There is no temptation by a decoy letter. It is the same as all other letters to outward appearance, and the duty of the carrier who takes it is the same. The fact that it is to a fictitious person is in all probability entirely unknown to the carrier, and even if known is immaterial."

proceedings for divorce, if the plaintiff secures someone to entice the defendant into illicit acts. The reason is that "connivance" is always a bar to the plaintiff's cause of action. Dennis v. Dennis, 68 Conn. 186, 34 L.R.A. 449, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95, 36 Atl. 34. But as to prosecution for offenses, not against individuals, but against the public, like the present, it is no defense that the illegal sale was made to a party who bought not for his own use, but to aid in convicting the seller. It is not the motive of the buyer, but the conduct of the seller, which is to be considered.

The attorney general in concluding his brief says: "In the case at bar it does not appear that the chief of police told Hammock to induce any sale. He simply furnished the money and told him to endeavor to buy the liquor. The officer doubtless had the best of reasons for believing there was a live tiger, in the house of defendant. He put out his bait, and the tiger, for all his cunning, 'bolted it,' and now complains that the law of the jungle was violated, else he would not have been entrapped." The defendant's counsel, in reply to this, strenuously contended that his client was a donkey, not a tiger. As to that controversy. Non nostrum est, tantas componere lites.

In the appeal, we find no error.

Larceny.

In larceny and other crimes where a want of consent of the individual affected is an element of criminality, instigation or consent to the crime is a defense to prosecution, if it negatives one of the essential elements of the crime charged, though not otherwise. Thus, in Lowe v. State, 44 Fla. 449, 103 Am. St. Rep. 171, 32 So. 956, the court said: "The authorities are abundant and the law unquestioned, that a taking by the voluntary consent of the owner or his authorized servant or agent, even though with a felonious intent, does not constitute larceny. But where the criminal design originates with the accused, and the owner does not in person or by an agent or servant suggest the design nor actively urge the accused on to the commission of the crime, the mere fact that such owner, suspecting that the accused intends to steal his property, in person or through a servant or agent, exposes the property or neglects to protect it, or furnishes facilities for the execution of the criminal design, under the expectation that the accused will take the property or avail himself of the facilities furnished, will not amount to a consent in law, even though the agent or servant of such owner, by his instructions, appears to co-operate in the execution of the crime."

And in State v. Adams, 115 N. C. 775, 20 S. E. 722, it is said that the court correctly told the jury that "if there was the guilty intent previously formed by the defendant, to steal certain property, and he carried out such design previously formed, he is guilty, notwithstanding the owner of the property was advised of the intended larceny, appointed agents to watch him, and could have prevented the theft, but did not do so, and allowed him to commit the theft, with a view of having him subsequently punished."

So, in Crowder v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 92, 96 S. W. 934, it was held no defense to a prosecution for the theft of mules, that the owner had employed a detective in order to catch defendant, who, he believed, had been stealing his stock, and that the detective, by direction of the owner, apparently encouraged defendant's design and led him on, provided neither the owner nor the detective induced the original intent on the part of the thief,—though if the intent and purpose to steal originated with, and was suggested by, the detective, it would be a taking with the consent of the owner, and the defendant would not be guilty.

In State v. Adams, supra, however, it was further held that there was no larceny where an agent of the owner of cotton, being informed of an intended larceny by the defendant, watched for the latter two nights without his coming, and until late the third night, when, no one coming, the agent filled up two sacks of cotton and gave one of them to a servant of the owner, to take and give to defendant telling the latter that he could get some more, whereupon defendant returned with the servant and took the other sack and carried it away.

And where property was taken from the possession of a railway company with its knowledge and consent, and pursuant to a previous arrangement by a detective who, at the time, was the agent of, and in the employment of, the company, for the purpose of entrapping the driver of a transfer wagon and the defendant, who was suspected of receiving goods stolen from the company, and the detective delivered the goods to the driver and persuaded him, although he suspected that the goods were being stolen from the company by the former, to convey the goods to defendant's store, and defendant received them from the driver, it was held that, as the criminal design did not originate with the driver or the defendant, and the taking by the former was at the instigation and with the consent of the company, there was no larceny, and defendant was accordingly not guilty of the crime of receiving stolen goods. State v. Waghalter, 177 Mo. 676, 76 S. W. 1028, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 283.

So, property is taken with the owner's consent, where one employed by the owner to detect thieves who had been stealing his property was authorized to use the property in any way he might see proper for that purpose, and, for the purpose of entrapping and prosecuting the thief, advises, co-operates with, and assists the latter in planning and carrying out the taking. State v. Hull, 33 Or. 56, 72 Am. St. Rep. 694, 54 Pac. 159.

And there is no larceny where one acting as a detective, in order to catch cattle thieves, and having the consent of the owner to a taking, inaugurates and actively participates with defendant in the thieving enterprise. McGee v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 66 S. W. 562, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 413.

The trespass necessary to constitute larceny is absent, also, where a property owner, upon being informed of a design to steal his property, places it upon a platform where the intending thief is planning to get it, with instructions to his servant in charge of the platform to deliver it to the one who will call for it, so that when the intending thief arrives, he is treated as having a right to the property,—especially where another agent of the owner, sent to arrange for the taking of the property, has agreed to the place proposed by the thief, under circumstances which involve a promise of assistance in carrying out the plan. Topolewski v. State, 130 Wis. 244, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 750, 118 Am. St. Rep. 1019, 109 N. W. 1037, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 627.

In Faust v. United States, 163 U. S. 452, 41 L. ed. 224, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1112, it was held no defense to the prosecution of an assistant postmaster for embezzling money order funds of the United States, that it is not shown that the embezzlement took place without the consent of the postmaster.

And in People v. Mills, 178 N. Y. 274, 67 L.R.A. 131, 70 N. E. 786, affirming 91 App. Div. 331, 86 N. Y. Supp. 529, it was held no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the statutory crimes of removing from the court records and stealing certain indictments, that defendant, having formed the purpose of corruptly effecting in some way the disposal of these indictments, was entrapped into what he did by representatives of the district attorney's office, or that the indictments were taken with the consent of the district attorney from a place where they had been placed by authority of the latter for the purpose of detecting defendant in the commission of the crime. The court said: "An important distinction between this case and those relied upon by the appellant is found in the difference between public and private ownership of the property taken by the accused. In most cases some third person is injured by the crime, and is directly or indirectly the complainant, but in this case the state was, as it must be in all criminal cases, the prosecutor, and it was also the injured party, for its property was the subject of the attempt at larceny. If an individual owner voluntarily delivers his property to one who wishes to steal it, there is no trespass; but when the property of the state is delivered by anyone, under any circumstances, to any person for the purpose of having him steal it, and he 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) takes it into his possession with intent to steal it, there is a trespass, and the attempt is a crime." There was, however, a strong dissent in this case as to the effect of the conduct of the district attorney and his representatives upon the character of defendant's acts.

Burglary.

Consent of officers is no defense to a prosecution for burglary. Thus, in People v. Laird, 102 Mich. 135, 60 N. W. 457, the court said: "The duty of the police lies beyond the protection of the public from a particular offense. It will not do to lay down the rule that if a burglary is suspected, it is the duty of police officers to prevent the commission of that particular offense, rather than lie in wait and secure the guilty parties. In such case the police do not encourage the commission of the crime, but simply apprehend parties bent upon the crime, who, in carrying out plans already formulated, rush into the arms of the officers. Even an informant accompanying his associates does not necessarily encourage their purpose, and it is not proper that he should, but he simply acquiesces in a plan already formed."

And in State v. Abley, 109 Iowa, 61, 46 L.R.A. 862, 77 Am. St. Rep. 520, 80 N. W. 225, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 279, though the court characterized the conduct of the officer as "outrageous," it was held no defense to a prosecution for burglary that defendant was instigated by a police officer to commit the crime, or that the owner of the building, being informed that the crime was contemplated, merely remained silent and permitted it to go on,—both for the purpose of having defendant apprehended and prosecuted.

In State v. Currie, 13 N. D. 655, 69 L.R.A. 405, 112 Am. St. Rep. 687, 102 N. W. 875, it was held no defense to a prosecution for burglary, that one present with and assisting defendant in the burglary was a detective, if the detective did not instigate the crime, and it was committed, as to every ingredient of it, by the defendant; nor that the owner of the building, to whom the detective disclosed that it was probably about to be burglarized by the defendant with the feigned assistance of himself, acting for the purpose of securing evidence of the intended burglary and other crimes, did not take steps to prevent the crime, but passively allowed it to go on.

And it is no defense to the prosecution of one who was the instigator and prime mover of an attempt to commit burglary with intent to steal, that one to whom the defendant proposed the crime, and who acted as a confederate, informed the owner of the premises to be burglarized of the intended burglary, and the latter, for the purpose of catching defendant, told the informer not to insist on defendant's coming, or to encourage him to come, but just to let him come along of his own free will and accord and voluntarily, if he would,

—such conduct of the owner not amounting to a consent for defendant to enter the house or take property therefrom. Robinson v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 71, 53 Am. St. Rep. 701, 29 S. W. 40.

But burglary is not committed by those assisting a detective in entering a building and taking money from a safe, in pursuance of a previously arranged plan between him and the owner, with the sole intent of entrapping the others into the apparent commission of a crime. Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 32 L.R.A. 139, 43 N. E. 710. In this case the court said: "Strong men are sometimes unprepared to cope with temptation and resist encouragement to evil when financially embarrassed and impoverished. A contemplated crime may never be developed into a consummated act. To stimulate unlawful intentions for the purpose and with the motive of bringing them to maturity, so the consequent crime may be punished, is a dangerous practice. It is safer law and sounder morals to hold, where one arranges to have a crime committed against his property or himself, and knows that an attempt is to be made to encourage others to commit the act, by one acting in concert with such owner, that no crime is thus committed. The owner and his agent may wait passively for the would-be criminal to perpetrate the offense, and each and every part of it, for himself, but they must not aid, encourage, or solicit him that they may seek to punish."

So, there is no burglary where the entry was instigated and participated in by one acting with knowledge and assent of the occupant of the building as a decoy, for the purpose of having defendant apprehended, and the latter relied upon the other's statement that he was authorized to enter in the manner shown. Roberts v. Territory, 8 Okla. 326, 57 Pac. 840, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 193.

Nor where the owner is connected with the original design to have his house broken, for the purpose of having defendant prosecuted therefor, and leaves the key at a point agreed upon with another, for the purpose of enabling him and defendant to go into the house, and the other person induces defendant to go into the house and unlocks the door for him,—the entry being with the owner's consent. Bird v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 96, 122 Am. St. Rep. 803, 90 S. W. 651.

Robbery.

Consent to a robbery, so as to absolve the robber from criminal liability, is not shown by merely providing one's self with money which may be taken, and going where the deed may be done in anticipation of the commission of the crime, for the purpose of apprehending the criminal. Tones v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 363, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 122 Am. St. Rep. 759, 88 S. W. 217, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 455.

And it is no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the crime of robbery, that defendant's accomplices were acting under instructions from the district attorney's office for the purpose of apprehending defendant, where the latter made the first suggestion of the crime and the person to be robbed had no part in the transaction. People v. DuVeau, 105 App. Div. 381, 94 N. Y. Supp. 225.

So, it is no defense to a prosecution for taking property by force or threats, and against the owner's consent, in pursuance of a conspiracy for the purpose, that the prosecutor, after defendants had formed their guilty intent, laid a trap, and went voluntarily to their meeting place with money which was marked and furnished him by the prosecuting attorney for the purpose of entrapping defendants, who were thus entrapped into the hands of officers on the watch. State v. Piscioneri (W. Va.) 69 S. E. 375.

And it is no defense to a prosecution for a train robbery that, after the plans for the commission of the crime were completed, a pretended accomplice informed the superintendent of the railroad thereof, and the latter, doing nothing to aid in the crime, simply protected the train to be robbed by guards, to prevent the contemplated robbery and apprehend the would-be robbers. State v. West, 157 Mo. 309, 57 S. W. 1071.

Bribery.

It is no defense to a prosecution for the statutory crime of bribing a representative of a labor organization, that the latter lied to and "bluffed" defendants for the purpose of entrapping them. "Even though . . . [he] went farther than laying a trap, and actually solicited the appellants to commit the crime, it would furnish no defense to them, since . . . [he] was not a prosecuting or other public official of any kind." People v. Block, 125 N. Y. Supp. 301.

And on a prosecution for offering to bribe an officer, it is immaterial that the latter suggested bribery to the defendant, for the fact that the officer may have been willing to be bribed would not make defendant less guilty of offering the bribe. Rath v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 142, 33 S. W. 229.

In State v. Dudoussat, 47 La. Ann. 977, 17 So. 685, it is held to be no defense to the prosecution of a city councilman for receiving a bribe, that, after he had made a proposal to the prosecuting witness that the latter pay him money for securing for witness a desired privilege, witness and others arranged and carried out a plan to entrap the defendant by witness's giving him marked money to the amount required, in the presence of the other parties secreted as witnesses. The court said, however, that if the "trap" prepared and arranged to procure evidence had been an inducement, an opportunity offered, and a temptation presented to commit the crime, the defendant should have been found not guilty; but as he had previously made up his mind to commit the offense, and proposed to do so, and the means employed were not an inducement or temptation, but for the purpose of securing the evidence, they were no defense.

But in People v. Liphardt, 105 Mich. 80, 62 N. W. 1022, it is held no defense to the prosecution of a member of a board of education for receiving a bribe, that the prosecuting witness encouraged another member of the board to advise defendant that witness would accept a proposition from defendant to sell his vote, and that witness informed the mayor of this, and they, with the police, made plans to entrap and detect defendant in receiving a bribe paid by the witness for the purpose of so detecting defendant. The court said: "We know of no case that holds that one who has committed a criminal act should be acquitted because induced to do so by another. It is merely when the criminality of the act is shown to be absent by the fact of the inducement that such proof justifies acquittal."

And on a prosecution of a state senator for asking and receiving a bribe, that after defendant had offered to receive the bribe, a plot was formed to entrap him and other senators, does not render inadmissible against the defendant the testimony of those implicated in the plot. People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 Pac. 364, 370.

Subornation of perjury.

In Com. v. Bickings, 12 Pa. Dist. R. 206, it was held that a conviction of attempted subornation of perjury cannot stand, where it appears that defendant, having been engaged in litigation against his brother, in the course of which it became necessary to prove certain disputed facts by a witness additional to himself, was approached by an acquaintance of both the brothers, between whom and defendant's brother a relation is clearly made out, and was finally lured by the former into giving him a written statement of the facts to be testified to and a part payment of a sum to be paid to him for testifying, and that the whole was a trap so to discredit defendant in the civil proceedings as to compel him to abate all or a part of his demand. The court said: "Wharton (Crim. Law, § 149) says that 'a trap laid by which the defendant, previously intending the offense, is tempted to proceed with it in such a way as to lead to exposure, is ordinarily no defense.' And the supreme court of our state, in the case of Campbell v. Com. 84 Pa. 187, held that a detective might, in the interest of the community, join a gang of criminals for the purpose of exposing it and bringing the criminals to punishment. This, however, is the extreme position to which any court in this or any other state has ever gone. The liability of men to fall into crime by consulting their interests and passions is unfortunately great, without the stimulus of encouragement. No state, therefore, can safely adopt a policy by which crime is to be artificially propagated. This principle it is which leads to the limitations of the doctrine as 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) laid down by Wharton, supra, namely, that the defendant who is trapped must himself have previously intended the offense into which he is trapped."

Extortion.

It is no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the crime of extortion, that one from whom defendant sought to obtain money by threats of accusation of crime, and who paid the money to defendant, was at the time acting as a decoy of the police, and trying to induce defendant to receive money from him under such circumstances as would render defendant guilty of a crime, and enable the police to arrest and convict him of it. People v. Gardiner, 144 N. Y. 119, 28 L.R.A. 609, 43 Am. St. Rep. 741, 38 N. E. 1003, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 82.

Criminal libel.

On a prosecution for criminal libel, it is no defense that the person libeled, having been informed and believing that the defendant designed to publish a libel, employed a detective to watch him and take every step to detect him if he committed the offense, and even to co-operate with him for that purpose, and allowed the crime to be committed, for the purpose of detecting and prosecuting the defendant, but the latter was not solicited to commit the crime, nor was it even suggested to him. People v. Ritchie, 12 Utah, 180, 42 Pac. 209.

Shipment of misbranded food.

It is no defense to a prosecution under the pure food act, for an interstate shipment of misbranded bottled water, that the shipment on which the indictment was based was secretly induced by a government detective in order to create a basis for a criminal charge. United States v. Morgan, 181 Fed. 587.

Counterfeiting.

It is no defense to a prosecution for falsely making the counterfeiting a trademark, that the counterfeiting was done at the instance of an agent of the owners of the trademark, and paid for with their money, for the purpose of ascertaining whether defendant was engaged in the unlawful business of counterfeiting their trademark, and defendant was not requested to print labels for the owners of the trademark, but was employed to print false labels for a person apparently designing to commit a fraud. People v. Krivitzky, 168 N. Y. 182, 61 N. E. 175, affirming 60 App. Div. 307, 70 N. Y. Supp. 173.

And on a prosecution for selling goods bearing counterfeit labels, it is no defense that the purchaser, acting with a special agent of the owners of the labels counterfeited, knew that the labels on the goods purchased were counterfeits, and made the purchase for the purpose of proving the fact of sale by the defendant and having him prosecuted. People v. Hilfman, 61 App. Div. 541, 70 N. Y. Supp. 621.

Abortion.

In People v. Conrad, 102 App. Div. 566, 19 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 259, 92 N. Y. Supp. 606, affirmed in 182 N. Y. 529, 74 N. E. 1122, it is held to be no defense to a prosecution for an attempt to commit the crime of abortion, that it was brought about by means of a trap arranged by the officers of the County Medical Society. The court said: "[Defendant] was not a passive instrument in the hands of the entrapping parties. He did the act with which he was charged voluntarily, with full knowledge of the subject and of the consequences which would flow therefrom. Under such circumstances, setting a trap by which he was caught is not a defense."

Illegal practice of dentistry.

On a prosecution for practising dentistry without a license, it is no defense that the complaining witness went to the office of the defendant, had him fill a cavity in his tooth, and paid him for the service, with the view of prosecuting him therefor. State v. Littooy, 52 Wash. 87, 100 Pac. 170, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 292. A. C. W.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

MRS. SADIE RICHMOND
v.
TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Tenn. —, 130 S. W. 790.)

Insurance — failure to renew — effect.

1. An accident insurance policy is not in force where a renewal receipt is mailed by the agent, held by the insured a couple of weeks, and returned with a notice to discontinue, although the agents do not accept the discontinuance, but write assured that they will hold the receipt for him and give him credit for the premium, where he dies before the letter reaches him; and it is immaterial that both parties think that the policy is in force until the discontinuance is accepted.

Same — keeping renewal receipt.

2. Mere delay in rejecting a receipt for renewal of an accident insurance policy does not amount to an acceptance which will continue the policy in force.

(June 11, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County in complainant's favor in a suit brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. R. Turley and R. M. Heath, for appellant:

As the correspondence between the parties shows that their minds never met with respect to the terms, there is no contract.

1 Joyce, Ins. §§ 45, 55; 1 May, Ins. 4th ed. §§ 50-53; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Young, 23 Wall. 85, 23 L. ed. 152; Giddings v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 102 U. S. 108, 26 L. ed. 92.

A proposal for insurance must be accepted before it becomes a contract.

New York Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 23 Pa. 72.

Messrs. McKellar & Keyser for appellee.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After a very careful examination of this case we find ourselves unable to concur in the result reached by the learned chancellor. The letter of September 2d, written by the agents, Marx & Bensdorf, containing the renewal receipt, simply amounted to an offer on the part of the company to renew the insurance for the ensuing six months. This was, of course, open to the acceptance or rejection of George Richmond, the subject of the insurance. On the 18th of the same month he mailed a reply to the agents, in which he rejected the offer and returned the renewal receipt. On the next day, September 19th, the agents wrote George Richmond another letter, in which they renewed the offer and urged him to accept it. He, however, never received this last letter, but was killed on the 22d of the same month.

We think on this state of facts there could be no doubt whatever as to the true legal result. A different construction, however, is sought by the complainant to be placed upon this correspondence, based upon two or three considerations; the first being the language of the letters themselves, the second resting on the evidence to the fact that George Richmond thought himself bound by his failure to reply for so long, and the third resting on the delay itself, as an inference of acceptance.

The correspondence was as follows:

Sept. 2, 1908.

Mr. George Richmond,
City.

Dear Sir:—

We take pleasure in inclosing herewith renewal receipt No. A 995,695, renewing your accident policy, or 1,474,327, for six months from the 4th inst. Premium on same is $15, for which you can send us check at your convenience.

Thanking you for your business, and soliciting your further favors, we are,

Yours very truly,

Marx & Bensdorf,
District Managers.

The inclosed receipt was as follows:

Series A. No. 995,893.

The Travelers' Insurance Company, of Hartford, Connecticut.

Received of George Richmond premium of $15, continuing in force policy No. O O 1,474,327 from the 4th day of September, 1908, to the 4th day of March, 1909, at noon, subject to all the conditions in original policy. Not valid unless countersigned by a duly authorized agent or cashier of the company. B. A. Page, Secretary. Countersigned at Memphis, Tennessee.

Marx & Bensdorf, D. A.

Sept. 18, 1908.

Messrs. Marx & Bensdorf,

Dear Sirs:—

I am sorry, but owing to the present conditions I must discontinue my policy No. ———.

Thanking you for past favors, I am,

Yours very truly,

George Richmond.

Box 109.

Sept. 19, 1908.

Mr. George Richmond,

City:—

We are in receipt of your favor of the 18th inst., inclosing your accident renewal receipt for cancelation, and note your remarks that on account of present conditions you will be compelled to discontinue your accident policy. We would suggest, however, that you keep your insurance in force, as there is no telling when a serious accident may occur to you, and we are perfectly willing to allow you to pay this premium one half in sixty days and one half in ninety days, if you prefer.

We are holding the renewal receipt in the office, waiting to hear from you.

We are very truly yours,

Marx & Bensdorf,

District Managers.

This last letter was misdirected, and never reached George Richmond.

The language of the renewal receipt is to the effect that the policy is continued in force, and the language of the letter accompanying it is that the policy is by the receipt renewed for six months. The reply of George Richmond uses the word "discontinue," indicating that he desired to put an end to something he thought then in existence, and the language of the letter of September 18th likewise indicated that the agents thought that the receipt evidenced a contract then in existence, because it mentioned the accident renewal receipt as something returned for cancelation, and suggested that "you keep your insurance in force," and says, "We will hold the renewal receipt in the office, waiting to hear from you." In addition to this, the evidence of the witness Bourne, and of Walter Richmond, the brother of George Richmond, clearly indicates that the latter thought that by holding the receipt so long as he had, he bound himself to take it for the six months, and that he would have to be released by the company or its agents. He desired to be released, because he wanted to substitute for his insurance in the Travelers' Insurance Company a policy in the Fidelity Accident Insurance Company.

Now it is perfectly clear that the agents of the insurance company, by sending the renewal receipt on September 2d to George Richmond, could not force the contract upon him, no matter how much they thought the company was bound by the language of the offer. It was, indeed, bound; but that was subject to the acceptance of George Richmond. He certainly did not accept it in terms, and the only reason there could be for holding that the contract was completed would be that George Richmond, by delaying to either accept or reject from September 2d to September 18th, had thereby become bound; that is, that the delay had amounted to an acceptance. No authority has been cited by counsel, and we have discovered none, indicating that such delay would amount to evidence of acceptance.

The nearest approach we have found to it is the case of Adams v. Eidam, 42 Minn. 53, 43 N. W. 690, referred to in § 58 of Joyce on Insurance. In that case it was held that a finding that an applicant received and retained without objection policies made out and sent to him was equivalent to finding that he had accepted them; but there, it is seen, there was an application by him for insurance, and the sending of policies to him. By his retaining them an unreasonable length of time, there was an inference that they were satisfactory to him, and that he had accepted them. In the present case, however, there was no application for insurance at all, but simply an offer or solicitation on the part of the insurance company, on September 2d, to renew an insurance policy which would expire on September 4th if not renewed. This was an offer which was not accepted. As to the matter of delay the authorities are very numerous that an application for insurance will not, even though accompanied by a premium, be treated as accepted, although the company should delay to act upon the matter for months. Some of these authorities are referred to in § 57 of Joyce on Insurance. The subsequent authorities since the publication of that book are in entire accord with the text. There are cases to the effect that delay will hold the company where the party making the application has been misled into believing that the insurance would be accepted, and, relying thereon, has refrained from obtaining other insurance. Here, it is observed, arises the element of injury and the consequent estoppel. On the other hand, it was held in one case that where a certain slip was sent the insured, to be pasted on his policy, and he kept it without making any reply for a considerable time, he could not be held to have accepted the slip modifying the contract by reason of the mere delay, unless it could be made to appear that the company had suffered some injury by reason of the delay. Shakman v. United States Credit System Co. 92 Wis. 366, 32 L.R.A. 383, 387, 53 Am. St. Rep. 920, 66 N. W. 528. The fact that the insurance agents entertained the mistaken view of law that the policy was in force, pending the offer of September 2d, until they received George Richmond's letter of September 18th, and that Richmond entertained the same mistaken view, and supposed that he would be held on the premium unless released by the company, did not change the rule of law that there can be no contract without mutual assent, and did not substitute for the ineffectiveness of that delay, in law, the opinions of these persons, or add to that delay an efficiency which the law did not attach to it.

We are referred by complainant's counsel to two cases as being conclusive of the present controversy. The first of these is Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Jones, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 146, 73 S. W. 978. In that case it appeared that an agent took the application of Jones for insurance, and this application was accepted by the company, and the policy sent to him pursuant to the terms of the contract. The facts just stated made such a contract. On receiving the policy, Jones attempted to return it because he supposed that the amount of the premium that was to be paid in such instalments was larger than he had contracted to pay, in which he was mistaken; however, he returned the policy to the company, and they sent it back to him. That is, after the contract was completed, they refused to agree to a cancellation. The difference between that case and the one before us is that here there was no contract made at all, but simply an offer of a contract, a tender. In the Jones Case, of course, the company had the right to refuse to cancel the contract after it was already complete; and it was liable thereon, Jones having died pending the attempted cancellation. The other case is Waters v. Security Life & Annuity Co. 144 N. C. 663, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 805, 57 S. E. 437. In that case it appeared that in February, 1906, the insured made an application for a policy of insurance, and executed two notes as payment of premium, each for $107.30, payable at certain dates. The policy was delivered on February 25, 1906. On the next day the insured wrote to the company that it was not the kind of policy he had bought, and he would not accept it. On March 2d the company wrote to him that the policy was all right as it was, but that an agent of the company would take the subject up with him and make the matter satisfactory to him. While matters were in this situation the insured died. Upon these facts the trial court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The court held: "If, therefore, the intestate, acting under an erroneous impression, sent the contract back to the company with the statement that it was not the policy he ordered, and he did not intend to pay the notes, the company could have made this proposition a binding contract by an unconditional acceptance signified in some definite manner; but, until they did this, the act of the intestate in sending back the policy was nothing more than a proposal to cancel, and, if he died before acceptance, the negotiation was off, and the contract of insurance remained."

Here there was an application, and a transmission of the policy pursuant to the application, effecting the contract. If the policy was in accord with the application, the letter of the insured would not be effective to prevent the operation of the contract, because that would take place as soon as the policy was placed in the mail for transmission to the insured. It then became a question whether the company would cancel or modify. Pending negotiations for such cancellation or modification, the insured died, leaving the contract, of course, in its original state.

Now, the radical difference between these two cases and the one before us is that in each of these cited cases there was a completed contract before the attempted cancellation, and the party died pending the negotiations for cancellation. In the case at bar there was no completed contract at all, but simply an offer on the one side, and a delay to respond for about two weeks on the other side, and a final rejection. Surely, under such state of facts, there ought not to be any recovery.

Therefore the decree of the chancellor must be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Plff. in Err.,
v.

WILLIAM B. KRAFT.

Lottery — gift enterprise — trading stamps.

1. A scheme by which a corporation organizes a co-operative society to which it admits members upon payment of a nominal fee which entitles them to stamps from merchants under contract with the corporation, which it redeems in cash or merchandise, is a gift enterprise within the meaning of a statute providing that every person who shall sell any article with the promise to give or hold out the promise of gift of, anything in consideration of the purchase of an article, shall be regarded as conducting a gift enterprise.

Same — police power — advertising.

2. The business of a trading stamp company is not a process of advertising the merchants with whom contracts are made which will take it out of the operation of the police power.

Constitutional law — trading stamps — prohibition.

3. Freedom of contract is not unconstitutionally interfered with by the prohibition of the use of trading stamps.

(Van Orsdel, J., dissents.)

(May 10, 1910.)

ERROR to the Police Court of the District of Columbia to review a judgment quashing an information charging defendant with engaging in a gift enterprise in violation of law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward H. Thomas and William Henry White, for plaintiff in error:

The business of the defendant, commonly known as the trading stamp business, constitutes a gift enterprise under the act of 1871, which is constitutional.

Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512; Humes v. Ft. Smith, 93 Fed. 857; State v. Hawkins, 95 Md. 146, 93 Am. St. Rep. 328, 51 Atl. 850; Fleetwood v. Read, 21 Wash. 547, 47 L.R.A. 205, 58 Pac. 665; Humes v. Little Rock, 138 Fed. 929; State v. Ramseyer, 73 N. H. 37, 58 Atl. 958, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 445; State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 91, 48 L.R.A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818, 46 Atl. 234; State v. Dodge, 76 Vt. 197, 56 Atl. 983, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 47; Young v. Com. 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327.

If one of the elements of the consideration is immoral or against public policy, the entire contract will be held illegal.

Note. — Forbidding use of trading stamps.

The earlier cases on this subject are included in the notes to Ex parte Drexel, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, and Denver v. Frueauff, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1131.

Since the preparation of those notes the Washington supreme court in Leonard v. Bassindale, 46 Wash. 301, 89 Pac. 879, upon authority of the cases cited in the earlier notes, has held that the "Washington anti-trading stamp act" (Laws 1905, page 374, chap. 179) was in violation of due process of law, and therefore unconstitutional. The court said that if the question were one of first impression in the courts it might entertain a different opinion, but it had been compelled to follow the great weight of authority and hold the statute unconstitutional, especially in view of the fact that the Federal courts have shown an inclination to hold the statute in contravention of the Constitution of the United States (referring to Ex parte Hutchinson, 137 Fed. 950, and Sperry & H. Co. v. Temple, 137 Fed. 992).

The exact character of the scheme involved in that case does not appear; and it is therefore impossible to determine from the opinion whether the decision may properly be limited, as suggested in DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA v. KRAFT, to a mere holding that statutes prohibiting merchants giving premiums, vouchers, gifts, etc., to purchasers of goods are in excess of legislative power, or whether the facts of the case call for a decision that the statute would be unconstitutional even as applied to a scheme essentially like that involved in the KRAFT CASE. The statute itself is apparently broad enough to cover all forms of trading stamp enterprises, and it may be that the court was not called upon to go any further than the point just suggested; but there is no intimation, in the opinion, of any intention to so limit the decision.

As stated in the opinion in the KRAFT CASE the decision in that case is opposed to the view taken by the Minnesota supreme court in State ex rel. Simpson v. Sperry-Hutchinson Co. post, 966, as applied to a scheme not involving the element of chance or uncertainty, though that case upholds the constitutionality of the act so far as it prohibits the issuing of trading stamps or tickets to be redeemed in articles of mer-

Met. 159; 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 566; Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469, 4 Am. St. Rep. 339, 16 N. E. 299; Braitch v. Guelick, 37 Iowa, 212; Sanderson v. Goodrich, 46 Barb. 616.

It is not until the unconstitutionality of a given act is plainly made to appear that the court is called upon to declare it void.

Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678-685, 32 L. ed. 253-256, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257; State v. Narragansett, 16 R. I. 424, 3 L.R.A. 295, 16 Atl. 901.

Mr. Frank J. Hogan, for defendant in error:

Courts of this country, Federal and state, that have passed upon laws which sought to prohibit the carrying on of a business similar to that of the Economy Co-operative chandise in any manner which depends upon any chance, uncertainty or contingency.

Upon the authority of the opinion in the KRAFT CASE the validity of the statute was upheld in the case of District of Columbia v. Gregory, 35 App. D. C. 271 (heard at the same time as the KRAFT CASE), the defendant in the latter case being the representative of the Sperry & Hutchinson Company, the same concern that was involved in Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512 (cited in the note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588). The court noted that the company had not the so-called co-operative feature of the Economy Company involved in the KRAFT CASE; that the receivers of stamps paid nothing to the company to be entitled to receive them, and that the terms of redemption differed slightly from those of the KRAFT concern.

Applications for writs of certiorari in both the KRAFT and the Gregory Cases were denied by the United States Supreme Court. It appears that after the Gregory Case had been remanded, and the defendant found guilty in the police court, he obtained leave of the Supreme Court to file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon the hearing of that petition (Re Gregory, 219 U. S. 143, 55 L. ed. —, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143) the rule was discharged and the petition dismissed upon the ground that the police court had jurisdiction. The Supreme Court, however, did not expressly pass upon the constitutionality of the statute as applied to a case like that before the court of appeals in the KRAFT CASE and the Gregory Case. The Supreme Court took the position that even if it were to be assumed that the condemnation of gift enterprises contained in § 1176 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia was too sweeping, and that Congress went beyond its power in giving the prohibition so wide a scope, that would not affect the provision of § 1177 (under which the defendant was prosecuted) relating to a recognized category of offenses for which it was within the power of Congress to prescribe a punishment. In reply to the argument that the facts did not support the conviction, the court said it was by no means manifest that the scheme or enterprise in which the petitioner was engaged lay outside of the range of judicial consideration under the statute.

Society, have held those laws unconstitutional.

Humes v. Little Rock, 138 Fed. 929; Ex parte Hutchinson, 137 Fed. 949; Sperry & H. Co. v. Temple, 137 Fed. 993; State v. Dodge, 76 Vt. 197, 56 Atl. 983, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 47; Com. v. Sisson, 178 Mass. 578, 60 N. E. 385; Com. v. Emerson, 165 Mass. 146, 42 N. E. 559; O'Keeffe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 76 N. E. 457, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 684; State v. Ramseyer, 73 N. H. 40, 58 Atl. 958, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 445; Denver v. Frueauff, 39 Colo. 20, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1131, 88 Pac. 389, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 521; State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 77, 48 L.R.A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818, 46 Atl. 234; State v. Shugart, 138 Ala. 86, 100 Am. St. Rep. 17, 35 So. 28; Ex

It is held in Com. v. Gibson Co. 125 Ky. 440, 101 S. W. 385, that the statute requiring "all resident trading stamp companies or corporations doing business in this state to pay an annual license tax" applies only to "all resident or foreign trading stamp companies or corporations" doing business in this state, and was not designed to prohibit bona fide merchants from offering discounts or rebates to cash purchasers of their goods.

In Oilure Mfg. Co. v. Pidduck-Ross Co. 38 Wash. 137, 80 Pac. 276, it is held that a municipal ordinance imposing a license fee upon persons transacting or soliciting business through the use of trading stamps, is a valid exercise of the police power, and that such an ordinance as applied to a nonresident's contract to solicit business in a city of the state for a resident business man is not void as an interference with interstate commerce.

According to a Canadian case, Wilder v. Montreal, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 26 C. S. 504, an act of the legislature authorizing municipalities to pass by-laws prohibiting the use of trading stamps, unless the manufacturer or trader who issues them also redeem them, does not infringe upon the exclusive power of the Parliament of Canada to make laws for the regulation of trade and commerce, nor upon the exclusive power of Parliament over criminal law, and is not unconstitutional, illegal, or ultra vires. But in a note to this case it is stated that on appeal to the court or King's bench this decision was reversed, on the ground that the act of the provincial legislature was ultra vires.

Also that "the Parliament of Canada, at its last session, passed an act amending the criminal law, and declaring the trading stamp business illegal."

Shepard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, William B. Kraft, was charged by information in the police court with engaging in a gift enterprise in violation of an act of Congress. He moved to quash the information on the following grounds: First, it does not set forth an offense against any law or regulation; second, so far as the act attempts to prohibit the acts charged, it is unconstitutional.

The motion was sustained, and a writ of error applied for by the District of Columbia has been granted.

The business in which Kraft was engaged is that of issuing and redeeming what are called "trading stamps," in the same general manner described in the report of the case of Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512, decided December 7th, 1897. Lansburgh, a retail merchant of the District, and Joseph A. Sperry, managing officer of a trading stamp company, a corporation of New York, were jointly charged with engaging in a gift enterprise, in violation of the same statute under which Kraft has been prosecuted. On August 23d, 1871, the then legislative assembly of the District made the following enactment:

"The proprietors of gift enterprises shall pay one thousand dollars ($1,000) annually. Every person who shall sell or offer for sale any real estate, or article of merchandise of any description whatever, or any ticket of admission to any exhibition or performance, or other place of amusement, with the promise, expressed or implied, to give or bestow, or in any manner hold out the promise of gift or bestowal of, any article or thing, for and in consideration of the purchase by any person of an article or thing, whether the object shall be for individual gain, or for the benefit of any institution of whatever character, or for any purpose whatever, shall be regarded as a gift enterprise: Provided, that no such proprietor, in consequence of being thus taxed, shall be exempt from paying any other taxes imposed by law, and the license herein required shall be in addition thereto."

After less than two years of experience of license, Congress, on February 17th, 1873, repealed the license clause of the aforesaid enactment, and prohibited the business under a penalty (17 Stat. at L. 464, chap. 148). Subsequently, said act was embodied in the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia in §§ 1176 and 1177 thereof. These read as follows:

"Sec. 1176. So much of the act of the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia entitled, 'An Act Imposing a License on Trades, Business, and Professions Practised or Carried on in the District of Columbia,' approved August 23d, 1871, as authorizes gift enterprises therein, and licenses to be issued therefor, is disapproved and repealed, and hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to engage in said business in any manner, as defined in said act or otherwise."

"Sec. 1177. Every person who shall in any manner engage in any gift enterprise business in the District shall, on conviction thereof in the police court on information filed for and on behalf of the District, pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars ($1,000), or be imprisoned in the District jail not less than one nor more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

In Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, supra, it was held: (1) That this statute was within the police power of Congress, under its exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia; (2) that it was not too broad in its scope of inclusion of prohibited acts to constitute a valid exercise of the power of Congress; (3) that the acts charged constituted engaging in the business of a gift enterprise, within the meaning of §§ 1176 and 1177, D. C. Rev. Stat. In respect of this last conclusion, it was said (p. 530): "Without the necessity of declaring that the acts proved in this case constitute the conduct of a lottery or gift enterprise, as those words are commonly understood, or even of finding that the element of chance operates intentionally and distinctively in the scheme of the trading stamp company, we think, nevertheless, that they come within the prohibition of the statute, which, as before said, furnishes its own definition of 'gift enterprise.' Although one of the most shrewdly planned of the many devices to obtain something for nothing, and one entirely novel, it could hardly have come more clearly within the scope of the statute had it been well known and expressly in the contemplation of Congress at the time of the enactment."

The scheme denounced in that case was substantially this: The trading stamp company entered into a contract with a retail dealer in merchandise to print in the directory of their subscribers' book the name, business, and address of the merchant; to distribute 100,000 copies of said book to the people of Washington, and to explain the use of the same; the merchant to take from the company sufficient stamps to supply all demands for the same, to issue one to the purchaser for each 10 cents' worth purchased, and to display the sign. "We give trading stamps," in a conspicuous place in his store. The merchant was to pay $5 per thousand for said stamps.

Purchasers receiving stamps from the merchant were required to paste the same in places provided in said books. When 990 stamps had been received and entered in a book, the trading stamp company obligated itself to exchange therefor any one of a great variety of articles kept by it on exhibition in a store for the purpose. No articles were kept for sale, but only for exchange for tickets when presented in the manner and to the number aforesaid. No stamps were redeemed in cash, or in quantity less than 990.

The first contention of Kraft is that his business is different from that described above, by reason of which differences he is not within the inclusion of the decision in that case.

The differences alleged are these: (1) Kraft's company is a co-operative association; (2) stamps are redeemable at the option of the purchasing member of the association, in cash at the rate of 10 cents for five—five bringing 1 cent.

The agreed statement of facts shows that David Rothschild, Wallace J. Hill, and William B. Kraft obtained a charter in the state of Virginia, under the name of the Economy Co-operative Society, authorizing them to engage in said business. The authorized capital stock was $10,000, divided into 100 shares. The incorporators were named as directors for the first year, and Rothschild was made president, Hill, vice president, and Kraft, secretary and treasurer. These and one Berliner are the only stockholders of the corporation.

The so-called co-operative feature was provided for in the by-laws of the corporation. A co-operative society was to be organized, the corporation officers to be officers thereof. Any person may become a member by paying annually in advance a fee of 25 cents. Members are entitled to receive a discount of a certain per cent on 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

all cash purchases from merchants under contract with the corporation to purchase and distribute the discount vouchers. Members are entitled to exchange discount vouchers (stamps) for merchandise displayed at the corporation office, on the basis of the actual cost price of such merchandise to the corporation. Membership fees shall be kept separate from other income of the corporation, and, on the first Monday of January of each year, a dividend shall be declared and paid to members from any surplus thereof that may remain after payment or expenses necessarily incidental to the procurement of new members, "and nothing more,"—no part of the salaries of officers to be charged to this fund. The fund is to be charged only with commissions paid to agents for procuring new members. Members have no right to dividends received from the sale of vouchers (stamps) to merchandise. These go to the stockholders of the corporation only.

The contracting merchants receive the stamps or vouchers from the corporation at the rate of $3.50 per thousand. These are to be issued to members making purchases, who are required to produce their membership cards when demanded. Members only can have the stamps redeemed. One stamp is to be given with each 10-cent purchase. Members are entitled to purchase the displayed articles with their stamps, or to have them redeemed in cash at the office of the corporation "in any quantity from five upward, in actual cash, and at their face value, viz., 2 mills each." As regards the issue of the stamp books, directories of contracting merchants, etc., the scheme is of the same general character as that described in the Lansburgh Case. The statement of facts further shows that the corporation has been engaged in business since July 10th, 1908. Between that date and October 1, 1909,—8,095,000 discount vouchers, or stamps, have been sold to merchants at $3.50 per thousand. 344,000 have been redeemed in cash, and 5,372,000 in exchange for articles of merchandise on display at the corporation's office. Counsel for Kraft stated on the argument that the charter and by-laws of the corporation had been written "with pen in one hand and the Lansburgh decision in the other." so as to bring the scheme within lines declared therein not to be prohibited by the statute. The part of the opinion referred to reads as follows: "We do not feel called upon at this time to undertake a specification of the particular conditions in which the act under consideration might or might not apply to actual merchants in the ordinary course and practice of competitive business, or to determine just what character of induements by way of gift or premium may and may not be held out to purchasers at the time, and as a part of their purchases. That it was not intended to apply to ordinary discounts for cash or in proportion to amounts of purchases, when made by the merchant himself to his customers, may be regarded as certain, and the exercise of such power would doubtless be denied if expressly attempted. Nor can it with reason be said to apply to bona fide co-operative associations and the like. It is possible, also, that it might not be operative in a case where the sale of a lawful article is accompanied by a gift of something specific and certain, not attended with any element of chance, and where the gift is not the real object of the sale, in an attempt to evade acts regulating or prohibiting a particular traffic, as, for example, in the case of Lauer v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 453."

Assuming that the statute does not apply in the case of bona fide co-operative associations, or of merchants making discounts or presenting actual articles directly to their customers, we fail to see that the co-operative association belongs in either class. We will consider, first, the co-operative feature. In a general sense a co-operative society or corporation is one organized on the principle of a joint-stock company, where the members share in the profits in proportion to their contributions, and may or may not obtain a discount on their individual purchases. This society is clearly not one of that kind. The admitted members pay a fee of 25 cents annually for the privilege of receiving stamps on their purchases,—a privilege which the other corporations whose case has been heard with this extends to all persons without charge. But these members are rigidly excluded from any participation in the profits of the corporation; that goes to its stockholders exclusively. These profits accrue from the sale of stamps to the merchants. A rough estimate of these profits, according to the statement of the stamps sold and redeemed during a little more than one year since the organization of the corporation, shows that they amount to about $12,000. All that a member of this so-called co-operative society gets back is his membership fee, less its proportion of the cost of obtaining members. The only benefit they are supposed to obtain is the redemption price of the stamps received on their several purchases from merchants dealing in the stamps, which benefit is extended, without charge, by other stamp companies, as we have seen, to all purchasers from merchants handling their stamps. This system falls far short of constituting a bona fide co-operative society. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The only other substantial difference between this scheme and that declared unlawful in the Lansburgh Case is this: In that case there was no redemption of stamps in cash, or in less quantities than 990; in this the stamps sold for $3.50 per thousand are redeemable in cash at the option of the holders at the rate of $2 per thousand, and in any quantity not less than five. This feature makes the scheme more advantageous than the other, but does not differentiate it. In substance they are the same.

A vigorous attack has been made on the act as unconstitutional, because it is an unreasonable interference with the freedom of trade and contract. While that question was decided in the Lansburgh Case, we are asked to reconsider it, on the ground that the soundness of that decision has been denied in many cases in other jurisdictions. We have carefully examined those decisions, and find that very few of them go to the extent claimed for them. They may be separated into the following classes: (1) Those in which the statute involved prohibited lotteries and gift enterprises without defining the acts constituting the same; and it was held that the giving of trading stamps was neither a lottery nor a gift enterprise, within the ordinary meaning of the terms. State v. Shugart, 138 Ala. 86, 100 Am. St. Rep. 17, 35 So. 28; Humes v. Little Rock, 138 Fed. 929.

(2) Cases holding that statutes prohibiting merchants from giving premiums, vouchers, gifts, etc., to purchasers of their goods, are in excess of legislative power. State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 77, 48 L.R.A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818, 46 Atl. 234; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343; State v. Dodge, 76 Vt. 197, 56 Atl. 983, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 47; Ex part Drexel, 147 Cal. 763, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 588, 82 Pac. 429, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 878; State v. Ramseyer, 73 N. H. 31, 58 Atl. 958, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 445; Leonard v. Bassindale, 46 Wash. 301, 89 Pac. 879; Young v. Com. 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327.

In some of those cases the court went beyond the question actually involved, and declared that the trading stamp business of third parties could not be lawfully prohibited. In others, as in State v. Dalton, the court expressly limited its decision to the case of the merchant giving premiums, and declined to say that the legislature might not prohibit the business of trading stamp companies.

(3) Cases analogous to those in class 1, which hold that the statute did not apply to the giving of premiums, simply because it was limited to those which embraced a gambling feature. Com. v. Emerson, 165 Mass. 146, 42 N. E. 559; Com. v. Sisson, 178 Mass. 578, 60 N. E. 385.

(4) Cases in which the statute or municipal ordinance imposed a license tax; some holding that the power to license had not been conferred on the municipality; some that the exercise of the power in the particular case was unreasonable and oppressive; others, that, as applied to a licensed merchant, the license requirement was inapplicable, because the giving of premiums by such merchants was but an incident of their regular business, and not a separate business as such. Winston v. Beeson, 135 N. C. 271, 65 L.R.A. 167, 47 S. E. 457; Hewin v. Atlanta, 121 Ga. 723-729, 67 L.R.A. 795, 49 S. E. 765, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 296; Ex parte Hutchinson, 137 Fed. 949; Ex parte Hutchinson, 137 Fed. 950; Com. v. Gibson Co. 125 Ky. 440, 101 S. W. 385; Montgomery v. Kelly, 142 Ala. 552, 70 L.R.A. 209, 110 Am. St. Rep. 43, 38 So. 67.

In some of these the courts expressly declined to pass upon the legality of the trading stamp business, which question was not involved (121 Ga. 729). The case of O'Keeffe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 76 N. E. 457, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 684, may be put in this class, but there the license tax was held unconstitutional, because the trading stamps were not "goods, wares, merchandise, or commodities," to which the special taxing power was limited by the Constitution of Massachusetts. See also State v. Walker, 105 La. 492, 29 So. 973, in which a statute prohibiting trading stamps, etc., was held unconstitutional, because the object of the act was not expressed in the title, as required by a provision of the state Constitution.

(5) Cases of injunction by trading stamp companies against others interfering with their business. Sperry & H. Co. v. Brady, 134 Fed. 691; Sperry & H. Co. v. Temple, 137 Fed. 992; Sperry & H. Co. v. Louis Weber & Co. 161 Fed. 219. No prohibitory statute was involved.

(6) Cases in which the validity of legislation prohibiting the trading stamp business was discussed and involved and expressly denied. Ex parte Drexel and Leonard v. Bassindale, supra; Denver v. Frueauff, 39 Colo. 20, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1131, 88 Pac. 389, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 521. The California and Washington cases appear to us to involve nothing more than the particular question stated in class 2, supra, and for that reason are ranged thereunder. The general question of the power to prohibit trading stamp concerns, as such, was not necessarily involved. In the Colorado case, the city ordinance went beyond the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

power conferred by the Constitution and an act of the legislature, which were limited to "lotteries" and "gift enterprises," neither of which terms embraced the giving of trading stamps as premiums on purchases. This point was the only one necessarily involved, and the case is in fact identical with that of Winston v. Beeson (Class 4, supra). A recent decision of the supreme court of Minnesota seems to decide the question directly. State ex rel. Simpson v. Sperry & H. Co. 110 Minn. 378, post, 966, 126 N. W. 120.

Of the cases cited on behalf of the District of Columbia, but one directly upholds the doctrine of the Lansburgh Case, which is quoted from and approved. Humes v. Ft. Smith, 93 Fed. 857; State v. Hawkins, 95 Md. 133, 93 Am. St. Rep. 328, 51 Atl. 850, does not involve the direct question presented here.

Before proceeding to consider the question necessarily involved in this case, in the light of some applicable decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States relating to the exercise of the police power limiting the freedom of contract, we will briefly consider a point that has been relied on as showing the legitimate character of the trading stamp business. It has been argued, and in some of the cases cited it has been suggested, that the trading stamp companies are engaged in advertising the merchants contracting with them; and it is contended that this business, in that respect, is similar to that of the ordinary newspaper. Certainly, the right of the advertiser and the newspaper to contract for this purpose has never been questioned. The newspaper is a time-honored institution, indispensable in civilized society. It gives the current news on all subjects of public interest, and in addition opens its pages to advertisers. The merchant purchases his space and presents the advantages of his business. Undoubtedly the cost of this advertising is an expense that must be added to the cost of carrying on the business, and borne along with other incidental expenses. No way can be devised by which the cost of transportation and the legitimate handling of produce or goods in the transfer from producer to consumer can be entirely eliminated.

In the case at bar the advertising feature is a mere pretense; it is of the stamp dealer rather than of the merchant. To induce the purchase of stamps, the stamp company circulates many copies of its books, which contain a directory of the names and locations of the merchants under contract with it to deliver its stamps with purchases. It is a notice to these persons where they can procure stamps, and where and how they can procure the redemption of the same when obtained. This is of prime importance to the stamp company. The trading stamp concerns are not engaged in the advertising business, or as agents for advertisers. As said in the Lansburgh Case, they "are not merchants engaged in business, as that term is commonly understood. They are not dealers in ordinary merchandise, engaged in a legitimate attempt to obtain purchasers for their goods by offering fair and lawful inducements to trade. Their business is the exploitation of nothing more or less than a cunning device. With no stock in trade, but that device and the necessary books and stamps and so-called premiums with which to operate it successfully, they have intervened in the legitimate business carried on in the District of Columbia, between seller and buyer, not for the advantage of either, but to prey upon both. They sell nothing to the person to whom they furnish the premiums. They pretend simply to act for his benefit and advantage by forcing their stamps upon a perhaps unwilling merchant. . . . The merchant who yields to their persuasion does so partly in the hope of obtaining the customers of others, and partly through fear of losing his own, if he declines." We see no reason for withdrawing or qualifying the foregoing observations in the light of the evidence in this case, for, as said before, the businesses are the same, notwithstanding some immaterial differences. It has been argued that there was no evidence to show that the stamps were forced upon perhaps unwilling merchants. That is true, but the courts may take notice of evident conditions and results of trades and business. That merchants are unwilling to enter into the scheme, and regard the same as unjustifiable imposition, is borne out by the charge made in the same argument, that certain merchants of the District had employed counsel who had aided the corporation counsel in the preparation of these cases. This charge would not have been made, if unsupported by the facts, and it was not denied. The police power of Congress in the District of Columbia, upon the exercise of which this statute rests, is substantially the same under the 5th Amendment as that which may be exercised by the states under the limitations of the 14th Amendment. As was said in the Lansburgh Case: "The comprehensive scope of the police power, as exercised in our day, and under our form of constitutional government, has been developed by the process of evolution. Rapid increase in population, wonderful inventions, from time to time, followed by vast material development and advances in the arts of civilization, have introduced novel situations and begotten difficulties for the solution of one generation, that were unanticipated, and often undreamed of even, by the most advanced minds of the generation next preceding. As a necessary consequence, the boundaries of the police power in its application to the property, business, and personal liberty of the individual citizen have never been definitely settled, so as to furnish a certain guide for all cases that may present themselves for legislative or judicial determination." This idea has been better expressed by Maeterlinck in "The Life of the Bee," in the form of a fundamental principle of social development. He says: "In proportion as society organizes itself and rises in the scale, so does a shrinkage enter the private life of each one of its members. Where there is progress, it is the result only of a more and more complete sacrifice of the individual to the general interest." See Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 600-609, 47 L. ed. 323-328, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 131 Iowa, 340-354, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 108 N. W. 902.

Hence, "it is always easier to determine whether a particular case comes within the general scope of the power, than to give an abstract definition of the power itself, which will be in all respects accurate." Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 818, 25 L. ed. 1079. In a later case it was said: "It is undoubtedly true that it is the right of every citizen of the United States to pursue any lawful trade or business, under such restrictions as are imposed upon all persons of the same age, sex, and condition. But the possession and enjoyment of all rights are subject to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed by the governing authority of the country essential to the safety, health, peace, good order, and morals of the community. Even liberty itself, the greatest of all rights, is not unrestricted license to act according to one's own will. . . . The right to acquire, enjoy, and dispose of property is declared in the Constitutions of the several states to be one of the inalienable rights of man. But this declaration is not held to preclude the legislature of any state from passing laws respecting the acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition of property. What contracts respecting its acquisition and disposition shall be valid, and what void or voidable; when they shall be in writing, and when they may be made orally; and by what instruments it may be conveyed or mortgaged,—are subjects of constant legislation. And as to the enjoyment of property, the rule is general that it must be accompanied with such limitations as will not impair the equal enjoyment by others of their property. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedes is a maxim of universal application. For the pursuit of any lawful trade or business the law imposes similar conditions. Regulations respecting them are almost infinite, varying with the nature of the business." Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86-89, 34 L. ed. 620-623, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13.

That there are bounds to forced individual "shrinkage," in order to prevent its development into sheer arbitrary oppression and tyranny, under our system of government, all must admit. The difficulty lies in the practical ascertainment of those boundaries. The legislature is the judge in the first instance, but when its act is an unmistakable invasion of individual liberty and right, the courts will intervene to arrest its enforcement. In a recent case, a statute of a state was upheld which made it unlawful to screen coal dug by miners before weighing the same for determining their compensation, and prohibiting them from waiving the benefit of the act by contract with the mining company. McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539, 5 L. ed. 315, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206. After referring to Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 832, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427,—a case strongly relied on by the defendant in error,—it was said by Mr. Justice Day, who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court (p. 545): "But in many cases in this court the right of freedom of contract has been held not to be unlimited in its nature, and when the right to contract or carry on business conflicts with laws declaring the public policy of the state, enacted for the protection of the public health, safety, or welfare, the same may be valid, notwithstanding they have the effect to curtail or limit the freedom of contract. It would extend this opinion beyond reasonable limits to make reference to all the cases in this court in which qualifications of the right of freedom of contract have been applied and enforced." Some of those cases will be mentioned later. He then quotes the following extract from Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633: "Regulations respecting the pursuit of a lawful trade or business are of very frequent occurrence in the various cities of the country, and what such regulations shall be, and to what particular trade, business, or occupation they shall apply, are questions for the state to determine, and their determination comes within the proper exercise of the police power by the state, and unless the regulations are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose, that the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

property and personal rights of the citizen are unnecessarily, and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law, they do not extend beyond the power of the state to pass, and they form no subject for Federal interference." The learned justice then proceeds with the discussion as follows: "It is then the established doctrine of this court that the liberty of contract is not universal, and is subject to restrictions passed by the legislative branch of the government in the exercise of its power to protect the safety, health, and welfare of the people. It is also true that the police power of the state is not unlimited, and is subject to judicial review, and when exerted in an arbitrary or oppressive manner, such laws may be annulled, as violative of rights protected by the Constitution. While the courts can set aside legislative enactments upon this ground, the principles upon which such interference is warranted are as well settled as is the right of judicial interference itself. The legislature, being familiar with local conditions, is, primarily, the judge of the necessity of such enactments. The mere fact that a court may differ with the legislature in its views of public policy, or that judges may hold views inconsistent with the propriety of the legislation in question, affords no ground for judicial interference, unless the act in question is unmistakably and palpably in excess of legislative power." See also Williams v. Arkansas, April 4th, 1910, 217 U. S. 73, 54 L. ed. 673, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493. One of the cases reviewed in McLean v. Arkansas is not distinguishable in principle from the case at bar. Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1. In that it was held that an act of the legislature of Tennessee, requiring the redemption in cash of store orders or other evidences of indebtedness issued by employers in payment of wages due employees, did not conflict with any provision of the Constitution of the United States protecting the right of contract. Had the statute in this case, instead of prohibiting the business, required redemption to be made in cash at the rate of the purchase price of the stamps, it would have been practically identical with the state statute upheld in that case; and yet its effect, by destroying the profits of the trading stamp associations, would necessarily be to put an end to the business.

The whole country is now agitated by the increased cost of living that has grown to alarming proportions, and legislative bodies are inquiring into its causes with a view, if possible, of providing remedies for the mischief. While there is difference of opinion as regards the chief source, all concur in the opinion that every introduction of superfluous middlemen, and consequent unnecessary charges between producer and consumer, undoubtedly contribute to swell the stream to overflowing. Had the statute under consideration been passed at the present session of Congress, it would be regarded as intended to promote the public welfare in this respect. Though enacted many years ago, when the mischief was not great, it answers the purpose of to-day.

Now, what are the conditions presented by the facts in this case? An entirely unnecessary middleman, for his own profit solely, has injected himself between the regular merchant on the one hand, and his customers on the other. He receives $3.50 for every thousand stamps issued to the customers, and redeems such as may be presented, in goods or in cash at $2 per thousand. By this means the corporation represented by the defendant in error has in the first year of its intervention received about $12,000, which should have either been retained by the merchant or received by his customers.

Several other concerns being engaged in the same business, their profits are probably as great, if not greater. We have then this large sum of money annually taken from the merchant and his customers, and added to the gross cost of living of all of the people of the District, without return. Is it not for the public welfare, in the juridical sense of the term, to prohibit such an undertaking? We think that it is. Must this public welfare be sacrificed to the unlimited freedom of contract invoked in this case, to protect the right to prey upon local commerce? We think not.

With this we will close a discussion that has been carried to an unusual length. Our excuse is the importance of the principle involved, and the great conflict of authority relating to it, which may furnish ground for a writ of certiorari to remove the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where alone the vexed question may be settled.

It follows that the Police Court erred in sustaining the motion to quash the information, and its judgment must therefore be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed.

Van Orsdel, J. dissenting:

I cannot agree with my associates that the business here under investigation is embraced within the terms of the statute. I am of opinion that the transaction between the merchant and the customer merely amounts to a discount allowed the purchaser on account of the purchase made. The purchaser receives an order, on presentation of which, according to its terms, he can receive his discount, either in cash or merchandise. Between the merchant and the stamp company, the contract is clearly one for advertising. I agree with what is said by my associates in regard to the ancient and legitimate method of advertising through the medium of the newspaper, but I am unable to distinguish it from many other equally legitimate methods of advertising,—the bill board, the distribution of circulars, the various methods adopted through the different kinds of directories, and the numerous other agencies, all alike conducted and solicited through the agency of third parties intervening between the merchant and his customers. It is true that competition compels the merchant to patronize these agencies, and the public to pay the expense. Deception is at times practised through these methods. It is not apparent, however, from the record before us, that any fraud has been practised or misrepresentation made by the Economy Co-operative Society. The public need not be deceived nor defrauded by this system of discount. The purchaser has his option of taking either cash or merchandise, or refusing both. Neither inconvenience nor delay in securing the discount are in themselves sufficient to bring the transaction within the limitations of the statute.

The system detailed by the record discloses neither a gift enterprise nor a lottery. Every stamp exchanged has a fixed value; and the mere fact that the transaction is conducted through the medium of a third party does not make it different from a direct payment of the discount by the merchant, or the giving of a stamp redeemable by him on presentation. It is conceded that the merchant himself could legally issue the stamps, redeemable by him in cash or merchandise, as an inducement to secure the patronage of the public. Such a transaction would be perfectly legitimate. Exactly the same result is here accomplished. The same discount is paid, and the customer is accorded the same rights. The advertising is conducted, as is customary, through the medium of a third party. The right of the merchant to so advertise cannot be controverted. With this neither the customer nor the public is concerned. The customer receives the exact inducement offered,—an inducement which, so far as the transaction between the merchant and the customer is concerned, is not condemned by the statute. The mere fact that the purchaser is required to take the, stamps for redemption to another point in no way affects the legality of the transaction.

In my opinion, the question of the constitutionality of the statute is not before us, as the matter here involved cannot be brought within its provisions. Such statutes are to be strictly construed, and no reasonable construction of this statute can bring the transaction here involved within its provisions. It is unnecessary to discuss in this connection the power of Congress, under the exercise of the police power, to regulate or suppress these stamp enterprises, since that question, in my judgment, is not here presented. The mere fact that the profits of the business have been large, or that a middleman is involved, is not sufficient to bring it by implication within the terms of the statute.

In view of the importance of the question involved, and the wide diversity of opinion among the courts of the country, as to the effect of the statute and the power of the legislature to regulate the business in question, I join with my associates in inviting the allowance of a writ of certiorari by the Supreme Court.

Petition for writ of certiorari denied by Supreme Court of the United States October 24, 1910.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL.
GEORGE T. SIMPSON, Attorney General,

v.

SPERRY & HUTCHINSON COMPANY.

Trading stamps — regulation — police power — lottery.

Chapter 142, Laws 1909 (Rev. Laws Supp. 1909, §§ 5170-5 to 5170-8), declares that any contract or arrangement between two parties, by which one of them shall issue and redeem trading stamps or tickets which are given in connection with the sale of merchandise by the other, shall constitute a gift enterprise, unless the articles promised to be given as such gift or premium shall be definitely described on the stamp or ticket, and the character and value of the articles are made known to the purchaser of the merchandise at the time of the purchase, and unless the right of the holder of such stamp or ticket, to the gift or article so promised for its redemption, Headnote by LEWIS, J.

Note. — See note to District of Columbia v. Kraft, ante, 957.

becomes absolute upon the completion of the delivery thereof, without the holder being required to collect any specific number of similar stamps or tickets and present them collectively for redemption, and unless the right of the holder of such stamp or ticket to the prize or gift so offered is absolute, and does not depend on any chance, uncertainty, or contingency whatever. Held:

1. The act is a constitutional exercise of the police power, in so far as it prohibits the issuing of trading stamps or tickets to be redeemed in articles of merchandise in any manner which depends upon any chance, uncertainty, or contingency.

2. The issuing and redemption of trading stamps, as carried on by respondent company, is not attended with such elements of chance, uncertainty, and contingency as to justify the restrictions imposed by the act. The enforcement of those conditions against the company would operate not as a reasonable regulation of its business, but practically as an absolute prohibition thereof.

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to oust respondent from doing business in the state of Minnesota. Writ discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George T. Simpson, Attorney General, and Young & Stone for relator.

Messrs. Morton Barrows and John Hall Jones for respondent.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the petition of the attorney general a writ of quo warranto issued from this court directing respondent to show cause by what warrant it claimed the right to continue the enjoyment of its corporate rights, franchises, and privileges in the state of Minnesota. Respondent demurred to the petition upon the ground that the facts stated therein did not constitute a cause of action, for the reason that chapter 142, p. 155, Laws 1909 (Rev. Laws Supp. 1909 §§ 5170-5 to 5170-8), upon which the petition is based, violates article 1, § 7, of the Constitution of Minnesota, and the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. That portion of chapter 142, necessary to set out in detail, reads:

"Sec. 2. Whenever two or more persons enter into any contract, arrangement, or scheme whereby, for the purpose of inducing the public to purchase merchandise or other property of one of the parties to said scheme, any other party thereto, for a valuable consideration and as a part of such scheme, advertises, and induces or attempts to induce the public to believe, that he will give gifts, premiums, or prizes to persons purchasing such merchandise or other property of such other party to be said scheme, and that stamps or tickets will be given by the seller in connection with such sales, entitling the purchaser of such property to receive such prizes or gifts from any other party to such scheme, the parties so undertaking and carrying out such scheme shall be deemed to be engaged in a 'gift enterprise,' unless the articles or things so promised to be given as gifts or premiums with or on account of such purchases shall be definitely described on such stamp or ticket, and the character and value of such promised prize or gift fully made known to the purchaser of such merchandise or other property at the time of the sale thereof, and unless the right of the holder of such stamp or ticket to the gift or premium so promised becomes absolute upon the completion of the delivery thereof, without the holder being required to collect any specified number of other similar stamps or tickets, and to present them for redemption together; and the right of the holder of such stamp or ticket to the prize or gift so offered is absolute, and does not depend on any chance, uncertainty, or contingency whatever.

"Sec. 3. Any person who engages in a gift enterprise such as is defined in this act, or who advertises the same in any manner, or who in furtherance of such scheme, as an inducement to purchasers, issues in connection with the sale of any merchandise or other property any such ticket or stamp purporting to be redeemable in some indefinite article not described thereon, only when presented with a collection of other stamps or tickets of like kind, by some other party to such scheme, and which, unless presented in the manner aforesaid is not redeemable at all, shall each and all be guilty of a misdemeanor."

According to the petition, respondent is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New Jersey, and, having complied with the provisions of chapter 69, p. 68, Gen. Laws 1899, is authorized to do business within the state of Minnesota. Its only business consists in the sale, issue, redemption of what are commonly known as "trading stamps." It issues and sells its trading stamps pursuant to contracts entered into with retail merchants in the state, by the terms of which the company agrees to deliver its stamps to the merchant at a stated price, and the merchant agrees to offer these stamps to his customers as an inducement for cash trade. The stamps are redeemed by the L.R.A. (N.S.)

company with merchandise only, and when presented by the merchant's customers in trading stamp books containing 990 stamps. The company agrees to advertise the name and business of the merchant in its S. & H. green trading stamp books; distribute them among the people of the city or town where the merchant resides, and to furnish the merchant signs advertising the fact that he distributes S. & H. green trading stamps. The merchant agrees that he will not use or give away any other coupons or stamps issued by either himself or any other firm, while under contract with the company. The title to the stamps remains in the company until redeemed, and the contract for their use covers the period of one year. The petition does not disclose whether the stamps are universally sold to merchants upon the same basis, but there is a provision which reads as follows: "Unless spot cash is paid upon delivery, the subscriber agrees to pay the Sperry & Hutchinson Company 50 cents per hundred for the use of all stamps disposed of by him, making weekly settlements for the same." From this provision we shall assume that the general price charged merchants for the use of the stamps was $5 per thousand. The petition alleges that the company has entered into a great many contracts with various merchants throughout the state; that none of the trading stamps are redeemed singly, but only in numbers of 990, when that number has been collected and pasted into the book furnished for that purpose. The petition also states that the company advertises in its trading stamp books that it will receive in exchange for stamps the wrappers, trademarks, coupons, tags, labels, etc., collected from articles in the trade, such as coffee, condensed milk, tobacco, etc., and that the trading stamp book also contains the statements that customers could only appreciate the variety and value of the merchandise given as premiums by visiting the company's premium parlor, where they would find practically everything, and the best of everything, required in any home. The petition states that the company never redeems any of its trading stamps in cash, or by exchanging a pen or pens therefor, although, since the act in question went into effect, respondent has caused to be printed across the face of its stamps the words: "One pen value one mill." It is also stated that respondent pursues a regular system of advertising its trading stamp books, through the newspapers and otherwise, for the purpose of inducing the public to deal with the merchants who are under contract to furnish stamps. and that such inducement consists in the promise to redeem the same in valuable articles of household goods and other merchandise.

The legal status of trading stamp companies has been under consideration by many of the courts of this country, involving statutes varying more or less in the details and scope of the regulation. The question being new in this court, it seems advisable to review, as briefly as possible, the more important cases on the subject.

A case frequently cited as authority on the principles involved in all such cases is that of People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343. The New York statute prohibited the giving of any gift or prize in connection with the sale of any article of food, and made a person violating it guilty of a misdemeanor. Gillson was arrested for giving away a cup and saucer in connection with the sale of 2 pounds of coffee, and the court held that the statute violated the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. In a very able opinion Judge Peckham defined the term "liberty" as used in the Constitution, and the court held that there was no basis for legislative interference, for the reason that the act of giving away the article in connection with the purchase of any food contained none of the elements of chance or lottery, did not involve the question of public health, contained none of the elements of fraud or crime, and that the statute was an unwarranted interference with the natural right of the defendant to attract custom in the manner stated. This case was made the basis of People ex rel. Madden v. Dycker, 72 App. Div. 308, 76 N. Y. Supp. 111, wherein the supreme court of New York had under consideration a trading stamp law which prohibited the issuing and distribution of trading stamps or other devices, in connection with the sale of goods and merchandise, to be redeemed by a third party, expressly exempting manufacturers and merchants from the provisions of the act, and permitting them to issue and redeem their own coupons and tickets. On the authority of People v. Gillson, and other cases, the court held the act to be unconstitutional, for the reason that there appeared to be no distinction between the business or method of issuing and redeeming such tickets or coupons by a manufacturer or merchant, as in the Gillson Case, and the method of issuing and redeeming trading stamps by a third party; that is, that the elements of lottery and public welfare were not involved in the transaction, so as to form the basis of legislative interference. After that decision the legislature of New York amended the law, making it applicable to the issue and redemption of stamps by third parties only, and providing that each stamp should have legibly written upon its face the redeemable value thereof in money, and that such stamps should be redeemed when presented in a quantity aggregating in money value not less than 5 cents each lot, and that upon failure to redeem, the party issuing such stamps should be liable for the face value thereof. The court held the law unconstitutional upon the authority of the Gillson Case, and declared that no moral or lottery question was involved, and also held that the law was invalid because the business of dealing in trading stamps was reserved for merchants and manufacturers, which created a preferential class. In this respect the court said: The vice, it seems, is not in allowing one to buy by promise of a gift, but in permitting the promise to be fulfilled by another than the seller. It is a narrow ledge for the distinction to rest upon, when in one instance the transaction is subject to legislative control to the extent of confiscation, and in the other it goes without let or hindrance.

Another leading case on the subject is that of State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 77, 48 L.R.A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818, 46 Atl. 234, decided in 1900. The act of the legislature prohibited the redemption by a third party of coupons or stamps, issued by a merchant connected with the sale of merchandise, and a merchant was arrested for dealing with a trading stamp company. The company involved in that case was respondent, and the contract was similar to the one involved in the case now under consideration. The court upheld the contention that the law deprived the merchant of his liberty and property without due process of law, and that the prohibited act did not in any manner concern the public health, public safety, or welfare, and did not contain any of the elements of lottery or chance. The court remarked that the scheme was simply one of a variety of devices resorted to by tradespeople in these days of sharp competition, to promote the sale of their goods. Notwithstanding its decision, however, the court took occasion to define its position on the trading stamp business in the following language: "In order that we may not be misunderstood in the position which we feel compelled to take regarding the case before us, we deem it proper to say that we do not approve of the trading stamp business as some of the cases above referred to inform us it is conducted, although there is no evidence before us concerning it; nor do we decide that it was not competent for the general assembly to prohibit it. What we do decide is that the statute in question is so broad as to interfere with the right of an individual to deal with his own property in his own way; that is to say, to make such contracts regarding the sale and disposition thereof as he shall see fit, so long as he observes the rule that each one shall so use and enjoy his own property as not to injure that of another person, and also the further rule that his use of it shall not be injurious to the community." The court thus intimated that it would be within the power of the legislature to regulate, or prohibit entirely, the trading stamp business, but left us in the dark as to what it considered such abuses as would justify the legislature to interfere, within the doctrine of the police power. There are other decisions to the same effect under similar statutes, among which may be mentioned State v. Dodge, 76 Vt. 197, 56 Atl. 983, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 47.

Another case often referred to is Young v. Com. 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327, decided in 1903. The respondent was the trading stamp company in that case, and the contract was similar. As in New York, the law was directed to the issuing and redeeming of trading stamps by third parties, and expressly exempted merchants and manufacturers from its operation. The court reviewed many of the authorities, including People v. Gillson and State v. Dalton, and reached the conclusion that the transaction was free from any element of gambling or lottery, did not affect the public welfare, safety, health, or morals, and that there was no foundation for legislative interference under the doctrine of police power. There is another line of cases, notably that of State v. Shugart, 138 Ala. 86, 100 Am. St. Rep. 17, 35 So. 28, where the statute simply prohibited lottery or gaming devices, and made no reference to the trading stamp business. Under such statutes it has universally been held that the scheme of issuing and redeeming trading stamps was not a lottery or gambling device; hence those decisions have no particular value here.

The supreme court of California in 1905 had the subject under consideration in Ex parte Drexler, 147 Cal. 763, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 588, 82 Pac. 429, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 878. There the statute was sweeping, and prohibited the issuing and redemption of trading stamps, not only by other parties, but also by merchants themselves. The act was held unconstitutional in all respects. The court adopted the reasoning of People v. Gillson and the other New York cases above cited,—State v. Dalton, State v. Shugart, Young v. Com.,—supra, and others, and referred to Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512; Humes v. Ft. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Smith (C. C.) 93 Fed. 857; and State v. Hawkins, 95 Md. 146, 93 Am. St. Rep. 328, 51 Atl. 850,—as follows: "With respect to these cases, we do not deem it necessary to consider the suggestion of petitioners that they are distinguishable from the mass of cases above cited. Whatever they may hold, they are not of sufficient consequence to ruffle the great current of authority which runs the other way."

The Massachusetts supreme court decided, in Com. v. Emerson, 165 Mass. 146, 42 N. E. 559, that an act preventing the sale or exchange of property under the inducement that a gift or prize was to be part of the transaction had no application, and did not forbid a sale of two things at once by a merchant, even if one of them was the principal object of desire, and the other an additional inducement which turns the scale. After that decision was rendered, the legislature amended the act to provide that no person should sell, exchange, or dispose of any property, or offer or attempt to do so, upon any representation, advertisement, notice, or inducement concerning any other property than that which was specifically stated to be the subject of the sale or exchange. In Com. v. Sisson (1901) 178 Mass. 578, 60 N. E. 385, the same court held that the delivery of trading stamps with articles sold for cash, redeemable at the store of an independent corporation issuing the stamps, was not a violation of the act, for the reason that it did not contain any of the elements of gambling or lottery. In O'Keefe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 76 N. E. 457, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 684, it was held that an act was unconstitutional which attempted to impose an excise tax on the business of selling or giving trading stamps or similar devices, by a merchant in connection with the sale of articles.

The leading case which presents a different view of the subject is Lansburgh v. District of Columbia, supra, decided in 1897. The act of Congress was a sweeping prohibition against the issuing of any ticket, stamp, or coupon by a vendor or by any other person or party under contract with the vendor, redeemable in any merchandise which was not identified or selected by the purchaser at or prior to the time of the purchase. The court stated its position as follows: "Without the necessity of declaring that the acts proved in this case constitute the conduct of a lottery or gift enterprise, as those words are commonly understood, or even of finding that the element of chance operates intentionally and distinctively in the scheme of the trading stamp company, we think, nevertheless, that they come within the prohibition of the statute which, as before said, furnishes its own definition of 'gift enterprise.'" This decision is based on the fact that trading stamp companies are not dealers or ordinary merchants engaged in the legitimate attempt to obtain purchasers for their goods by offering fair and lawful inducements to encourage trade, but are organized for the purpose of intervening between the merchant and his customers, and the position they occupy enables them to force their stamps on unwilling merchants by use of the argument that they thereby secure an advantage over other merchants who are not taken into the scheme. The court also expressed the opinion that the premiums were grossly overvalued, and that the corporation maintained itself upon the vast difference between the cost of carrying on the business and the amount received by the merchant. Or, if there was any substantial value in the premiums, as compared with the amount of the tickets for redemption, then the profit, or part at least, was secured by reason of the fact that many of the merchant's customers failed to redeem their tickets or stamps, because unable to complete the book. The court took occasion to express in vigorous language that the whole scheme was a cunning device created for the purpose of taking advantage of the weakness of human nature.

The Federal circuit court for the western district of Arkansas, in the case of Humes v. Ft. Smith, supra, sustained an act of the Arkansas legislature regulating gift enterprises by imposing a license tax not exceeding $1,000 per year upon any person, firm, or corporation engaged in such enterprise. The act defined gift enterprises to include premium stamps, trading stamps, and similar schemes and devices, by means of which merchants, manufacturers, and other persons engaged in lawful callings are advertised, exploited, and patronized to the exclusion of others on like terms. The court followed the Lansburgh Case, and held that the issuing of stamps for the purpose of redemption in merchandise might fairly be deemed against public policy, detrimental to the public welfare, and, under the police power, the legislature might exercise its discretion in regulating or prohibiting it.

The supreme court of Washington, in Fleetwood v. Read, 21 Wash. 547, 47 L. R.A. 205, 58 Pac. 665, decided in 1899, upheld an ordinance of the city of Tacoma which imposed a license tax upon all business houses which employed trading stamps for the sale of goods, under a statute which authorized cities of the first class to grant licenses for any lawful purposes. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In a later case, however (Leonard v. Basindale, 46 Wash. 301, 89 Pac. 879, 65 Cent. L. J. 303), decided in 1907, the court declared an act passed in 1905 unconstitutional which made it a misdemeanor to issue and redeem trading stamps in connection with mercantile transactions. In the opinion the court state that the cases of Lansburgh v. District of Columbia and Humes v. Ft. Smith did not seem to have been able to withstand the overwhelming trend of opinion to the opposite view, and that the court felt impelled to follow the great weight of authority, and held the statute was in violation of the state Constitution, which provided that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

In 1891 the statute of Maryland contained a sweeping prohibition against the use of any form of gift enterprise as an inducement for the sale of all kinds of merchandise, and the supreme court of that state held, in Long v. State, 74 Md. 565, 12 L.R.A. 425, 28 Am. St. Rep. 268, 22 Atl. 4, that the statute was invalid in so far as it related to gift enterprises not involving any element of chance. The statute was then amended so as to prohibit the issuing of stamps, tickets, etc., in connection with the sale of merchandise, the same to be redeemed by some person or association of persons other than those making the sale, the holder receiving in exchange therefor any gift, prize, or gratuity, or anything uncertain, undetermined, or unknown to the purchaser of the goods at the time of the purchase thereof. This statute came before the supreme court for consideration in the case of State v. Hawkins, 95 Md. 133, 93 Am. St. Rep. 328, 51 Atl. 850, and it was upheld as a constitutional exercise of the police power. The court held, however, that the fact that the stamps were redeemed by another party than the merchant, or that they were to be redeemed at a place other than where the sale was made, did not introduce any element of chance.

From this review of the cases we think it manifest that the apparent differences in judicial expression may be generally accounted for by the differences in the statutory provisions under consideration. In some states the statute prohibited the issuing of stamps or tokens which enabled either the merchant or a third party to redeem the same in merchandise. In other states the legislation was directed merely to the issuing and redemption of such stamps or coupons by third parties, making no attempt to regulate the business as conducted by merchants. In yet other states the statute involved was a general prohibition against engaging in lottery, chance, or gaming operations.

Although there is some conflict in the decisions, a few principles are recognized as the settled law upon this subject. It is beyond the province of the legislature to prohibit a merchant from issuing coupons, tickets, stamps, or tokens representing a certain value, which entitle the holder to a redemption of the same in merchandise. In pursuance of this scheme of advertising to excite the interest of his customers, the merchant is not required to redeem these tickets or coupons singly. They may be issued in any amount, and redemption may be made to depend upon their being presented collectively. No feature of lottery is involved from the fact that the articles were not exposed and examined by the purchaser at the time the coupons were issued to him. There is no tangible difference between the selection of an article at the time of receiving the coupons, and the selection thereof at a subsequent time when coupons representing a certain sum shall have been collected. There is no distinction between making the selection of a premium from merchandise on exhibition at the store, or from a catalogue furnished by the merchant. The fact that the particular article desired by the purchaser is not described in the coupon or ticket does not invest the transaction with the element of chance, uncertainty, or hazard. These and similar methods of advertising by merchants have been followed so long, and have become so thoroughly recognized as the legitimate exercise of personal rights and privileges under the Constitution, that they are no longer the subject of legislation.

If we shall find that there are no different elements of chance and uncertainty, or no greater tendency to fraud, as the business of issuing and redeeming stamps is conducted by respondent, than attends their issue and redemption by the merchant making sales of merchandise, then we know of no legal ground for sustaining the writ. The main differences in the method of transacting the business are as follows: A variety of merchandise is kept on exhibit at the company's store in the village or city where the merchant does business, and the customer may make a selection from such articles as are designated for the redemption of one or more stamp books, as the case may be. The customer may not know at the time he receives the stamps from the merchant, what particular article he will select; but he has the opportunity to examine the stock at the company's store, and may make his collection of stamps with reference to some particular article.

We recognize the fact that legislative regulation is not necessarily dependent upon whether the business, as conducted by respondent, affects the public health, or is attended with features of a lottery. It has long been settled that any business, although legitimate in itself, is subject to regulation by the police power, whenever so conducted that it may fairly be said that it affects the public interest or welfare. Public interest may be affected when a business is conducted on such a scale and under such conditions as to lead to an abuse of the confidence of those who have occasion to transact business in that line. The rates of interest, insurance business, the regulation of grain elevators and warehouses, hawking and peddling, bakeries, butcher shops, etc., have been recognized as proper subjects for police regulation, not because of anything naturally wrong in these vocations, but because, from the character of the business, opportunities are present for deception on account of the difficulty the customer has to obtain knowledge of the character of the contract or the merchandise. So with reference to certain lines connected with the handling of agricultural products. Where the producer is located at a distance from the commission house, the law may properly regulate the conditions upon which commission and brokerage houses shall do business with the public. This is illustrated by the cases of State ex rel. Beek v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 46 L.R.A. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, and Knoxville Iron Co. v. Harbison, 183 U. S. 13, 46 L. ed. 55, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1. In the latter case an act of the legislature of Tennessee was upheld, which required the redemption in cash of store orders or other evidences of indebtedness issued to employees in payment of wages.

If, in dealing with the merchant and his customers there is an opportunity to take advantage of them by a persistent system of attractive advertising and other inducements, then reasonable safeguards and limitations may be provided to prevent such abuses. But the difficulty with the present law is that it is not designed to regulate a legitimate business. It condemns the business conducted by respondents as illegitimate, because the public is induced to engage in lottery transactions, and places such restrictions about the issue and redemption of stamps as to make that business impossible. In State v. Hawkins, supra, the Maryland statute was held valid in so far as it was directed to prevent the holder of stamps from receiving in exchange therefor anything uncertain, undetermined, or unknown to the purchaser of the goods at the time of the purchase. But this law does not stop at that point. It requires that each stamp or ticket shall have described thereon the character and value of the gift which redeems it, or that such fact shall be made known to the customer at the time of the purchase. Each separate stamp must be treated independently, and redemption collectively is prohibited. It is apparent that it would not be practicable to redeem stamps of the value of 1 mill or 1 cent, nor to print on each stamp the character of the article offered for its redemption. To make such a provision practicable would require each stamp to be issued in denominations to correspond with each purchase. Most cash purchases are in small amounts, and the restrictions imposed by chapter 142 necessarily limit the articles offered for redemption to those of practically no value.

Our attention is called to the language of the court in the Lansburgh Case, by which the business of issuing and redeeming trading stamps is condemned as a cunning device which confers no benefit on anybody, and that merchants are persuaded to invest in stamps, partly in the hope of obtaining the customers of other merchants, and partly through fear of losing their own. We assume that the court was referring to the practice of selling the stamps to one merchant only in the same line of business, thus attempting to give him an advantage over his competitors. Why this exclusive right to deal in stamps by the merchant who enters into a contract with the company should be considered as detrimental to his or to the public interest, we are unable to understand, unless the practice is attended with some tendency to deceive. Many merchants prefer to conduct such schemes of advertising by issuing and redeeming their own coupons. Others prefer to place the entire matter in the hands of a third party, and be relieved of the trouble and responsibility. But so far as the petition informs us, the merchants in this state have not been induced to enter into the contracts by reason of deceptive representations. Such contracts are made for the period of one year, and there is no compulsion about renewing them. The stamps cost the merchants at the rate of half a cent each, or 5 cents for ten stamps. He gives his cash customers, if they call for them, ten stamps for every dollar's worth of merchandise purchased. The effect is that the merchant receives 95 cents for every dollar's worth of goods sold for cash. The object, no doubt, is to secure additional customers, if possible, and build up his trade, and to induce payment in cash for the purpose of getting the money to use. Merchants who enter into contracts with respondent company agree to make this discount, and presumably they so obligate themselves because they consider it a paying investment.

The profit in respondent's business is the difference between the amount received from the merchants for the stamps and the cost of the articles offered in redemption, less the cost of running the business. The profits may be large; but that alone does not furnish ground for the prohibition of the business. No doubt some stamps are lost, some books are not filled out, and hence never presented for redemption. To that extent the company is the gainer. The same advantage exists when the scheme is conducted by the merchant; but even if there is a distinction in this feature between the merchant and the company, it has not been made to appear from the petition that the collectors of stamps pay any additional value for them. They are at liberty to take them, if they so desire; but we discover no element of deception or compulsion. Without deciding that a business of this character may not be conducted in such manner and on such a scale as to make it subject to regulation or prohibition, because of this so-called tontine feature of uncertainty of redemption of stamps, we find no basis for the application of this principle in the present case.

Our conclusion is that, in so far as chapter 142, Laws 1909, prohibits companies or parties from issuing and redeeming trading stamps under contracts which in practice depend on chance, uncertainty, or contingency, the law is a proper exercise of the police power; that the business of issuing and redeeming trading stamps as conducted by respondents is not attended with such elements of chance, uncertainty, and contingency as to come within that provision of the act; that the provisions requiring each stamp to be valued and redeemed independently of other stamps, and to have printed thereon its value and character of the article offered for redemption, constitute unnecessary restrictions amounting to practical prohibition of the business as conducted by respondents, and are not a proper exercise of the police power of regulation.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

I respectfully dissent. The presumption in favor of the constitutionality of legislative action is strong. A statute should not be avoided, unless clearly necessary. The authorities do not impress me as compelling the decision that the law here in issue is unconstitutional, although not all of them can be so substantially distinguished as to show that they do not hold it invalid.

Moreover, I am unable to perceive why the statute should not be upheld, because it excludes an illegitimate business. In effect it regards the defendant as a commercial parasite, and prohibits existence. The facts justify that definition and prohibition.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

MERCHANTS' ICE & COLD STORAGE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

JOHN ROHRMAN.

Monopoly — consolidation of business — validity of contract.

1. Contracts by which a corporation which buys up and consolidates all but a small percentage of the ice manufacturing plants of the city, in order to control the market and suppress competition, requires stockholders of the absorbed plants to refrain from re-engaging in the business for a period of ten years, are void as a restraint of trade, and are within a statute declaring guilty of conspiracy any corporation or individual which shall enter into any contract having for its object the limiting of the quantity of any commodity to be produced, and cannot be enforced by a corporation organized to take over the business, property, and contracts of the one which effected the consolidation.

Same — failure to raise prices — effect.

2. That no effort is made to control, fix, or raise the price of the product of certain plants which have been bought in by one concern to control the market and suppress competition, does not render enforceable a contract by which holders of stock in such concern agreed not to enter into the business within the city for a series of years.

As to the bearing upon the validity of such an agreement, of the circumstance that it is one of a number of similar contracts, what is said with reference thereto in a note to *Grogan v. ousness of such contracts cannot affect their nature, and while the test to be applied cannot be affected by the circumstance that a particular contract is part of a general system, yet, such test being whether such a stipulation is upon the whole against the public interest, so that it is not the fact of restraint, but the degree of the restriction, which controls,—the result of such test may be considerably affected by the fact that the particular contract in question is one of a number.

International Harvester Co. v. Com. supra.

Messrs. Kohn, Baird, Sloss, & Kohn also for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellant ice company to restrain the appellee, Rohrman, from violating a contract entered into by him, in which he obligated himself not to engage for a period of ten years in the business of manufacturing or selling ice in Jefferson county, Kentucky. Rohrman in his answer set up several defenses, but we deem it necessary only to notice the one pleading that the contract was illegal, in restraint of trade, and against public policy. Upon hearing the case, the chancellor dismissed the petition, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment.

To understand fully the nature of the case, it will be necessary to relate somewhat in detail the facts disclosed by the record. On the 1st day of March, 1905, the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of ice, sold its plant, good will, and business to the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state in April, 1904, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling ice and carrying on a cold storage business. On the 25th of March, 1905, a few days after its purchase of the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, by amended articles of incorporation, increased its capital stock from $200,000 to $1,000,000. On January 2, 1906, the appellant Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company was incorporated with a capital stock of $1,500,000. It may here be noted that the principal stockholders in each of these companies were the same persons, and that Charles H. Inman was the president of each of them.

It is averred in the petition that prior to the said "1st day of March, 1905, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company had been incorporated and organized at the instigation of and for the benefit of the persons interested in the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, including the defendant, Rohrman, and others, for the purpose of acquiring the plant, good will, and business of the said National Ice & Cold Storage Company, and the plants, business, and good will of other ice manufacturers of Louisville, with a view to consolidating them under one management and control through and by the said Merchants' Refrigerating Company." And, further, that "the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company was incorporated in January, 1906, at the instigation of and for the benefit of the persons interested as stockholders in the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, for the purpose of having the said Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company acquire the assets and contracts of the Merchants' Refrigerating Company and other manufacturers of ice, and continue their business. . . . And that the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company on the 9th of January, 1906, acquired and had conveyed to it all of the real estate of the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, and paid a large consideration therefor, of which the defendant, Rohrman, received his due proportion."

The Merchants' Refrigerating Company, in pursuance of the plan for which it was organized, purchased the plant, business, assets, and good will of the National Ice & Cold Storage Company under the following contract, which was signed by all of the stockholders, including the appellee, Rohrman:

This article of agreement, made and entered into by and between the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, and the undersigned stockholders thereof, parties to the first part, and the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, party of the second part, of the city of Louisville, Jefferson county, Kentucky, Witnesseth: That whereas the said National Ice & Cold Storage Company has sold, transferred, and delivered to the second party its certain real estate, with the improvements thereon, situated in the city of Louisville, Jefferson county, state of Kentucky, and all the machinery, fixtures, furniture, wagons, horses, harness, and all other property of every kind or description, connected with or used in its business of dealing in, manufacturing, and delivering of ice, together with the good will and business of the said first parties as dealers in and manufacturers of ice, for the sum of one hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred sixty-four and 66-100 dollars. Now, therefore, in consideration of said sale to and purchase by said second party, and in order that the said second party may be secure in the full enjoyment of the good will of said first parties, said first parties do severally agree that they will not, nor will either of them, for a period of ten years from the first day of April, 1905, without the consent of the said second party directly or indirectly, as principal, agent, or employee, engage in the business of manufacturing or selling ice within Jefferson county, Kentucky, except in the service of said second party.

Merchants' Refrigerating Co.,

By Chas. W. Inman, Pres. & Tr.

In the contract by which the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company purchased the property and assets of the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, it is stipulated that the Merchants' Refrigerating Company transfers to it, "all its good will and the good will of others acquired by it, including all contracts pertaining to and taken in connection with the acquisition of the good will of others, with the right in the buyer to enforce in its behalf all such contracts to the same extent as the seller could do had it continued in business, it being understood that the said contracts are a material part of the consideration received by the buyer under its contract with the seller."

It will thus be observed that in March, 1905, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company purchased the plant, business, assets, and good will of the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, and that in January, 1906, the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company purchased the property, assets, and good will of the Merchants' Refrigerating Company. It may here be mentioned that Rohrman was a stockholder in each of these companies, and owned in 1908 some $30,000 worth of the stock in the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company. In addition to what may be termed the consolidation of the three plants mentioned, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, between the time of its absorption of the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, in 1905, and the sale of its plant to the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company, in January, 1906, had purchased the property of all the ice plants in Louisville, engaged exclusively in the manufacture of ice, except the Inman Ice Company, that had a capacity of 35 tons. In addition to this, it arranged to and did purchase the output of nearly all the concerns that manufactured ice in connection with their business and sold the surplus. These various plants purchased, as well as the contracts for the output, were turned over to the Merchants'

Ice & Cold Storage Company, when it took over the Merchants' Refrigerating Company. The result of all this was that the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company owned and controlled all the ice manufactured in Louisville, except 5 or 10 per cent thereof, which was manufactured by a few small plants; and it is also shown that an unsuccessful effort was made to purchase some of these small plants or their output. The persons selling plants that were purchased by the refrigerating company were required to execute a contract similar to the one signed by Rohrman. There is also some evidence that the price at which peddlers or distributors of ice sold the same was fixed by the appellant company; and they were notified that unless the prices so fixed were maintained they would be charged a higher rate for ice than they had been paying. It does not appear, however, that any attempt was made to increase the price above its fair value, or to dictate to the independent companies the price at which ice should be sold by them. The officers of the appellant company deny that they had any intention of controlling the manufacture or price of ice in Louisville, and insist that the only purpose in buying up some plants and the product of others was to organize the business upon a satisfactory and paying basis, and cut down the expense of carrying it on.

Without stating further in detail the evidence, we may summarize as follows the facts as we gather them from the record: (1) At the time the Merchants' Refrigerating Company commenced to purchase ice plants and the output of ice, there were in operation in the city some fifteen independent ice factories, and in addition some seven other concerns that sold a large part of their product to the public, and between these various factories there was active competition. (2) After the absorption of all the plants it could purchase or control, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company owned or controlled all the ice manufactured in Louisville for the use of the public, except 5 or 10 per cent thereof. (3) The absorption of these various plants was accomplished in behalf of the Merchants' Refrigerating Company by Webber and Cox, who each received for their services $5,000 worth of stock in this company. (4) These various plants were purchased under a contract similar to the one made with Rohrman. (5) The principal stockholders in the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, and the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company were the same persons; and Charles W. Inman was the president and controlling spirit in each of them. (6) 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The Merchants' Refrigerating Company was organized to take over all the ice plants in Louisville that it could purchase or control. (7) The Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company was organized for the purpose of taking over the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, and all of the factories and product that it had purchased, as well as other factories engaged in the ice business; and although this last-named company was not organized until January, 1906, it is yet manifest that the purpose of its organization was to control the ice business in Louisville. (8) The purchase of the National Ice & Cold Storage Company was merely a part of the plan and scheme conceived by Inman and his associates to obtain, by purchase or otherwise, control of all the plants in the city, and thereby fix and regulate the price as well as the output of ice. (9) The price of ice was not raised above its fair or reasonable value by either the Merchants' Refrigerating Company or the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company; nor was it attempted to control the output of the few independent factories or the price at which they sold their product.

From these facts, our conclusion is that the contract was not only unenforceable, because in violation of the statute before its amendment by the act of 1906 (Laws 1906, chap. 117), held to amend in Com. v. International Harvester Co. 131 Ky. 551, 133 Am. St. Rep. 256, 115 S. W. 703, but it was void as an unreasonable restraint of trade, independent of the statute. The statute, which is § 3915 of the Kentucky Statutes (Russell's Stat. § 3717), reads as follows: "That if any corporation under the laws of Kentucky, or under the laws of any other state or country, for transacting or conducting any kind of business in this state, or any partnership, company, firm, or individual, or other association of persons, shall create, establish, organize, or enter into, or become a member of, or a party to, or in any way interested in, any pool, trust, combine, agreement, confederation, or understanding, with any other corporation, partnership, individual, or person, or association of persons, for the purpose of regulating or controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured article, or property of any kind, or shall enter into, become a member of, or party to, or in any way interested in, any pool, agreement, contract, understanding, combination, or confederation, having for its object the fixing, or in any way limiting, the amount or quantity of any article of property, commodity, or merchandise to be produced or manufactured, mined, bought or sold, shall be deemed guilty of the crime of conspiracy, and punished therefor as provided in the subsequent sections of this act."

The learned judge of the lower court, in a well-written opinion, holding that the contract was in violation of this statute, said: "It was the rule of the common law that any scheme to corner the market by getting control of the available supply is illegal, and so all contracts made in promotion of such scheme are unenforceable. If the common-law rule, as thus announced, is not sufficient to dispose of the question at bar, it would seem that the Kentucky statute is violated, and renders the contract sought to be enforced by the plaintiffs void. Corporations in this country are simply aggregations of men for the purpose of conducting business, and, for the convenience of those interested in the business, are substituted for partnerships. There is a marked distinction between a corporation created under the laws of the state and the old corporation created by act of the legislature. Under the laws of this state any small number of men otherwise engaged in a partnership enterprise may, by proceeding under the statute, incorporate themselves. The ease and facility with which corporations are created in this age have made them a shield and a blind for many purposes, and the rule of the courts throughout the country is not to look at the form of such transaction, but to the substance. Thus the motives which inspire the incorporators or the stockholders of a corporation will be inquired into, and the court will act upon the facts as found, without regard to the form of the transaction. Where, therefore, one corporation is created for the purpose of taking over a number of other corporations, issuing stock, or even paying for the property, with a view of establishing a monopoly, trust, or combination, the form of the transaction will be disregarded and the intent of the parties will be looked to.

Thus the Merchants' Refrigerating Company and the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company were created for the purpose of taking over all other ice concerns which would sell to them, and did take over all which they could possibly buy, and, pursuant to the general intent, it did arrange to take the surplus output of other concerns. It will be noted that the statute in Kentucky denounces any 'agreement' for the purpose of regulating, controlling, or 'fixing the price' of any merchandise, etc. The taking over of the several corporations, the making of contracts, such as the one declared upon by plaintiffs, are all in the nature of agreements, and the ultimate result was the 'fixing of the price' at which the ice output was to be sold. It is not necessary that the combination shall have increased the price beyond its real value, or have depreciated the price below its value. For the vice in the contract, not as shown by the contract itself, but by all the attendant circumstances, it seems to me, the defendant who is equally in fault with the plaintiffs, and indeed places himself beyond the sympathy of the court, cannot be enjoined from violating the contract. Applying the well-established principles of law, the court must leave the parties where it finds them, without giving either relief. The contract could not be enforced by Rohrman, nor should it be enforced by the plaintiffs, and the fact that he has profited largely by the contract, having sold interest in the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, and otherwise profited by their manipulations, cannot avail the plaintiffs."

In addition to this the contract had for its purpose an unreasonable restraint of trade, and hence the courts will not enforce it at the instance of either party. It is too well settled to need more than the mere citation of authority, that a contract in reasonable restraint of trade is valid. Pike v. Thomas, 4 Bibb, 486, 7 Am. Dec. 741; Turner v. Johnson, 7 Dana, 435; Sutton v. Head, 86 Ky. 156, 9 Am. St. Rep. 274, 5 S. W. 410; Western Dist. Warehouse Co. v. Hobson, 96 Ky. 550, 29 S. W. 308; Stovall v. McCutchen, 107 Ky. 577, 47 L.R.A. 287, 92 Am. St. Rep. 373, 54 S. W. 969; Louisville Bd. of Fire Underwriters v. Johnson, 133 Ky. 797, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 153, 119 S. W. 153. Or as said in Beach on Modern Law of Contracts, vol. 2, § 1602: "It is a well-settled doctrine that any agreement in restraint of trade is void as being against public policy, unless founded upon a valuable consideration, and as regards time, space, and the extent of the trade limited to what is reasonable under the circumstances of the case, for the reason that such contracts tend to deprive the public of the services of the parties in the employments and capacities in which they are most useful, and so tend to expose the public to the evils of monopoly. Many authorities declare, in substance, that all restraints are presumed to be bad, but if the circumstances are set forth that presumption may be excluded, and the court judge of these circumstances, whether the contract be valid or not." Therefore, if the contract in question was in reasonable restraint of trade, and there was no other objection, it follows that the courts would enforce it as a valid contract. But, in our opinion, this contract was not in reasonable restraint of trade, and we will proceed to state the reasons for this conclusion.

At the outset, it may be observed that it is difficult to draw the line between contracts in partial restraint of trade, that are recognized as legitimate by all the courts, and contracts having for their purpose the control of the market for an article or commodity, and consequently the suppression of competition, which are condemned by the courts as either monopolies, trusts, or conspiracies, or as being in restraint of trade. Every purchase of a competitor in any trade or business under an agreement that the seller will not for a specified time engage in the same trade or business in that territory is at least the partial suppression of competition, and gives to the purchaser a larger control of the market for the article or commodity involved in the transaction than he had before. And it is fair to assume that, in all transactions like this, one of the reasons for the purchase is to remove competition. But although this may be so, it will not of itself render the contract invalid. If this feature or fact would invalidate such contracts, then all of them would be void. To render a contract invalid, there must be some other object in view than the mere purchase of a competing business; and the natural consequence of the purchase must be to control the market or suppress competition. But, even if this should be the natural result of the purchase from a business or trade standpoint, it would not in every case or under all conditions render the contract of purchase invalid. There are, and must in the necessity of the case be, exceptions to the rule, and these exceptions must be dealt with as they come up. For instance, if there were only two merchants in a town, and one of them should buy the other out, it might result in a condition of affairs in that particular community that would leave only one person engaged in the mercantile business and give him control of the immediate market, and yet the circumstances and conditions surrounding the transaction might be such as to exempt it from the operation of the rule condemning contracts that have the effect of placing in the hands of one person control of an article, trade, or business. In other places, and in reference to other things, the purchase by one concern of a half-dozen plants or establishments might not, except in a measure, affect competition, and would not enable the purchaser to control the market, and this would not be the purpose in view in making the purchase. It can therefore be seen that it is easy enough to suppose or even describe conditions in which the purchase of a competing plant or business would not have the effect of creating a situation that would come within the condemnation of the law, and also that it would not be difficult to set down conditions that would make the transaction illegal without reference to the number of competitors that were purchased. The textbooks on contracts are full of cases in which this question, in one form or another, has come before the courts, but it would not accomplish any useful purpose to undertake to differentiate them in this opinion. In the able and elaborate opinion rendered by Judge Taft in United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. 46 L.R.A. 122, 29 C. C. A. 141, 54 U. S. App. 723, 85 Fed. 271, as well as in the full note to Harding v. American Glucose Co. 64 L.R.A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 189, a discussion of the principles underlying this question may be found. The safe and just plan is to deal with each particular case as the facts and conditions presented seem to demand, protecting the good while punishing the bad. The question is too delicate, and involves too many important rights, to attempt an accurate statement of principles that might be applied to each case. On the one side, we have the inalienable right of the citizen to contract, and buy and sell, in the open market that which is the legitimate subject of barter and sale; and this privilege should not be abridged without good reason. On the other side, we have the interest of the public that must be protected, even though it cost a part of the liberty of the individual. It is not the purpose of the law to control or hinder enterprising, energetic men, with brains or capital, from developing an industry or building up a great trade or business. The largest freedom in commercial enterprises compatible with the public good should be allowed. And so there should be no interference with the right to contract or to buy or sell, unless it is apparent that the main purpose and reasonable effect of the contract is to create a condition of affairs that will enable the purchaser to control the market, destroy competition, and create a condition incompatible with the public good. As well said by the supreme court of Indiana in Knight & J. Co. v. Miller, 172 Ind. 27, 87 N. E. 823: "The true test is whether the contract or combination in its apparent purpose or natural consequence places a restriction upon competition, or tends to create a monopoly, or is inimical to trade or commerce; and it is not necessary that a pure monopoly is effected, or that the restraint is a complete one. . . . But the control of commodities which are necessities of life, or of material necessary or essential to building, or to sanitary regulations, or of subjects of legitimate trade affecting the interests of the public or the interests of any particular class of citizens, either as producers, dealers, or consumers, to the extent that it either does or tends to prevent or restrain competition, cannot be justified." To the same effect is Texas Standard Oil Co. v. Adoue, 83 Tex. 650, 15 L.R.A. 598, 29 Am. St. Rep. 690, 19 S. W. 274.

Monopolies since the earliest times have been condemned by the courts; and contracts such as the one we are considering, having for their purpose the control of the market and the suppression of competition, are nothing more nor less than an effort to create a monopoly, and at the same time place an unlawful restraint upon trade. How to deal with the ever-growing problem involved in the attempt to suppress monopolies and combinations that have for their purpose the control of various lines of trade and industry that are close to the material needs and welfare of the people has become a matter of great public concern. Many attempts have been made by legislatures and courts to prevent and put down efforts to get possession of a useful article or commodity, but all of them have apparently proved unavailing. These illegal combinations appear in so many forms and in so many different guises that it is a difficult task to keep them under the surveillance of the law. When driven from one place of vantage by vigilance of legislatures, with the assistance of the courts, they at once seek another that seems to offer security from prosecution. As an illustration of the ingenuity in devising plans to evade the law against monopolies and combinations, this case is a fair example. Here an effort is made to accomplish by indirect methods what would be in another shape easily marked for condemnation,—the contention being that as the appellant Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company was not incorporated until 1906, about a year after the contract between Rohrman and the Merchants' Refrigerating Company was entered into, and was not a party to the contract, it should not be charged with or held responsible for the vice in it. It is said it only took over the Merchants' Refrigerating Company and all the properties owned by it, and so should not be made to bear the burden of the wrongdoing of that concern. There would be more force in this argument if the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company occupied the position of what we may call an innocent purchaser. But it does not hold this place of advantage. It was organized by, and is substantially owned by, the persons who owned the Merchants' Refrigerating Company. Its creation was merely the last step in the plan conceived by the Merchants' Refrigerating Company to control the ice market. As it took over the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, with full knowledge of what it had done in this direction, it will not be heard to say that its hands are clean of any complicity in the scheme partially perfected by the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, and then delivered with all the vice connected with the transaction to its successors, the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company, to put it into full execution. If this kind of subterfuge were allowed there would be little use in trying to check monopolies or put the seal of condemnation upon contracts to control the market. It would only be necessary when any corporation or concern had obtained control of the market to dispose of its holdings to another and new corporation, thus evading the law, and making legal an obnoxious transaction. There is no merit in this contention, and we will treat the case as if the contract with Rohrman had been made with the Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Company in place of its predecessor, the Merchants' Refrigerating Company. Considered from this standpoint, let us look into this contract. As an independent transaction, distinct from the plan of which it was a part, we see no objection to it. On its face it only provides for a reasonable restraint of trade. It was merely one business concern selling out to another, and so, if this was all, the contract would be free from objection, and we would grant the relief sought. But the validity of this particular contract cannot be determined by looking at it alone. It must be considered in connection with the others of which it was and is a part, and when so considered in connection with the circumstances under which it was entered into and the conditions that gave rise to its execution, we find that it was only one of a number of like contracts secured about the same time by the Merchants' Refrigerating Company, in furtherance of the purpose to obtain control of the ice market and effectually destroy substantial competition. In short, we think it is plain that the purpose in the minds of the parties to this transaction was to purchase the National Ice & Cold Storage Company and Rohrman's interest therein, as a link in the chain that would finally bind all the consumers of ice in Louisville to the wheels of a single concern, thereby creating a condition that would enable the purchaser to control the market and stifle, if not suppress, competition.

If the owners of all the ice plants in Louisville that were purchased by the Merchants' Refrigerating Company had, while each was owning and operating his plant, entered into a trust agreement among themselves to control the market and fix the price, although the price might be reasonable, there would be little doubt about the invalidity of the contract. And the fact that this condition is brought about by the employment of other methods cannot exempt the purchaser from the operation of the rule of invalidity that would be applied if merely a trust agreement between these independent concerns had been entered into. In both instances the purpose would be the same,—the object in the minds of the promoters identical,—the only difference being in the means employed by which the same end was to be accomplished. If a contract is made that suppresses competition, and controls the market, and that contract is entered into between those who have theretofore engaged in competition in the market sought to be controlled, it is a contract in restraint of trade. It may be more. It may amount to a trust or conspiracy or a monopoly, but it is nevertheless a contract in restraint of trade. To restrain trade is the essential feature of the contract,—the reason why it was made. If trade that is in competition could not be restrained, the promoters would not go into the scheme; and when such a contract is made, whatever form it may assume, or by whatever name it may be called, and although it may be reached under the law of monopolies, trusts, and conspiracies, it will be declared void as being in unreasonable restraint of trade. Said the United States Supreme Court in Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96: "We have no doubt that where the direct and immediate effect of a contract or combination among particular dealers in a commodity is to destroy competition between them and others, so that the parties to the contract or combination may obtain increased prices for themselves, such contract or combination amounts to a restraint of trade in the commodity, even though contracts to buy such commodity at the enhanced price are continually being made. Total suppression of the trade in the commodity is not necessary in order to render the combination one in restraint of trade. It is the effect of the combination in limiting and restricting the right of each of the members to transact business in the ordinary way, as well as its effect upon the volume or extent of the dealing in the commodity, that is regarded."

sist that each class should be kept in a separate column and treated apart from the others. And so there has been some criticism of the modern tendency to bring cases like this within the doctrine governing contracts in restraint of trade, upon the ground that the offense partakes of the nature of a trust, monopoly, or conspiracy, rather than a restraint upon trade as the law in reference to restraint is generally understood. But, in our opinion there seems no good reason why a case should not be treated as an illegal restraint of trade when such is its effect. And so it is not important how this control of the market or suppression of competition is effected. It is the result that the law looks at and seeks to correct, and not the means by which it is accomplished. It is not worth while to make any nice distinctions in matters like this. At last and in all events, the question in so far as it relates to restraint upon trade comes down to the proposition whether the restraint is reasonable or not. If it is, it is legal; if it is not, it is illegal.

The views we have expressed are directly at variance with the opinion of the New Jersey supreme court in Trenton Potteries Co. v. Oliphant, 58 N. J. Eq. 507, 46 L.R.A. 255, 78 Am. St. Rep. 612, 43 Atl. 723, strongly relied on by counsel for the appellants. In that case the court upheld a contract identical, in the circumstances and conditions surrounding it, with the one involved in this case, and, in the course of the opinion, said: "A person engaged in any manufacture or trade, having the right to acquire and possess property, and to do with it what he chooses, may lawfully buy the business of any of his competitors. His first purchase would at once diminish competition. If he continued to purchase, each succeeding transaction would remove another competitor. If his capital was large enough to enable him to buy the business of all competitors, the last purchase would completely exclude competition, at least for a time. But in the absence of legislative restrictions (if such could be imposed), upon the acquisition of such property, and its use when so acquired, courts could impose no limitations. They would be obliged to enforce such contracts, notwithstanding the effect was to diminish, or even to exclude, competition. . . . Under our liberal corporation laws, corporate authority may be acquired by aggregations of individuals, organized as prescribed, to engage in and carry on almost every conceivable manufacture or trade. Such corporations are empowered to purchase, hold, and use property appropriate to their business. They may also purchase and hold the stock of other corporations. Under such powers it is obvious that a corporation may purchase the plant and business of competing individuals and concerns. The legislature might have withheld such powers, or imposed limitations upon their use. In the absence of prohibition or limitation on their powers in this respect, it is impossible for the courts to pronounce acts done under legislative grant to be inimical to public policy. The grant of the legislature authorizing and permitting such acts must fix for the courts the character and limit of public policy in that regard. It follows that a corporation empowered to carry on a particular business may lawfully purchase the plant and business of competitors, although such purchases may diminish, or, for a time at least, destroy, competition. Contracts for such purchases cannot be refused enforcement. Since contracts by individuals, and by corporations having legislative authority, for the purchase of competing plants and business, may be made, and are enforceable, although, as a result thereof, competition is diminished or temporarily destroyed, it further follows that contracts reasonably required to make such purchases effective by protecting the purchaser in the use and enjoyment of the thing purchased cannot be declared by the courts to be repugnant to public policy."

And it must be admitted that this case fully sustains the contention of counsel, and if recognized as authority by us would uphold the contract here sought to be enforced. But we cannot give our approval to the doctrine announced by the New Jersey court. It is not only entirely at variance with our public policy as often declared both by the legislative and judicial departments of the state, but is contrary to the great weight of authority. Indeed we have not found any case that goes so far in an effort to promote trusts and encourage monopolies; the true and prevailing doctrine on this subject being well expressed by the Michigan supreme court in Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L.R.A. 457, 43 N. W. 1102, where it is said: "Monopoly in trade or in any kind of business in this country is odious to our form of government. It is sometimes permitted to aid the government in carrying on a great public enterprise, or public work under governmental control, in the interest of the public. Its tendency is, however, destructive of free institutions, and repugnant to the instincts of a free people, and contrary to the whole scope and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and is not allowed to exist under express provision in several of our state Constitutions. . . . It is always destructive of individual rights, and of that free competition which is the life of business, and it revives and perpetuates one of the great evils which it was the object of the framers of our form of government to eradicate and prevent. It is alike destructive to both individual enterprise and individual prosperity, whether conferred upon corporations or individuals, and therefore public policy is, and ought to be, as well as public sentiment, against it." And by our court, in Anderson v. Jett, 89 Ky. 375, 6 L.R.A. 390, 12 S. W. 670, where it is said: "Rivalry is the life of trade; the thrift and welfare of the people depend upon it; monopoly is opposed to it all along the line; the accumulation of wealth out of the brow sweat of honest toilers by means of combinations is opposed to competing trade and enterprise. That public policy that encourages fair dealing, honest thrift, and enterprise among all the citizens of the commonwealth, and is opposed to monopolies and combinations, because unfriendly to such fair dealing, thrift, and enterprise, declares all combinations whose object is to destroy or impede free competition between the several lines of business engaged in utterly void."

The argument is further made that the contract should be upheld because the purpose of the purchase was only to economize in the cost of producing and selling ice, and prevent competition that was destructive to the conduct of the business, and not to fix, regulate, or raise the price of the article. And it is true there is no evidence that any attempt was made to raise the price of ice. But the mere fact that no effort was made to control or fix or raise the price has little to do with the question. It is the purpose to control the market and suppress competition that constitutes the essential vice in the contract. It would not, however, be out of place to observe that the probability of an advance in the price of an article of necessity is always eminent when there is no competition and the market is controlled by one person. It is an easy step from the point at which the control of a product is accomplished to the place at which the making of an increase in the price begins. When the unrestricted control of an article or commodity is placed in the hands of an individual or corporation, there are few who can or will resist the temptation to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to make as much profit out of the enterprise as the business will stand. That it would be inimical to the public good to have the ice business in a city the size of Louisville in the hands of one concern is, we think, a proposition so plain as not to need argument in support of it. Ice in large cities is one of the common necessities of life. It is an article which on account of its perishable qualities and the loss and expense attending its shipment affords exceptional opportunities for creating a monopoly in its manufacture and sale at the place it is used. It is easier to obtain control of the market and suppress competition in the sale of ice than almost any other article in general use. It would be almost impractical for one concern to control the dry goods, the grocery, the boot and shoe, or the hardware, or other like businesses in a large city, as goods of this character can easily be obtained at any time from other places by persons who need them, and the character of the business is such that any person with a small capital can soon set himself up in business. But the manufacture of ice requires the investment of a large sum of money to establish even a small plant. It cannot, without great deterioration, as well as expense, be imported from outside points to the place at which it is to be used. And so if it was permissible to make any discrimination between attempts to monopolize a trade or industry, it would not be amiss to single out ice as one of the articles to which the discrimination might well be applied, and the most stringent rule adopted to prevent monopoly.

The case for the appellant, tested by every rule applicable in cases of this character, falls well within the condemnation of the law, and the judgment denying it any relief must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

RE NATIONAL GROCERY COMPANY,
Claimant, Petitioner.

RE THOMAS HASTINGS, Bankrupt.

(— C. C. A. —, 181 Fed. 33.)

Mortgage — execution exemptions — validity.

1. Where, under the local law, it is not against public policy to permit the transfer of exemptions from execution, and mortgages may cover after-acquired property, a mortgage by one of his exemptions, to apply when it is sought to be enforced, will be enforced against the claim of his trustee in bankruptcy.

Same — definiteness — sufficiency.

2. The mortgage of the statutory exemptions from execution to which a merchant is entitled out of his stock in trade is sufficiently specific to be upheld where by statute he is entitled to claim as exempt merchandise to a specified value out of the stock.

Bankruptcy — mortgage of exemptions — validity.

3. The provision of the bankruptcy act empowering courts to set off to bankrupts their exemptions does not prevent the enforcement of a mortgage of such exemptions, which confers upon the mortgagee the right to select them.

Same — waiver of claim.

4. One who has mortgaged his statutory exemptions from execution cannot, by failing to claim them in bankruptcy proceedings, effect a waiver of the claim, which will prevent their enforcement by the mortgagee.

Mortgage — execution exemptions — public policy.

5. Under a statute permitting the selection of statutory exemptions to be made by the debtor or his "authorized agent," a mortgage of such exemptions, giving the mortgagee the right to make the selection, is not against public policy.

Note. — Right of debtor to assign exemptions, or delegate to another the right to select exempt property.

This note is confined strictly to cases like RE NATIONAL GROCERY Co., to the exclusion of cases in which the attack is made upon the assignment by the debtor himself. This narrows the question down to the point whether the policy of the exemption laws forbids the debtor to assign the right to claim or select exempt property at a time when third persons shall seek to assert liens against the property, and when, but for the attempted assignment, and if not estopped by it, the debtor would have been entitled to make the claim or selection. An other line of cases that as a whole may fairly be said to contain nothing that is of much value in the discussion of the question in RE NATIONAL GROCERY Co. involves the power to waive the benefit of the exemption laws by executory contract, or, as it is sometimes put, to waive prospective exemptions. It will be noted that, whereas an assignment is an act whereby it is sought to convey an affirmative right of claim or selection to the assignee, the waiver is merely a means of imposing upon the debtor a negative duty, when the waiver creditor shall seek to enforce affirmative rights that may arise in his favor from other sources. There are numerous cases passing upon the power to waive, but the great majority of them seem to have arisen where debtors have sought to claim exemptions as against creditors in whose favor such debtors had previously executed waivers. It would also seem that little benefit is to be derived from a discussion of cases involving statutes exempting property by specific enumeration.

The case of Re Sloan, 135 Fed. 873 throws some light upon the distinction between an assignment and a waiver of ex-

PETITION by the National Grocery Company, claimant, to review an order of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan disallowing its claim to certain exempt property of Thomas Hastings, bankrupt. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Severens, Warrington, and Knappen, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Bundy, Travis, & Merrick, with Mr. C. L. Benedict, for petitioner:

The lien is on exempt property, and no creditor can complain of the disposition of exempt property, because no creditor can complain of the disposition of property which he cannot reach.

emptions. There the exemptions were claimed by one to whom a bankrupt attempted to assign his right under the Pennsylvania statute, and also by the lessor of the bankrupt, who was seeking to assert his claim for rent under a lease containing a waiver of exemptions. The court said: "1. As the bankrupt's property in this case was sold by order of court, by a receiver appointed the day after the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and prior to the filing of the schedule by the bankrupt, and in view of the fact that he notified the receiver that he claimed his exemption, and specified the property at the day of sale, he would be entitled to claim his exemption from the proceeds, . . . but instead of insisting upon his claim he subsequently assigned it to another, who was not a creditor of his estate. A claim of exemption under the act of 1849 (Pa. Laws, 533) was meant only for the insolvent debtor, to keep a shelter and the means of living for himself and his family (Bowyer's Appeal, 21 Pa. 210), and it is therefore not a vendible or assignable thing (Eberhart's Appeal, 39 Pa. 513, 80 Am. Dec. 536). What he does not claim for himself and his family he leaves in the general fund and under the control of the court for distribution. Bowyer's Appeal, supra. It would seem, therefore, that the bankrupt in this case abandoned his right to claim the exemption by the execution of the assignment to Byron, and the only effect of the attempted transfer is to leave the proceeds of the sale of the articles he claimed in the general fund for distribution. A debtor cannot waive his right to the $300 in favor of a junior creditor or assign it to a third person. Bowyer's Appeal, supra. 2. As these articles were such property as could have been taken by the landlord upon a distress for rent under his lease with the waiver of exemption, he is entitled to receive his rent as a prior claim out of the proceeds of the fixtures, notwithstanding his failure to have made a levy either before or after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, he having proved his claim before the referee."

And it was held in Re Pfeiffer, 155 Fed. 892, that where a debtor had, in bankruptcy proceedings against him, waived the benefits of the Pennsylvania exemption act, he could not thereafter withdraw his waiver in favor of a creditor to whom he had made an assignment of his claim. This decision seemed to be based upon the theory that the assignment of the claim of exemptions was void.

Many cases (some of them are cited in Re Sloan, supra) have been decided under the Pennsylvania act of 1849, which was construed to exempt to a debtor $300 worth of property, provided he so elected and requested an appraisal before inquisition. It was said in Bowyer's Appeal, supra: "It is easy to see how this statute might be perverted to purposes as far as possible from the intention of the legislature, if the courts would maintain the right of the debtor to claim its benefit against one creditor, and relinquish it in favor of another; or to assign his interest under it to other parties who may or may not have paid him a consideration for it. The debtor in this case seems to have thought that the law was made, not to protect his family from want, but to give him the power of preferring those whom he chose to favor, at the expense of others whom he liked less, but whose legal rights were superior. He used it to subvert the maxims of the law, by giving to the sleepy what none but the vigilant were entitled to. We are clearly of opinion that all stipulations not to claim the $300, made in favor of a particular creditor, are void, so far as they are intended to affect others; and that an assignment of a debtor's right is, pro tanto, an abandonment of it. He must make his claim, if he makes it at all, in good faith, to carry out the very purpose of the law, and no other. All transfers and all waivers of his right, whether express or implied, inure to the benefit of his creditors in the proper order of their liens. Whatever he does not claim for himself or his family, he leaves in the general fund under the control of the court, to be distributed among those who are legally entitled to it; and

If the company could have enforced its lien before any assignment by Hastings, by entering and taking $250 worth of property, it could enter and take such property at any time before Hastings made any such transfer, because a mortgage upon future-acquired property is valid in Michigan.

The bankruptcy court will look to the laws of the state in which the questions arise, not only on the subject of mortgaging exempt property, but also as to the person or persons who may select such exemptions such distribution is not to be regulated by any wish of his, no matter in what form he may choose to express it. We are not now deciding whether or not a waiver of the debtor's claim to the $300 before execution is binding as between him and the party he agrees with, if he repents him afterwards and gives notice in time. We do not say whether he may or may not, when he creates a debt, irrevocably bind himself to defeat the object of the law with reference to his family. However this may be, he cannot, by means of a transfer or waiver, put one who has no legal right to the fund in the place of one who has."

In Yeager v. Nicholls, 7 Phila. 91, where exempt goods to the value of $300 were set apart to the debtor, who gave them to his mother, it was held that she could not set up the claim of exemption to avoid a subsequent levy, subsequently sought to be made upon the ground that the transfer was in fraud of creditors.

The Pennsylvania courts have denied the power of a debtor to waive the benefit of the exemption in favor of a junior execution creditor, so as to give him a preference over a prior levy on the same property. Garrett's Appeal, 32 Pa. 160, 72 Am. Dec. 779; Collins's Appeal, 35 Pa. 83; Lauck's Appeal, 44 Pa. 395; Knoll's Appeal, 11 W. N. C. 511; Denlinger v. Burkey, 18 Lanc. L. Rev. 94.

On this point it was said in Shelly's Appeal, 36 Pa. 373: "Our position is taken; we have recognized in all the cases the capacity of the debtor to make the waiver, and have held it a binding contract betwixt him and the creditor in whose favor it was made; but we are admonished to go no farther by way of enabling debtors to defeat the operation of statutes. If, by waiving his rights in behalf of the last creditor on record, he may make him the first, he defeats not only the beneficent purposes of the exemption law, but all those statutes which recognize priority of lien and forbid assignments to preferred creditors. To illustrate this, suppose a debtor's land produces just $300, and he has several judgment creditors. As between themselves, the first creditors in point of lien are legally entitled to be first paid; but as between all of them and the debtor, he is entitled to the fund. Such are the relations which the law establishes. But by waiving his rights in favor of the last of his creditors, the debtor virtually assigns his estate to that creditor, and reverses the relations which the law has established. It may be said that the prior creditors are not injured, since the estate would have gone to the debtor, and not to them, if the preferred creditor had not taken it; but the question is, Who gave the debtor power to control the distribution of his estate among his lien creditors? Primarily, the whole of his estate belonged to his creditors, to be distributed among them according to priority of lien. The legislature, from motives of humanity, permitted him to take $300 of it to himself. Refusing the proffered bounty, he leaves it to be distributed as if there was no exemption law. The legislature did not mean to give him the privilege of saying which of his creditors should have his estate. The exemption is to be of a specific portion of the land, if possible, and therefore it is not to come into the distribution at all: but if it cannot be set off in specie, the distribution of proceeds is to be made on the same principle,—to the debtor himself, if entitled, and, if not, to the creditors in their record order. Such, and only such, is the legitimate operation of the exemption law; and therefore what was thrown out in Bowyer's Appeal is worthy to be followed."

Again discussing this question in Thomas's Appeal, 69 Pa. 120, the Pennsylvania court throws light upon the distinction between the question merely of estoppel of the debtor, and the question of the rights as between creditors. The court said: "Expressions such as used in Bowyer's Appeal, 21 Pa. 214, that 'the law does not give the debtor the power of preferring those whom he chooses to favor at the expense of those whom he liked less, but whose legal rights are superior;' and that 'whatever he does not claim for himself or his family, he leaves in the general fund under the con-and the kinds of property which may be selected.

Here is no question of lien. No creditor has levied upon the goods but the one against whom the debtor claims his exemption. The court is called upon to make no distribution among lien creditors, and the right of the debtor to his exemption is superior to the right of the execution creditor. The exemption must therefore prevail if demanded in proper time."

The question of waiver of exemptions has been discussed in many aspects in the Pennsylvania courts, but none of them seem really to involve the precise question considered in this note. The foregoing cases have been cited purely for purposes of illustration, and attention is especially called to this fact, and to the fact that other Pennsylvania cases having nearly as much actual claim to a place in this note as those cited have been deliberately excluded. It has, however, been thought best to refer to the case of Hallman v. Hallman, 124 Pa. 347, 16 Atl. 871, not because it contains matter of much relevancy to the foregoing title but because it contains a general review of the cases from a general view point, and a statement of what the court regards as the resultant rules of law. It was therein said: "The result of this somewhat prolonged discussion of the authorities may be summed up finally in the following rules, with which no authority carefully examined on its facts is in conflict, and which are believed to rest on sound reasoning and settled principles of law: First, a waiver as to any lien will inure to the benefit of all prior liens; on the principle that a debtor cannot alter the precedents settled by law. Secondly, a waiver as to any lien will inure to the benefit of subsequent liens, so far as to compel the waiver creditor to resort first to the exempted fund; on the principle of the equity of creditors having one and two funds, respectively, under their control. 30 L.R.A. Thirdly, a waiver will not inure to the benefit of subsequent liens, beyond its own amount; so that if the waiver judgment is less than $300, the balance will go to the debtor claiming his exemption, and this on the broad ground that men may do what they will with their own, provided they do not contravene the settled rules of law, or impair the rights of others." This case was followed in respect of the first rule, in Miller v. Getz, 135 Pa. 558, 20 Am. St. Rep. 887, 19 Atl. 955; Keetley v. Campbell, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 415; Steininger v. Butler, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 97.

In considering the matter of the selection of the exempt property by third persons, it should be kept in mind there is ample room for a distinction between cases in which the third person seeks to make the selection as agent for, and on behalf of, the debtor, and cases in which a person other than the debtor acts in his own behalf. This distinction is met in RE NATIONAL GROCERY Co. by the statement that since in Michigan the exemptions may be selected by the debtor or his "authorized agent," they may be selected by a transferee of the claim of exemptions, who is given express authority to make the selection, because, in such circumstances, there is an agency coupled with an interest. While it may, in some sense, be true that an agency exists, it is also true that the so-called agent acts on his own behalf, and not on behalf of the transferor.

Language bearing upon the right of a transferee to make the selection is to be found in Hombs v. Corbin, 20 Mo. App. 497, and although its tenor is to the effect that the right of selection cannot be transferred, it should be pointed out that there seems to have been no attempt expressly to delegate the power of exemption. The case arose over the right of one from whom property was sought to be recovered upon the ground that the transfer to him was in fraud of the transferor's creditors, to insist upon the transferor's right of exemption and selection under a statute permitting a debtor to select as exempt property to the value of $300. So the question really was as to the right of the vendee of specific property to claim and select the vendor's exemptions, and not as to the validity of an attempt to confer upon him that right. The court said: "The right to the exemption is a personal privilege belonging to the debtor, which he may or may not claim.

. . . The debtor's right to the exemption is a privilege, but not a restraint. He may sell his exempt property, notwithstanding judgment or execution liens. Freeman, Executions, § 218. In a case of sale of exempt property, the purchaser would stand in the place of the debtor, and could assert the latter's right to the exemption. . . .

A levy upon property, therefore, made exempt by specific provisions of the statutes, may be avoided by the defendant in the execution, or by a purchaser of the exempt property. But this is true only as to property which is thus specifically made exempt, and not as to property which the defendant may select in lieu of the specified property exempt under the statute. Because, as to the right of selection, it is purely a personal privilege conferred upon the debtor, which he alone can exercise, and which he cannot transfer to another. Exempt property the debtor can sell, and it remains exempt after the sale, as it was before, unaffected thereby. Or if the property be not exempt, the debtor may select it in lieu of that which is exempt, and after the selection, sell it as he may sell the exempt property. But the right to make the selection the debtor cannot sell; he alone can exercise it. As the debtor can alone make such selection, he alone can avoid a levy on account of a failure of the officer to give him an opportunity to make it. The right to make the selection the debtor may waive just as he may waive his right to all exemptions." This language well states the considerations that led to the exclusion from this note of the cases involving provisions exempting specified property.

sented in Stotesbury v. Kirtland, 35 Mo. App. 148, which involved the assignment of property by a debtor to his children. The language of the foregoing case was quoted with approval, and the court in this case said: "He [the debtor] might have retained his right of exemption in the fund by assigning to his children all of it in excess of $300, reserving that amount to himself in virtue of his rights under the statute. But he did not do this; he elected to give it all away to his children, and having given it away, it is not perceived upon what principle he can get it back through the agency of the statute of exemptions. The theory upon which his answer, the answer of the children, and the decree of the court, proceeded, is that, to the extent of $300, his interest in the income accruing to him under his mother's will was impressed with the quality of exemption from his creditors by operation of law, and that when he assigned the whole fund to his children, it went into their hands to the extent of $300, impressed with this exemption; so that they could hold as against his creditors this $300, because he might have selected it, although he had not done so. The right of exemption, as we have seen, cannot, except in the case of specific chattels, be asserted by anyone save the debtor himself."

While it must be confessed that the foregoing cases do not squarely decide the precise question here considered, it would seem safe to say that the obvious leaning of the courts is toward a position from which they might be expected to declare in opposition to RE NATIONAL GROCERY Co., and the declaration in that case, that the circumstances therein disclosed were within the meaning of the Michigan statute permitting the selection to be made by the debtor or his "authorized agent," was made with a summariness that fails to pay due respect to the doubt that may well be entertained in the premises.

Knappen, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The matter here under review was heard below on the following statement of agreed facts

"First. Hastings for upwards of three years previous to filing his petition was engaged solely and principally in the retail grocery business in the city of Port Huron, in one location. At the time of the delivering of the instrument hereinafter set forth, Thomas Hastings, the bankrupt, owed the National Grocer Company $250 and upwards.

"Second. In June, 1908, the National Grocer Company refused further credit unless Hastings gave some security, and Hastings then executed and delivered the following instrument:

"For a valuable consideration to me in hand paid, and as security for any sum that I now owe, or may hereafter owe, to the National Grocer Company, I hereby bargain, sell, assign, and transfer to said company all the goods and chattels now belonging to me in my business, that are now, or may be at any time hereafter, exempt from levy and sale on execution against me, and I hereby authorize the said company to demand, select, and receive such exemptions in my name, or otherwise, at any time and from any person from whom I might have demanded them, had this instrument not been made, or to sue for said exemptions and for damages for the detention thereof.

"Dated this 4th day of June, 1908.

"Witness: E. E. Carson.

"And the National Grocer Company substituted L.R.A. (N.S.)

sequently sold him goods amounting to about $700, and received about the same amount in cash.

"Third. In December, 1908, Hastings filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, in which he made no claim for his exemptions, but specifically waived them.

"Fourth. At the first meeting of the creditors, the claimant asserted its rights under the instrument, and, from the inventory compiled by the trustees, claimant selected from stock of goods certain goods in the appraised value of $250, and of the specie and kind exempt under the statute, had the bankrupt seen fit to claim them.

"Fifth. Demand was made upon the trustee for the same, and it was agreed that the trustee should sell the goods so selected, and the funds should be held intact to await the decision of the courts."

The referee allowed the claim of the petitioner to the funds derived from the sale of the goods so selected. The district court entered an order overruling the referee, and disallowing petitioner's claim to the proceeds of the property in question. The reasons for the conclusion reached by the judge who heard the matter are thus stated in his opinion: "By this instrument the debtor did not exercise his own discretion in selecting exempt property, or attempt to execute a mortgage on any specified property, but, on the contrary, attempted to mortgage generally all of his exempt property then owned or thereafter acquired, and to vest in the mortgagee, when action might be required, the privilege of selecting the exempt property to be covered by the mortgage. I am of the opinion that this attempted delegation of the right of selection of the exempt property was against public policy and void; and that the instrument attempting to delegate this power of selection created no estoppel against the debtor himself, and is therefore ineffective as against the trustee in bankruptcy, who takes the title of the debtor." The correctness of this conclusion is the sole question presented to us.

In our opinion the learned judge erred in denying petitioner's lien. The right of exemption depends upon the Michigan statute. Section 6a of the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 548 U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3424) provides that "this act shall not affect the allowance to bankrupts of the exemptions which are prescribed by the state laws in force at the time of the filing of the petition in the state wherein they have had their domicile for the six months or the greater portion thereof immediately preceding the filing of the petition."

By § 70a the title to the bankrupt's property is vested in the trustee "except in so far as it is to property which is exempt;" and by § 47, subd. 11, it is made the duty of the trustee to "set apart the bankrupt's exemptions, and report the items and estimated value thereof to the court as soon as practicable after their appointment." The title, therefore, to property of a bankrupt which is generally exempt by the law of the state in which the bankrupt resides remains in the bankrupt, and does not pass to the trustee. Lockwood v. Exchange Bank, 190 U. S. 294, 47 L. ed. 1061, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 751. The Michigan statute exempts from levy and sale under execution or other final process "stock . . . to enable any person to carry on the profession, trade occupation, or business in which he is wholly or principally engaged, not exceeding in value $250." 3 Comp. Laws (Mich.) § 10,322, subd. 8. In applying exemption laws, the bankruptcy courts are bound to follow the construction of such laws announced by the highest court of the state whose statute is involved. Loveland Bankr. p. 514; Re Irvin (8th Circuit) 57 C. And on the question of the validity of an instrument reserving the mortgagor's exemptions under the laws of the state, the settled local law controls. Wilson v. Perrin (6th Circuit) 11 C. C. A. 66, 22 U. S. App. 514, 62 Fed. 629, 631. See also Three States Lumber Co. v. Blanks (6th Circuit) 69 L.R.A. 283, 66 C. C. A. 353, 133 Fed. 479, 482; Re First Nat. Bank, 67 C. C. A. 536, 135 Fed. 62. The mortgaging or conveying of exempt property to a creditor is not against the public policy of the state of Michigan. A mortgage of exemptions of the class here in question is not required to be signed by the wife. Charpentier v. Bresnahan, 62 Mich. 360, 28 N. W. 916; Miller v. Miller, 97 Mich. 151, 56 N. McIntyre*, 66 Mich. 681, 33 N. W. 762; Bresnahan v. Nugent, 92 Mich. 76, 52 N. W. 735. As the trustee in bankruptcy stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, he can take no better title than the latter had at the time the bankruptcy occurred (York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 50 L. ed. 782, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 481; Re Cincinnati Iron Store Co. [6th Circuit] 93 C. C. A. 122, 167 Fed. 486, 488), and a transfer which is good as against the transferor is equally valid as against the trustee.

that the bankrupt had the power to convey to petitioner his existing exemptions; and, as under the laws of Michigan, one may lawfully mortgage or convey property thereafter to be acquired (Curtis v. Wilcox, 49 Mich. 425, 13 N. W. 803; Louden v. Vinton, 108 Mich. 313, 318, 319, 66 N. W. 222), it is plain that the lien in question was not rendered invalid from the fact that it was made to apply to the stock as it should exist at the time the lien was sought to be enforced.

It is urged by the trustee that the description of the exemptions transferred is inadequate, in that exact property so intended to be exempted was not specified, and authorities are cited lending more or less support to this contention. In our judgment, however, the case is ruled, with respect to this proposition, by the decision of this court in Wilson v. Perrin, supra. In that case the mortgage, which contained a specific description of the property covered, was by its terms expressly made "subject to all exemptions from execution to which said first party may be entitled under the laws of the state of Michigan, and that his exempt interest is not covered by this mortgage." It was urged as invalidating the mortgage that, inasmuch as the mortgagee was garnished before a separation of the exempt portion had been made, there was no means to determine which portion of the stock of goods was conveyed and which was not. This court, speaking through Judge Lurton, disposed of the contention referred to in this language: "We attach no particular importance to the suggestion that the conveyance is limited to what would be left after the exemptions should be set apart. The conveyance is of the entire stock of merchandise, subject to the mortgagor's right of exemption. This is the plain and obvious meaning. As to the exemptions, it would seem that the mortgagee would take a defeasible title, subject to be defeated upon separation of the statutory amount of exemptions from the stock."

We can see no difference in principle between the validity of a description which excepts from it in general terms exemptions to be thereafter determined and a conveyance in terms of statutory exemptions which must be determined in the same way.

It is urged, however, that even if it be conceded that the assignment of the exemptions in question was originally valid, it was defeated by the failure of the bankrupt to select his exemptions under the bankruptcy proceedings, and especially by his express waiver thereof in his petition for adjudication in bankruptcy. It is argued, first, that the provisions of the bankruptcy act, impliedly at least, forbid recognition of any right to exemptions except upon the specific claim thereto presented by the bankrupt himself. The provisions of the act which are thought to produce this result are § 2, subd. 11, which authorizes courts of bankruptcy to "determine all claims of bankrupts to their exemptions," and general order No. 17 (32 C. C. A. XIX. 89 Fed. viii.), which requires a trustee to report to the court "the articles set off to the bankrupt by him." In our opinion, the sections invoked cannot be construed as denying the power of the court to recognize the right of a party other than the bankrupt, holding under a valid and effective assignment, conferring in express terms authority to make the selection in the name of the assignor. If the exemptions in question were lawfully assigned by the bankrupt, the trustee obtained no title thereto; and, as the selection was made according to an appraisal had under the direction of the trustee, there is no apparent difficulty in allowing the selection to be made by anyone representing the bankrupt.

We are thus brought to determine the second objection to the enforceability of the assignment, and upon which the court below held the petitioner not entitled to enforce the attempted lien, viz., that the attempted delegation of the right to select exempt property is against public policy and void. It is true, as contended by the trustee, that the right to exemption is a personal privilege, and may be waived by the debtor, and that such privilege cannot be claimed for him by another. But this proposition is not decisive of the question before us, because the debtor did not in this case waive his privilege, but, on the contrary, took advantage of it in making the assignment in question. The assignment was based upon a valuable consideration, viz., the giving of future credit; and the authority to the assignee to make the selection, if originally valid, was irrevocable, as being coupled with an interest. Baker v. Baird, 79 Mich. 255, 259, 44 N. W. 604.

Several decisions in other jurisdictions are relied upon by the trustee in support of his contention that the assignment of the right to select exemptions is against public policy. None of these decisions are persuasive. Three decisions of the supreme court of Michigan, invoked by the trustee, require attention. These cases are Wilson v. Montague, 57 Mich. 638, 24 N. W. 851; Galbraith v. Fleming, 60 Mich. 408, 412, 27 N. W. 583, and Re Service, 155 Mich. 179, 186, 118 N. W. 948. In the first of these cases it was held that a mortgage of chattels upon which a subsequent execution had been levied is not affected by the levying officer's omission to appraise the property and set off to the debtor the amount of his exemptions; that the exemption is a personal privilege which a judgment debtor can waive. This case did not in any way involve the power of a debtor to assign the right to select exemptions, nor even the right to assign the exemptions themselves. In Galbraith v. Fleming, it was held that the statutory right of action by ejectment, to recover unassigned dower, is vested solely in the widow, and is not conveyable to her assignee. This was put upon the ground that the authority for bringing such action must rest entirely upon statute; that the Michigan statutes confer no express authority upon an assignee to recover dower previous to assignment; that while, before assignment, the widow may release her dower to the owner of the fee so as to unite it with the fee, she cannot alien or transfer it to a stranger to the title. This is but a statement of the general rule recently applied by this court in the case of Re Lingafelter — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 181 Fed. 24. Neither of the Michigan cases just referred to bears any analogy to the case we are considering. In the case of Re Service, it was held that the statutory right of the widow to elect to take under the provisions the statute, in lieu of the terms of the will, is a personal right, and not assignable. This case seems to have been to some extent relied upon by the judge below. Setting to one side the consideration that the holding just referred to was not necessary to a decision of the case, and assuming that the settled law of Michigan is as there stated, we are unable to recognize that case as authority for the proposition contended for here. The right of a wife to elect to waive the provisions of her husband's will, and to take under the statute of distributions, involves a personal discretion, the exercise of which by anyone other than the one for whose benefit the right is given may well be held to offend against public policy. Conceding that there is an analogy between an election to waive the terms of a will and an election to waive the benefit of a statute pertaining to exemptions, we can recognize no such analogy between the first-mentioned right of election and the right to select exemptions which have not been waived, but which, on the contrary, have been expressly claimed, by a lawful assignment and transfer. The case before us does not involve the right of someone other than the bankrupt to insist upon or to waive his claim of exemptions, but only the right of the assignee under a valid assignment to make the selection of the exemptions so assigned, under an express authority therefor contained in the instrument of assignment. Had the bankrupt personally made the claim under the bankruptcy proceedings, there can be no doubt that the exemptions would have passed to the petitioner here. The assignment in terms authorizes the petitioner to make the selection in the name of the assignor or otherwise, thus constituting petitioner, to say the least, the agent of the assignor for the purpose.

It is to be noted that the Michigan statute in express terms permits the selection of exemptions to be made by the debtor "or his authorized agent." Comp. Laws (Mich.) 1897, § 10,326. This feature plainly distinguishes the case before us from the case of an assignment of a widow's right to elect whether to waive the terms of a will or to take under the statute of distributions, as well as from the case of a conveyance of unassigned dower, for neither of which acts is there any statutory authority. The personal discretion involved in the selection by an assignee, under power of attorney from a debtor, is of no more importance than in the case of a selection by an agent in the absence of an assignment. It is clear that this lawful authority to select exemptions, given upon a valuable consideration and coupled with an interest, could not be revoked by the failure of the bankrupt to claim the exemptions in his own name, or even by his express waiver thereof; and that the assignor was estopped so to do.

The order of the District Court is reversed, with directions to enter an order allowing petitioner's lien.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RE CELSUS OREAR. Trustee in Bankruptcy of Jacob W. Derr et al., Petitioner.

(102 C. C. A. 78, 178 Fed. 632.)

Bankruptcy — life insurance — right of trustee.

The proviso in § 70 of the bankruptcy act, that when a bankrupt shall have an insurance policy with a cash surrender value payable to himself or his estate, he may, under certain circumstances, pay such value to the trustee and retain the policy, does not interfere with the operation of the provision in the section that the trustee shall be vested by operation of law with any property which the bankrupt could by any means have transferred, and therefore a policy the beneficiary in which may be changed by the bankrupt at pleasure will pass to the trustee.

(Pollock, District Judge, dissents.)

(February 23, 1910.)

Note. — Life insurance as assets of bankrupt.

This question having been treated in the notes to Morris v. Dodd, 50 L.R.A. 43, and Re White, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, only the cases decided since the preparation of the latter note are considered in this note.

This question is governed by the provisions of § 70a of the bankruptcy act of 1898, and so much of this section as is necessary for the purposes of this note is set out in RE OREAR. The note in 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) shows that it is now settled that the proviso to § 70a does not operate to invest the trustee with the right to claim the cash surrender value of a policy as to which he has no right under other provisions of the section, but that its purpose is to confer a benefit upon an insured bankrupt by way of giving him the right to tender the cash surrender value and retain the policy where otherwise it would irredeemably pass to the trustee. This was determined in controversies over the construction of the exemption clause of § 70a in connection with the proviso.

There can be no question but that the operation of the proviso in connection with clause 5 of § 70a is not to require the bankrupt to tender to the trustee the cash surrender value of policies which he could not "by any means have transferred," but is to give him the privilege of doing so, and of retaining the policy, when that policy is one which he could "by any means have transferred," and which therefore is one that the trustee may claim. There is nothing in RE OREAR which conflicts with this statement. That case holds merely that the policy passes to the trustee in the first instance, and the question of the bankrupt's right to redeem by paying in the cash surrender value seems not to have been contested in the circuit court of appeals. And it should be noted that that court affirmed the referee's order conferring the privilege of redemption upon the bankrupt. The court of appeals heard the case upon appeal by the trustee upon the ground that the district court reversed the referee, and held that the policies did not pass to the trustee at all.

In some of the later cases, including RE OREAR, considerable attention has been devoted to the effect of the fact that a policy gives to the insured the right to change the beneficiary. This fact may operate to deprive a present beneficiary of the right to claim an exemption, or to place within the operation of other clauses of § 70a policies that otherwise might not pass to the trustee under such clauses.

The case of Re Herr, 182 Fed. 716, 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 142, involved a policy on the PETITION by the trustee in bankruptcy of Derr Brothers, a partnership composed of Jacob W. Derr and Charles C. Derr, and as individuals, bankrupts, to review in matter of law an order of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri reversing an order of a referee in bankruptcy directing that certain policies of insurance on the life of Jacob W. Derr be turned over to the trustee. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Van Devanter, Circuit Judge, and Carland and Pollock, District Judges.

Messrs. Joseph A. Wright and Warren D. Harris, for petitioner:

The insurance policies in suit give an endowment plan, payable to the husband in 1916, or in case he died before that date, to his wife if she survived him, otherwise to his executors, administrators, or assigns. The policy had a cash surrender value, and contained a provision authorizing the bankrupt to change the beneficiary at any time. It was held that while the wife was the contingent beneficiary, the policy was under the complete control of the bankrupt, and it therefore passed to the trustee, subject to the right to redeem on paying the surrender value. The court said: "It is true that if the bankrupt died to-day, the money due on the policy would belong to his wife. But it is also true that at once, upon the discharge of the present rule, the bankrupt could eliminate her, by the designation of a new beneficiary, and get the surrender value of the policy, which the trustee therefore, by the terms of the statute, is entitled to claim. It is the uncertainty of her interest that makes it of no concern. It is only to policies where she has something dependable that the exemption applies. Because of the bankrupt's absolute command over it, the surrender value is to be regarded as payable to him, within the meaning of the law."

So, it was held in Re Dolan, 182 Fed. 949, 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 145, citing RE OREAR, that the power of the bankrupt to change the beneficiary in an endowment policy payable to the former if she should survive the expiration of the tontine period, otherwise to the latter, rendered it property which she could have transferred within the meaning of § 70a, and therefore entitled the trustee to claim the cash surrender value.

The case of Allen v. Central Wisconsin Trust Co. (Wis.) 127 N. W. 1003, 25 Am. Bankr. Rep. 126, differs considerably from those just cited. In this case it appeared that before the adjudication the bankrupt had elected to withdraw the accumulated surplus of a twenty-year policy, which was then continued as a fully paid-up policy, and made payable at the insured's death to his wife, subject to his right to change the beneficiary, and payable, if no beneficiary absolute power of disposition of the funds by the insured, enabling the insured to realize the surrender value of the policy for his own benefit, and of necessity give him as full control of the proceeds as if the money was in deposit to his credit in a bank, and therefore pass to him under § 70 of the bankruptcy act.

The trustee may pay the premiums upon insurance policies when policies can be rendered valuable to the estate.

The provisions of § 70 do not conflict so should survive, to his executors, etc. As thus converted, the policy drew annual dividends, and had a certain cash surrender value. The trustee in bankruptcy of the insured claimed the policy, but the court held that since the investment feature of the policy in behalf of the insured was entirely eliminated when the surplus was paid to the insured, the policy thereupon became and remained strictly a life insurance policy payable to the wife, and, as such, was exempt from the claims of the husband's creditors. In disposing of the contention that as the insured reserved the right to change the beneficiary, he might still convert the policy into property that would pass to the trustee, the court said: "Conceding, but not deciding, that he still has the right to change the beneficiary, and assuming that he may do so, yet it is not easy to perceive upon what ground it can be claimed that the trustee is at all concerned with what may afterward become of exempt property. The trustee is vested with the title to the property of the bankrupt, if at all, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt. At that time this policy was exempt, and did not pass to the trustee. It cannot pass later, no matter what the bankrupt may do."

In Burlingham v. Crouse, 181 Fed. 479, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 632, it appeared that the bankrupt had assigned absolutely to a firm of which he was a member policies on his life, payable to his executors, etc., and that the firm, after obtaining from the insurance company loans to the extent of the full surrender value of the policies, assigned them to one as security for the return of certain stocks and bonds loaned on a special account, and to secure other indebtedness. Within four months after the assignment, the firm and all members were adjudged bankrupts. Subsequently the assignee of the policies paid the premiums, and thereafter the insured bankrupt died, and the right to the proceeds of the policies was contested as between the trustee and assignee. It was held that the assignee was entitled to the proceeds, and that after deducting the amount paid by him for pre-as to prevent the trustees taking policies over which the bankrupt retained the right to transfer.

Policies of life insurance which have no cash surrender value, but have an actual value, pass to the trustee.

miums, he was bound to apply the balance first to the payment of the special account, and then, so far as the sum would go, to the payment of other claims. Dealing with the effect upon the operation of the proviso, of the fact that the insurance company had already loaned a sum equal to the surrender value, the court said: "It is the object of the statute to place in the hands of the trustee, for distribution among the creditors, every dollar which the bankrupt could collect. Therefore, if he has a policy on which money could be collected by surrendering it, he must turn over such policy to the trustee, who may thereupon surrender and collect. Having done this, there can be, of course, no possible objection to the bankrupt effecting new insurance on his own life, if some friend or relative chooses to assist him to pay the premiums. But his doing so would involve one element of hardship. The old policy may have been taken out many years before, when the assured was a young man and the annual premium low; for the new policy a much higher premium may have to be paid. Indeed his condition of health might be such that he could not pass the examination and secure a new policy at all, and thus be unable to secure something for his family in the event of his death. It seems quite apparent from the language of the proviso that Congress was not solicitous to subject the unfortunate bankrupt to any such unnecessary hardship, and so has provided that if there is paid or secured to the trustee, for the creditors, all that the bankrupt could obtain by surrendering the old policy, he may hold and carry such policy. The policies in this case are of the kind referred to as having a cash surrender value; that value at the date when trustees qualified was somewhat less than $15,000. Had the insurance company not made a loan to the bankrupts and secured itself by an assignment of the policies, the bankrupt or the trustees could have collected that amount upon surrendering them. But 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the company did make a loan of $15,370 on the security of the policies, and the propriety of that loan and the validity of the company's lien on the policies are not questioned. Therefore, on the day the title vested in the trustees, the cash which the company had agreed to pay on surrender would, if surrender were claimed, have been entirely absorbed in releasing the lien of the company, whether the privilege of surrender were exercised by the bankrupt or by the trustees. There was therefore nothing to pay or secure to the trustees to take the place of the money the bankrupt might obtain by surrendering, because he could not obtain anything himself by such surrender, although the policy had a cash surrender value. To hold upon such a state of facts that the policies passed to the trustee as assets, unless the individual insured bankrupt or the bankrupt firm or somebody paid the trustees $15,000 in addition to the $15,000 which the insurance company would take in satisfaction of the lien, would, in our opinion, be a clear violation of the intent of Congress as expressed in the section quoted supra."

In Re Davison, 179 Fed. 750, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 460, after determining that a bank to whom one, more than four months before his bankruptcy, had assigned policies having no cash surrender value, as security for debts due the bank, was entitled to have their present value determined, where the bank and the trustee could not agree upon a valuation, and was authorized to convert the policies into money, credit the same upon the debts, and thereafter come in for dividends upon the unpaid balance, the court went on to determine whether the trustee could, after that, require the bank to surrender the policies to him. In arriving at a negative answer the court said: "The contention seems to be that having procured the present value of the securities to be determined, and having received that value to apply on the debt, and having also taken a dividend, pro rata, with the others, on the balance of the debt, the interest of the bank in such securities had ceased, and the equity, if any, belongs to the estate. But the bank has the policies as securities for the entire debt, and must pay therefor their present value by crediting the amount on the debt before having a dividend on the balance. §§ 57a, 57e, 57h. The law does not provide that, on crediting the value of the security on the debt and being allowed a dividend on the balance, the secured creditor is to surrender the security, even if tendered the value thereof as fixed by the court. The secured creditor has the right to retain the policies as security for any balance and any premiums it may pay to keep them alive. . . . The policies belong to the bank as security until the debt is paid, but for purposes of a dividend as well as ultimate payment it is compelled to credit now the value of such security. It does not follow that the policies and all sums received thereon at maturity will become or now become the property of the bank absolutely, for the ownership is a qualified one, I think, but the bank cannot be deprived of them until the notes are fully paid. . . . These policies were assigned to the bank in good faith more than four months before the bankruptcy, and the rights of the bank therein and thereto are in no way affected by the bankruptcy, except that it is compelled, if it elects to prove its claim, to credit the present value, as fixed in the mode provided by the act, on the debt, and I do not think this operates as an absolute sale and transfer to the bank. It is useless to speculate as to what the rights of the parties might have been or would be had the trustee or creditors offered to purchase the policies at a greater sum than the court or referee fixed as their value. Probably such offer or offers would have determined that their value was at least that sum, but, even then, the bank was not under obligation to let the policies go, except to some one willing to pay more than 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Carland, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding to review in matter of law an order of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, made January 25, 1909, reversing an order of the referee in bankruptcy made May 27, 1908. The facts upon which the questions of law arise are as follows: On January 28, 1908, Derr Brothers, a partnership composed of Jacob W. Derr and Charles C. Derr, were adjudged bankrupts, individually and as a firm. The petitioner, Celsus Orear, was duly appointed trustee of the estate. At the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy and the adjudication thereon, Jacob W. Derr had eight policies of life insurance upon his life for $2,500 each, issued by the Northwestern Mutual Life it would. Here, so far as appears, the trustee did not offer to purchase the policies or tender the amount fixed as their value, and demand their surrender. Clearly the bank cannot be compelled to part with its securities for a debt, there being no preference, until its debt is paid in full, except in case the securities are sold or converted into cash, and in such case it is entitled to the proceeds of the sale or conversion to apply on the debt. The bank cannot be compelled to part with or surrender its security for the reason it receives a dividend, or as a condition of receiving a dividend, after crediting the present value of the security as determined by arbitration or by litigation, as the court directs. It is, of course, true that the trustee became the owner of all these policies subject to the rights of the bank. He took them in the same plight and condition and subject to the same equities as the insured held them, and that condition was that the bank had the right to hold them as security for the entire debt, keep them alive by paying the premiums, and collect and apply the proceeds at maturity on such debt, or to dispose of them under the laws relating to pledges. The trustee had the right to redeem these policies on paying the debt due the bank, for the benefit of the estate. But I find no evidence of any offer to do this."

It was held in Smith v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 514, that where in 1901 one contracted with an insurance company for the payment to him of a life annuity to commence in 1916, in consideration of a certain premium paid at the time of the contract, and in fraud of creditors, the contract was wholly executory, and that the trustee in bankruptcy of such person could, five years after such premium was paid, elect to sue for the same for the benefit of creditors, and was not bound to trace the premium to the present possession of the insurance company in the suit against it to avoid the contract.

L. A. W.

Insurance Company, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Four of said policies were issued January 27, 1906. Prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy Derr had paid the annual premiums on each of the last-mentioned policies for two and one-half years. The next annual premium on each of said policies became due July 27, 1908. The remaining four policies were executed and delivered by the insurance company to Derr May 5, 1906. Prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy Derr had paid on these last-mentioned policies the annual premium for two years, and the third annual premium became due on June 5, 1908. All the policies were limited payment life policies. They each provided that after payment of premium thereon for three years or more, and upon a full and valid surrender of the policy, the insurance company would pay cash surrender values of specified amounts. On June 5, 1908, the third annual premium on four policies, amounting to $198.50 on each policy, became due, and these policies provided for a cash surrender value of $385 on each policy. By the terms of the four other policies the third annual premium, amounting to $193.85 on each policy, became due July 27, 1908, and these last-mentioned policies provided for a cash surrender value of $377 on each policy. These surrender values were payable to Derr, the insured, irrespective of the beneficiary named in the policy. The aggregate amount required to pay the third annual premium on the eight policies was $1,569.40. The aggregate amount of cash surrender values after the third premiums were paid was $3,048. The foregoing facts appearing to the referee by the petition of the trustee, the following order was made by the referee:

"That said bankrupt, Jacob W. Derr, forthwith execute and deliver to the trustee of this estate a good and sufficient written assignment conveying, assigning, and transferring to said trustee all his right, title, and interest in and to, and all rights, benefits, privileges, and advantages accruing to him under, eight certain policies of life insurance issued by the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company upon the life of said bankrupt, for the sum of $2,500 each, being policies numbered 656,496, 656,497, 656,498, 656,499, and 660,328, 660,329, 660,330, 660,331; and it is further ordered that said trustee pay or tender to the said the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, the annual premiums next accruing on said policies respectively, at and upon the dates when said premiums shall become due and payable upon said policies respectively; and it is further ordered that if, within thirty days after the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) date of the payment of said premiums upon said policies respectively, said bankrupt, Jacob W. Derr, or any beneficiary named in any of said policies, shall pay or cause to be paid to the trustee of this estate the sum of money which under the terms of such policy can be realized by said trustee upon a surrender of such policy, then said trustee shall reassign and release such policy, or any policies in respect of which payments are so made, to said bankrupt, and deliver the same to him fully discharged from any and all claims of said trustee; and it is further ordered that in the event said bankrupt or said beneficiaries shall fail or neglect to avail themselves of the right to secure a reassignment of said policies, or any of them, in the manner hereinbefore specified, then said trustee shall thereupon surrender such policy, or policies to the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, and collect from said company the cash surrender value thereof, as provided in said policies respectively."

The above order on petition of the bankrupt, Jacob W. Derr, was certified by the referee to the district court for review. The district court set aside said order, and its action in so doing is now before us for review. It is conceded that at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, January 7, 1908, the insurance policies, neither by their terms nor by any concession or practice of the insurance company, had any cash surrender value. The question of law arising upon the record is this: Did the insurance policies pass to the trustee by the adjudication in bankruptcy? If they did, then the trustee held the contracts in the same manner as a receiver, and if the referee, representing the United States district court, should be of the opinion that it would be for the best interests of the bankrupt estate that the contracts be performed in whole or in part he could very properly authorize the trustee to do so. It is to be presumed that if any question should arise in regard to the payment of individual and firm creditors the assets of the bankrupt estate would be marshaled as provided by law.

Section 70 of the bankruptcy act provides that "the trustee of the estate of a bankrupt upon his appointment and qualification . . . shall in turn be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, except is so far as it is to property which is exempt, to all (1) documents relating to his property; . . . (3) powers which he might have exercised for his own benefit, but not those which he might have exercised for some other person. . . . (5) property which prior to the filing of the petition he could by any means have transferred or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him: Provided, that when any bankrupt shall have any insurance policy which has a cash surrender value payable to himself, his estate, or personal representatives, he may, within thirty days after the cash surrender value has been ascertained and stated to the trustee by the company issuing the same, pay or secure to the trustee the sum so ascertained and stated, and continue to hold, own, and carry such policy free from the claims of the creditors participating in the distribution of his estate under the bankruptcy proceedings, otherwise the policy shall pass to the trustee as assets." Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3451.

We think the district court fell into error in holding that the policies of insurance did not pass to the trustee. Its judgment that they did not pass was based upon the erroneous proposition that the proviso in § 70, above quoted, defined and limited what insurance policies should pass. Whereas, the true construction to be given to said proviso requires us to hold that it simply excepts from the property of the bankrupt, which would otherwise pass to the trustee under the other provisions of § 70, policies of insurance which have a cash surrender value, either by the terms of the policy or by the concession of the insurance company. This construction was placed upon the proviso in the following cases: Re Slingluff, 69 C. C. A. 496, 106 Fed. 154; Re Welling, 51 C. C. A. 151, 113 Fed. 189; Re Coleman, 136 Fed. 818; Re Mertens (D. C.) 131 Fed. 972. The Supreme Court of the United States in Hiscock v. Mertens, 205 U. S. 202, 51 L. ed. 771, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488, decided nothing contrary to the position here taken. The Supreme Court in the case mentioned decided that in order that the bankrupt should have the benefit of the proviso in § 70, it was not necessary that the insurance policy should in terms provide for a cash surrender value, but that it was sufficient to bring the policy within the proviso if, by the concession or practice of the company issuing the same, it had a cash surrender value. Neither is there anything in Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 49 L. ed. 1018, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656, which in any way conflicts with our views. In that case the Supreme Court held that the proviso in § 70 did not in any way modify or control § 6 of the same act, relating to exemptions. Subdivision 5 of § 70 specifies as property the title to which will vest in the trustee: "Property which prior to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the filing of the petition he [bankrupt] could by any means have transferred or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him." Subdivision 25, § 1, of the bankruptcy act, provides that the word "transfer" "shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift, or security." All of the policies of insurance in controversy contained the following provision: "The insured may nominate a beneficiary or beneficiaries hereunder, and may also change any beneficiary or beneficiaries nominated by him or named in the policy."

Under this provision the insured was unequivocally given the right and power to change the beneficiary in each policy without the concurrence of the beneficiary named in the policy, and even against the will of such beneficiary. Not only so, but this power was one which he could exercise for his own benefit. To illustrate: He could have borrowed money and have changed the beneficiary so that the lender would have held the policy as security for the repayment of his money. He also could have exercised this power so as to have secured indulgence from an existing creditor. He further could have exercised this power so as to have made the policy payable to his own estate. He still further could have exercised this power by naming as the beneficiary some trustee for all his creditors. See Atlantic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Gannon, 179 Mass. 291, 60 N. E. 933.

Of the case of Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 32 L. ed. 370, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41, it is enough to say that the policies there in question did not empower the insured to change the beneficiary, but contained provisions to the contrary, as is shown by the statement preceding the opinion. Neither did the policy in Gordon v. Ware Nat. Bank, hereinafter cited, so empower the insured.

In the case of Gordon v. Ware Nat. Bank, 67 L.R.A. 550, 65 C. C. A. 580, 132 Fed. 444, this court, in an opinion, where all the cases are cited, held that the owner of a policy of insurance may lawfully and in good faith assign the same to a creditor who has no insurable interest in the assignor to secure the payment of a debt, and that on default of payment the creditor may foreclose the pledge and sell the policy at judicial sale. It necessarily results from this state of the law that Jacob W. Derr, prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, could have transferred to one or more of his creditors the insurance policies in question to secure the payment of his debts. This being so, the policies were property which, under § 70, subd. 5, above mentioned, passed to the trustee upon the adjudication of Derr as a bankrupt. Whether or not policy No. 656,496, which is expressed therein to be for the benefit of the wife of the insured, is to be regarded as exempt under § 7895, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899 (Anno. Stat. 1906, p. 3749), and whether or not anything has occurred to avoid an exemption of the policy under that statute, are questions which were not in any manner presented before the referee or the district court, and have not been presented in this court; so we leave them undecided. The United States district court for the eastern division of the eastern district of Missouri is therefore directed to vacate its judgment of December 19, 1908, reversing the order of the referee made May 27, 1908, and enter a judgment affirming the same, but without prejudice to the right, if any, of the wife of the bankrupt to claim the policy expressed to be for her benefit, as an exemption under the state statute before mentioned.

Pollock, District Judge, dissenting:

By the foregoing opinion of my associates it is determined each and all of the eight policies of insurance involved herein, which are ten payment life contracts, under the provisions of § 70a of the bankruptcy act, by operation of law, as of the date of the adjudication (January 28, 1908), passed to the trustee in bankruptcy, with like effect as though governed by the terms of the proviso found in the section, and this notwithstanding the admitted fact that neither of said policies at the date of the adjudication had either by virtue of the terms of the contracts themselves, or by reason of a custom of the company issuing them, any surrender value whatever. And the same principles of the law are applied to each and all of the several different contracts, notwithstanding the further fact that in one the wife of the insured is named as beneficiary, and in each of three others a sister of the insured is so named, and in the four remaining no beneficiary is named, but by the terms of the contracts the power is reserved to the assured to appoint or change beneficiaries thereof at will. And this ruling is made in the absence of the beneficiaries, wife and sisters of the insured, from the record, on application of the trustee to the court for instructions as to his duties in reference thereto.

With this determination I do not agree. The statement of a few general principles admitted by all may serve to elucidate my reasons therefor.

It is common knowledge that the rights of all parties in interest in the state of a 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bankrupt become fixed, and are determined by the status of such parties at the date of the adjudication. Whatever the bankrupt may thereafter earn, or whatever property rights he may thereafter acquire, do not pass to the trustee, but remain with him. Whatever debts he may thereafter contract may not be liquidated from assets of his estate in the hands of his trustee. The purpose of § 70a of the bankruptcy act is to define what property or rights of property possessed by a bankrupt at the date of the adjudication by operation of law pass to the trustee for the benefit of creditors. By the true construction of this section and its proviso, all property, by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt resided and the proceedings are instituted, exempt from subjection to the claims of the creditors, is exempt from the operations, of the bankruptcy act. Policies of insurance held by the bankrupt having a cash surrender value payable to himself, his estate, or his representatives, but not by the laws of the state exempt, pass to the trustee, unless, within thirty days after the cash surrender value is ascertained by the company issuing them and stated to the trustee, there be paid or secured to him for the estate in his hands the cash surrender value found and stated by the company. Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 49 L. ed. 1018, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656; Hiscock v. Mertens, 205 U. S. 202, 51 L. ed. 771, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 488; Steele v. Buel, 44 C. C. A. 287, 104 Fed. 972.

As it stands admitted the policies of insurance in dispute did not at the date of the adjudication have any surrender value whatever, it is quite too clear for argument they did not fall within the terms of the proviso found in the section. Therefore, in the light of the principles above stated, of necessity, the policies must be found to have been either such property or property rights of the bankrupt, at the date of the adjudication, as, by operation of law, passed absolutely to and vested in the trustee of the bankrupt estate for the benefit of creditors, or to have been, by virtue of the laws of the state of Missouri, or from their very nature, such contract rights as did not vest in the trustee, but remain outside the operation of the act, to be carried out and performed for the benefit of the beneficiaries according to their terms.

To my mind, the middle ground taken by the referee, and approved in the foregoing opinion, is wholly untenable, for it determines rights of the parties in policies of insurance having no surrender value whatever, and for this reason not touched by the terms of the proviso, to be within its application.

In so far as the exemption laws of the state of Missouri, where the bankrupt and his beneficiaries in the policies resided prior to the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings, and where the bankruptcy proceeding was instituted, are concerned, § 7895, Rev. Stat. 1899, of the state, in force at the time of the adjudication, provides, as follows: "Any policy of insurance heretofore or hereafter made by any insurance company on the life of any person, expressed to be for the benefit of the wife of the insured, shall inure to her separate benefit, independently of the creditors, executors, and the administrators of the husband: Provided, however, that in the event of the death or divorce of the wife before the decease of the husband, he shall have the right to designate another beneficiary, upon written notice to the company, but such notice shall not be effected unless indorsed upon the policy by the president or vice president and secretary of the company issuing the policy. But when the premiums paid in any year out of the funds or property of the husband shall exceed the sum of five hundred dollars, such exemptions from such claims shall not apply to so much of said premiums so paid as shall be in excess of five hundred dollars, but such excess shall inure to the benefit of his creditors."

As the beneficiary in policy No. 656,496 is the wife of the insured, and as the annual premium paid on this policy is only $193.85, while such contention is not made on the briefs and in the argument of solicitors for the bankrupt, yet I am at a loss to understand on what ground, in the light of the foregoing authorities, the trustee may claim or take any interest whatever in this policy, and shall therefore leave it out of any further discussion.

As to the remaining policies I find no law of the state by the terms of which they may be claimed as exempt. The question, therefore, is, Are they such property of the bankrupt as by the adjudication passed to the trustee under the provisions of § 70a of the act, and may it be so determined on this application of the trustee in the absence from the record of the sisters of the bankrupt, beneficiaries in policies Nos. 656,497 to 656,499, inclusive? There can be no question but that the sisters of the bankrupt have an insurable interest in his life. Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115, 7 Am. Dec. 38. Therefore, in so far as the policies in which the sisters are named as beneficiaries are concerned, the question presented is, Do such contracts, having no surrender value at the date of the adjudication, represent accumulated property rights of the bankrupt, which, by operation of law, passed to the trustee, freed from any claim thereto by the beneficiaries, or do they represent money expended by the bankrupt to indemnify his sister beneficiaries against loss which may be by them sustained shall they outlive the bankrupt, on the happening of the contingency of his death? The foregoing opinion proceeds on the theory the policies in dispute at the date of the adjudication represent property rights of the bankrupt accumulated by his payment of annual premiums, which, by operation of law, passed to the trustee, because, as held, the bankrupt, prior to the filing of the petition of bankruptcy, might have "transferred" them, as that word is employed in the bankruptcy act, and the case of Gordon v. Ware Nat. Bank, 67 L.R.A. 550, 65 C. C. A. 580, 132 Fed. 444, is cited in support of this holding. An examination of that case, however, will disclose the question here presented was not involved therein nor determined thereby. In that case the policy of which the proceeds was in dispute was written on the life of Gordon for the benefit of his wife, if she should survive him, if not, for the benefit of their children. After the premiums required by the terms of the policy to be paid had been paid, both the assured and his wife, as beneficiary, executed an assignment of the policy by way of pledge to the German Bank to secure a debt of the insured. The bank brought suit against the insured and his wife to procure a decree foreclosing the pledge and for sale of the property in satisfaction of the debt due the bank, and secured such decree, under which the policy was sold and delivered. The insured died before his wife. The contest in that case, arising over the proceeds of the policy, was between the administrator of the estate of the wife and an assignee of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. The question determined was as to the right of such assignee, having no insurable interest in the life of Gordon, to receive the proceeds. Here the sisters as beneficiaries under the policies have executed no transfer of their rights. They have been neither consulted nor brought into this litigation. At the date of the adjudication the insurance company issuing the policies had in its possession no money or property of the bankrupt which, either according to the terms of the contract, or from its customary manner of transacting business with its policy holders, would be returned to anyone. It had the absolute right at that date to retain every dollar theretofore paid it by the bankrupt as its own property. True, the amounts theretofore paid by the bankrupt as premiums represent more than an amount sufficient to indemnify the beneficiaries from loss of their insurable interest during the time the policies had remained in force, and this for two reasons: (1) The policies are ten payment contracts instead of natural life; (2) because the risk insured against increased as the age of the insured increased. Hence, the company having collected more than the amount required to protect it against the risk assumed while the policies had been in force, after payment of the third annual premium, contracted to return to the insured on the surrender of the policies and all claims thereunder, which included the rights of the beneficiary, a portion of the amount theretofore paid by the bankrupt, and thus relieve itself of further risk of liability, but this agreement was, as said in Hiscock v. Mertens, supra, "the result of the age of the policy, and cannot be a test of other policies or of the construction of the law." It is this contract right of the bankrupt with the insurance company made for the benefit and protection of his sisters, on which, at the date of the adjudication, the insurance company would not and could not be compelled to pay any amount whatever to any person to which on the happening of the contingency that the insured should live until the date of the third annual payment of premium. and it should be then paid, which is held to constitute an asset of the estate, and by operation of law to have passed to the trustee as against not only the bankrupt, but the beneficiaries in the policies. If this ruling be found the correct one, in reason, it must arise either from the absolute right of the insured by his own act, and without the consent of his beneficiaries, to assign and transfer his property rights in the policies held at the date of the adjudication, or from the exercise of some power reserved by the bankrupt in accordance with the terms of the contracts, which passed to and vested in the trustee, to be exercised by him under the provisions of § 70a of the bankruptcy act. By reference to the contracts it will be found no power of assignment or transfer is reserved to the bankrupt. The form and manner of assignments or transfers of the policies is left to the parties in interest, to be exercised under the general principles of the law. On this subject the contracts provide, as follows: "Assignments. If this policy be assigned a duplicate of the assignment shall, within thirty days, be given to the company and satisfactory proof of assignee's interest be produced on making claim. The company in receiving or filing any assignment will not assume any responsibility for the validity thereof."

As no such power of assignment was re-

served in the contracts themselves, resort must be had to the principles of the law to ascertain whether the insured might by his own act, without the consent of the beneficiaries, assign or transfer the policies. In Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 32 L. ed. 370, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41, which was a contest between the beneficiaries in certain policies of insurance and the creditors of the insured, who while insolvent had paid the premiums thereon, Mr. Justice Fuller, delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said: "Marine and fire insurance is considered as strictly an indemnity; but while this is not so as to life insurance, which is simply a contract, so far as the company is concerned, to pay a certain sum of money upon the occurrence of an event which is sure at some time to happen, in consideration of the payment of the premiums as stipulated, nevertheless the contract is also a contract of indemnity. . . . We think it cannot be doubted that in the instance of contracts of insurance with a wife or children, or both, upon their insurable interest in the life of the husband or father, the latter, while they are living, can exercise no power of disposition over the same without their consent, nor has he any interest therein on which he can avail himself, nor upon his death have his personal representatives or his creditors any interest in the proceeds of such contracts which belong to the beneficiaries to whom they are payable. It is indeed the general rule that a policy, and the money to become due under it, belong, the moment it is issued, to the persons or persons named in it as the beneficiary or beneficiaries, and that there is no power in the person procuring the insurance by any act of his, by deed or by will, to transfer to any other person the interest of the person named. Bliss, Life Ins. 2d ed. p. 517; Glanz v. Gloeckler, 10 Ill. App. 484, per McAllister, J.; S. C. 104 Ill. 573, 44 Am. Rep. 94; Wilburn v. Wilburn, 83 Ind. 55; Ricker v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289, 6 N. W. 771; Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Brant, 47 Mo. 419, 4 Am. Rep. 328; Gould v. Emerson, 99 Mass. 154, 96 Am. Dec. 720; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Weitz, 99 Mass. 157. . . . Conceding, then, in the case in hand, that Hume paid the premiums out of his own money, when insolvent, yet, as Mrs. Hume and the children survived him, and the contracts covered their insurable interest, it is difficult to see upon what ground the creditors, or the administrators as representing them, can take away from these dependent ones that which was expressly secured to them in the event of the death of their natural supporter. The interest insured was neither the debtor's nor his creditors'. The contracts were not payable to debtor or his representatives or his creditors. No fraud on the part of the wife or the children or the insurance company is pretended. In no sense was there any gift or transfer of the debtor's property, unless the amounts paid as premiums are to be held to constitute such gift or transfer. This seems to have been the view of the court below; for the decree awarded to the complainants the premiums paid to the Virginia company from 1874 to 1881, inclusive, and to the other companies from the date of the respective policies, amounting, with interest to January 4, 1883, to the sum of $2,696.10, which sum was directed to be paid to Hume's administrators out of the money which had been paid into court by the Maryland and Connecticut mutual companies. But, even though Hume paid this money out of his own funds when insolvent, and if such payment were within the statute of Elizabeth, this would not give the creditors any interest in the proceeds of the policies, which belonged to the beneficiaries for the reasons already stated. Were the creditors, then, entitled to recover the premiums? These premiums were paid by Hume to the insurance companies, and to recover from them would require proof that the latter participated in the alleged fraudulent intent, which is not claimed. Cases might be imagined of the payment of large premiums, out of all reasonable proportion to the known or reputed financial condition of the person paying, and under circumstances of grave suspicion, which might justify the inference of fraud on creditors in the withdrawal of such an amount from the debtor's resources; but no element of that sort exists here. The premiums form no part of the proceeds of the policies, and cannot be deducted therefrom on that ground. Mrs. Hume is not shown to have known of or suspected her husband's insolvency, and if the payments were made at her instance, or with her knowledge and assent, or if, without her knowledge, she afterwards ratified the act, and claimed the benefit, as she might rightfully do (Thompson v. American Tontine Life & Sav. Ins. Co. 46 N. Y. 674), and as she does (and the same remarks apply to the children), then has she thereby received money which ex æquo et bono she ought to return to her husband's creditors, and can the decree against her be sustained on that ground?"

In that case it was held, notwithstanding the admitted fact that the premiums paid in keeping in force the contracts of insurance were paid by Hume out of his property while insolvent, yet the proceeds of the policies passed to the beneficiaries, and were not recoverable by the creditors. This case would seem to be conclusive of the right of the bankrupt to have transferred the policies in dispute by his own act without the consent of his beneficiaries, unless such power is reserved to him by the terms of the contracts themselves, the exercise of which power passed to the trustee under the terms of the bankruptcy act. By reference to the contracts found in the record it will be seen the only power reserved by the bankrupt which he might exercise at will was the power of nominating and changing the beneficiaries in the policies. Did such a power reserved by the bankrupt, under the provisions of the bankruptcy act, at the date of the adjudication pass to the trustee, to be by him exercised at will? If so, it is clear he might, as against the beneficiaries and the insurance companies issuing the policies, substitute a representative of the creditors, and thus continue the payment of the annual premiums if permitted by the court, until the death of the insured, or until such time as the policies would have a cash surrender value, then surrender the policies and receive such cash surrender value. Section 70a of the bankruptcy act provides, in substance: "The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt upon his appointment and qualification . . . shall in turn be vested by operation of law . . . as of the date he [the bankrupt] was adjudged a bankrupt . . . (3) powers which he [the bankrupt] might have exercised for his own benefit, but not those which he might have exercised for some other person." [30 Stat. at L. 565, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3451.]

Is the power reserved by the bankrupt in these contracts of insurance, of nominating and changing his beneficiaries, such a power as he might have exercised for his own benefit, but not such as he might have exercised for the benefit of some other person? The policies in dispute are not endowment policies. They are life policies. Therefore, are payable only after the death of the insured. How, therefore, in the very nature of things, could the bankrupt exercise this reserve power for his own benefit, or by its exercise vest himself with an estate in the proceeds payable after his death? However this may be, it is quite clear the bankrupt could have exercised the power reserved, for the benefit of anyone having an insurable interest in his life, and as he could exercise the power for the benefit of another having an insurable interest in his life, under the very terms of the act in question, it is clear such power did not by operation of law, as of the date of the adjudication, pass to the trustee to be by him exercised. As bearing on this question see 1 Sugden, Powers, 3d Am. ed. pp. 225, 226; Re Rose [1904] 2 Ch. 348; Simpson v. Bathurst, L. R. 5 Ch. 202.

It follows, I think, the policies in dispute in which the sisters are named as beneficiaries, and which at the date of the adjudication had no cash surrender value whatever, do not represent such accumulated property interests of the bankrupt as he might, prior to the filing of his petition in bankruptcy, by his own act, without the consent of the beneficiaries, by any means, have transferred, or such as might have been seized on process issued out of judicial proceedings brought against him. On the contrary, I am of the opinion all beneficial interest in such policies at the date of the adjudication resided in the sister beneficiaries, and would there continue to reside, until, in accordance with the terms of the contracts, the assured had exercised the power reserved to himself of changing his beneficiaries, or until the contracts, being by the payments of annual premiums kept in force, and having attained such age as to possess a cash surrender value, they should, with the consent of the beneficiaries, be surrendered by the assured in exchange for such cash surrender value. For, it must be thought, the Congress in limiting the character of insurance policies, not by the laws of the state exempt, which pass to the trustee by virtue of the proviso contained in § 70a of the act, not alone to such policies as at the date of the adjudication have a cash surrender value, but to such only as possess a cash surrender value payable to the insured bankrupt, his estate, or his personal representatives, made such limitation in recognition of the settled principles of the law that as to those policies not having such cash surrender value, purchased and carried by the insured as indemnity to those having an insurable interest in the life of the assured bankrupt named as beneficiaries in the policies,—such persons, and not the insured bankrupt, are the parties beneficially interested therein.

The view expressed by the majority of the court, of necessity, must result in passing all contracts of insurance (not exempt by the laws of the state) to the trustee in bankruptcy as of the date of the adjudication, notwithstanding the fact they may possess not a dollar of value to the estate, and the unhappy bankrupt may by operation of natural laws have come into that state of health which absolutely precludes the possibility of his procuring further protection for those dependent upon him.

A view of the provisions of the bankruptcy act so futile of good, yet so fraught with disastrous results to an honest debtor and his innocent dependents, has not heretofore been taken by the courts of this country. As said by Mr. Justice White in delivering the opinion of the court in Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 49 L. ed. 1018, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 656: "As § 70a deals only with property which, not being exempt, passes to the trustee, the mission of the proviso was, in the interest of the perpetuation of policies of life insurance, to provide a rule by which, where such policies passed to the trustee because they were not exempt, if they had a surrender value, their future operation could be preserved by vesting the bankrupt with the privilege of paying such surrender value, whereby the policy would be withdrawn out of the category of an asset of the estate; that is to say, the purpose of the proviso was to confer a benefit upon the insured bankrupt by limiting the character of the interest in a non-exempt life insurance policy which should pass to the trustee, and not to cause such a policy when exempt to become an asset of the estate. When the purpose of the proviso is thus ascertained, it becomes apparent that to maintain the construction which the argument seeks to affix to the proviso would cause it to produce a result diametrically opposed to its spirit and to the purpose it was intended to subvert."

I am therefore of the opinion the policies under consideration, payable to the sisters of the bankrupt as beneficiaries, did not, by operation of law, pass to the trustee as assets of the estate in bankruptcy, but remained the property of the beneficiaries therein named. That the power reserved by the bankrupt of nominating and changing beneficiaries in the policies was not such a power as might have been exercised for his own benefit, but might have been exercised for the benefit of another, therefore the exercise of such power did not, under the terms of the act as of the date of the adjudication, pass to the trustee for the benefit of the estate in his hands.

In so far as the four remaining policies, Nos. 660,328 to 660,331, are concerned, in which the bankrupt had not at the date of the adjudication exercised the power reserved of appointing a beneficiary, and as the sums of money expended by the bankrupt in making payment of annual premiums were not expended for the purpose of procuring indemnity to anyone having an insurable interest in his life, and as the interests of no third person have attached, I see no reason why any amount which may be obtained therefrom may not be made available to the estate in bankruptcy from payment by the trustee of the third annual premium thereon out of the estate in his hands, if such be the better policy, and the interests of the estate will be conserved thereby.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

PEARL C. MESSERVY, by Guardian ad Litem, Resp't.,
v.

JOHN R. MESSERVY, Appt.

(85 S. C. 189, 67 S. E. 130.)

Divorce — alimony — compelling payment.

The court cannot compel a husband who has no trade or profession or employment, to learn a trade, acquire a profession, or find employment, and, by exercise thereof, derive an income, to comply with the court's order to pay alimony to his wife, in a suit for her separate maintenance.

(March 10, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County committing him for contempt for failure to pay alimony and suit money according to an order rendered in a suit for divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. A. Holman for appellant.

Messrs. Logan & Grace for respondent.

Hydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court committing the appellant to jail for contempt for failing to pay to the plaintiff alimony and suit money, according to a previous order, which was affirmed by this court. 80 S. C. 277, 61 S. E. 442.

The testimony shows that appellant is a young man of limited education, who has no trade, profession, or employment, and no property or income. It does not appear that he has, or ever had, any steady employment, or that he has ever engaged in any business. On the contrary, it does appear that he has always been supported by his father, who is a man of means. In his sworn return to the rule to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt, appellant asserts his inability to comply with the order of the court, and says that he tried to get work, but failed; and that, if he could obtain employment, on account of his lack of skill and training, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) he could not earn more than enough to support himself. The circuit court found as facts "that he has no property from which he can derive an income, and that he is without any income, except such as his father sees fit to allow him," and, further, "that his father will not voluntarily allow him anything for plaintiff, and that, were he disposed to share with plaintiff any allowance he might receive from his father, he would have to do so without his father's knowledge, or else such allowance would be discontinued." The circuit court held, however, that he had not made an honest effort to get such work as he was capable of doing, and therefore adjudged him in contempt.

There is no doubt of the obligation, legal and moral, of the appellant to support his Note. — Inability to pay alimony as defense to contempt.

The general subject of contempt proceedings to compel payment of alimony is discussed at length in the note to Staples v. Staples, 24 L.R.A. 433, where the earlier cases upon inability to pay as a defense are considered. For a consideration of the constitutionality of imprisonment for failure to pay alimony, see the notes to Carr v. State, 34 L.R.A. 634, and Ex parte Davis, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1140. As to husband's prospects as a basis for alimony, see the note to Muir v. Muir, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 909.

It is a general rule that where an attachment is sought against one who is unable to pay the ordered alimony, he will not be committed if it appears that he is unable to comply with the court's order, and did not voluntarily create the disability for the purpose of avoiding such payment.

It is no contempt not to pay what one is, without fault, unable to pay. Kadlow sky v. Kadlowsky, 63 Ill. App. 292. See also to similar effect Kahlbon v. People, 101 Ill. App. 567.

"It is neither a crime nor offense to refuse to comply with an order of court when it is not in the power of the party to do so." Re Cowden, 139 Cal. 244, 73 Pac. 156.

In Schuele v. Schuele, 57 Ill. App. 189, the court, in reversing an order committing the defendant to jail for not paying alimony, said: "It is not a contempt of court to fail to pay money which one neither has nor can obtain, and which he has not causelessly either put out of his hands or failed to receive."

In Pancost v. State, 15 Ohio C. C. 246, the court reversed an order committing the appellant to prison for contempt in failing to pay certain moneys for the care of his children, directed to be paid to his wife in a decree of divorce, on the ground that the amount was excessive considering the appellant's means, and that the act directed wife. This court has held that a judgment may be given against a husband for alimony, when he has neither property nor income, but is able, by the use of his faculties, to provide maintenance for her. In such a case the wife is entitled to the judgment, even though it may be impossible for the court to enforce its payment. The court cannot deny a party the right to a judgment to which he is entitled, on the ground that the judgment debtor is insolvent or unable to pay the amount adjudged to be due, for the debtor may thereafter acquire property which could be subjected to the payment of the judgment. There is therefore no inconsistency in the court decreeing alimony in a case like this, even though it may find itself unable to enforce payment thereof. If a husband has property or an income, or if, by the exercise of his faculties, he does derive an income, the court may, in its discretion, to be exercised according to the facts of the case and the circumstances of the parties, order a part of such property or income, in excess of what is necessary for the support of the husband, devoted to the support of the wife, and obedience to such order may be enforced by attachment for contempt. The remedy, however, is a harsh one, and it should be applied with caution. But where it appears that the husband is able to comply with the order of the court; and wilfully refuses to do so, or has, in fraud of the rights of his wife and in violation of the order of the court, brought upon himself the inability to do so, he may be punished as for a contempt. But we do not think the court can compel a husband who has no trade or profession or employment, to learn a trade, acquire a profession, or find employment, and, by the exercise thereof, derive an income for the support of his wife. If it could do so to enforce payment of a judgment for alimony, why could it not do so to enforce payment of any other judgment? The moral obligation to pay a judgment for alimony may be greater than the obligation to pay any other, but there is no difference in the legal obligation. The court does not undertake to enforce purely moral obligations; nor can it undertake to make the thriftless thrifty.

The order of the Circuit Court is reversed, but without prejudice to plaintiff to apply for such further orders as may be proper to compel obedience to the orders of the court, if and when appellant is able to comply therewith.

Gary, A. J., and Woods, J., concur.
Jones, Ch. J., concurs in the result.

was not in his power, under the contempt statutes.

In Holcomb v. Holcomb, 53 Wash. 611, 102 Pac. 653, on an appeal from an order committing the defendant to jail for contempt of court in failing to pay alimony, the court, finding that the defendant was hopelessly insolvent, and that his only income was from his profession and fell far below his office and living expenses, reversed the order.

The principle is also recognized in Wester v. Martin, 115 Ga. 776, 42 S. E. 81; Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 125 Ga. 491, 54 S. E. 537; McSherry v. McSherry, 49 Ill. App. 90; Perry v. Pernet, 165 Ind. 67, 74 N. E. 609, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 533 (suggesting that the court has power to discharge from custody one unable to pay).

Some of the cases are disposed of by failing to find the fact of inability. Lane v. Lane, 27 App. D. C. 171; McSherry v. McSherry, supra; State ex rel. Ditmar v. Ditmar, 19 Wash. 324, 53 Pac. 350.

In general the burden of proof is upon the defaulting party to show his disability. Deen v. Bloomer, 191 Ill. 416, 61 N. E. 131, reversing 93 Ill. App. 479; Shaffner v. Shaffner, 212 Ill. 492, 72 N. E. 447; Zippe v. Zippe, 143 Ill. App. 638; Hurd v. Hurd, 63 Minn. 443, 65 N. W. 728; State ex rel. Smith v. Smith, 17 Wash. 430, 50 Pac. 52.

Thus, in State v. Cook, 66 Ohio St. 506, 58 L.R.A. 625, 64 N. E. 567, it was held that a complaint for attachment for contempt need not state the ability to pay, as that is presumably settled by the decree, and the burden is on the defaulting party to show his inability to pay.

And it has been held that the party in default may not show his inability in answer to an application to commit him, as his remedy is by an application to modify the order or decree for alimony. Young v. Young, 35 Misc. 335, 71 N. Y. Supp. 944; Cahzin v. Cahzin, 112 N. Y. Supp. 525; State ex rel. Nixon v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct. 14 Mont. 396, 40 Pac. 66; Nixon v. Nixon, 15 Mont. 6, 37 Pac. 839. See also, as stating the rule, Delanoy v. Delanoy, 19 App. Div. 295, 46 N. Y. Supp. 106; Compton v. Compton, 125 App. Div. 859, 110 N. Y. Supp. 775.

In Mowry v. Bliss, 28 R. I. 114, 65 Atl. 616, it was held that one imprisoned on an execution against his person for failing to pay temporary alimony could not be permitted to take the poor debtor's oath and so escape, as his only course was to pray for a modification of the decree.

In other cases it has been held that inability to pay alimony is a defense which may be set up in reply to an application to punish for contempt. Schuele v. Schuele and Holcomb v. Holcomb, supra.

And in some jurisdictions a finding of ability is a prerequisite to an imprisonment for nonpayment of alimony. Ex parte Silvia, 123 Cal. 293, 69 Am. St. Rep. 58, 55 Pac. 988; Re Cowden, 139 Cal. 244, 73

Pac. 156; Lutz v. District Ct. 29 Nev. 152, 86 Pac. 445. See also, as recognizing or assuming the rule, Allen v. Superior Ct. 133 Cal. 504, 65 Pac. 977; Ex parte Houtsen, 154 Cal. 540, 98 Pac. 391.

Work and earnings.

Where the inability proceeds from spending one's earnings or other money, the court have no difficulty in finding this to be a disobedience of its order.

Where the defendant made no effort to pay the alimony out of his earnings, and it appeared that at times they would have enabled him to pay something, the order committing him was affirmed. Deen v. Bloomer, supra.

Similarly, the order of commitment was affirmed where it appeared that the delinquent had expended his considerable salary upon the support of himself and his minor son, and in litigation to escape the payment of the separate maintenance of his wife and daughter under the court's decree. Barclay v. Barclay, 184 Ill. 471, 56 N. E. 821.

The fact that a divorced man would have had to exercise the closest economy to pay the alimony from his earnings will not relieve him where, two weeks after the divorce, he marries another woman and has her to support. Hoffman v. Hoffman, 28 Ohio C. C. 658.

Where a man's salary was $112.50 per month, it was held that a finding that he was not unable to pay $50 a month to his divorced wife was correct, in spite of the circumstance that it required $95 a month to support himself and his new wife. State ex rel. Brown v. Brown, 31 Wash. 397, 62 L.R.A. 974, 72 Pac. 86.

The rule sustained in MESSERVY v. MESSERVY, that the courts cannot compel a man to work to earn alimony, does not seem to be questioned anywhere, but its application seems to have been attended with difficulty in some of the earlier cases.

Thus, it is not easy to say just where the court meant to leave the matter in Lester v. Lester, 63 Ga. 357. In that case the deponent answered on a proceeding to commit him for not paying alimony, that the best wages he could get did not exceed $150 per year, and the court stated that the attachment would bring the actual resources of the deponent to a practical and decisive test, and said: "If a man, though having health, will not work for the support of his wife and minor children, a court cannot assume direct control of his will and muscle, and compel him to labor. To do this would be to reduce him to a sort of juridical slavery, and would contradict the spirit of our institutions. To be idle (taking the consequences) is one of the privileges of a freeman, unless he is convicted penally of some offense and put to work as a punishment. But, while a civil court cannot order an able-bodied man to go to work, it can, in a proper case for alimony, order him to contribute so much money at 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such times to the maintenance of his dependent family, and leave him to provide the money by the free and voluntary exercise of his faculties, mental and physical, or by any other means at his command. If it is not reasonably and fairly within his power to comply with the order, he may disobey it, and the court must and will excuse him. But it is not a sufficient excuse to say, 'I cannot raise the money unless I work for it,' nor, 'Although I can raise money by my labor, I cannot save that much over and above my expenses, unless I practise a more rigid economy than is agreeable to me.'"

And in Lansing v. Lansing, 41 How. Pr. 248, the court declined to discharge the defendant, who was in custody for contempt in failing to pay alimony, on the ground that there was no explanation why the defendant, who lived with his father, had not been able to earn $200 per year, which was the amount of alimony required, but gave him leave to renew his application.

The later cases are clear in support of the rule. In Ex parte Todd, 119 Cal. 57, 50 Pac. 1071, the court said, in reversing an order committing a defendant for failing to pay permanent alimony: "The court found, among other facts, that he had no money or other means of payment, and that he had made no disposition of any property in fraud of his creditors. The court found, in other words, that it was not in the power of the petitioner to pay the money, or any part of it. But, at the same time, the court found that petitioner, having been allowed a month or thereabouts to seek employment by which he might have earned money to make the weekly payments of alimony as prescribed in the order, had wholly failed and neglected to make any effort to obtain employment, and therefore ordered him to be imprisoned in the county jail until he paid the $200 due. This order was clearly in excess of the power of the court, which cannot compel a man to seek employment in order to earn money to pay alimony, and punish him for his failure so to do."

In Webb v. Webb, 140 Ala. 262, 103 Am. St. Rep. 30, 37 So. 96, the court, in affirming an order refusing an attachment against a husband for failure to pay temporary alimony in a suit brought by him against his wife for divorce, said: "The only remaining insistence is that he is able to work, and will not work, to earn the money to make the payment, and the court ought to commit him for default in this respect. It is difficult to understand how the desired result was thus to be accomplished, and how the court would go about it. If complainant would not labor, the court was without power to inflict corporeal punishment to compel him. If it imprisoned him till he was willing to work, that would not have produced money, meantime, but would have entailed expense for the imprisonment; and if imprisoned, and he should relent and come in and signify his willingness to labor, employment would have had to be obtained for him, by the court, by himself, or someone else; and how the court would have proceeded legally to hire him out, or supervise him if he hired himself, and collect the money for application to its decree, has not been made to appear."

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

JAMES R. WOODWARD, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 69 S. E. 385.)

Intoxicating liquors — Sunday closing act — constitutionality.

1. Sections 1 and 3 of chapter 14, Acts Ex. Sess. 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, §§ 933a1, 933a3), closing saloons on Sunday, are not unconstitutional as imposing punishment cruel or unusual or disproportionate to the offense, or depriving of property without due process.

Criminal law — crimes — creation — power of legislature.

2. The legislature has power to create and define crimes and fix their punishment, so only that such punishment is not cruel or unusual or disproportionate to the offense.

Intoxicating liquors — regulation of sales — closing place where sold.

3. The legislature has power to regulate and restrict the sale of intoxicating liquor, and to revoke license and close places where sold under it, upon conviction of offense against liquor law.

Headnotes by BRANNON, J.

Note. — Constitutionality of statute by which conviction of violation of liquor law entails revocation of license and prohibition of sale of liquor.

The scope of this note excludes a consideration of those statutes which provide that places where liquor is illegally sold shall be deemed public nuisances, and may be abated as such; and it also excludes statutes providing for special proceedings for the revocation of liquor licenses for violations of liquor laws by holders thereof.

For a general consideration of the police power of the state as to intoxicating liquors, see note to Tragesser v. Gray, 9 L.R.A. 780.

And as to cruel and unusual punishments in general, including punishment of liquor law offenses, see note to State ex rel. Garvey v. Whitaker, 35 L.R.A. 561.

The decisions seem to be almost unanimous that no constitutional provision is violated by statutes by which conviction of violation of liquor laws entails revocation of license and prohibition of the sale of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Randolph County to review a judgment convicting defendant of keeping open a saloon on Sunday in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell, for plaintiff in error:

The statute is unconstitutional in that punishment forfeiting the license and closing the place of business for a violation is so severe and so out of all proportion to the offense as to shock public sentiment and violate the judgment of reasonable people.

Robinson v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549, 37 N. W. 21; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 437; 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 963.

Mr. William G. Conley, Attorney General, for the State:

The power to make laws regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors is within the police powers of the state.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 720; United States v. Nelson, 29 Fed. 202; McKinney v. Salem, 77 Ind. 213.

A state has the right to prohibit, restrict, or regulate all sales and traffic in intoxicating liquors within the state, and to inflict penalties for their manufacture and sale, and for the violation of the laws regulating and prohibiting same, and for the abatement of property used for such forbidden purposes.

Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323.

Under its power to regulate the sale of liquor on the premises or by the licensee for a specified period.

Thus, in Re Sarlo, 76 Ark. 336, 88 S. W. 953, the court said: "The authorities are practically uniform in holding that a liquor license is a mere privilege, revocable at the will of the state. It is not a contract between the state and the licensee, and no property rights inhere in it. Constitutional limitations against impairing obligations, retroactive laws, etc., cannot be invoked in support of rights under it. It is not a vested right for any definite period: in fact, it is not a vested right at all, but is a mere permission temporarily to do what otherwise would be a violation of the criminal laws."

So, in Com. v. Brothers, 158 Mass. 200, 33 N. E. 386, it is held that "if a druggist sells intoxicating liquors in violation of his license, it is not unconstitutional to impose upon him a penalty or punishment in addition to providing by statute that his license shall be void."

And in Campbell v. Thomasville, 6 Ga.

intoxicants, the legislature may require saloons to be kept closed on certain days and at certain hours, and where a statute requires that saloons shall be closed on Sundays, the offense of keeping open is complete even though no sale be made; it need not be alleged or proved that the defendant sold any liquor.

Sullivan v. District of Columbia, 20 App. D. C. 29; Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 39 L.R.A. 269, 28 S. E. 624; Baldwin v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 418; State v. Heibel, 54 Ohio St. 321, 43 N. E. 328; State v. Binard, 21 Wash. 349, 58 Pac. 210.

The legislature of the state has full power to impose such conditions upon those licensed to sell liquor, as it may deem proper and requisite for the good of the community.

App. 212, 64 S. E. 815, the court, in reviewing seriatim the provisions of municipal "near beer" ordinances alleged as a whole to be unconstitutional, said: "The provision for the forfeiture of the license upon the holder's being convicted of violating the provisions of the ordinance or the laws of the state is, of course, reasonable."

"An Act to Prohibit the Sale of Liquor on Sunday," which, in addition to prohibiting Sunday sales and fixing a punishment for violations, provides "that if any person is convicted twice under this act for offenses committed within one year, such person shall also forfeit his license and be debarred from conducting for himself or another the business of a dealer in spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors for a period of two years after such conviction," is not violative of a constitutional provision that "each law shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title;" such provision of the statute being directed, and plainly and unquestionably germane and referable, to the subject clearly expressed in the title. Borck v. State (Ala.) 39 So. 580.

And the title of an act, "The Better Regulation and Restriction of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors," clearly covers a provision therein that, for a second conviction for violation of any section of the act, the court may, and upon a third conviction shall, annul the license and all rights thereunder; and such title is not in contravention of a constitutional provision that "every act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title." State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L.R.A. 313, 44 N. E. 469.

As to the constitutional provision against excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishment, discussed at length in STATE v. WOODWARD, the conclusion there reached seems to be sound, that such provision is not violated by a statutory provision that a judgment of conviction of violation of the liquor laws shall also revoke the license granted for the sale of liquor on the prem-Lodano v. State, 25 Ala. 64; Hoboken v. Greiner, 68 N. J. L. 592, 53 Atl. 693.

One who accepts a license under a statute for the sale of intoxicating liquors must be deemed to consent to all the conditions and restrictions which have been or may be imposed by the legislature in the interest of the public morals and safety, relative to the traffic in the place in which he sells.

Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, 51 Am. Rep. 768, 1 N. E. 47; State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L.R.A. 313, 44 N. E. 469.

The law takes no record of the purpose for which the place is open. If the saloon was open during that time, the criminality of the act is not obviated by the fact that the purpose was innocent and harmless.

Monsey v. State, 78 Ga. 110; Rosenthal v. Hobson (Iowa) 77 N. W. 488; People v.

ises involved, and that the court shall order that such premises shall not be used for the sale, storage, or manufacturing of liquor for one year from and after conviction.

So, in Borck v. State, supra, it is held that a statute providing that, for a second conviction for illegal sales of liquor on Sunday made within one year, a licensee forfeits his license, and is prohibited from engaging in the business for the period of two years, is not offensive to the provisions of either the Federal or State Constitution against cruel and unusual punishment.

Nor is such constitutional provision violated by a statutory provision authorizing a fine and a forfeiture of his license upon conviction of the licensee for violating the law. Dinuzzo v. State, 85 Neb. 351, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 417, 123 N. W. 309.

And a statute providing that a liquor license shall be forfeited in addition to other penalties provided by law, for the illegal sale of liquor by the licensee, is not unconstitutional as imposing an excessive penalty. Krueger v. Colville, 49 Wash. 295, 95 Pac. 81.

But in Robinson v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549, 37 N. W. 21, a liquor statute was held unconstitutional, both as to the severity and the inequality of the punishment fixed, as inflicting unusual punishment and denying equal protection of the laws, where it entailed, upon conviction of violation of any of its provisions, in addition to fine and imprisonment, a forfeiture of the tax paid and incapacity to continue business for various specified periods,—in the case of a druggist, after a second offense, for five years; and in the case of others, for the remainder of the year or time for which the tax was paid, and for one year after conviction.

As against allegations of violation of constitutional provisions that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, statutes of the kind under consideration have been upheld both on the ground that due process is

The legislature is the judge of the expediency of creating new crimes, and of prescribing penalties, whether light or severe.

A license to sell liquor being neither a contract nor a right of property, but merely a temporary permit to do that which would otherwise be unlawful, the authority which granted it always retains the power to revoke it, either for due cause or forfeiture, such as the violation of the laws regulating the traffic, or upon a change of policy and legislation in regard to the sale of liquors; and such revocation cannot be complained of as a breach of contract, or as unlawfully divesting the licensee of his rights or his property.

The order of the court not to use the room and premises for the sale and storage or manufacture of intoxicating liquors for one year from and after the conviction was not excessive, cruel, or unusual punishment.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By chapter 14 of the extra session of 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, § 933a1) a new offense is created. In its 1st section it enacts that "all rooms, except drug stores, where any of the liquors mentioned in § 1 paragraph c, chapter 36, Acts of 1905, are sold or kept for sale, either at wholesale or retail, shall be kept closed and securely locked on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, from and after the hour of 12 o'clock Saturday night and until 5 o'clock on the morning of the succeeding Monday, and no person shall be permitted in such room for any purpose during the days and hours when it is by in fact had, as pointed out in STATE v. WOODWARD, and on the ground that the rights of the licensee are not "property" within the meaning of this constitutional provision. Thus, in Sprayberry v. Atlanta, 87 Ga. 120, 13 S. E. 197, involving a city ordinance providing that the conviction of a licensee for violation of the liquor laws should work an immediate revocation of his license, the court said: "The license being a mere privilege to carry on a business subject to the will of the grantor, it is not property in the sense which protects it under the Constitution. The revocation of the license does not deprive the citizen of his liberty or his property without due process of law."

And in Martin v. State, 23 Neb. 371, 36 N. W. 554, affirmed on rehearing in 27 Neb. 325, 43 N. W. 108, holding that a statute providing that a license "shall be revoked by the mayor and council upon conviction of the licensee of any violation of any law, ordinance, or regulation pertaining to the sale of such liquors," is not unconstitutional as depriving the licensee of property without due process of law, the court said: "There is no vested right in a license to sell intoxicating liquors, which the state may not take away at pleasure.

Such licenses are not contracts between the state or municipality issuing them and the licensee, but are mere temporary permits to do what otherwise would be unlawful."

So, a statute providing that a liquor license shall be forfeited in addition to other penalties provided by law, for an illegal sale of liquor by the licensee, is not unconstitutional as depriving the licensee of his property without due process. Krueger v. Colville, supra.

And a statutory provision for a forfeiture of his license in addition to a fine, upon conviction of a licensee for violating the law, is not unconstitutional as depriving him of property without a jury trial. Dinuzzo v. State, supra.

And neither the constitutional provision preserving the right of trial by jury, nor one prohibiting the taking of property without a judicial proceeding, is violated by a statute providing that if the holder of a license permits certain illegal sales of liquor on his premises, his license shall thereby become forfeited, and that, upon prescribed complaint being presented to the board of excise commissioners, alleging that such license has become forfeited and specifying the acts complained of which are alleged to have worked such forfeiture, the board shall investigate, and if the licensee is found guilty of any of the alleged offenses, his license shall be revoked and annulled, and he shall be disqualified for one year from receiving a license in the state. Voight v. Board of Excise, 59 N. J. L. 358, 37 L.R.A. 292, 36 Atl. 686. A. C. W law or ordinance required to be closed. All openings of every sort from such room to any other room, hall, vestibule, entrance, or stairway, situated in the building, or from such room to any building or room adjoining the room in which said business is carried on, or from such room to any basement or cellar, chamber or attic, shall be kept securely closed and locked on said first day of the week." Its 3d section (§ 933a3) provides that any person, his agent or employee, violating the 1st section, "shall on conviction be fined not less than $50 nor more than $250, and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than six months nor more than twelve months; and such violation by an agent or employee shall be deemed an offense as well by the principal or employer, and they may be indicted for the same either jointly or separately. The court before which such conviction is had shall, as a part of its judgment, revoke the license granted for the sale of spirituous liquors on said premises and shall order that said room and premises shall not be used for the sale, storage, or manufacture of such liquors for one year from and after such conviction." Under this James R. Woodward was indicted in the circuit court of Randolph county; the indictment charging that, having a state license to sell at retail spirituous liquors, he did, in a certain room in which he sold and kept for sale spirituous liquors, "unlawfully unlock and open the said room and enter therein on the morning of said day, being the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday." Woodward was found guilty by a jury, and the judgment was that he pay a fine of $50 and be confined in jail six months, and that his liquor license be revoked, and that the room where he sold and kept liquors for sale should not be used for the sale, storage, or manufacture of such liquor for one year after the date of the judgment.

The defendant moved the court to quash the indictment, and for a new trial; but the court overruled the motions. In his motion to quash the indictment he suggested that the statute is contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution and § 10 of article 3 of the state Constitution (Code 1906, p. li.), both providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. We cannot see that the statute is obnoxious to that objection. It provides for the ordinary process of law by conviction on trial upon indictment. I need not cite authority to show that this is due process of law. Surely, so far as fine and imprisonment are concerned, under our Constitution he must be indicted and tried by his peers. This is 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the highest sense due process of law, under which even life may be taken. We do not think that that feature of the statute which commands the court, on conviction, to revoke the liquor license and to close the place of sale, is any more open to constitutional objection, since that is a part of the penalty prescribed by the statute for the offense, and is inflicted only after due process has been had. This matter falls under the rule that the legislature is clothed with power well nigh unlimited to define crimes and fix their punishment. So its enactments do not deprive of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and the judgment of a man's peers, its will is absolute. It can take life, it can take liberty, it can take property, for crime. "The legislatures of the different states have the inherent power to prohibit and punish any act as a crime, provided they do not violate the restrictions of the state and Federal Constitutions; and the courts cannot look further into the propriety of a penal statute than to ascertain whether the legislature had the power to enact it." 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 136. "The power of the state to impose fines and penalties for a violation of its statutory requirements is coeval with government." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 29 L. ed. 463, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110. The legislature is ordinarily the judge of the expediency of creating new crimes, and of prescribing penalties, whether light or severe. Com. v. Murphy, 165 Mass. 66, 30 L. R. A. 734, 52 Am. St. Rep. 496, 42 N. E. 504, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 67; Southern Exp. Co. v. Com. 92 Va. 66, 41 L.R.A. 436, 22 S. E. 809. For such a fundamental proposition I need cite no further authority. As to that feature of the act forfeiting license and closing the saloon, it falls under the power to punish after conviction. It is a forfeiture which may as validly be enacted as the imposition of imprisonment and forfeiture of money. The power of the legislature to declare what are nuisances and to authorize their removal is established clearly by authority. Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Kirkland v. State, 72 Ark. 171, 78 S. W. 770, 65 L.R.A. 76, 105 Am. St. Rep. 25, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 242, and note, is full on this subject.

Where Woodward accepted his license, he accepted it subject to legal regulations, and surely, for a violation of the law, the legislature could declare its forfeiture. And so it might authorize the closing of the saloon, as the instrument used in the violation of the law. Statutes providing forfeiture of liquor licenses are numerous and constitutional. Fines may be imposed, and this is a fine levied on a specific article, instead of the offender's estate at large. The power is universally conceded, says Bishop's Statutory Crimes, §§ 993, 1056. So license may be revoked. Id., § 1003a. Our very Constitution gives the state power to deal with the evil resulting from intoxicating liquors, in the provision that "laws may be passed regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the limits of this state." Article 6, § 46 (page lxiii.). This is a very great power; it is hard to say where its limits are. It may make any kind of regulations in the wisdom of the legislature adapted to regulation. This power falls within the great police power so widespread and so necessary to a state government. Though counsel for Woodward made the suggestion in the motion to quash the indictment, that the act deprived of life, liberty, and property without due process, he seems not to rely on it, as he does not pursue it in his brief. He seems rather to base his charge of unconstitutionality on that provision of the Constitution of the state (article 3, § 5, p. 1.) saying that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted. Penalties shall be proportioned to the character and degree of the offense." What is meant by the provision against cruel and unusual punishment? It is hard to say definitely. Here is something prohibited, and, in order to say what this is, we must revert to the past to ascertain what is the evil to be remedied. Within the pale of due process, the legislature has power to define crimes and fix punishments, great though they may be, limited only by the provision that they shall not be cruel or unusual or disproportionate to the character of the offense.

Going back to ascertain what was intended by this constitutional provision, the history of the law tells us of the terrible punishment visited by the ancient law upon convict criminals. In our days of advanced Christianity and civilization, this review is most interesting, yet shocking and heart rending. Take the case of treason. Blackstone says (bk. 4, p. 92) that "the punishment of high treason in general is very solemn and terrible: 1. That the offender be drawn to the gallows, and not be carried or walk, though usually (by connivance, at length ripened by humanity into law) a sledge or hurdle is allowed, to preserve the offender from the extreme torment of being dragged on the ground or pavement. 2. That he be hanged by the neck and then cut down alive. 3. That his entrails be taken out and burned while he is yet alive. 4. That his head be cut off. 5. That his body be divided into four parts. 6. That his head and quarters be at the King's disposal." Blackstone, bk. 4, p. 327, says: "The English judgment of penance for standing mute was as follows: That the prisoner be remanded to the prison from whence he came, and put into a low, dark chamber, and there be laid on his back on the bare floor, naked, unless where decency forbids; that there be placed upon his body as great a weight of iron as he could bear, and more; that he have no sustenance, save only, on the first day, three morsels of the worst bread, and, on the second day, three draughts of standing water, that should be nearest to the prison door; and in this situation this should be alternately his diet till he died, or (as anciently the judgment ran) till he answered." This horrible punishment was called in old English law, in law French, peine forte et dure. In case of a woman her judgment is to be drawn and burnt, as well in high treason as petit treason, and she is neither hanged nor beheaded. She was on account of sex relieved from exposure of disembowelment and being cut into four pieces. Blackstone says (bk. 4, p. 377): "Some punishments consist in exile or banishment, by abjuration of the realm, or transportation; others in loss of liberty, by perpetual or temporary imprisonment some extend to confiscation, by forfeiture of lands or movables, or both, or of the profits of lands for life; others induce a disability of holding offices or employments, being heirs, executors, and the like; some, though rarely, occasion a mutilation or dismembering, by cutting off the hand or ears; others fix a lasting stigma on the offender, by slitting the nostrils or branding in the hand or cheek; some are merely pecuniary, by stated or discretionary fines; and, lastly, there are others that consist principally in their ignominy though most of them are mixed with some degree of corporal pain, and these are inflicted chiefly for such crimes as either arise from indigence, or render even opulence disgraceful, such as whipping, hard labor in the house of correction or otherwise, the pillory, the stocks, and the ducking stool." What was meant by "drawing" was tying the culprit's feet to a horse's tail and dragging him along the ground to the gallows. For this drawing the English had Bible precedent, as we find in Sharswood's Blackstone, bk. 4, p. 93, note: "This punishment for treason, Sir Edward Coke tells us, is warranted by divers examples in Scripture; for Joab was drawn, Bithan was hanged, Judas was emboweled, and so of the rest." It was the infliction of such cruel judgments in the days of the tyrant Stuarts that caused the insertion in the English Bill of Rights in 1688 of this clause, and caused its presence in American Constitutions, national and state. But it refers only to punishment of such cruel character. It does not trench upon that wide power of the legislature to say what are offenses and fix their punishment, "so long as they do not provide cruel and unusual punishments, such as disgraced the civilization of former ages, and make one shudder with horror to read of them, such as drawing, quartering, and burning." Whitten v. State, 47 Ga. 301. A free colored man was convicted of larceny of $100, and was sentenced to receive 39 stripes on his bare back, and be sold as a slave, and transported and banished beyond the limits of the United States. A statute authorized that severe punishment. The general court of Virginia said that the constitutional provision was not designed to control the legislative right "to determine ad libitum upon the adequacy of punishment, but is merely applicable to the modes of punishment." Aldridge v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 447. A man was convicted of keeping a gaming table. Under statute he was subject to punishment of imprisonment in the jail not less than one month nor more than six, on low, course diet, and punished with stripes to be inflicted at one or different times. It was held that the act was not repugnant to the Bill of Rights, and that whipping was not an "unusual" punishment in the constitutional sense, though it might consist of several whippings. Com. v. Wyatt, 6 Rand. (Va.) 694.

How can we say that the statute before us inflicts cruel punishment when our statutes have punished with death, lifelong imprisonment, and fines, and forfeiture of instruments of crime through centuries? Nobody can question their validity. Inflicting death by electricity is unusual, in a sense, a new mode, but held not contrary to the prohibition; not as cruel as hanging, which is surely not prohibited. Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 446, 34 L. ed. 519, 523, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 930. The court said punishments are cruel when they involve torture or lingering death, but punishment by death is not such. In Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U. S. 130, 135, 25 L. ed. 345, 347, it was held that execution of death sentence by shooting does not violate this clause. The statute punished murder by death, by shooting, hanging, or beheading. It was held not to be invalid. It does not 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) clearly appear that the court would have approved the sentence, if there had been judgment by beheading, but did not condemn the act. Beheading would be no more cruel than hanging, not so much so. The court said: "Difficulty would attend the effort to define with exactness the extent of the constitutional provision which provides that cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted; but it is safe to affirm that punishments of torture, such as those mentioned by the commentator referred to, and all others in the same line of unnecessary cruelty, are forbidden by that amendment to the Constitution. Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 408; Wharton, Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 3405." The provision does not affect legislation providing imprisonment for life or years, or death by hanging or electrocution, and if it did, the laws for the punishment of crime would give no security. Hobbs v. State, 133 Ind. 408, 18 L. R. A. 774, 32 N. E. 1019. This interdict applies to such punishment as amounts to torture, like drawing, quartering, burning at stake, cutting off nose, arms, or limbs, starving to death, or such as were inflicted by the act of Parliament in 22 Henry VIII., whereby the prisoner was ordered to be thrown into boiling water and boiled to death for poisoning. State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 310. The word "cruel," as used in the Constitution, was intended to prohibit torture, agonizing punishment, but never intended to "abridge or limit the selection by the lawmaking power of such kind of punishment as was deemed most effective in the punishment and suppression of crime." Garcia v. Territory, 1 N. M. 415. See 35 L.R.A. 561, for a fine collection of authorities upon this subject. The late case of Weems v. United States, 217 U. S. 349, 54 L. ed. 793, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544, discusses this subject, and it is there said that the provision in question is intended to veto statutes inflicting such cruel punishments as had been inflicted in England above mentioned. The same principle will be found stated in O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693. In short, the text writers and cases say that the clause is aimed at those ancient punishments, those horrible, inhuman, barbarous inflictions. We can by no means say that the statute before us falls under this ban.

So I conclude that this act does not violate the Constitution in its injunction against "cruel and unusual punishment." When the court said, in the Aldridge Case, that the provision was not designed to control the legislature in determining at its pleasure upon the adequacy of the punishment, but merely as to the modes of punishment, it is possibly right, because the Virginia Bill of Rights prohibited cruel and unusual punishments, but did not contain those words in our Constitution: "Penalties shall be proportioned to the character and degree of the offense." This certainly does not only, if at all, refer to the mode of punishment, but to the degree, extent, and quality. Even without such a clause, under the words "cruel and unusual," it has been held that imprisonment for too long a time, though imprisonment is not cruel or unusual, is forbidden by those two words. Weems Case, supra. Surely, under our Constitution fines so excessive, imprisonment so long, looking to the offense, as to shock our feelings of humanity, conscience, justice, and mercy, would be branded by this clause. I suppose that a sentence for years to the penitentiary for assault and battery attended with no serious results, or long imprisonment in jail for profane swearing, would fall under that clause. But it is established everywhere that the legislature has large discretion as to punishment in kind and degree. Can we say that this act, which fixes punishment at a fine of from $50 to $250 and imprisonment from six months to one year, is so disproportionate to the offense as to be unconstitutional? Counsel says that it is unusual and severe and drastic. Drastic and severe it is, but not beyond the scope of legislative authority. The evident purpose of the new statute is to protect Sunday from profanation and desecration by not only carrying on a business, but from drunkenness. Through the centuries Sunday has been protected from secular business and desecration by statutes of more or less severity. The great majority of people whether members of the church or not, regard Sunday as a day of rest and peace and holiness, and approve laws to protect it from desecration. Of course, the open saloon would signally operate to its profanation. We cannot therefore say that this statute imposes for this offense a punishment disproportionate to it. We cannot thus deny the power of the legislature. As said in the Weems Case: "We disclaim the right to assert a judgment against that of the legislature, of the expediency of the laws, or the right to oppose the judicial power to the legislative power to define crimes and fix their punishment, unless that power encounters in its exercise a constitutional prohibition. In such case, not our discretion, but our legal duty, strictly defined and imperative in its direction, is invoked. Then the legislative power is brought to the judgment of a power er superior to it for the instant. And for the proper exercise of such power, there must be a comprehension of all that the legislature did or could take into account; that is, a consideration of the mischief and the remedy. However, there is a certain subordination of the judiciary to the legislature. The function of the legislature is primary, its exercises fortified by presumptions of right and legality, and is not to be interfered with lightly, nor by any judicial conception of their wisdom or propriety. They have no limitation, we repeat, but constitutional ones, and what those are the judiciary must judge. We have expressed these elementary truths to avoid the misapprehension that we do not recognize to the fullest the wide range of power that the legislature possesses to adapt its penal laws to conditions as they may exist, and punish the crimes of men according to their forms and frequency."

The legislature has a wide power and has established wide practice in dealing with the evil of intoxicating liquors. All over the Union for years and years statute law has been growing more and more rigid and rigorous, and peculiarly in late years. This is so much the case that many people say that these laws are so rigid and comprehensive and severe as to amount to injustice, seeing that license is granted on payment of heavy taxes, and the privilege so restricted as to sometimes render the business practically unprofitable; but the legislatures look upon the sale of intoxicating liquors as an evil, as we are bound to say from a view of the large volume of statute law of the different states.

It occurred to me that this act might be unconstitutional on the theory that it violates constitutional law in prohibiting to the citizen his use of his property for innocent purposes. It says that he shall not enter the saloon for innocent purpose, to sleep, to cook his meals, to secure his money from theft forgotten in his drawer, to preserve his property from leakage of water pipes or from fire. It seems questionable to me in this respect, though not urged by counsel. The statute absolutely prohibits any use of the room or place. Whether entrance from stringent necessity would be excused by the incorporation of an exception by the courts, we do not say. Cases differ as to this. 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 190. Perhaps it would be like the case of some ancient statute or law which forbade the drawing of blood, but which was held not to apply to the surgeon or physician drawing blood to save life. Morganstern

v. Com. 94 Va. 788, pt. 4, 26 S. E. 402. This statute makes no express exception.

Our Constitution gives express power to the legislature to either regulate or prohibit the sale of liquors. This is a very wide power, vesting the legislature with plenipotential powers to accomplish the end. There is no right in any person to engage in this business, in such sense as to remove it from legislative control, nor any vested right in those having license which prevents it being afterwards regulated or even forbidden by statute. McKinney v. Salem, 77 Ind. 213. The state has the right to prohibit, restrict, or regulate all sales of intoxicating liquors, and to inflict penalties therefor and for the abatement of property used for the forbidden purpose. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. It may require saloons to be closed on certain days. There have been many decisions upon statutes like this held constitutional. Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 565, 51 Am. Rep. 768, 1 N. E. 47. Entering a saloon for any purpose, though innocent, on Sunday, has been held to be a violation of such statute. Monsee v. State, 78 Ga. 110; Rosenthal v. Hobson (Iowa) 77 N. W. 488; People v. Waldvogel, 49 Mich. 337, 13 N. W. 620. Even to clean the saloon, or though it be an entrance to a dwelling. People v. Talbot, 120 Mich. 486, 79 N. W. 688, and People v. Waldvogel, supra. The offense consists in not keeping the saloon closed on Sunday, and it is not material whether or not any sales are made, nor what is the saloon keeper's intent in not keeping it closed, nor whether anyone was seen to enter or depart from it. State v. Schell, 22 S. D. 340, 117 N. W. 505; State v. Fairchild, 22 S. D. 343, 117 N. W. 506; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, 393. If he keep it open but for a moment, it is a violation of the statute; and there is no purpose for which the statute authorizes it to be open, as held in Monsee v. State, supra, and Klug v. State, 77 Ga. 734, and Kroer v. People, 78 Ill. 294.

So our conclusion is that we cannot hold as unconstitutional the 1st and 3d sections of the act creating the offense and imposing the penalty. The case does not involve the 2d section authorizing officers to close places conducted in violation of the act, and authorizing officers to arrest without warrant. We say nothing as to that section; it being separate and distinct from the other, and not involved in this case.

We affirm the judgment.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

HUELING DAVIS, Claimant, Appt.,

v.

LOUISVILLE TRUST COMPANY, Trustee in Bankruptcy of Howe Manufacturing Company, et al.

(— C. C. A. —, 181 Fed. 10.)

Evidence — report to mercantile agency — admissibility of record.

1. A report made by an agent of a mercantile corporation to it, as to the financial standing of a merchant which he had been sent to investigate, and placed on file in due course of business, is admissible as evidence of facts which he learned at the time, although he has since deceased.

Same — methods in mercantile agencies.

2. Although courts take judicial notice of the methods of mercantile agencies, this knowledge may be supplemented respecting disputed methods of business by the testimony of experienced officers of the agencies themselves.

Fraud — right to rely on report to mercantile agency.

3. One securing information as to the standing of a corporation desirous of disposing of some of its treasury stock, through a subscriber to a mercantile agency to which such corporation had furnished such information, may, although he himself has no contractual relations with the agency, rely thereon in purchasing stock from the corporation, and, in case the information was erroneous, may rescind the contract.

Same — report of corporate condition — intent.

4. A report by the president of a corporation which is desirous of selling stock to a mercantile agency, which falsely states the amount of stock subscribed and the amount of capital paid in, and makes an unwarranted forecast as to the payment of the remainder, must be treated as having been designed fraudulently to influence the purchase of stock.

Note. — Although there are many cases using general language to the effect that, if a person makes to a mercantile agency a statement as to his pecuniary condition known to him to be false, for the purpose of procuring credit, such a false statement is fraudulent as to persons who deal with him in reliance on such representation, aside from DAVIS v. LOUISVILLE TRUST Co. and Irish-American Bank v. Ludlum, 49 Minn. 344, 51 N. W. 1046, sufficiently set out in the former case, no cases have been found where the court expressly passed upon the question whether a statement to a mercantile agency can be regarded as addressed to persons who are not subscribers or patrons of the agency.

Laches — delay in rescinding fraudulent contract.

5. Three years' delay by one fraudulent-ly induced to purchase stock of a corporation, in taking steps to rescind his contract, will not defeat the right on the ground of laches, in favor of creditors having notice of his claim.

Same—knowledge of fraud.

6. One defrauded into purchasing stock of a corporation cannot be charged with laches which will preclude his rescinding his contract until he has knowledge of the fraud, or knowledge should be imputed to him because of suspicious circumstances which he failed to pursue after receiving notice of them.

Judgment — absence of issues — right to enter.

7. A claim against the assets of an insolvent corporation, based upon a fraudulent sale by it of its stock, cannot, in the bankruptcy proceedings against it, be given preference to claims of other creditors, although they are officers of the corporation and parties to the fraud, and become parties to the proceeding, where no issues are made presenting the question of priority to the court.

(July 13, 1910.)

A PPEAL by Hueling Davis from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky, disallowing his claim against the bankruptcy estate of the Howe Manufacturing Company. Reversed.

Statement by Warrington, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from an order entered in the court below April 9, 1908, rejecting a claim of Davis, appellant, against the Howe Manufacturing Company, bankrupt, for $5,000 and interest. The company was adjudicated a bankrupt December 22, 1906, and the Louisville Trust Company, one of the appellees, was thereafter appointed trustee. The claim grows out of a purchase by Davis of fifty shares of the par value of $100 each of the capital stock of the bankrupt. In his original and amended proofs of claim, Davis alleges that he subscribed for the stock and paid its par value in cash to the company in reliance upon the truth of certain representations made by the company through its president and vice president, who were also directors; that these representations were false and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of inducing him to purchase the stock; that upon discovery of the fraud, he repudiated and rescinded the contract, tendered to the company the certificates representing the stock, and demanded payment of the price with interest, which was refused.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The alleged false representations consist of two classes. The first class is said to be comprised in a report made by Ben Howe, as president of the company, to R. G. Dun & Company, a mercantile agency, then maintaining an office in Louisville. The other class is claimed to have been made principally, if not wholly, by T. L. Jefferson, as vice president and director of the company, through a letter written to a Mr. Chess, and through statements made by Jefferson both to Chess and Davis. A copy of the report to Dun & Company, as well as the letter written by Jefferson to Chess, were placed in the hands of Davis before he purchased. These representations related to the financial condition of the bankrupt company and also of another company bearing the same name, the assets and good will of which had been purchased and taken over by the new company. It is not necessary set out more than the substance of the statements said to have been made, or the evidence offered in support and denial of the contentions made by the respective parties.

In addition to what will be found in the opinion, it is sufficient to state here that the present controversy begins with negotiations had in July, 1903, between Davis and Howe, whereby Davis was to take stock and Howe was to give him employment in the company, and that Davis thereupon borrowed of Chess $2,500 and of Llewellyn Smith the same sum, giving to them his notes and using the money in buying the stock. Davis was given employment in the company and continued therein in several capacities for a period of nearly three years, and received from the company compensation of about $3,000, when at the close of April, 1906, he claims to have made discoveries which caused him to quit the employ of the company. He testified that he suspected financial difficulty in the affairs of the company in March of that year, through knowledge he obtained of a proposed contract—called a "four-cornered agreement"—to which the company, a "syndicate," the Western National Bank, and Jefferson were to be parties, designed in some way to aid Jefferson, if not the company itself. This resulted in an investigation and the discovery claimed to have been made by Davis upon which he bases his contention that he was entitled to rescind. He insists further that his right extends not only to proving a general claim for $5,000, but also to priority over certain of the creditors, if not all of them in the assets of the bankrupt. The particular creditors against whom the claim of priority is made are Jefferson, the Western National Bank of Louisville, and Ben Howe, both individually and as assignee of certain claims of creditors of the bankrupt. The claims of Davis in both the respects last mentioned were allowed by the referee, but the orders in that behalf were reversed and set aside by the court below.

Argued before Severens, Warrington, and Knappen, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Helm Bruce and Percy N. Booth, for appellant:

A statement made to a mercantile agency may be relied upon as a basis of credit, and will be misrepresentation upon which an action may be brought, if it be false.

The record of R. G. Dun & Company, made by its regular city reporter, in the line of his duty, and in the regular course of business, to wit, that of collecting and recording information as to the financial condition of persons, is competent evidence to prove the fact that Ben Howe, as president of the Howe Manufacturing Company, made the statements which that record says he made.

Warrington, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The initial test of the validity of the claim of Davis is involved in important questions of admissibility of evidence. It is contended in the first place that no competent witness was produced to testify that any report of the financial condition of the company was ever made to the mercantile agency; and, in the next place, that the instrument exhibited as such a report could not, if received in evidence, be considered as addressed to Davis, or as having been intended to influence him or anyone else in the purchase of treasury stock of the bankrupt company. The court below regarded the report as inadmissible, and so declined to consider it. This is made the subject of the first assignment of error.

The paper was received in evidence by the referee. It was admittedly a copy of what purported to be a report made by J. H.

Saunders as city reporter of Dun & Company at Louisville. It was shown that he had occupied that position for ten years, but that he was deceased at the time the report was offered in evidence, and that he had made and presented the writing on June 18, 1903, to the superintendent of Dun & Company. The material parts of the report are: An abstract of a portion of the articles of incorporation of the bankrupt company, dated June 1, 1903, showing its authorized capital stock, $500,000, its successorship to the business of the old company, and names of the subscribers for 2,430 shares of $100 each of the new capital stock, and specifying the number taken by each subscriber. It then proceeds:

"Ben Howe, the president, states there has been actually paid in cash $250,000, that the assets consist of machinery, merchandise, etc., and that the new company has no indebtedness. He further states that the company has purchased a wholesale plumbing and steam fitting supply business, for which they paid $150,000, and that they have also purchased another business for a like amount at Birmingham, Alabama, and, while all deals have been completed, they are not ready to make a detailed statement of the company's affairs. It is their intention to elect three more directors. Claims that the entire capital of $500,000 will be paid up within the next two weeks. . . . It will be seen that they have not completed their affairs, and just what amount of actual capital they have cannot be ascertained."

J. J. Saunders testified that he was then manager of the mercantile agency at Louisville, and at the time the report was made he was assistant manager. He further testified that the paper offered in evidence was a "copy of the report from our records," production of the original having been waived, and referring to what he called the "record" of the report in question, he further said that his deceased brother was the author of the report; that the records show that his brother had received the statement contained in the report and had made it a matter of record; that "it was kept in our regular files, to be given to anybody that wanted information of that company (the Howe Manufacturing Co.) at that time;" and that such statements "are placed on record for the purpose of giving them to inquirers." He was, however, not present when Howe purports to have made statements to the deceased brother, but it was agreed that J. J. Saunders would, if recalled, testify: "His knowledge of such alleged statements was and is based on his knowledge of the record on file in the office of R. G. Dun & Company, and on his knowledge of the making, filing, and preserving of said record, and on his knowledge of the business of R. G. Dun & Company, and the methods, rules, customs, and circumstances governing the statements made to R. G. Dun & Company, and governing the making, filing, and preserving of other records of such statements."

He delivered to Chess a copy of the report on August 4, 1903.

The objection urged against receiving this report is that it is hearsay. We think the right to resort to secondary proof in the circumstances stated is reasonably well settled. The principle underlying the admissibility of such evidence is that the person making the report was engaged in the regular course of a distinct business before any dispute arose, and in the discharge of a duty to record matters for others, without having any personal interest in the subject recorded.

It is well settled in what we regard as kindred cases that the duty thus discharged need not be imposed by law. It is enough that the duty is recognized. The fact that the record is designed for the use of all persons rightly interested in the subject, and that the success of the business of supplying the information so obtained is dependent upon its accuracy, cannot, we think, but enhance the obligation and sense of duty involved. When it is shown that a record was made in that way and with the motive indicated, that it has been carefully preserved, and that the author is dead, there can be no perceivable violation of any principle of evidence by treating the report as prima facie evidence that the acts and matters so recorded and purporting to relate directly to the business in hand occurred as there stated, subject, of course, to contradiction by other evidence.

In Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat. 326, 337, 5 L. ed. 628, 630, when passing upon the admissibility of memoranda of a deceased notary, made in the regular course of his business, but not in obedience to law, Justice Story said: "We think it a safe principle that memorandums made by a person in the ordinary course of his business of acts or matters which his duty in such business requires him to do for others, in case of his death, are admissible evidence of the acts and matters so done. It is, of course, liable to be impugned by other evidence; and to be encountered by any presumptions or facts which diminish its credibility or certainty."

The contention of counsel for appellees that that decision has been repudiated by the Supreme Court is not tenable. This will be seen by comparison of the last case relied on by counsel—Rates v. Preble, 151

U. S. 149, 38 L. ed. 106, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277—with another case decided by the same justice later. We refer to Constable v. National S. S. Co. 154 U. S. 51, 38 L. ed. 903, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1062. In passing upon the admissibility of a memorandum made in pursuance of a practice and usage in the port of New York touching the posting of notices in the customhouse of the time of unloading vessels, the learned justice said (69): "The practice even of a private office, if well established, is presumed to have been followed in individual cases, and is accepted as sufficient proof of the fact in question when primary evidence of such fact is wanting,"—[citing among other cases, Nicholls v. Webb].

The authority of Nicholls v. Webb was recognized, also, by Mr. Justice White in Putnam v. United States, 162 U. S. 687, 695, 40 L. ed. 1118, 1121, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922. In Kennedy v. Doyle, 10 Allen, 161, 167, Judge Gray said: "In the United States the law is well settled that an entry made by a person in the ordinary course of his business or vocation, with no interest to misrepresent, before any controversy or question has arisen, and in a book produced from the proper custody, is competent evidence, after his death, of the facts thus recorded."

Treating the report of the mercantile agency then as prima facie evidence of the fact that the president of the bankrupt company made the representations therein stated, the question arises: To whom were they addressed? Was Davis entitled to rely upon them? This question is not of easy solution. Davis was not a patron or subscriber of R. G. Dun & Company. He obtained the report through Chess, and Chess obtained it from Dun & Company through his membership of the Chess-Wymond Company, which seems to have been a patron of R. G. Dun & Company. It is clear enough that, if Chess had obtained the report for either his firm or himself for the purpose of determining whether to give credit in the way of sales of material or loans of money, he might rightfully have placed faith in the report; for ordinarily such statements are given for the very object of fixing a basis of credit. As stated in National Bank v. Illinois & W. Lumber Co. 101 Wis. 247, 253, 77 N. W. 185, 188: "The commercial agency which gathers and circulates reports as to the financial standing of business houses is an institution now so well established, and its reports are so universally used, that no court or merchant can plead ignorance of its purpose or functions. When a merchant states to such an agency his financial condition, he knows it is for publication to the business world, and that such publication will probably be consulted when he applies to any business institution for credit. He makes his statement, therefore, knowing that it will probably be used as a basis of credit. Upon what ground can it be said that such a statement is not a representation made for the purpose of securing credit as fully as if made personally to each business house with which he has dealing?"

It is further to be observed of these decisions that, where it is shown that the representations are falsely and fraudulently made, they are to be treated as having been made with that intent to each of the persons addressed, precisely the same as if each person had been singled out and so sought to be influenced. In Genesee County Sav. Bank v. Michigan Barge Co. the supreme court of Michigan, in expressing its approval of the language employed in Eaton, C. & B. Co. v. Avery, supra, quoted the following from that decision (52 Mich. 170): "And if a merchant furnishes to such an agency a wilfully false statement of his circumstances or pecuniary ability, with intent to obtain a standing and credit to which he knows that he is not justly entitled, and thus to defraud whoever may resort to the agency, and in reliance upon the false information there lodged extend a credit to him, there is no reason why his liability to any party defrauded by those means should not be the same as if he had made the false representation directly to the party injured."

The facts of the decisions thus far cited concern sales of articles or loans of money to the person making the report to the mercantile agency, and upon which reliance was placed by the sellers or lenders. It is not difficult, however, to conceive that it would be to the interest of business concerns, whether owned by individuals or corporations, to employ mercantile agencies as the means of communicating to others not merely responsibility in relation to desired purchases and loans, but also to attract dealers in investments and investors themselves. We think this conception is justified in this particular case, both by the report and the evidence adduced. In addition to the other features of the report which are obviously adapted to inspire confidence in the financial stability of the company, the report contains these statements (in substance): That about half the authorized shares had been subscribed, also that "Ben Howe, the president, states that there has been actually paid in cash $250,000, . . . claims that the entire capital of $500,000 will be paid up within the next two weeks." While the statements are not in terms expressive of a desire to sell stock, it cannot escape attention either (1) that all of the company's stock had not been taken; or (2) that the language was calculated to induce purchases of stock. But we now know that Howe was then wishing to sell treasury stock.

In his testimony he stated:

Q. Did you tell Mr. Davis that the company was desperately in need of money when you asked him to put in $5,000?

A. That was one of the reasons I was trying to get subscribers for stock.

Q. Do I understand you to say that the New Howe Manufacturing Company was in need of money or ready cash to pay its debts or run its business in the fall of 1903?

A. We were, or we would not have been trying to get stock subscriptions.

Q. In August and September, 1903?

A. Yes, sir.

Now, wherever it is necessary to determine the scope of a given representation, of course, the intent and object of the one making it must be considered. Manifestly this company needed money and desired to sell stock to obtain it. Naturally it would not, and in truth it did not, confine its efforts to sell stock simply to persons from whom it might expect to buy materials or obtain loans. Why, then, should this report be so interpreted as to restrict the object of the company to an effort merely to establish a basis of credit? The company certainly had as much authority to sell treasury stock as it had to purchase materials or borrow money; indeed, at the time of making the report, it does not seem that the company was any more anxious to acquire a basis of credit than it was to obtain money through sales of stock. It is therefore not too much to say that one of the purposes of the report was to influence sales of stock.

Can the report then be regarded as having been addressed to persons desiring to buy treasury stock, but who were not patrons of the mercantile agency? The answer may, we think, be aided by the testimony.

Saunders testified:

Q. When statements such as these are made by business concerns to your agency what is customarily done with them by you?

A. Well, they are placed on record for the purpose of giving them to inquirers.

Q. For what purpose do you furnish these reports, or copies of your records to applicants?

A. Well, that is a pretty hard question for me to answer, because I do not know what use the people inquiring want to make of them. They are supposed to be, for the purpose of determining credit. Maybe it ain't always that way.

Q. How long has R. G. Dun & Company been in this business?

A. Since 1841.

Q. Do persons who furnish facts to your agency for the purposes which you have named do so with any knowledge that such statements will be communicated by your agency to any other persons?

A. Yes, sir; invariably. All statements are made as a basis for credit.

This testimony was received subject to objection, and although courts are accustomed to take judicial notice of the methods of mercantile agencies, we see no reason why such knowledge may not be supplemented respecting disputed features of their methods of business by the testimony of experienced officers of the agencies themselves.

It is to be observed that the witness said that such statements are made "as a basis for credit;" but he also stated that they are placed on record for the purpose of giving them to "inquirers." It is urged that "inquirers" must be limited to patrons. The witness did not state any such limitation. Further, it does not appear that the persons making reports to the agencies impose any restrictions in this regard. It may be assumed that the primary object of the agency is profit; but even in this view it seems that the agency gathering the information, not those giving it, determines the conditions upon which it will be given circulation. Why, then, may not an agency rightfully give information so obtained to third persons generally, and upon such terms as the agency may choose to exact? Is not that in truth the ordinary course pursued by such agencies? Plainly it is consistent with the evidence that the reports "are placed on record for the purpose of giving them to inquirers."

If the agency had chosen to furnish Davis directly with a copy of the report, no matter on what terms, it is hard to see what reason the company would have to complain. The most that can be said in its behalf is that the agency did not furnish Davis with a copy. What happened was that Davis requested Chess to investigate, Davis testifying: "I was not in position to investigate this matter, and would like to have him (Chess) investigate it for me." Later Chess did investigate, and as a result turned over to Davis a letter he had received from Mr. Jefferson, together with a copy of the report in dispute, and Davis testified that he relied on this report as well as the letter in purchasing the stock. Chess made the investigation both because of his interest in Davis and of his purpose to loan Davis half of the money necessary to buy the stock. But the last analysis of the situation would seem to be that Chess undertook the investigation as the agent of Davis.

Now, it may be conceded that Davis could not have treated the report as addressed to him, if he had come into possession of it wrongfully. But can it be justly said as between him and the bankrupt company that he did obtain the report wrongfully? Surely he did not do so as to the portion of the report which purported to be based on the articles of incorporation. In that portion it is stated in substance that 2,430 shares of the stock had been subscribed by persons there named. The articles had been recorded in the office of the clerk of the Jefferson county court, and were obviously addressed to the public.

In Emerson v. Detroit Steel & Spring Co. 100 Mich. 127, 132, 58 N. W. 659, 660, it appeared that the report of a mercantile agency had been based upon sworn reports of the company to the secretary of state; and Montgomery, J., having occasion to pass upon an attachment in dispute, said: "The next question was whether there were grounds for attachment. We think there was sufficient to show that the indebtedness was fraudulently contracted. It sufficiently appears that Dun's reports were based upon the sworn reports of the company to the secretary of state, that both the plaintiffs in attachment extended credit upon the strength of these reports, and we are satisfied that these statements of the company were false, and could have been made with no other purpose than that of establishing a false credit."

It is true that the question there involved differed from the one now under discussion; but the point of the reference is that notice of a report addressed to the public may be acquired through the medium of a report of a mercantile agency, and that action may be rightfully taken upon the faith of the information so derived. Now, as to the rest of the report, it is to be constantly borne in mind, as before pointed out, that the report is made to the mercantile agency for the very purpose of having its contents communicated to others; that is, as testified in this case, to "inquirers." Such a report cannot, in the nature of things, be of any sort of consequence to the mercantile agency, except only as the agency may itself choose to exhibit the report. It is not the case of one person authorizing another to make representations to a specified third person, for there the use to be made of the representations is expressly limited by the person making them. But, according to the testimony in this case, the report was turned over to the mercantile agency with authority to dispose of it, indeed to sell it, upon such terms and to such persons as it might determine. How does this differ in principle from the law as laid down in the old case of Scott v. Dixon, decided by the Queen's bench in 1859, and reported in 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 62, note, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 523?

In that case a report in writing was made by directors of a bank and addressed expressly to the shareholders, but it was left at the bank, and copies could be had by sharebrokers or anybody applying for them who was desirous of information in regard to the affairs of the bank with a view to purchasing shares. Plaintiff Scott obtained a copy through a broker, and he and the other plaintiffs afterward purchased shares in their joint names. The report was held to be a representation made to persons other than the shareholders. Lord Campbell said: "The next point which we have to consider is, Was this representation made to the plaintiffs? Upon that I cannot entertain the slightest doubt. Reports of joint-stock companies, though addressed to the shareholders, are generally meant for the information of all who are likely to have dealings with the company, and I have no doubt that the directors in the present case knew that this particular report would, a few hours after its publication, be in the hands of all sharebrokers in Liverpool, and that it would be acted on by those who had or wished to have dealings with the bank. But, moreover, we have here positive evidence that it was to be bought by any person who wished to become a purchaser of shares, and it thus came into the hands of the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs, by the perusal of it, were induced to buy shares in the bank. I have therefore no doubt whatever that the allegation in the declaration that that representation was made to the plaintiffs is most completely established."

In Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 527, Lord Chelmsford approved of the decision in Scott v. Dixon, distinguishing it from the famous case in which he was then delivering his opinion, in the following language (397): "An action was brought against a director of a banking company for falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully publishing and representing to the plaintiffs that a dividend was about to be paid out of the profits, which were sufficient for payment of the dividend, and that the shares were a safe investment for the money. The plaintiffs bought their shares upon the faith of a report made by the directors to the shareholders which contained the false representations. Copies of this report were left at the bank, and were to be had by sharebrokers or any persons applying for it, who were desirous of information with regard to the affairs of the bank, with a view to the purchase of shares. The plaintiffs purchased at the bank, through their broker, a copy of the report. The court of Queen's bench held that there being positive evidence that the report was to be bought by any person who thought of becoming a purchaser of shares, and that it came into the hands of the plaintiffs in this manner, and by the perusal of it they were induced to buy shares in the bank, there was a publication to the plaintiff in the sense of the declaration. I do not doubt the propriety of this decision. The report, though originally made to the shareholders, was intended for the information of all persons who were disposed to deal in shares; and the representation must be regarded as having been made not indirectly, but directly to each person who obtained the report from the bank where it was publicly announced it was to be bought, in the same manner as if it had been personally delivered to him by the director."

The doctrine of Scott v. Dixon was approved by this court in Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 57 L. R. A. 108, 50 C. C. A. 623, 112 Fed. 931, 943. It is true that in that case this court held that a certificate of a bank showing that a certain deposit of money had been made and filed with the state insurance commissioner, in form as required by the law of Kentucky, was a representation intended only to influence the commissioner; and, further, that the fact that it was the duty of the commissioner on demand to furnish copies of the certificate to any of the public, and also to include the certificate in his official report, did not change the character of the representation. But we think that was far from holding that a report like the one in question would not have a broader scope than that of the bank certificate then under consideration.

There is another class of decisions which seems to us to lend analogy to the question under discussion. Those decisions concern liability growing out of representations made by corporate officers touching the financial condition of their companies, and sent to some state or Federal official, and subsequently published in pursuance of statutory requirement. One of the decisions alluded to is Warfield v. Clark, 118 Iowa, 69, 91 N. W. 833. That action was based upon a false statement of the financial condition of an insurance company. The Iowa Code required such statements to be filed with the auditor of state, setting out certain prescribed data, also that the auditor should arrange the information contained in the statement, and report the result to the governor, and also that these reports should be printed and distributed as part of the annual report of the auditor; and, further, that the companies themselves should annually publish a certificate showing their aggregate amount of assets and liabilities. The plaintiff bought stock in the Des Moines Insurance Company from stockholders on the faith of reports of this character, and afterward brought an action of deceit against the secretary upon the ground that the reports so made and published were false and fraudulent. Says the court at page 72 of 118 Iowa: "Insurance companies know that their reports are thus made public, and it is not going too far to say that they make them as favorable to their interests as the facts will warrant, for the express purpose of inducing public confidence, and by so doing to increase the volume of their business. . . . It is said, however, that in the purchase of stock from a third person, the plaintiff had no right to rely upon the representations made in the statement sworn to and filed by the defendant. If the defendant in fact falsely reported the financial condition of his company for the purpose of deceiving the public in relation to its responsibility as an insurer, it seems clear to us that we should not say as a matter of law that he only intended to wrong that particular class, and that those dealing in its stock were not his intended victims; for he knew that stock in such companies was often bought and sold, and that reliance might be placed upon his sworn statement by those dealing therein.

Smith) 164, 168; Genesee County Sav. Bank v. Michigan Barge Co. 52 Mich. 164, 170, 438, 17 N. W. 790, 18 N. W. 206; Silberman v. Munroe, 104 Mich. 352, 62 N. W. 555. See particularly, Graves v. Lebanon Nat. Bank, 10 Bush, 23, 19 Am. Rep. 50, where the bank was directly affected.

The relevance of these decisions, as they seem to us, is that the persons making the representations did so with knowledge not merely that the particular officer to whom they would be addressed would be advised of their contents, but also that their substance would be published to all who might wish to deal with the companies and in their stocks. How can one escape the charge that he contemplated the effect such representations would have upon others at the very time he made them? As it seems to us, therefore, it is immaterial whether representations are made voluntarily or in obedience to law, wherever they are put out with general authority in some agency to make publication of them to third persons, in such manner and to such extent as the agency shall desire.

We do not overlook Irish-American Bank v. Ludlum, 49 Minn. 344, 51 N. W. 1046, relied on by counsel for the trustee. In that case one Thompson appeared to have sold notes to the bank, which had been made to his order by the New York Pie Company. The bank brought suit on the notes against Ludlum, as owner of the pie company. At the trial Thompson testified that he was a subscriber to the commercial agency of Dun & Company, and had "called for and received a report from it" upon the pie company. This, it should be observed, may have been (though this does not expressly appear) a special report, made to him personally, and not a copy of the company record. He stated that he had lost this report, but could state its contents, and was permitted, against objection, to do so. The cashier of the bank was, under objection, allowed to testify that before receiving the notes he had been informed by Thompson of the nature and contents of the report of the agency, and believed in and relied upon the report in accepting the notes. It was held that this testimony "should have been excluded as immaterial and incompetent." If it was meant by this ruling to hold, as in fact the court did in substance say, that representations made to a mercantile agency are intended only for its patrons, we are not disposed to follow it, especially upon a comparison of its facts with the facts disclosed in the present case. Indeed, we are constrained to hold under the evidence of the present case that Davis was so connected with the representations in dispute as to entitle him to place faith in and rely upon them.

Treating the report, then, as admissible, we must next inquire into its alleged falsity. It cannot be expected that we shall discuss the vast amount of evidence in detail, which bears upon this report. We shall state some of our conclusions. In the first place, the subscriptions to capital stock were not in truth made according to the only inference that could be drawn either from the articles of incorporation themselves or as they are stated in the report to the mercantile agency. It cannot be pretended that T. L. Jefferson made a bona fide subscription for 1,150 shares, as there represented. He testified that he only intended to subscribe for 250 shares for himself and 200 for his son, Floyd Jefferson, and that he was induced to make the additional subscription on statements made by Howe that certain shares had been practically taken, and that those sales should be made out of Jefferson's nominal portion. Jefferson also stated substantially the same thing respecting the apparent subscription of R. W. Bingham for 255 shares. The total number of shares apparently taken was 2,430. Immediately following the list of subscriptions is the statement said to have been made by Howe "that there has been actually paid in cash $250,000." The evidence does not warrant any such statement. It was not true. Another statement purporting to have been made by Howe was "that the company has purchased a wholesale plumbing and steam fitting supply business, for which they paid $150,000." As we understand the evidence, we are bound to say as to the payment of $150,000 that this statement was equally untrue. What warrant Howe had for the claim ascribed to him that "the entire capital of $500,000 will be paid up within the next two weeks" is not shown. This may in one sense be said to have been an opinion rather than a statement of a fact, but it certainly was an unwarranted forecast. If the features of the report so pointed out as not sustainable under the evidence had been omitted, the report would hardly have been calculated to influence either sales of merchandise or loans of money, much less investments in the stock. It is therefore not necessary to compare the rest of the report with the evidence. Why should such a report have been made? Why should it not have been explained? It is said that Howe denied making the report. But, so far as we can discover, Howe did not in his testimony allude to the report. He did make one statement that is inconsistent with one portion of the report.

He testified:

Q. I will ask you to state whether or not you told Mr. Davis, or any one else, that the new Howe Manufacturing Company had bought the plant of T. A. Vogel & Sons, or the jobbing house in Birmingham, Alabama.

A. No, sir; I never told no one that in my life.

Q. As I understand, you had an option on it?

A. Yes, sir; an option on it; I never told anyone that I ever bought it.

But it surpasses our understanding why Howe would not directly and emphatically have denied the representations contained in the report, if in truth they had not been made.

It follows that there was error in excluding the report, and that the report must be treated as having been designed fraudulently to influence the sale of stock in question. While it is true that Davis testified, as before pointed out, that he was influenced both by the report and the letter of Jefferson, we see no escape from the conclusion that the effect of the report alone was sufficient to entitle Davis to rescind the contract, unless he was guilty of laches in repudiating it. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the part that Jefferson is said to have taken toward influencing the sale of stock. We have no hesitation in finding that, whatever Jefferson did, he did not do in an official capacity or as an agent engaged in the transaction of the business of the company. The company did not deal with Davis through Jefferson. It dealt with him through Howe, its president. The company can claim title to the money it received for the stock only through the acts of Howe and Davis. We therefore see no reason or room for introducing Jefferson into the transaction for the purpose of binding the company.

Had Davis, through acquiescence and delay, lost his right to rescind? If we were to consider merely the lapse of time between the purchase of the stock and the repudiation of the contract, a period of three years, it would seem under some of the decided cases that Davis should have ascertained his rights and taken action earlier. But, as a rule, the facts offered in support of defenses of laches vary so greatly that it is not ordinarily helpful to employ results reached in one case to determine the result that should be reached in another. There is, however, one principle pervading all the decisions that cannot be avoided here. It is that the defense of laches will not be entertained, unless it is made to appear that it would be inequitable to deny it. As observed by Justice Brewer in Gallihier v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 372, 36 L. ed. 738, 740, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873, 874, when speaking of the cases in which this defense had been invoked: "It is true that, by reason of their differences of fact, no one case becomes an exact precedent for another, yet a uniform principle pervades them all. They proceed on the assumption that the party to whom laches is imputed has knowledge of his rights, and an ample opportunity to establish them in the proper forum; that by reason of his delay the adverse party has good reason to believe that the alleged rights are worthless, or have been abandoned; and that because of the change in condition or relations during this period of delay, it would be an injustice to the latter to permit him to now assert them."

After commenting upon some of the decisions, the learned justice proceeded at page 373 of 145 U. S.: "But it is unnecessary to multiply cases. They all proceed upon the theory that laches is not like limitation, a mere matter of time; but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced,—an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relations of the property or the parties."

See also Ward v. Sherman, 192 U. S. 168, 176, 48 L. ed. 391, 395, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227; Stevens v. Grand Central Min. Co. (8th Circuit) 67 C. C. A. 284, 133 Fed. 28, 31; Cook, Corp. §§ 161, 162. An instance of allowing the defense of laches against a subscriber to corporate stock, who had not been "vigilant in discovering such fraud and in repudiating his contract," appears in Chubb v. Upton, 95 U. S. 665, 667, 24 L. ed. 523, 524, where under the facts it would have been inequitable to enforce the subscriber's rights. In Josly v. Cadillac Automobile Co. (6th Circuit) 101 C. C. A. 77, 177 Fed. 863, 869, it was stated by Judge Knappen: "Acquiescence and waiver are always questions of fact, and, where set up to defeat rescission, the burden is upon the defendant to make it out. Mudsill Min. Co. v. Watrous (6th Circuit) 9 C. C. A. 415, 22 U. S. App. 12, 61 Fed. 163, 186, 188, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 1;

As we understand the evidence, practically all the claims of creditors of the bankrupt company have been purchased by Howe, and are held under some arrangement between him and Jefferson and the Western National Bank; and we are impressed with the belief that those parties, unlike the original creditors, parted with their money with notice of the claim now in dispute. Nor do we understand that the rights of any present stockholders were acquired without notice of this claim; and, further, we do not discover anything tending to show that the assets are sufficient to admit of payment of a dividend to stockholders in any event. There is no secondary or double liability of the stockholders. But, apart from these considerations, we are not convinced that the trustee has discharged the burden of showing that Davis either gained knowledge of the true conditions under which he purchased his stock, or that his relations to the company were of a character rightly to justify us in imputing to him or otherwise charging him with such knowledge, prior to March, 1906, when the "four-cornered agreement" mentioned in the statement was entered into; and we think that he thereupon investigated into the facts and pursued the remedies open to him with reasonable diligence.

What has been said must, of course, result in permitting Davis to prove his loss for the sum of $5,000 with interest from July 27, 1906, the date of the rescission. But we cannot in this proceeding accord priority to the claim as was ultimately allowed by the referee. The referee ordered that the claim should be paid in full before any distribution of the estate should be made to Jefferson, Howe, or the Western National Bank. Our attention has not been called to any decision in which such priority was granted in a proceeding of this character. We do not see how such an order could be allowed without in effect determining the ultimate rights between Davis, on the one hand, and each of the parties named, on the other. We do not think that the proceeding is in condition to admit of such an order. It is true that the proceeding is of an equitable character, and that the creditors named have voluntarily become parties to it. But no such issues have been formulated and presented as to enable the court properly to hear and determine the rights of Davis against the other parties named, either severally or jointly. Such rights as Davis urges against them would ordinarily be enforced against them separately in actions for deceit. The 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) evidence offered in the present proceeding might be admissible in each of those cases; but it is by no means certain that all of the evidence which the parties might wish and be entitled to produce is to be found in the present record.

The order of the court below will be reversed, with directions to cause an order to be entered allowing the claim of Davis as a general claim, with interest from July 27, 1906 (the date of rescission and demand), until the date of filing the petition in bankruptcy, against the estate of the bankrupt, and awarding to him his costs. addition, two public highways adjacent to his land intersect. At this point, three streets leading across the addition from the city end in said public highways. A railway company, under legislative authority from the municipal corporation, was alleged to have constructed and operated lines of railway and switch tracks upon and across all of said streets, and upon two of them in such a manner as to obstruct greatly public travel over same. Held that, in the absence of averment in the petition showing that the streets obstructed were plaintiff's only means of access to his property which did not abut upon said streets, his petition failed to state sufficient facts to show that he had suffered an injury special to himself, and different in kind from that suffered by the general public, and a demurrer to his petition for that reason was rightfully sustained.

ERROR to the District Court for Garfield County to review a judgment dismissing as to defendant City of Enid an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the wrongful obstruction of certain streets. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. M. Dodson, for plaintiff in error:

An obstruction or interference with a public street or way need not necessarily be in front of or contiguous to the property claimed to be affected thereby, in order to authorize a recovery. It is sufficient if it is such an obstruction or interference as produces a diminution in the value of the property, as distinguished from mere personal inconvenience to the owner.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error is the owner of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 1, township 22 N., range 7 W., which lies northwest and outside of the limits of the city of Enid. Immediately southeast of his property, and separated from it by the intersections of two public highways, is an addition of the city of Enid, known as "Kenwood Addition." From the intersection of the highway running east and west along the south side of plaintiff's property, with the highway running north and south along the east side at the southeast corner of his property, there are three streets running into the city of Enid,—one running south, known as "Nineteenth street;" one running southeast, known as "Kenwood boulevard;" and one running east, known as "Chestnut street" or "avenue." These three streets begin at the intersection of the two public highways at the southeast corner of plaintiff's land. He brought this action to recover damages from the defendant city of Enid and the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company jointly, because of alleged obstructions placed in said streets by the railway company. He alleges that the railway company, under the authority and with the permission of the city of Enid, granted by an ordinance which he attaches to his petition as an exhibit, has constructed upon, across, and over said streets its line of railway and switch tracks, and by so doing has so obstructed the highways as to make the access to plaintiff's land more difficult, because of which the value of his property has been greatly depreciated. He further alleges that the railway company had negligently constructed its tracks upon said streets upon a different grade from that of the streets, and by embankments, ditches, and standing cars upon its tracks, has greatly obstructed public travel over two of said streets. The city and the railway company filed their separate demurrers to plaintiff's petition. The demurrer of the city was sustained, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that of the railway company overruled. Whereupon, plaintiff refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered by the court in favor of the city, dismissing the action against it. From that judgment this proceeding has been brought.

The ordinance by which the city granted to the railway company permission to build over the streets involved in this action grants to the company the right to use and occupy all of said streets for its main line of track through the city of Enid, and its switches, stations, grounds, and buildings, and for all other railway purposes and for a right of way, with the limitation, however, that the right of the public to travel over and across said three streets is reserved to the public. The ordinance provides that "the public shall be allowed the right to travel upon and across said right of way on the streets in this section named, and in consideration of the grant of the public grounds and streets in this ordinance given to said railway company, and the right to use and occupy said public grounds, streets, avenues, alleys, it is hereby made the duty of said railway company to provide a suitable place on each of said streets for a crossing by vehicles over each of its main and side tracks; said crossing to be properly made with planks to be laid between the rails, and extending 1 foot on the outside of the rails on each side of the track. . . ."

The theory upon which plaintiff seeks to recover is stated in the brief of his counsel in the following language: "The plaintiff in error brought this action against the defendant in error, defendant below, jointly for the recovery of damages sustained by him, alleged to have been caused by the defendant railway company obstructing and interfering with the ingress and egress to his property; and seeks to hold the defendant city jointly liable with the defendant railroad company for permitting the obstructions to be placed and maintained in the streets and highways directly communicating with plaintiff's premises."

The title to the streets involved in this action is not in the abutting owners, but is in the municipality in trust for the use and benefit of the public for the purpose of public highways. Municipal corporations of the territory had, and of the state now have, by virtue of § 118, art. 9, chap. 18, Wilson's Stat. 1903, authority to grant railway companies the use of the streets of such corporations for railway purposes, to be used in common with the traveling public, consistent, with the rights of abutting property owners. Foster Lumber Co. v. Arkansas Valley & W. R. Co. 20 Okla. 583, 95 Pac. 224, 100 Pac. 1110; Blackwell, E.

& S. W. R. Co. v. Gist, 18 Okla. 516, 90 Pac. 889. Plaintiff does not deny that the city of Enid had the power to enact the ordinance granted to the railway company in this case, permitting the railway company to occupy the streets with its tracks, but he insists that if, in the exercise of this right granted to the railway company, it commits acts that result in injury to plaintiff's property, the city is liable therefor. The weight of authority supports the rule that where a railway company, under legislative authority from a municipal corporation, constructs upon the streets or public highways of a city, its railway tracks, and operates its trains thereon in a reasonable, proper, and lawful manner, the city is not liable for injury resulting to private rights.

In Murphy v. Chicago, 29 Ill. 279, 81 Am. Dec. 307, it was said: "It is the settled law of this court, as well as in most of the other states of this Union, that it is a legitimate use of a street or highway to allow a railway track to be laid down in it, and for doing so the city is not liable for any damages which may accrue to individuals." Other cases in point and to the same effect are: Sorensen v. Greeley, 10 Colo. 369, 15 Pac. 803; Frith v. Dubuque, 45 Iowa, 406. The same rule is declared by Judge Brewer, speaking for the supreme court of Kansas, in Hedrick v. Olathe, 30 Kan. 348, 1 Pac. 118, under a statute identically the same as the one existing in this state.

Discussing the same question, the supreme court of Colorado in Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6, said: "But the construction of an ordinary railroad is not, as we have found, an improvement of the street for the convenience and benefit of the local public. It is a private enterprise, for private profit. True, the city attaches certain conditions to the license granted, such as that the roadbed shall be upon a certain grade, that culverts shall be constructed for the gutters, and planks laid at the crossings, but otherwise the municipal authorities do not control the enterprise; whether we term the railroad company purely a private, or whether we call it a quasi public, corporation, the situation remains unchanged. In constructing and operating the road it is acting for itself, and not for the city. It is no more the city's agent than is the individual licensed by ordinance or resolution to engage in some legitimate private business requiring such license or authority. If the railroad company disobey the law in building or operating its road, the city is no more responsible therefor than it would be for a tort 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) of the private individual in the pursuit of his business aforesaid."

The rule of the foregoing authorities is sound in principle and is supported by good reason; but a grant to a railway company by the legislative department of the state or by a municipal corporation, of authority to construct its railway tracks upon the streets or public highways, is not an authorization to the company to violate private rights. Such authorization relieves the company only from liability to suit, civil or criminal, at the instance of the government, but the licensee must respond in damages for injury resulting to private rights. Foster Lumber Co. v. Arkansas Valley & W. R. Co. supra; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719. The only right granted by such acts of authorization is one against the public, and not against the private rights of individuals. That the state or a municipal corporation acting under legislative authority may grant such right is too well settled to require the citation of authorities, and to hold that a municipal corporation having the power to grant such right may, for the mere act of granting it, be penalized, would be a legal inconsistency. But plaintiff insists in his brief that defendant is liable for the reason that the railway company, in the exercise of the right granted to it to lay its tracks on the streets of defendant, has unreasonably and in an improper manner constructed its tracks across two of the streets, and permitted its cars to stand upon said tracks across said streets, so as to hinder and obstruct public travel thereon, and to make the access to his property more difficult and inconvenient. License to a railway company by a city to construct its tracks upon the streets and in the public highways of a city must be exercised in a reasonable and proper manner, and does not give to the railway company authority to monopolize the streets, and to construct its tracks or operate its trains thereon in negligent, unreasonable manner, without regard to the rights of the traveling public and of abutting property owners. It must exercise the right granted with due regard to the rights of the public, and if, by failure to do so, it obstructs the streets or highways, it renders itself subject to prosecution for the maintenance of a public nuisance, and if any individual suffers special and peculiar injury therefrom, he has a right of action to restrain the nuisance and to recover damages for his injury. Ottawa, O. C. & C. G. R. Co. v. Larson, 40 Kan. 301, 2 L. R. A. 59, 19 Pac. 661.

Plaintiff's petition does not allege with fullness the acts it charges the railway company with having committed, that create the obstruction upon the streets leading to his property; but the allegations of his petition are to the effect that upon two of these named streets, leading across the addition from the city into the public highways upon which plaintiff's property abuts, the railway company has constructed, in an unreasonable manner, embankments and ditches upon which it has laid its tracks, and over which it has failed to provide and maintain crossings in compliance with the contract with the city; and that it has permitted and now permits cars to stand upon said tracks, all of which results in blocking said streets and so obstructing same that plaintiff is required to go to and from his premises by a more circuitous and inconvenient route, and has rendered his farm less suitable for an addition to the city, and has depreciated its value. Whether plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action for damages for said alleged injuries involves two questions. First, whether the alleged nuisance maintained by the railway company in the streets results in special and peculiar injury to plaintiff, for which he has his right of action against the railway company for damages; and, second, if he has such right of action against the railway company, is the city likewise liable to him in a similar action against it, for the reason that the city has permitted the alleged public nuisance to be maintained in violation of its ordinance granting the license to the railway company, and after notice to it of the maintenance thereof? It will follow that if the acts charged against the railway company are insufficient to give a right of action for damages in favor of plaintiff against the railway company, none exists against the city, and we shall therefore consider that question first.

A railway constructed upon the streets of a city or public highway, under legislative authority, is not a nuisance per se, but it may become such by reason of the manner of construction or of its operation. It is unnecessary to determine how much of a street a railway company might appropriate to its exclusive use under legislative license without any limitation upon its rights in the ordinance granting such license; for, in the case at bar, it is specifically provided by the ordinance granting to the railway company permission to build upon the streets of the city, that the public shall be allowed the right of travel upon and across said streets, and that the railway company shall provide suitable places on each of said streets for crossings, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) that its right to use and occupy the streets shall be subject to the rights of public travel.

Section 4751 of the Compiled Laws of 1909 defines a nuisance to consist in unlawfully doing an act or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission, among other things, "unlawfully interferes with, obstructs, or tends to obstruct, or renders dangerous for passage, any lake or navigable river, bay, stream, canal, or basin, or any public park, square, street, or highway." The terms of the ordinance clearly do not except the railway company from the operations of this statute, except in so far as it constructs and operates its line of railway in a reasonable and proper manner. Section 4751 provides three remedies against a public nuisance: First, indictment; second, civil actions; third, abatement. Section 4760 provides that a private person may maintain an action for a public nuisance if it is especially injurious to himself; but not otherwise. This provision of the statute is in harmony with the common-law rule. As to what are special damages flowing from a public nuisance, for which a private individual may recover, the rule is that the injury from which they result must be different in kind, not merely degree, from that suffered by the general public from the act complained of. Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403; Decker v. Evansville Suburban & N. R. Co. 133 Ind. 493, 33 N. E. 349; Gundlach v. Hamm, 62 Minn. 42, 64 N. W. 50; Tilly v. Mitchell & L. Co. 121 Wis. 1, 105 Am. St. Rep. 1007, 08 N. W. 969. "It is not," says Mr. Wood in his treatise on Nuisance, "that he has sustained more damage than another; it must be of a different character, special and apart from that which the public in general sustain; and not such as is common to every person who exercises the right that is injured." Wood, Nuisance, ¶ 646. The statement of the rule is easier than the application of it. It is often difficult to determine whether the injury to an individual from a public nuisance is or is not a kind that gives him a right of private action to recover damages therefor. The authorities generally hold that the injury resulting from an obstruction in a street or public highway in front of an abutting owner's property, which interferes with his ingress or egress to and from his property, is a special injury to him; and many authorities hold that, although the obstruction be not in front of the abutting property, if it be in such proximity to it, upon the street or highway upon which the property abuts, that the abutting owner's use and enjoyment of the property is destroyed or greatly interfered with, and its value depreciated, this injury is special and peculiar to him. And it has been held that injury to property, the access to which has been interfered with by an obstruction, although the property be not adjoining the highway or street upon which the obstruction exists, if such street or highway is the owner's only means of access to the property, is a special injury, and the owner may recover therefor. Bembe v. Anne Arundel County, 94 Md. 321, 57 L.R.A. 279, 51 Atl. 179. But the facts in the case at bar do not bring it within any of these classes. Plaintiff's property does not abut upon any of the streets obstructed. It abuts only upon public highways into which said streets lead. He has no private easement in the streets obstructed, such as an abutting property owner has; his right therein, violation of which he complains, is one common to all the public. Plaintiff owns property in the vicinity of these highways, and the value of his right to travel over these may be of greater value to him than the value of the same right to others who have no property in the same vicinity; but this is a difference only in degree, and not in kind. He does not allege that the streets obstructed constitute the only means of access to the property, or that the obstruction complained of cuts off his communication with the city. On the other hand, of the three streets named by him as crossing the additions of the city, and leading to the highways adjoining his farm, he has charged that only two of them have been so obstructed by the railway company as to interfere with public travel over them, and it may be presumed that the remaining street furnishes him adequate means of access to his farm from the city, and, if it does not do so, it could not be presumed, in the absence of allegation to that effect, that there were no other highways and streets affording to him means of ingress and egress to and from his property. In Houck v. Wachter, 34 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332, it was held that one who was compelled by an obstruction in the highway that led to his farm, to go from and return to his farm by a very circuitous route, to his great inconvenience, did not suffer such special damage as entitled him to maintain an action therefor, and the court said: "All the authorities agree that to support the action, the damage must be different not merely in degree, but different in kind, from that suffered in common, hence, it has been well settled that, though the plaintiff may suffer more inconvenience than others from the obstruction, by reason of his proximity to the highway, that will not entitle him to maintain an action."

In Guttery v. Glenn, 201 Ill. 275, 66 N. E. 305, the closing of a street by the board of trustees of a town was held to be a public nuisance, but that a private person whose property was not adjacent to the street closed, and to which the street did not afford direct access, could not enjoin the action of the trustees merely because, by closing the street, he would be inconvenienced in going from his premises to certain parts of the town. Other cases in point are; McCowan v. Whitesides, 31 Ind. 235; Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598; Shaubut v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 502; Aldrich v. Wetmore, 52 Minn. 164, 53 N. W. 1072; Zettel v. West Bend, 79 Wis. 316, 24 Am. St. Rep. 715, 48 N. W. 379; Dantzer v. Indiana Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L. R. A. 769, 50 Am. St. Rep. 343, 39 N. E. 223; Kinnear Mfg. Co. v. Beatty, 65 Ohio St. 264, 87 Am. St. Rep. 600, 62 N. E. 341; Stoutemeyer v. Sharp, 89 Ark. 175, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74, 116 S. W. 189; Guilford v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 94 Minn. 108, 102 N. W. 365; Van Buskirk v. Bond, 52 Or. 234, 96 Pac. 1103.

The facts in Shaubut v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. and Guilford v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. supra, are very similar to the facts in the case at bar. In the Shaubut Case, plaintiff owned unplatted lands which adjoined the limits of a city. The street obstructed ended at the boundary line of plaintiff's property; the only difference between that case and the case at bar being that in the Shaubut Case the end of the street obstructed was contiguous to the plaintiff's land, whereas in the case at bar the streets and highways are adjacent to plaintiff's land. In the Guilford Case, the street obstructed intersected a street that was adjacent to plaintiff's property. In each of these cases plaintiff's means of communication with the city from his property was made more inconvenient, but recovery of damages therefor was denied, because his injury was held not to be special and peculiar to him. Plaintiff in the case at bar alleges that he has suffered great injuries and damages "which are peculiar to himself alone, and that are not shared by the public generally." This statement is nothing more than the averment of a legal conclusion. The averment of probative facts contained in the petition fails to show that he has sustained an injury different in kind from that experienced by the public at large. Van Buskirk v. Bond, supra.

We are therefore of the opinion that plaintiff's petition fails to show that he has suffered any special injury from the public nuisance charged in his petition, for which he can recover from those guilty of maintaining it. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether, if he had suffered such special injury as would entitle him to recover against the railway company, the city would be liable, because it had suffered in violation of the ordinance granting to the railway company the right to lay its tracks upon the streets, the obstruction to be maintained after notice to it of its existence.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

A telephone company cannot refuse to serve one who offered to pay its rates and comply with its reasonable rules and regulations, for the purpose of coercing payment of a debt contracted for service rendered in the past.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County entered on a directed verdict for defendant in an action brought to recover a statutory penalty for alleged discrimination by defendant against plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. E. Williams, Austin & Danaher, and Palmer Danaher for appellant.

Mr. Walter J. Terry, for appellee:

A telephone company may remove the instrument or discontinue the service because of nonpayment of telephone rentals or tolls at the time required by the contract or regulations of the company.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Adelia P. Danaher brought this action against the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company to recover the statutory penalty for discrimination against the plaintiff by refusing to furnish her telephone service for a period of forty days. Plaintiff alleged in her complaint that she Note. — Right to refuse telephone service to coerce payment of bill.

There is nothing to compel a telephone company to furnish telephone service to one who will not pay for it, and a regulation that, in case a patron is in default, service will be denied, is reasonable and may be enforced. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin, 27 Ind. App. 62, 59 N. E. 327; Irvin v. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. 161 Ind. 524, 69 N. E. 258; Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Hobart, 89 Miss. 252, 119 Am. St. Rep. 702, 42 So. 349; Malochée v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 49 La. Ann. 1690, 22 So. 922; Magruder v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 92 Miss. 716, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 500, 46 So. 404; Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Baker, 85 Miss. 486, 37 So. 1012; Buffalo County Teleph. Co. v. Turner, 82 Neb. 841, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 693, 130 Am. St. Rep. 699, 148 N. W. 1064.

The reason for the rule is that the law compels a telephone company to furnish efficient service without discrimination under reasonable regulations, and since it can maintain an efficient service only through prompt payment of its dues and tolls, the use of the summary remedy of denying service for nonpayment is reasonable. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin and Irvin v. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. supra.

And telephone service may be refused for nonpayment of rental, despite the company's indebtedness to the subscriber, where the rule is reasonable. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin; Irvin v. Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co.; and Buffalo County Teleph. Co. v. Turner.—supra.

In State ex rel. Goodwine v. Cadwallader, 172 Ind. 619, 87 N. E. 644, affirmed on rehearing in 172 Ind. 644, 89 N. E. 319, it was said that, in case of dispute over a is, "and for many years has been a subscriber to the defendant's telephone exchange in Little Rock, and as such had a telephone instrument in her residence, furnished by defendant, and was at all times upon her call furnished with connections to all other telephones in said exchange until March 30, 1908, when the defendant disconnected said telephone and arbitrarily refused to permit plaintiff to use same, continuing so to refuse her service until the 8th day of May, 1908, when it again connected her telephone with its exchange; that plaintiff paid defendant the rent upon said telephone for said months of March, April, and May, 1908, and fully complied with all of defendant's rules and regulations; that defendant refused to permit plaintiff to use said telephone during all of said time from March 30, 1908, to May 8, 1908, both days included, and refused on each and all of said dates to answer any call made by plaintiff through said telephone, or to call plaintiff at the request of any other subscriber asking for connection with said telephone; that, by virtue of the statutes of this state, it is made the duty of defendant to furnish all appliquestion of indebtedness, the remedy of the patron is to pay under protest the amount demanded, and sue for excess; that the patron cannot compel service by mandamus to enforce his agreement.

But other cases take the view that such a regulation cannot be made the instrument by which the telephone company can become the judge in its own case, and refuse service to enforce payment of disputed bills. State ex rel. Payne v. Kinloch Teleph. Co. 93 Mo. App. 349, 67 S. W. 684; State ex rel. Webster v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404, 32 N. W. 237.

In the last cited case it appeared that the telephone was removed because of relator's refusal to pay for its use during the time the company was in default in furnishing him with a directory or list of its subscribers with their numbers, which the relator claimed was essential to the profitable use of the telephone, and which it was the custom of the company to furnish to its subscribers, and that, upon relator's subsequent application to become a subscriber, and to have an instrument placed in his office, it was insisted that relator's conduct relieved the company from any obligation to furnish telephone service. It was held upon application for mandamus to compel the company to furnish telephone service, that the mere fact of a misunderstanding with those who desire to receive its benefits will not relieve the company from the discharge of those duties; that if the relator was indebted to the respondent for the use of its telephone, the law gives an adequate remedy by an action for the amount due.

And so, also, in Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Luckett (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 856, it was held that a telephone company, being a public service corporation, cannot refuse service to a patron who offers to pay the customary rental, because he owed the company for past services for which he had failed or refused to pay.

Nor can such regulation be used as a means to enforce payment which it is not the duty of the subscriber to pay. Thus, a telephone company cannot refuse to continue to furnish telephone service on the ground that there is an amount due from the complainant's wife for the use of another telephone. Cumberland Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Hobart, supra. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the above case it was also said that even if the complainant was indebted to the company for telephone service rendered under a separate contract, the company could only put an end to that contract wherein there was default; that the failure to pay a telephone bill on one house does not authorize discontinuing service from the other, where the service is rendered under separate contracts.

In State ex rel. Payne v. Kinloch Teleph. Co. supra, the right of the telephone company to enforce a regulation requiring pay for back service before restoring a telephone was denied, where it failed to perform the required service, and the party was not notified of the regulation at the time he originally contracted to have the telephone placed in his house. The court said: "Without deciding whether a previous failure to pay the rent, either from dishonesty or inability, would justify a telephone company in refusing to again install an instrument removed on account of the default, until it was made whole for the back rent and cost of installation, we do decide and hold that when the customer is solvent, and it is fairly doubtful if any back rent is owing, or, as in this case, when the subscriber has paid for all the service he got (and there is practically no testimony that these appellants owe anything, while they are shown to be financially responsible), a company cannot insist on that condition,—cannot be judge in its own case and decide the dispute."

And the fact that the applicant had violated a former contract with the company, to use its system exclusively, is no ground for the company's refusing the service. State ex rel. Gwynn v. Citizens' Teleph. Co. 61 S. C. 83, 55 L.R.A. 139, 85 Am. St. Rep. 870, 39 S. E. 257; Gwynn v. Citizens' Teleph. Co. 69 S. C. 434, 67 L.R.A. 111, 104 Am. St. Rep. 819, 48 S. E. 460.

But in Rushville Co-op. Teleph. Co. v. Irvin, supra, it was said obiter that telephone service could be refused as long as the patron refused to pay the rental for the preceding month.

Upon the question of the right to withdraw telephone service because of abuse of privilege, see note to Huffman v. Marcy Mut. Teleph. Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1010.

cants telephone connections, service, and facilities without discrimination or partiality, provided such applicants comply with all of defendant's reasonable rules and regulations; that the defendant discriminated against plaintiff each day of said period of forty days, in this: that other persons who were subscribers to said telephone exchange were permitted to use their telephone at their residences, and were given connections through said exchange, provided they paid to defendant the rental price for such telephones and service as plaintiff did; and that such other subscribers were permitted to have connection with the telephones of other subscribers in the city of Little Rock and elsewhere, for the purpose of transmitting messages and communicating through said telephones to all persons having telephones, upon their payment of an amount of money equal to that paid by plaintiff for like service during said period, while, during the above-mentioned period, and on each and every day thereof, the defendant refused to allow the plaintiff to use her telephone and kept it disconnected from its switchboard, so that no call made by plaintiff was received at the exchange of defendant, and defendant, during all of said time, refused to connect plaintiff's telephone with that of any other subscriber; that during all of said time, defendant furnished to other subscribers in like situation such service and connections; that, by reason of such discrimination, defendant has subjected itself to a penalty of $100 for each and every day during said period, and plaintiff prayed judgment for $4,000.

"Defendant answered, denying all the material allegations of the complaint, and stated that on March 13, 1908, plaintiff paid the defendant $2, for which it receipted her, and, at that time and on several prior occasions, it notified her that there was a balance of $4 due defendant from plaintiff for two months' prior telephone rentals; that plaintiff denied this indebtedness, claimed to have receipts covering it, and promised from time to time to produce them, but failed and refused to do so; that one of its rules is to refuse telephone service to such persons as neglect or refuse to pay their telephone rentals for preceding months; that this rule is reasonable and necessary, and was known to plaintiff, and was part of a contract existing between her and defendant; that on March 20th it notified plaintiff that she was indebted to it for two months' rental, amounting to $4, and that, if same was not paid on March 30, 1908, here telephone service would be discontinued; that on March 30, 1908, plaintiff was again reminded of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) her delinquency, and again notified that if the bill was not paid, her service would be discontinued; that she failed and refused to make payment of such past due rentals, and for that reason service was refused her."

Mrs. Danaher, the plaintiff, testified that she resides in Little Rock, and has been a subscriber of the defendant for a number of years, and that she was a subscriber during the months of March, April, and May, 1908, and had a telephone in her residence; that she paid to the telephone company its regular charges for her telephone for every month since she first had the telephone, and that she paid the charges for March, April, and May, 1908; that the defendant, claiming that she was indebted to it in the sum of $4 for services rendered in some month in the past, and she claiming that she had paid it and refusing to pay it again, discontinued her telephone service on the 30th day of March, 1908, in the afternoon, until May 8, 1908, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when it was resumed, and during all that time her neighbors were furnished with telephone service. Other evidence was adduced by both parties. The court instructed the jury trying the issues in the case, to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, which they did, and judgment was rendered accordingly, and plaintiff appealed.

The telephone company, in devoting its property to a use in which the public has an interest, becomes a public servant, and is bound to serve the public impartially. It is like common carriers, in that it is bound to serve those applying to it impartially and upon equal terms.

In State ex rel. Webster v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404, 22 N. W. 237, the court said: "That the telephone, by the necessities of commerce and public use, has become a public servant, a factor in the commerce of the nation, and of a great portion of the civilized world, cannot be questioned. It is to all intents and purposes a part of the telegraphic system of the country, and, in so far as it has been introduced for public use and has been undertaken by the respondents, so far should the respondent be held to the same obligation as the telegraph and other public servants. It has assumed the responsibilities of a common carrier of news. Its wires and poles line our public streets and thoroughfares. It has, and must be held to have, taken its place by the side of the telegraph as such common carrier."

In Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Baltimore & O. Teleg. Co. 60 Md. 399, 59 Am. Rep. 167, 7 Atl. 809, it is said: "The appellant [the telephone company] is in the exercise of a public employment, and has assumed the duty of serving the public while in that employment. . . . The telegraph and telephone are important instruments of commerce, and their service as such has become indispensable to the commercial and business public. They are public vehicles of intelligence, and they who own or control them can no more refuse to perform impartially the functions that they have assumed to discharge, than a railroad company, as a common carrier, can rightfully refuse to perform its duty to the public. They may make and establish all reasonable and proper rules and regulations for the government of their offices and those who deal with them, but they have no power to discriminate, and, while offering [themselves as] ready to serve some, refuse to serve others. The law requires them to be impartial and to serve all alike, upon compliance with their reasonable rules and regulations."

Section 7948 of Kirby's Digest provides: "Every telephone company doing business in this state, and engaged in a general telephone business, shall supply all applicants for telephone connection and facilities without discrimination or partiality, provided such applicants comply or offer to comply with the reasonable regulations of the company; and no such company shall impose any condition or restriction upon any such applicant that is not imposed impartially upon all persons or companies in like situations; nor shall such company discriminate against any individual or company engaged in lawful business, by requiring, as condition for furnishing such facilities, that they shall not be used in the business of the applicant, or otherwise, under penalty of $100 for each day such company continues such discrimination, and refuses such facilities after compliance or offer to comply with the reasonable regulations, and time to furnish the same has elapsed, to be recovered by the applicant whose application is so neglected or refused."

A telephone company, being a public servant, cannot refuse to serve anyone of the public in that capacity in which it has undertaken to serve the public, when such one offers to pay its rates and comply with its reasonable rules and regulations. It cannot refuse to serve him until he pays a debt contracted for services rendered in the past. For the present services it has a right to demand no more than the rate of charge fixed for such services. It transcended its duty to the public when it demanded more. State ex rel. Gwynn v. Citizens' Teleph. Co. 61 S. C. 83, 55 L.R.A. 139, 85 Am. St. Rep. 870, 39 S. E. 257; Nebraska Teleph. Case, supra; State ex rel. Payne v. Kinloch Teleph. Co. 93 Mo. App 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

349, 67 S. W. 684; Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Cos. § 251, and cases cited.

A tender or payment of the telephone company of its rate or charge for service or rent of telephone for any particular time, and offer to comply with its reasonable rules and regulations, would entitle the applicant to such service or rent. Should the telephone company incur a penalty by refusing to rent or render such service, it could prevent the increase thereof by renting or offering to rent the telephone, or rendering, or offering to render, the applicant such service.

The evidence adduced by the plaintiff was sufficient to entitle her to a submission of the issues in the case to the jury for a verdict. The court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. Reverse and remand for a new trial.

Petition for rehearing denied.

JOHN R. SMITH, Appt.,

v.

F. T. RUCKER et al.

(— Ark. —, 129 S. W. 1079.)

Bill of review — what necessary to sustain.

1. A bill of review is a bill or complaint seeking, after the lapse of the term, to reverse or modify a decree that has been made and entered in the cause, and must be based

Note. — Bill of review for newly discovered evidence.

As a general rule, the newly discovered evidence for which a bill of review will lie must be relevant and material, such as, if produced, might probably have caused a different determination, and which was not known to the party or his attorney when it could have been used in the cause, and could not have been discovered by the use of reasonable diligence. Newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative, or goes to impeach the character of the witnesses, is insufficient. 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 580; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 414, 418.

But a bill of review for newly discovered evidence is not a matter of right; court, and whether such leave shall be granted rests in the sound discretion of the leave to file it must be obtained from the court. The exercise of this discretion in granting or in refusing leave to file a bill of review for newly discovered evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, except for manifest abuse. The cases dealing with the question as to the necessity of a performance of the decree before bringing a bill of review, and as to what extent a perform-upon error in law apparent on the face of the decree, or on the discovery of new facts since the decree was entered.

Same — necessity of consent.

2. A bill of review cannot be filed without leave from the chancellor in whose court the decree was rendered.

Same — forgotten evidence.

3. There is no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit the filing of a bill to review a decree settling the credits to be allowed on a note given to a bank for money loaned to settle with the maker's creditors, because of newly discovered evidence consisting of items delivered to the bank for credit, but not credited, where the items were known to petitioner, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have been discovered, before the rendition of the decree, and which were merely overlooked or forgotten.

ance is a prerequisite, have been excluded. And so, also, the cases dealing with the question as to who may bring a bill of review have been excluded.

Purpose of bill.

A bill of review based upon newly discovered evidence is designed to accomplish the same purpose as a petition for a rehearing in chancery, or a motion for a new trial at law. Such a petition or motion must, however, be filed or made during the term, while a bill of review is filed only after the term at which the decree was rendered. Elzas v. Elzas, 183 Ill. 160, 55 N. E. 669; Watts v. Rice, 192 Ill. 123, 61 N. E. 337.

Bills of review are in the nature of writs of error, calling upon the court to review and reverse the former decree. Griggs v. Gear, 8 Ill. 2.

But bills of review differ from writs of error and appeals; the former being by the court which renders the decree, the latter by a superior tribunal. Poole v. Nixon, 9 Pet. 770, 9 L. ed. 305, Fed. Cas. No. 11,270; Camp Mfg. Co. v. Parker, 121 Fed. 195.

Necessity of leave to file.

—leave as a matter of discretion.

A bill of review for newly discovered evidence cannot be brought as a matter of course, but application for leave to file it must be made to the court in which the decree was rendered. Such bills are not favored by the courts. And the allowance of it, not being a matter of right in the party, but of the sound discretion in the court, is to be exercised cautiously and sparingly, and only under circumstances which demonstrate it to be indispensable to the merits and justice of the cause. Evans v. Parrott, 26 Ark. 600; Camp Mfg. Co. v. Parker, supra; Callier v. Shields, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 417; Johnson v. Offutt, 2 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the White Chancery Court refusing to file a bill to review a former decree of that court in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. J. Crabtree, J. W. House, and M. House for appellees.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The courts of Pennsylvania make a distinction in regard to newly discovered evidence and newly discovered matter, which is not recognized in any other jurisdiction, holding that a review may be had as a matter of right for new matter which has arisen after the decree, and it may be allowed ex gratia for new evidence as to facts on which the decree was grounded, which has been discovered after the decree, and which by reasonable diligence could not have been produced or used before the decree was made. Green's Appeal, 59 Pa. 235; Bishop's Estate, 1 Woodw. F. T. Rucker instituted an action in the circuit court against John R. Smith upon a note for $1,500, which it was alleged had been executed by Smith & Ward, a partnership composed of John R. Smith and A. C. Ward, to the Bank of Beebe, on March 4, 1904, and by said bank transferred to said Rucker. To the complaint Smith filed an answer and cross complaint, and also a motion to make the Bank of Beebe a party to the suit, and a motion to transfer the cause to the chancery court. The cause was transferred to the chancery court, and the Bank of Beebe was made a party to the action. In his answer and cross complaint Smith denied that there was anything due upon the note sued on, but alleged that it had been paid. He alleged that the firm of Smith & Ward had been engaged in the mercantile business, beginning in the year 1900, and that the note sued on was one of the debts of that firm, that the firm of Smith & Ward became financially embarrassed, and in 1905 filed a petition in voluntary bankruptcy. Shortly after the filing of said petition, F. T. Rucker, who was the cashier of the Bank of Beebe, suggested to the members of said partnership that they should attempt to make a settlement with their creditors, and that said bank would assist them by lending them the money to make the settlement, upon the agreement that the indebtedness due to the bank would be paid in full. That, in pursuance of said suggestion, a settlement was made with the

Whether or not leave should be granted to file a bill of review for newly discovered evidence rests in the sound discretion of the court, arising out of the circumstances of each case. *Jacks v. The court is at liberty to look into all the circumstances of the case, and if, upon full consideration of them all, it comes to the conclusion that opening the decree and rehearing the cause would be productive of mischief to innocent parties, or is for any other reason inexpedient, it may refuse to do so, though the facts, if admitted, would vary the decree. *Hughes v. In the Burch Case the complaint showed that the original plaintiff admitted that he had obtained a decree by default for more than was due, but did not allege that the complainant had lost any of his testimony, and it appeared that he had negligently omitted during the space of about five months to put in his answer, but, as he averred by his bill that he had a good and available defense to the merits, the decree was set aside and the complainant let in to answer on payment of costs; but on appeal the order setting aside the decree was reversed upon the ground that the establishment of such a lax principle of practice would be productive of deleterious consequences.

In Bartlett v. Gregory, 60 Ark. 453, 30 S. W. 1043, the supreme court held that they did not consider themselves bound by the exercise of the chancellor's discretion granting a bill of review, and, being of the opinion that the evidence in that case might have been discovered in time by the exercise of diligence, the case was dismissed.

In Craufurd v. Smith, 93 Va. 628, 23 S. E. 235, 25 S. E. 657, it was said that the court, before allowing a bill of review to be filed on the ground of after-discovered evidence, ought to be satisfied that the evidence relied on is new, and could not by ordinary diligence have been discovered prior to the date of the decree complained of; but when the court is so satisfied and allows a bill of review to be filed, those questions are finally determined, and are not open when the bill of review is heard upon the merits. Upon this question, see cases cited in subdivision, "Diligence in discovery of evidence,—when question may be raised."

Leave of court to file a bill of review must be granted in open court. Colville v.

creditors of the partnership, and that the Bank of Beebe advanced to the firm the money to pay off all other creditors. To secure the Bank of Beebe for the money thus advanced, they transferred and turned over to it certain notes and mortgages and the book of accounts of the partnership. He alleged that said Rucker, as cashier of the Bank of Beebe, had entire management and control of the collection of said notes and accounts, and that, from these collections and also from amounts paid by Smith, all the money advanced by the bank and all the indebtedness due to the bank, including the note sued on, was paid. The Bank of Beebe and said Rucker made answer to the cross complaint, denying that sufficient collections had been made on said notes and accounts to pay off the indebtedness of Smith & Ward to the bank or to pay the note sued on. They also alleged that, for the money advanced by the bank to pay to the creditors of Smith & Ward, two additional notes had been executed to the bank, secured by mortgage on real estate, and they sought a recovery upon these notes and a foreclosure of the mortgage executed to secure their payment. The testimony which was adduced upon the trial of that cause is quite voluminous. It was introduced for the purpose of showing the collections which had been made upon said notes and accounts, and the payments that had been made by Smith upon the indebtedness due by said firm to the Bank of Beebe and upon said note sued

The manifest purpose of the rule requiring a suitor to obtain leave before filing a bill of review is to prevent frivolous and vexatious litigation.

The fact that leave has been granted should be stated in the bill. Pendleton v. Fay, 3 Paige, 204; Lansing v. Albany Ins. Co. Hopk. Ch. 102.

In Hodson v. Ball, 1 Phill. Ch. 177, it was held that a bill of review filed without leave will be ordered to be taken from the files on motion.

In Henderson v. Cook, 4 Drew. 306, it was held that a bill of review filed without leave is demurrable for that reason.

To the same effect is Knight v. Atkisson, 2 Tenn. Ch. 384, where it was suggested that either remedy was available.

But in Webster v. Diamond, supra, it was held that where a bill does not appear upon its face to have been filed by leave of court, a motion to strike it from the files, and not a demurrer, is the proper mode of raising the objection.

After a defendant has demurred to a bill of review, he cannot raise an objection to the right of the plaintiff to file it. Hyde v. Lamberson, 1 Idaho, 539. To the same effect is McGowan v. Elroy, 28 App. D. C. 188.

In the Hyde Case it was said that a party, to avail himself of such objection, should move the court on his first appearance to strike the bill from the files or dismiss the suit.

Granting leave to file a bill of review does not estop the court to dismiss it on demurrer. McGuire v. Gallagher, supra.

A bill of review will be ordered to be taken off the file where it is inconsistent with the leave granted, as in the case where other objects than those comprehended in the leave are introduced. Buckingham v. Corning, 29 N. J. Eq. 238.

Petition for leave.

The proper mode of applying to the court for leave to file a bill of review for newly discovered evidence is by petition. The petition must state the facts clearly and distinctly, and be supported by affidavits of witnesses in support of the averments, so as to enable the court to determine whether or not the newly discovered testimony, when produced, will be of such a character as will make it controlling in the cause. Greer v. Turner, 47 Ark. 17, 14 S. W. 383; Finlayson v. Lipscomb, 16 Fla. 751; Dixon v. Graham, 16 Iowa, 310; Rowan v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ill. App. 434; Burch v. Scott, 1 Gill & J. 393; Vaughan v. Ch. 85; Berdanatti v. Sexton, 2 Tenn. Ch. 609; Burson v. Dosser, 1 Heisk. 754; Puryear v. Puryear, 5 Baxt. 640; Livingston v. Noe, 1 Lea, 55; McGuire v. Gallagher, supra; Griffith v. Hatcher, 77 Va. 600; Norfolk Trust Co. v. Foster, 78 Va. 413; Harman v. McMullin, 85 Va. 187, 7 S. E. 349; Taylor v. Easton, 103 C. C. A. 509, 180 Fed. 363; Thomas v. Rawlings, 34 Beav. 50.

The statements thus required to be presented in the petition under oath cannot be made by proxy. Only the applicant himself can state why he was ignorant of the particular facts previous to the decree, and that he used the necessary diligence to bring his application within the law.

In Quick v. Lilly, 3 N. J. Eq. 255, it was held that the court will not, before granting leave to file a bill of review, inquire whether the petitioner can prove the facts set out in his petition. If the facts and matters set forth in his petition, verified by affidavit, are such as to lay a sufficient foundation for a bill of review, it is all that is required.

In Long v. Granberry, supra, it was said that the bill might in most cases be so drafted as to embody all the requirements, on. Upon the trial of the cause the chancellor found that the total indebtedness of the firm of Smith & Ward to the Bank of Beebe and said Rucker amounted to the sum of $6,486.59, and that the total collections made by the bank and Rucker thereon, including all payments made by Smith and others for him, amounted in the aggregate to $4,072.83, and he entered a decree for the balance in favor of the Bank of Beebe and said Rucker. From that decree said J. R. Smith appealed to this court, and said decree was by this court affirmed on December 21, 1908.

On August 27, 1909, this application or petition was filed in said chancery court for leave to file a bill of review of said decree, upon account of new facts discovered since in which event, if properly verified, the application might be made by motion.

Nature of new evidence.

—materiality and weight.

By "material" is meant that the evidence must be of a character which would probably change the results of the cause if unanswered, or at least raise a question of so much nicety and difficulty as to be a fit subject of judgment in the cause. Purcell v. Coleman, 6 D. C. 87.

In Thomas v. Rawlings, supra, it was said that the question is whether the evidence is such as would have induced the court to make a different decree, when taken in connection with all the other evidence in the case.

In Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 314. Fed. Cas. No. 7,267. Judge Story said: "It is not sufficient that it is such as might be argued, with more or less effect, by way of a presumption, against or in favor of former testimony. But it should go further, and demonstrate that, consistently with it, the decree ought not to stand." To the same effect are Allgood v. Bank of Piedmont, 130 Ala. 237, 29 So. 855; Webster v. Diamond, 36 Ark. 532; Jones v. Robson, 30 Ga. 826; Boyden v. Reed, 35 Ill. 458; Walker v. Douglas, 89 Ill. 425; Lewis v. Topsico, 201 Ill. 320, 66 N. E. 276; *Jenkins v. the entering of said decree. The new matter thus set up consisted of certain collections and payments which it was alleged were made to the Bank of Beebe and said Rucker, and which had never been credited on the indebtedness due to the bank by said partnership, and which had never been presented upon the trial of the case. It was alleged that said Smith had, in 1905, delivered to said Rucker thirty-one bales of cotton to be applied upon said indebtedness, which had not been done; that Rucker had assured Smith that credit therefor had been given, and that, on account of his confidence in Rucker, he had accepted his word that it had been done; but since the rendition of the decree he had learned that this had not been done. The matter must be materially relevant and pressing upon the decree, and must be different from that of mere accumulation of witnesses to a litigated fact. Callar v. Shields, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 417.

In Long v. Granberry, supra, it was said that the rule that the evidence should not be merely cumulative means that, besides being additional evidence to the same point, it should be sufficiently strong to change the former result without reference to the evidence in the original case.

To the same effect is Burson v. Dosser, 1 Heisk. 763, where it was said that if the rule were otherwise, there would probably be but few seriously contested cases where grounds equally strong might not be presented, since the parties, after the trial and after discovering the ground upon which they failed, would too often discover that upon another trial they could maintain their side of the contest with more evidence and greater skill, which would open the doors to endless frauds and perjuries.

And in Brown v. Nutter, 54 W. Va. 82, 46 S. E. 375, it was said that newly discount it was alleged that no testimony had been introduced relative to the payment of said cotton on said indebtedness upon the trial of the cause. It was also alleged that Smith had, in 1905, made two deposits in the Bank of Beebe of $200 each, which were to be applied in payment upon said indebtedness, but which had not been done; that, at the time of making the deposits, he had received written acknowledgments thereof, or deposit slips, which he had turned over to his attorney, and that they had been lost by the attorney, and on the trial of the case had been forgotten. The other items set out are smaller in amounts, and like allegations are made relative to the payment thereof, and the reason why covered oral evidence, contradictory or cumulative in its nature, to be sufficient to sustain a bill of review, must be so indisputable as to be decisive of the case. To the same effect are Rowan v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ill. App. 434; Wieczorek v. Adamski, 114 Ill. App. 161; Aholtz v. Durfee, 122 Ill. 286, 13 N. E. 645; affirming 25 Ill. App. 43; Elzas v. Elzas, 183 Ill. 132, 55 N. In Webster v. Diamond, supra, it was said that new written evidence of a binding nature, such as newly discovered papers, may be sufficient to move the court to grant leave for a bill of review, though evidence of a cumulative character.

In St. John v. Alderson, 32 Gratt. 140, it is said that in determining whether or not evidence is cumulative, the courts must see if the kind and character of the facts offered, and those adduced on the former trial, are the same, and not whether they tend to produce the same effect. It is their resemblance that makes them cumulative. The facts may tend to prove the same proposition, and yet be so dissimilar in kind as to afford no pretense to saying they are cumulative.

Thus, where the issue was payment, it was held that newly discovered evidence of a witness who could prove that he saw the creditor receive the money on account of that particular debt was not merely cumulative.

testimony was not adduced relative thereto in the trial of the case.

A bill of review is a bill or complaint seeking, after the lapse of the term, to reverse or modify a decree that has been made and entered in the case. In order to file a bill of review, leave must be obtained from the chancellor in whose court the decree has been rendered. Such bill may be based upon error in law which is apparent on the face of the decree, or on account of new facts discovered since the decree was entered. If it is based upon newly discovered evidence, it rests within the sound discretion of the chancellor to grant or refuse leave to file the bill of review; but this discretion is subject to review upon appeal, if it has been abused. Jacks v. Adair, 33 lative, since it was dissimilar in kind, and, if true, was conclusive of the case. Ibid.

But in Burson v. Dosser, supra, it was held that new proof that defendant had admitted the debt was paid was merely cumulative testimony, where the issue had been payment.

In Diamond Drill & Mach. Co. v. Kelley Bros. 138 Fed. 833, it was held, in a suit for infringement of a patent belt fastener, that newly discovered evidence of a witness, corroborated by two others, that he had made and used a belt fastener the exact counterpart of that patented some four years prior to the application for the patent relied on, and that his use was persisted in intermittently for two or three years, was sufficiently material to reopen the case, and allow the filing of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, where under the law such prior use would affect the validity of the patent.

But in Blandy v. Griffith, supra, it was held that where the question of priority of invention was put in the original suit, evidence of other alleged anticipations than those set up in that suit is mere cumulative evidence upon the former issue, and such evidence after judgment is not a ground for granting leave to file a supplemental bill.

—parol testimony.

There appears to be some conflict whether a bill or review may be maintained upon the discovery of parol testimony. Traphagen v. Voorhees, 45 N. J. Eq. 44, 16 Atl. 193.

There are authorities which seem to hold that leave should not be granted to let in new oral testimony as to facts which were controverted on the final hearing, and that as to these facts nothing short of written evidence will lay a sufficient foundation for a bill of review. Lord Talbot in Taylor v. Sharp, 3 P. Wms. 371, held that the new matter must be a release or receipt, or something of that kind, for, unless the new evidence was limited to writing, a Ark. 161; Webster v. Diamond, 36 Ark. 532; 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 588. It is the policy of the law that a decree once solemnly entered should not be set aside or modified except for cogent reasons. The issues that are presented in a suit should be fully developed by the testimony, and it is presumed when a cause is finally submitted for determination and decree, that the parties have adduced all evidence of which they had knowledge, or which they could have known by the exercise of due diligence. Therefore it has been uniformly held that the new matter for which a bill of review will lie must be such as was not known to the petitioner or his attorney in time to be used in the suit, or could not have been known by the exercise of reasonable diligence. White v. Holman, 32 Ark. 757; Woodall v. Moore, 55 Ark. 22, 17 S. W. 268; Dumont v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 131 U. S. clx, Appx. and 25 L. ed. 520.

In the case of Bartlett v. Gregory, 60 Ark. 453, 30 S. W. 1043, the rule is thus stated: "Where a bill of review is for newly discovered matter, the rule now is that the matter must be such as could not have been discovered by the use of reasonable diligence, 'for, if there be any laches or negligence in this respect, that destroys the title to the relief.'"

A bill of review will not lie for evidence which was known in time to have been offered before the submission of the cause for determination or decree. It is the duty of the parties to present all such evidence, vexatious person might resort to a bill of review as a means to oppress his adversary, and to keep the cause from ever being at rest. This case was cited with approval by Chancellor Kent in Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124. And the Livingston Case was cited with approval by Mr. Justice Nelson in Southard v. Russell, 16 How. 547, 569, 14 L. ed. 1052, 1062.

This is the doctrine which the court of appeals of Kentucky laid down in Repass v. McClanahan, Hardin (Ky.) 342, and which Mr. Justice Story thought was supported by sound reason. Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 303, Fed. Cas. No. 3,856; Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 299, Fed. Cas. No. 7,267.

To the same effect are Bowles v. South, Hardin (Ky.) 451; Vaughn v. Hann, 6 B. Mon. 338; Brewer v. Bowman, 3 J. J. Marsh. 492, 20 Am. Dec. 158; Head v. Head, 3 A. K. Marsh. 121; McDougald v. Dougherty, 39 Ala. 409; Bradshaw v. Garrett, 1 Port. (Ala.) 47; Callier v. Shields, supra.

And the discovery of a receipt which of itself would have been inadmissible in evidence on the former trial, without parol testimony accompanying and explaining it, is insufficient new matter within the rule. Bradshaw v. Garrett, supra.

There are other authorities, however, which expressly hold that any evidence, whether written or oral, and whether it relates to facts which were controverted on the final hearing, or to entirely new facts, which is so material and cogent as to convince the court that, if the new evidence had been before it on the final hearing, it is highly probable that a different result would have been reached, or a different decree would have been pronounced, will be sufficient to entitle the applicant to leave to file a bill of review. Massie v. Graham, 3 McLean, 41, Fed. Cas. No. 9,263; Thomas v. Rawlings, 34 Beav. 50; Long v. Granberry, 2 Tenn. Ch. 85; Perkins v. Partridge, 30 N. J. Eq. 559.

In Traphagen v. Voorhees, supra, it was said upon this question that no consideration of either justice or policy exists why 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

oral evidence, if it be of sufficient weight to convince the court that its decree is erroneous, should not be held to be a sufficient ground for granting leave to file a bill of review.

—whether new evidence must relate to matter controverted on the original hearing.

As to whether the new matter must relate to the matter controverted on the original hearing, there is conflict of authority. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 415, 416; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1577, note 3; Elzas v. Elzas, 83 Ill. App. 521; Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 313, Fed. Cas. No. 3,856.

In Anonymous, 2 Freem. Ch. 31, it was held that a bill of review should not be granted where the new proof referred to a matter which was particularly in issue on the original hearing.

In Elzas v. Elzas, 183 Ill. 132, 55 N. E. 673, affirming 83 Ill. App. 519, it was said that the newly discovered evidence must be such as relates to a matter in issue on the hearing,—not evidence to make a new case, but to establish the old one.

To the same effect are Boyden v. Reed, 55 Ill. 458; Vaughan v. Cutrer, 49 Miss. 782.

Thus, a decree granting a divorce on the ground of desertion, where the controverted fact in the case was the marriage of the parties, cannot be reviewed and reversed upon the ground that complainant had been guilty of adultery during the marriage. Elzas v. Elzas, supra.

But where the evidence sought to be introduced establishes a new fact of itself, decisive of the merits of the cause and necessarily changing the original decree, the rehearing should be granted. Owens v. Love, 9 Fla. 325. To the same effect is Partridge v. Osborne, 5 Russ. Ch. 195.

In Craig v. Smith, 100 U. S. 226, 25 L. ed. 577, it was said that there is no universal or absolute rule which prohibits the courts from allowing the introduction of newly discovered evidence under a bill of review, to prove facts which were in issue on the former hearing, but that the allow-and if, through design or inadvertence, they do not introduce such evidence, they will not be permitted to wait the determination of the issue, and then seek to again try the issue upon evidence which they have designedly or negligently omitted to introduce. Greer v. Turner, 47 Ark. 17, 14 S. W. 383; State ex rel. Nevada County v. Hicks, 48 Ark. 515, 3 S. W. 524; Boynton v. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. 84 Ark. 203, 105 S. W. 77; 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 530.

The issues that were made by the pleadings in the case upon which the decree was rendered involved the indebtedness that was due by the firm of Smith & Ward to the Bank of Beebe and Rucker, and also all payments that had been made thereon by Smith or by anyone for him or said firm, ance of it is not a matter of right in the party, but of sound discretion of the court, to be exercised cautiously and sparingly, and only under circumstances which demonstrate it to be indispensable to the merits and justice of the cause. To the same effect is Wood v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 334, Fed. Cas. No. 17,953, where the same rule was announced by Mr. Justice Story.

In Shelton v. Van Kleeck, 106 U. S. 532, 27 L. ed. 269, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491, it was held that new matter alleged to have been discovered, when it related only to the proceedings in making a sale, could have no effect on the original decree in a foreclosure suit.

It may be safely asserted that new matters of fact may be ground for a bill of review, although such matter is not capable of being used as evidence of anything which was previously in issue in the cause. Story, Eq. Pl. § 416; Dan. Ch. Pl. 1577.

It was held in Poole v. Nixon, 9 Pet. 770, 9 L. ed. 305, Fed. Cas. No. 11,270, that an entirely new title in a party claiming adversely to all the original parties to a suit in which a title was established could not be considered newly discovered matter for the purpose of opening the decree by a bill of review.

Under the ruling of Camden v. Farrell, 50 W. Va. 119, 40 S. E. 368, it is held that a bill of review based on newly discovered evidence does not lie to a decree by default, since the newly discovered evidence must bear on the issue involved in the suit, and on which the decree is predicated. This distinction is not made in the Federal practice, as shown by ruling in Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 59 L. ed. 105, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788; Acord v. Western Pochontas Corp. 98 C. C. A. 625, 174 Fed. 1019, affirming 156 Fed. 989.

A change of ruling by the appellate court on a question of law and fact is not new matter for which a bill of review will lie. Tilghman v. Werk, 39 Fed. 680; Bledsoe v. Carr, 10 Yerg. 55.

So, the vacating of a material collateral decree may not be new matter. Vetterlein v. Barker, 45 Fed. 741. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and all collections that had been made upon the notes and accounts of the firm. These matters were extensively developed by the testimony adduced upon the trial of the case. J. R. Smith gave his testimony, and deposed at length and in detail as to payments and collections for which he claimed credit. He was assisted in the preparation and trial of the case by able counsel. He was cognizant at the time he testified in the case of every item for which, in this petition for a bill of review, he now seeks credit. Before he gave his testimony in the case, and before the cause was submitted to the chancellor for determination, he knew the very facts and matters which he now sets up in this petition. These matters cannot therefore be said to be

But in Ballard v. Searls, 130 U. S. 50, 32 L. ed. 846, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, it was held that where the whole basis and foundation of a suit has disappeared by a decree rendered in another suit after the appeal taken to the appellate court, the appellate court will remand the cause to the lower court with instructions to allow the appellant, defendant below, to file a supplemental bill in the nature of a review, or a bill to suspend or avoid the operation of the decree upon the new matter arising from the reversal of the decree in the other case.

Upon the general question of bill of review because of newly discovered evidence, after affirmance or reversal by appellate court, see note to Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Gittings, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 865.

In Connolly v. Connolly, 32 Gratt. 657, the discovery of a written confession of one that a will was a forgery was held sufficient to sustain a bill of review to set aside the probate of the will.

—evidence impeaching witnesses.

Evidence which simply tends to impeach the character or impair the credibility of witnesses examined upon behalf of the successful litigant has never been regarded as sufficient ground for giving leave to file a bill of review. Traphagen v. Voorhees, 45 N. J. Eq. 41, 16 Atl. 198; Boyden v. Reed, 55 Ill. 458; Adamaki v. Wiczorek, 93 Ill. App. 357; Karsten v. Winkelman, 126 Ill. App. 418; Dixon v. Graham, 16 Iowa, 310; Foy v. Foy, 25 Miss. 207; Livingston v. Hubbs, supra; Kern v. Wyatt, 89 Va. 885, 17 S. E. 549; Southard v. Russell, supra.

And the discovery of new evidence or of new witnesses for the purpose of showing subornation of perjury of the witnesses at the former hearing is not generally regarded as a sufficient ground for allowing a bill of review. Society of Shakers v. Watson, 23 C. C. A. 263, 47 U. S. App. 170, 77 Fed. 512; Southard v. Russell, supra.

And this is especially the case where the credibility of the witnesses was directly put in issue at the original hearing. Ibid.

newly discovered since the rendition of the decree. Upon an examination of the record in the case upon which the decree was entered, we find that testimony was introduced upon the trial of the cause relative to a great number of the matters and items which are set out in the petition as newly discovered, and we find that some of the items of payment now set out in the petition were not only considered by the chancellor, but that credit was given therefor in said decree. The chancellor in said decree made a finding that Smith & Ward were entitled to credits amounting in the aggregate to $4,072.83. This sum consisted of a great number of different items.

In the testimony it appears that in some instances the different amounts of the credits are given, but the items thereof are not specifically named. It may be that these credits represent the items, or a great many of the items, of payment which are now set out in the petition for the bill of review. However this may be, it clearly appears that the matters which are now set out as newly discovered were known to petitioner, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have been discovered by him, before the rendition of the decree; that these matters were within the issues of the case, and could have been brought out by the use of any degree of diligence.

Under these circumstances we cannot say that the chancellor abused his discretion in refusing leave to file a bill of review of said decree.

The decree is affirmed.

And in Long v. Granberry, supra, it was held that new evidence to sustain the character of a witness examined on the former hearing is not new proof to sustain a bill of review, since proof of character which turns upon the knowledge of the neighbors and acquaintances may always be had at once, and also because the proof could not be otherwise than cumulative.

But in Brewer v. Bowman, supra, while holding that discovery of parol testimony to a matter in issue was insufficient to sustain a bill of review, but that testimony of a "permanent nature and unerring character" which, had it been produced on the trial, would have changed the decree, it was said by showing by record that witnesses, upon whose testimony the decree was procured, have been convicted of perjury, upon their testimony, given in the case sought to be reviewed, would be a sufficient ground for a bill of review.

Time of discovery.

The rule is that if the new matter has arisen or been discovered after the hearing in the original case, it may be brought forward by bill of review. The English rule of chancery formerly requiring that evidence of new matter, to authorize a bill of review, should have come to light after the decree, has been relaxed, and it is sufficient if such new matter be discovered subsequent to publication. Caller v. Shields, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 417; Cochran v. Rison, 20 Ala. 463; Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124; Evans v. Parrott, 26 Ark. 600; White v. Holman, 32 Ark. 753; State ex rel. Allan, 21 Gratt. 241; Durbin v. Roanoke Bldg. Co. 108 Va. 468, 62 S. E. 339; Ketchum v. Breed, 66 Wis. 85, 26 N. W. 271.

Numerous cases in describing the requisites for the filing of the bill of review state that the new matter must have been discovered after the date of the decree. It is believed, however, that in all the recent cases, and where the question was squarely presented, it is sufficient that it has come to the knowledge of the party for the first time after it was too late to produce it at the hearing.

In Cochran v. Rison, supra, it was held that an agreement entered into between the complainant and one of the defendants after publication of the testimony had passed, whereby the complainant, for a valuable consideration paid him by the said defendant, agreed to proceed no further against him in the original suit, and reserved his right to proceed against the other defendants, was proper subject-matter for a bill of review, and entitled the said defendant to relief against the original decree.

Not only must the evidence have been discovered after the taking of the testimony, but the fact must have been unknown to the party. It must not be such evidence of a fact as was known to the party and which he failed to bring forward for any reason. Vetterlein v. Baker, supra; Hill v. Phelps, 41 C. C. A. 569, 101 Fed. 650; Purcell v. Miner (Purcell v. Coleman) 4 Wall. 519, 18 L. ed. 459; Banks v. Long, 79 Ala. 319; McCrackin v. Finley, 1 Bibb, 455; Perkins v. Partridge, 30 N. J. Eq. 559; Costen's Appeal, 13 Pa. 292; Hartman's Appeal, 36 Pa. 70; Milligan's Appeal, 82 Pa. 389; Rittenhouse's Estate, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 313; Simpson v. Watts, 6 Rich. Eq. 364, 62 Am. Dec. 392; Hinson v. Pickett, 2 Hill, Eq. 351; Bledsoe v. Carr, 10 Yerg. 55; Cleveland v. Martin, 2 Head. 128; Larson v. Moore, 1 Tex. 22; Winston v. Johnson, 2 Munf. 305; Richmond v. Richmond, 62 W. Va. 206, 57 S. E. 736; Dousman v. Hooe, 3 Wis. 466.

Thus, a bill of review will not be granted because of the absence of witnesses, where the party knew the facts and the witnesses. Long v. Granberry, 2 Tenn. Ch. 85; Green's Appeal, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 66.

It was suggested in the case last cited that the proper remedy was to apply to the court for time to obtain the testimony of the witnesses.

And in Putnam v. Clark, 36 N. J. Eq. 33, leave to file a bill of review on the ground that the complainant had, since the decree, discovered the whereabouts of a material witness, whose existence and materiality she knew when she began her suit, was denied on the ground of the impolicy of allowing a renewal of the litigation.

So, also, the following circumstances were held to furnish no sufficient ground for granting a bill of review:

—where the discovery was made in time to have been brought forward in either an amended or supplementary bill. Barnes v. Dickinson, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 326;

—mere finding of papers of which the party had knowledge. Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. Ch. 127;

—discovery of new documentary evidence which was known before the determination of the suit in the appellate court. Stevens v. Dewey, 27 Vt. 638 (this case was controlled largely by statute);

—the omission to prove a material fact during the examination of a witness who had knowledge thereof. Evans v. Parrott, supra;

—a mere misapprehension of the effect of the evidence taken, or a mistake of the law respecting the admissibility of evidence, either by the party or by his counsel. Robinson v. Sampson, supra;

—erroneous advice of counsel. Franklin v. Wilkinson, 3 Munf. 112; Foy v. Foy, supra; —that certain documents on which complainant's right to a decree depended, and which he intended to exhibit with his original bill, were lost or mislaid by his counsel, and not found until after the decree against him. Jones v. Pilcher, 6 Munf. 425;

—matter that counsel omitted to claim through mistake. Triplett v. Wilson, 6 Call (Va.) 47.

—failure of officer to return a deposition in time for use. Miday v. Harvey, 9 Gratt. 458.

Diligence in discovery of evidence.

Another indispensable requisite is that the evidence on which the application is grounded must not only be new and material, but the applicant is bound to show that the nature, condition, or situation of the new evidence was such that he could not, by the use of reasonable diligence, have discovered it in time to have made use of it on the original hearing, so that the court 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may judge for itself whether or not reasonable diligence has been used, "for, if there be any negligence in this respect, that destroys the title to the relief." Story, Eq. Pl. 10th ed. § 414; Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 312, Fed. Cas. No. 3,856; Hughes v. Jones, 2 Md. Ch. 289; Perkins v. Partidge, 30 N. J. Eq. 559.

The material point is, not what the applicant knew, but what, using reasonable diligence, he might have known. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. Jr. 348; Hitch v. Fenby, 4 Md. Ch. 190.

In Adler v. Van Kirk Land & Constr. Co. 114 Ala. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 133, 21 So. 490, it was said that diligence in this respect is of the essence of the equity of the bill; laches or negligence is as fatal to relief as the actual absence of a matter of defense. The courts have uniformly and rigorously adhered to this qualification.

Such was the case of Young v. Keighly, supra, decided by Lord Eldon, where a strong intimation, if not positive opinion, is expressed by him, that, by refusing the application then made for leave to file a bill of review, he was deciding against the justice of that particular case, deeming it better, as he said, that individual injury should be inflicted than that rules established to prevent general mischief should be broken down. The same doctrine has been fully sanctioned by Chancellor Kent in Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 488, and by Mr. Justice Story in Dexter v. Arnold, supra.

The reason for this qualification of the rule is clearly expressed in Nichols v. Nichols, 8 W. Va. 187, where it is said that "if a party were allowed to go on to a decree without looking for evidence which might be obtained by proper search, and afterwards, by finding the evidence, to file a bill of review, there would be no end to such bills."

Whether or not reasonable diligence has been exercised must be determined by the court upon the particular facts and circumstances of each case. This question was passed upon in the following cases: Bradshaw v. Garrett, 1 Port. (Ala.) 47; Murrell v. Smith, 51 Ala. 301; Banks v. Long and Adler v. Van Kirk Land & Constr. Co. supra; Greer v. Turner, 47 Ark. 17, 14 S. W. 383; Bartlett v. Gregory, 60 Ark. 453, 30 S. W. 1043; Boynton v. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. 84 Ark. 203, 105 S. W. 77; Purcell v. Coleman, 6 D. C. 87; McGowan v. Elroy, 28 App. D. C. 188; Finleyson v. Lipscomb, 16 Fla. 751; Reynolds v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 42 Fla. 387, 28 So. 861; *McDaniel v. Diligence to procure the newly discovered evidence for the trial must be alleged by apt averments in the bill. Warren v. Adams, 26 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Greer v. Turner, supra, it was held that the bill should show that the plaintiff had not been guilty of negligence in failing to discover and produce the evidence at the former trial, by stating how and when he first came to a knowledge of the matters alleged, and the means that were used, if any, to keep him in ignorance thereof.

Where the diligence used is alleged to have consisted in making inquiries, the time, place, and circumstances must be stated. Hines v. Driver, 100 Ind. 315.

The reason for the rule is that the complainant must rebut the presumption existing against him, and this he can do only by showing that he made inquiries in the proper quarter and in due season. Ibid.

And the rule that the evidence must be such as could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence applies not only to the party, but also to his attorneys, solicitors, and agents, since notice to either of them is notice to the principal. Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 26; Gould v. Tancred, 2 Atk. 533; Jones v. Pilcher, 6 Munf. 425; Greenlee v. McDowell, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 481.

And there is no ground for a bill of review where the proofs showed that the evidence was in existence and accessible, and was probably not produced because not deemed material by counsel. Lafferty Mfg. Co. v. Acme R. Signal & Mfg. Co. 74 C. C. A. 521, 143 Fed. 321.

Nor will it be available for the reason that the party was prevented from offering the evidence by the advice of one of his counsel in the absence of the other. Franklin v. Wilkinson, 3 Munf. 112.

It is no excuse that the solicitor did not know the postoffice address of his client to enable them to communicate with each other regarding depositions taken by the other side, and to take necessary steps to prepare the case for trial by putting counsel in possession of the facts that would have shown the falsity of the testimony taken, since a special messenger might have been sent if necessary, for the party should have informed his counsel on employing him how his letters should be directed. Foy v. Foy, 25 Miss. 207.

Nor is the ill health of the party any excuse, since he might and ought to have sent an agent to his counsel if not well enough to go himself. Ibid.

The diligence and prudence required of ordinarily prudent litigants requires something more on their part than the mere employment of counsel, especially when they are given information which would put an ordinarily prudent person on his guard. Stockley v. Stockley, 93 Mich. 307, 53 N. W. 523.

In Ex parte Vandersmissen, 5 Rich. Eq. 519, 60 Am. Dec. 102, a bill of review was allowed where the evidence might have been produced at the original trial if the counsel had been astute and diligent; but there the new evidence was in a foreign language, it was decisive of the case, and the apparent negligence of counsel was excused by a change of attorneys.

Parties claiming through a general assignee are bound to inquire of him in case of a controversy for any facts in his knowledge bearing upon it, and failure to do so is such negligence as will defeat the right to file a bill of review for matter afterwards discovered. Ryerson v. Eldred, 23 Mich. 537.

And in Sayre v. King, 17 W. Va. 562, it was held that a surety cannot rely on his ignorance of a substantial defense known to his principal, unless he alleges in his bill and proves that he took proper steps to ascertain from his principal, or otherwise, the true state of the case, or that he was prevented from doing so by circumstances not under his control.

Although the party applying for a rehearing may himself have no merits because of his laches, yet, if it appears that the interest of innocent third persons or those for whom he is trustee may be injuriously affected, the rehearing will be granted. Hodges v. Mullikin, 1 Bland, Ch. 503.

With administrators who are strangers to the transaction, and who have to look after evidence to defend the estate, the same stringency in ruling as to knowledge of the facts ought not to be exercised. Owens v. Love, 9 Fla. 325.

In Harris v. Edmondson, 3 Tenn. Ch. 211, it was held that the rule requiring the exercise of diligence had been complied with where a personal representative of a decedent, having no knowledge of the facts, had twice examined the books and papers of the deceased without success, to find evidence on the subject, and afterwards, after the rendition of the decree, had accidentally discovered the evidence in searching among the same papers for another purpose.

In Re Houghton, L. R. 18 Eq. 573, it was held that an infant who petitions for leave to file a bill of review will not be required to give evidence that knowledge of the facts relied upon could not have been previously obtained by reasonable diligence. It was doubted whether it was necessary for an infant to obtain leave of court to file a bill of review.

But in Woodall v. Moore, 55 Ark. 22, 17 S. W. 268, it was held that the infancy of the plaintiffs will not exempt them from the rule of laches where their rights are asserted by their guardian or next friend, since they proceed under the eye of the court and are supposed to enjoy its care and protection, and conclusions therein reached are as binding upon them as upon persons sui juris.

The finding of a document since the decree, which would have been relevant evidence on the hearing, cannot sustain a bill of review where the party knew of its existence and contents, since it was his duty to prove its existence and contents if it could not be produced on the hearing. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Dunbar, 32 W. Va. 335, 9 S. E. 237. To the same effect is Wethered v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 436, 32 S. E. 209.

In Society of Shakers v. Watson, 23 C. C. A. 263, 47 U. S. App. 170, 77 Fed. 512, it was held that the failure to prove at the original hearing the loss of books, the contents of which were sought to be proved by secondary evidence, which, because of such failure, was excluded, was such gross negligence as would prevent the subsequent discovery of the books from being good ground for filing a bill of review, though it was shown that the books were in fact lost at the time of the original hearing.

In Repass v. McClanahan, Hardin (Ky.) 342, it was said that there is an important difference between the discovery of a matter or fact itself which, though it existed at the former hearing, was not then known to the party to exist, or which was not alleged or put in issue by either party, and the discovery of new witnesses or proof of a matter or fact which was then known or in issue. In the former case, the party not knowing the fact, and it not being particularly in issue, there was nothing to put him in the reach either of the fact or the evidence of the fact; and therefore the presumption is in his favor that, as the matter made for him, his failure to show the matter was not owing to his negligence or fault. But where the matter was known or put in issue, the party is put upon the investigation, and the presumption is strong that by using due diligence he might have shown the truth of the matter on the former hearing.

So, leave to file a bill of review was refused upon newly discovered evidence of which the party was sufficiently apprised by the suggestions in a letter and the proceedings in the case, to have enabled him with reasonable diligence to have put it upon the record originally. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. Jr. 348.

And in Banks v. Long, 79 Ala. 319, it was held that newly discovered evidence of a fact was not ground for a bill of review where it appeared that while the original suit was pending, and before final decree rendered, the complainant was informed by his counsel of a fact which ought to have put him on inquiry, and which, if followed up diligently, would have led to the discovery of the very fact which he relied on as newly discovered evidence.

In Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124, the issue was whether the land sold was as represented and fit for cultivation, and the petition for the bill of review stated that, since the decree, the defendant had discovered that several of the witnesses had mistaken the land in question, and had testified respecting lands adjoining thereto; that, since the decree, he had the tract in question surveyed, and that several intelligent persons had since visited it and declared it to be as he had represented it; but the application was refused, since defendant's attention was called to the very fact by the issue submitted under the pleadings, and he was bound to use reasonable diligence in bringing forward his proof on that point. To the same effect is Iler v. Routh, 3 How. (Miss.) 276.

In Warren v. Adams, 26 Colo. 404, 60 Pac. 632, it was held that the lack of effort to produce a witness at the trial will not be excused because the petitioners for a bill were led, by allegations in the pleadings of their adversary in the original suit, to believe that his evidence would be favorable to their adversary, and against the petitioners' interest, and that said witness would be produced by their adversary. The court said that, however diligent the adverse party may have been to produce the witness, it would not excuse the lack of effort on the part of those seeking to avoid the decree, since the diligence used to procure new evidence relied upon as a basis of a bill of review must be the diligence of the parties seeking the review, and not the diligence of their adversaries.

And in Novelty Tufting Mach. Co. v. Buser, 85 C. C. A. 413, 158 Fed. 83, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 192, it was held not a sufficient excuse for failing to take the testimony of witnesses known to have some knowledge respecting the matters in controversy, that they refused to state what their testimony would be, to entitle the party so failing to afterwards present their testimony as newly discovered evidence.

But in Becker v. Johnson, 16 Va. Law Reg. 615, 68 S. E. 986, it was held in a suit to declare a sale of stock void for false representations that a certain person had bought some of the stock, and had paid a certain price for it, that plaintiff's request to such person to testify as to whether he had made such purchase was the use of such reasonable diligence to obtain that evidence as should sustain a bill of review on the ground of the subsequent procurement of such evidence.

And in Diamond Drill & Mach. Co. v. Kelley Bros. 138 Fed. 833, it was held that the testimony of a witness with whom the defendants had been in conversation before the original decree, and from whom they represented to have obtained newly discovered evidence establishing a prior use of a patented device, as a defense to a suit for infringement, will not be regarded as accessible to the defendants by the exercise of due diligence, where it is shown that such witness had only been sought out in order to learn about other matters, and, except as he volunteered information, there was no means of knowing that he had any information with reference to such prior use which he then did not disclose.

And in Sutherland v. Gent (Va.) 69 S. E. 340, it was held that leave to file a bill of review was properly granted for newly discovered matter, upon application based upon affidavits of friends and neighbors of the parties to the suit, stating matters that would bring about a different result, which testimony the petitioner was unable to secure before the trial because of the witnesses' desire not to appear or take part in the controversy.

In Bradshaw v. Garrett, 1 Port. (Ala.) 47, it appeared that the facts requiring the new matter came to the knowledge of the complainants about a week before the trial term of the court at which the cause was heard, but as the record did not disclose enough of the attending circumstances to enable the reviewing court to determine whether there had been a reasonable time in this interim to have taken the necessary proofs, it was suggested by the court that, if, however, the distance of the residence of the parties and witnesses was such as to make it impracticable with ordinary diligence to take the proofs, yet it was incumbent upon the parties to apply for a continuance of the cause, and since no sufficient excuse was offered for that omission, the complainants could not disturb the former adjudication, even if the matters discovered could otherwise furnish ground for a review.—not having done everything which could be reasonably required, to avail themselves of the new matter during the pendency of the suit.

To the same effect are Hines v. Driver, 100 Ind. 315; Hood v. Green, 42 Ill. App. 664; Pendleton v. Fay, 3 Paige, 204; Huffacre v. Green, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 51.

Discovery of matter in public records which existed before the entry of the decree does not show a sufficient exercise of due diligence to entitle the party to a bill of review. Jorgenson v. Young, 69 C. C. A. 222, 136 Fed. 378; Acord v. Western Pochontas Corp. 98 C. C. A. 625, 174 Fed. 1019, affirming 156 Fed. 989; Gentry v. Thornberry, 3 Dana, 500; Dumont v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 131 U. S. clx. Appx. and 25 L. ed. 520 (record evidence in the archives of the government); Bennett v. Schooley, 77 Fed. 352; Kissinger-Ison Co. v. Bradford Belting Co. 59 C. C. A. 221, 123 Fed. 91 (records in the patent office); Watts v. Rice, 192 Ill. 123, 61 N. E. 337 (title of real estate); Harvey v. Murrell Harp. Eq. 257 (inventory and appraisement of the property of a decedent's estate).

But the failure of a party to a suit to discover that the authenticated copy of a decree signed by his adversary, and relied upon as res judicata, was incomplete, when a complete copy would have shown the invalidity of such decree, is not such laches as will prevent such party from availing himself of the invalidity of the decree upon a bill of review. Boynton v. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. 84 Ark. 203, 105 S. W. 77.

Some courts take the view that the question of diligence is necessarily a preliminary one, to be considered and passed upon at the time application is made for leave to file the bill upon the ground of after-discovered evidence, and being used and disposed of when the bill is allowed, it cannot be again considered on the hearing of the bill. Birdsboro Steel Foundry & Mach. Co.

v. Kelley Bros. 78 C. C. A. 101, 147 Fed. 713, affirming 142 Fed. 868; Lewellen v. Mackworth, 2 Atk. 40; Hodges v. Mullikin, 1 Bland, Ch. 503; Craufurd v. Smith, 93 Va. 628, 23 S. E. 235, 25 S. E. 657.

A denial in the answer, of the averment of diligence made in the bill, raises therefore an immaterial issue. Birsboro Steel Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Kelley Bros. supra.

But a different view is taken in Massie v. Graham, 3 McLean, 41, Fed. Cas. No. 9,263, where it was said that the defendant ought not to be concluded from contesting the facts on the hearing of the bill of review, by a preliminary proceeding.

Whether or not the newly discovered evidence could have been produced at the original hearing must be considered on appeal as having been proved by the evidence submitted below, and in the absence of the evidence produced on this question, the appellate court will presume that the case was brought within the requirement. Craig v. Smith, 100 U. S. 226, 25 L. ed. 577.

Damages — death of convict.

3. (November 7, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Drew County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's warden. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James C. Knox, for appellant:

There were two separate and distinct causes sought to be set up to in this action, one for benefit of the estate and the other for the benefit of the next of kin.

Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 53 Ark. 117, 7 L.R.A. 283, 13 S. W. 801.

It was therefore reversible error in the court to overrule the demurrer interposed.

Messrs. R. W. Wilson and A. J. Johnson, for appellee:

It was not reversible error to overrule defendant's demurrer. There was no misjoinder of actions.

Kirby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Mrs. Mattie Reynolds, administratrix of the estate of William Reynolds, deceased, for damages for his wrongful death, caused, it is alleged, by defendant's warden, in charge of his convict farm, where her intestate was detained a prisoner working out a sentence of fine and imprisonment for a misdemeanor committed, under the lease of convicts from Lincoln county, unlawfully and brutally whipping and beating him. The complaint contains two causes of action sufficiently alleged in separate paragraphs,—one for the benefit of the widow and next of kin of decedent, and the other for the benefit of his estate,—and in each of which damages are claimed in the sum of $5,000.

A demurrer was filed and overruled, and defendant answered, admitting that he was operating a convict farm leasing Lincoln county convicts, and that deceased Lincoln to his farm under said lease, and died there a week or two after arrival; denied that William Reynolds, deceased, was assaulted or whipped by W. L. Gentry, or anyone else, as alleged; denied all the other allegations of the complaint, "and he says, further, that, if the said Reynolds was assaulted or whipped by Gentry or any other person in any manner whatever, it was without the knowledge, consent, or direction of this defendant, and beyond the scope of authority of employment of said Gentry by this defendant; further answering, defendant says that he has faithfully carried out every item of his contract with Lincoln county in the matter of leasing prisoners, in relation to the said William Reynolds, that the death of the said Reynolds was due to natural causes that it was in no way due to any mistreatment by this defendant or his employees, that everything was done for the said Reynolds that could be done under the circumstances, that neither this defendant nor his employees are in any way responsible for his death, that the defendant is seldom about the farm, and knew nothing personally of his sickness until after his death, that as soon as his condition was discovered, everything that could possibly be done for the deceased was done by the defendant and his employees," and denied that plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages. The jury returned a verdict for the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) plaintiff for damages for the benefit of the widow and next of kin in the sum of $3,750. Defendant appealed.

The evidence shows substantially, that Mattie Reynolds was duly appointed administratrix. That she was the wife of William Reynolds, and they had three small children, two girls and a boy, of the ages of three, six, and seven years. That William Reynolds was convicted of a misdemeanor in Lincoln county, and sentenced to a small fine and imprisonment, and sent to the convict farm of defendant, T. F. Tillar, under his lease of convicts from Lincoln county, about July 8th, and remained there in the custody and under the control of defendant's warden, G. L. Gentry. That on the morning of July the 18th, the warden compelled him to take off his clothes and lie down across a log or block face downward, and whipped him on the bare back with a leather strap about 30 inches long, and from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch thick. One witness says it was an inch thick. This strap was fastened to a staff, and "Mr. Gentry handled the strap with both hands, over his shoulders," and struck deceased from twelve to fifteen licks hard, one witness says; and another that "he whipped him on the small part of his back. Gentry was standing by his side. I was standing right there. He had me here to hold him down if he bucked. The licks were hard. He hit him with both hands." That, after the whipping, he was sent to work, and the guard in charge of his squad said that he commenced complaining of his kidneys hurting him about 11 o'clock. That afternoon he acted like a drunk man, wanted to urinate frequently. "He complained of the small of his back hurting and his kidneys hurting him. He wasn't able to work. He was urinating all evening. Every five minutes he urinated blood. I sent for Mr. Gentry to come and get him. He came and got him. The man was dead when I got in." Reynolds died that night about 8:30 o'clock without any medical attention whatever. The witnesses who prepared the body for burial stated "we noticed a couple of black spots over the small of his back and back down otherwise on him. They were black spots about the size of my hand. Over his loins and down he was bruised pretty badly, from half way of his back down. There was a great big blue place on him right across the small of his back. They looked like they were very severe." That the beating might have and probably did cause his death. It showed, further, that Reynolds's wife and children were solely dependent upon him for support, that he was engaged in getting out staves at the time of his conviction, and shortly before for a number of months he had been making from \$50 to \$60 a month as a car repairer, the greater part of which he contributed to the support and maintenance of his wife and children; that he was strong and of sound bodily health, and had an expectancy of life of thirty-four years.

Rule 6 of the penitentiary board is as follows: "No convict shall for any cause be punished by whipping on his naked body; and no warden shall whip any convict except he be designated and authorized to do so by the superintendent; and a report thereof shall be made by the superintendent monthly to the board, together with the causes therefor, and a witness shall be called to all whippings, and in no case shall more than ten lashes be administered at any one time."

Several instructions given are complained of, but only error in giving the one numbered 2 is insisted on here. It is copied in the opinion.

The appellant raises three objections, contends that there was a misjoinder of actions, that the court erred in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 2 herein set out, argues that the evidence does not sustain the verdict, and claims that the verdict is excessive. There is nothing in the first contention. The actions could be joined and were properly brought together, and the demurrer should have been overruled. Kirby's Dig. §§ 6970, 6290; Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 53 Ark. 117, 7 L.R.A. 283, 13 S. W. 801. If two actions had been brought separately they could have been consolidated by the court. Act No. 339 of Acts 1905 Ark. Leg.; Mahoney v. Roberts, 86 Ark. 138, 110 S. W. 225; Ashford v. Richardson, 88 Ark. 124, 113 S. W. 808; American Ins. Co. v. Haynie, 91 Ark. 51, 120 S. W. 825. Did the court err in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 2? "You are further instructed that the employer who puts his agent or employee in a place of trust or responsibility, or commits to him the management of his business, is responsible when the agent or employee, acting within the scope of his authority, through lack of judgment or discretion, or under the influence of passion, inflicts an unjustifiable injury upon another, even though he go beyond the strict line of his duty or authority." The objectionable part of the instruction being the italicized words. We think not. It is undisputed that Gentry, the warden, was defendant's agent in charge of the convict farm at the time Reynolds was delivered to the farm, and at the time of his death, and for months thereafter, and that he was instructed to observe the rules laid down by the penitentiary board governing the convicts confined in the penitentiary, and charged by defendant not to depart from said rules in the management and punishment of the convicts placed on the farm. He had the authority to punish, and was acting within the scope of it when he inflicted the injury.

In Ward v. Young, 42 Ark. 543, 544, in discussing the liability of the master for the tort of his servant, this court said: If Hawkins' was clothed with the authority to protect the property, then his act was," inlaw, the act of Ward notwithstanding it may have been contrary to express orders. 'Having employed the servant to protect his property or to maintain his possession, he is liable for all the acts done in pursuance of such employment, and within the power implied therefrom, even though he expressly directed the servant what to do. Having set in motion the agency for producing mischief, he is bound at his peril to prevent mischievous consequences.' " Further: "It is not necessary, in order to fix the master's liability, that the servant should at the time of the injury have been acting under the master's orders or directions, or that the master should know that the servant was to do the particular act that produced the injury in question. It is enough if the act was within the scope of his employment, and, if so, the master is liable, even though the servant acted willfully and in direct violation of his orders." Continuing on page 553: "It is in general sufficient to make the master responsible that he gave to the servant an authority, or made it his duty, to act in respect to the business in which he was engaged when the wrong was committed, and that the act complained of was done in the course of his employment." "The master who puts the servant in a place of trust or responsibility, or commits to him the management of his business or the care of his property, is justly held responsible when the servant, through lack of judgment or discretion, or from infirmity of temper, or under the influence of passion aroused by the circumstances or the occasion, goes beyond the strict line of his duty or authority, and inflicts an unjustifiable injury upon another." Cooley, Torts, p. 538. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hackett, 58 Ark. 387, 41 Am. St. Rep. 105, 24 S. W. 882, this court said: "The question is, Was he acting in the course of his employment?" "If he was, the company is liable in damages for any wrongful act of his in the course of his employment, resulting in injury to another, though he exceeded his authority as such night watchman." "A servant may do an act expressly forbidden by his employer, and yet, if it be within the scope of his authority, the employer may be liable for a resulting injury. This rule is constantly enforced in the cases against railroads, electric light and gas companies, and it applies to private persons who employ servants to transact their business." Pine Bluff Water & Light Co. v. Schneider, 62 Ark. 116, 33 L.R.A. 366, 34 S. W. 548. This court, on a question of this kind, quoted with approval Clark & Skyles Law of Agency: "It is a well-established rule that a principal is liable for all torts, negligences, or rather malfeasances committed by his agent in the course of his employment and for the principal's benefit, although such torts or negligences are not authorized or ratified by the principal, or even though he had forbidden or disapproved of them, and the agent disobeyed or deviated from his instructions in committing them. . . . This rule is not based on the ground that the agent had authority, express or implied, to commit the tort, as is the case with contractual obligations binding on the principal; but it is based on the ground that in such cases the agent represents the principal, and all acts done by the agent in the course of his employment are of the principal, and is also on the ground of public policy that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer from the agent's wrongful act, it is just and reasonable that the principal, who has put it in the agent's power to commit such wrong, should bear the loss rather than the innocent third person." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Grant, 75 Ark. 585, 88 S. W. 582, 1133. There was no error in giving the instruction, and, on the whole, the instructions fairly presented the issues of fact to the jury. The evidence, although somewhat contradictory, tended strongly to show that the deceased was unlawfully and brutally whipped and beaten on his bare back with a leather strap 4 inches wide, and from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch thick, and about 30 inches long, attached to a staff or handle about 18 inches long, by defendant's agent and warden; that he wielded the strap with both hands, striking more licks than felons in the penitentiary are permitted to be whipped, and on the bare skin, even if against defendant's directions; that deceased was compelled to work thereafter in the sun till he reeled and staggered like a drunken man, and was sent from the field groaning with pain and urinating blood, and died that night early without being furnished any medical attention; that the beating might have and probably did produce death, and the jury so found, and the evidence amply sustains the verdict.

Is the verdict excessive? Was William Reynolds life of the value of $3,750 to his widow and minor children? He was a 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

strong man of sound bodily health, the sole support of his wife and children, about thirty-one years old, with an expectancy of life of thirty-four years, and shown to have been earning shortly before his death from $50 to $60 a month, most of which was contributed to the maintenance and support of his family, and the jury fixed the damages at that sum, which we do not regard excessive.

Finding no error in the case, it is affirmed.

(October 19, 1910.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Plymouth County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after directing a verdict for defendant of an action brought to recover damages for an assault alleged to have been made by defendant's servant upon plaintiff. Verdict set aside and a new trial granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. B. Snow for plaintiff.

Mr. Asa P. French, for defendant:

If the plaintiff's language or demeanor was such as in common experience naturally and ordinarily provokes or induces an assault, he cannot hold the defendant responsible for failing to protect him from the consequences of his own improper behavior.

Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 180, 8 Am. Rep. 311; Scott v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 53 Hun, 414, 6 N. Y. Supp. 382; Little Miami R. Co. v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 110, 2 Am. Rep. 373; Harrison v. Fink, 42 Fed. 787; Peavy v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 81 Ga. 485, 12 Am. St. Rep. 334, 8 S. E. 701.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, having entered the car and paid his fare, became a passenger, and when the evidence closed it was uncontroverted that he had been assaulted by the conductor, although the place of the assault was for the jury to decide, upon conflicting evidence.

During the first part of the journey, they engaged in a verbal quarrel, which resulted in ill feeling between them; but there was no testimony that, during the last half, the dispute was renewed, or that the plaintiff was told that if upon request he did not depart he would be put off when the car stopped at the turnout, where the conductor was to set a switch and display a signal light. If, as the defendant contended, and its witnesses testified, the jury were satisfied that the encounter took place after the conductor returned from the switch, they could find that the plaintiff, having passed from the car, had become a traveler, and the defendant would not be responsible for an injury then inflicted out of a spirit of vindictiveness for what had taken place on the car, or by anger aroused by the insult with which, as the conductor testified, the plaintiff then greeted him. Creamer v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 320, 16 L.R.A. 490, 32 Am. St. Rep. 456, 31 N. E. 391; McGilvray v. West End Street R. Co. 164 Mass. 122, 41 N. E. 116; Conroy v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 188 Mass. 411, 74 N. E. 672.

The plaintiff, however, contended that upon arrival at the turnout, he had reached the end of his journey, and prepared to leave, and the jury would have been warranted in finding upon his evidence that as he stood, with one foot on the platform and the other on the step, and while he was in the act of descending, the conductor who was standing on the ground at the foot of the steps, seized, pulled him off and knocked him down. If the turnout was his destination, or if, in response to the conductor's order, which the plaintiff said was given, he was leaving the car, as the evidence shows, without making any resistance, and in an orderly manner, the use of violence upon his person was unjustifiable. St. John v. Eastern R. Co. 1 Allen, 544. It is only where a passenger refuses to comply with a lawful order that, if he resists, reasonable force may be used to eject him. Coleman v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 106 Mass. 160; Conklin v. Consolidated R. Co. 196 Mass. 302, 82 N. E. 23, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 857. And if he uses violence on his part beyond what is necessary to prevent blows, or to protect himself from excessive force, the burden is on him to prove that his illegal acts did not contribute to the injury. Coleman v. New York & N. H. R. Co. supra. The declaration, which is for an assault and battery upon the plaintiff, alleges that the assault was committed by the defendant's conductor while the plaintiff was a passenger; and the answer, after a denial of these allegations, raised by further averments the issues that, if an assault was committed, the conductor at the time was not acting within the scope of his employment, or, if he was so acting, that the force used was not excessive, but justifiable in self-defense, to repel an attack by the plaintiff. But there is no evidence to which this last averment is applicable. It appears that neither in the car nor while passing from the car to the ground did the plaintiff threaten him with bodily harm, or lay hands upon the person of the conductor.

If the defendant intended to rely upon the defense that the plaintiff was rightly ejected with the use of no more force than was necessary, it should have pleaded the avoidance. It was not available under the present answer. Hathaway v. Hatchard, 160 Mass. 296, 35 N. E. 857; Dixon v. New England R. Co. 179 Mass. 242, 249, 60 N. E. 581. The conductor, if attacked during transportation, "undoubtedly would have been justified in using sufficient force to repel the assault and protect himself, and this defense would be available in the defendant's behalf when sued for his acts. New Orleans & N. R. Co. v. Jopes, 142 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 919, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109. It is plain upon the evidence, as it stood at the close of the trial, that a verdict for the defendant could not have been ordered, and, apparently with the consent of the parties, the judge submitted to the jury three questions, the answer to which it was assumed would be decisive of the defendant's liability. The first question, however, was not answered; and the answer to the third question simply having negatived any contention of the plaintiff that an attempt was made to eject him as he was leaving the car, the further issue, covered by the first question, whether he was assaulted before he ceased to be a passenger, was left undecided.

But if there was evidence that the assault took place on the car, the defendant, without any objection by the plaintiff that the defense was not open under the pleadings, took the position that a failure to answer the first question became immaterial, since, the jury having found, in answer to the second question that the assault was provoked by the plaintiff, it was not liable even if the contract of carriage had not been terminated.

The evidence leaves no doubt, and the defendant concedes, that the only provocation during transportation was the offensive language which the plaintiff addressed to the conductor; and it also should be borne in mind that the jury could find that not only was the battery disproportionate to the insult given, but the assault was not delivered at the time of the alleged provocation, if the assailant waited until the plaintiff was leaving the car. In other words the defense is that because the plaintiff, while a passenger, insulted the conductor by the use of abusive language, he contributed to his own harm, or invited the punishment inflicted upon him, and thereafter during transportation the defendant was discharged from any further duty to protect him from an assault by its servant. If the plaintiff's words absolved the defendant, then where a passenger purposely behaves in an insulting manner toward a servant, the passenger no longer can claim the protection of the carrier, but is put in jeopardy of a retaliatory assault at any time before transportation has ended, if such be the pleasure of the servant. He may be seriously injured or crippled for life, but has no remedy except to sue the servant, while, in the meantime, all other duties arising out of the contract must be reasonably performed by the carrier. By the plaintiff's contract, the duty rested upon the defendant of affording him full protection from unlawful violence at the hands of the conductor, to whom, as its representative, the management of the car had been intrusted. Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 117, 121, 6 Am. Rep. 200. In Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 180, 190, 8 Am. Rep. 311. Chief Justice Chapman, in speaking of his duty, said: "For the violation of such a contract, either by force or negligence, the plaintiff may bring an action of tort or an action of contract." And in the case of Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202, 213, 2 Am. Rep. 39, which was referred to in the opinion with approval, it was said: "The carrier's obligation is to carry his passenger safely and properly and to treat him respectfully, and if he intrusts the performance of this duty to his servants, the law holds him responsible for the manner in which they execute the trust. The law seems to be now well settled that the carrier is obliged to protect his passenger from violence and insult, from whatever source arising. . . . He must not only protect his passenger against the violence and insults of strangers and copassengers, but a fortiori against the violence and insults of his own servants. If this duty to the passenger is not performed, if this protection is not furnished, but on the contrary the passenger is assaulted and insulted, through the negligence or the wilful misconduct of the carrier's servant, the carrier is necessarily responsible."

It is to be presumed that the defendant did not authorize the acts complained of, and no question of the conductor's authority is involved. The plaintiff's contract was with the defendant, whose liability for the consequences which could have been found to have followed from neglect of its duty to protect the plaintiff, while he remained a passenger, from the conductor's violence, is established not only by our own decisions, but by the great weight of authority. Moore v. Fitchburg R. Co. 4 Gray, 465, 64 Am. Dec. 83; St. John v. Eastern R. Co. 1 Allen, 544; Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 121, 6 Am. Rep. 200; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 180, 8 Am. Rep. 1039; New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jones, 142 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 919, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109. It results from the application of this rule that the servant is justified in using force upon a passenger only to protect himself from bodily harm, but even then he cannot lawfully go farther than is reasonably necessary for his defense, and the proper management of the carrier's business.

If provocation by mere words, therefore, does not exonerate the carrier, yet, when sued for the assault, evidence of insulting language and insolent conduct of the passenger which induced the attack is admissible in mitigation of compensatory damages, where it appears that the provocation and the blow were substantially coincident. We find nothing in the cases cited by the learned counsel for the defendant which materially modifies or affects the conclusion to which we have come, except the case of Scott v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. 53 Hun, 414, 6 N. Y. Supp. 382, where a contrary decision was made by a divided court. But that case was doubted, criticized and not followed in Weber v. Brooklyn Q. C. & Suburban R. Co. 47 App. Div. 306, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1. The use of opprobrious and hot-tempered language by the plaintiff, even though it was justly provocative of anger, and with his partial intoxication, might have warranted his ejection as a passenger, did not justify the use of physical force upon his person by the conductor, whatever may have been the motive by which he was prompted, and the defendant's duty had not been discharged until the plaintiff had a reasonable opportunity to pass unmolesated from the car, and to depart. The substantial error of the trial arose from the assumption that under the circumstances verbal provocation was the legal equivalent of justification, and the special findings of the jury not having determined the rights of the parties if the assault was committed as described by the plaintiff, the court could not properly order a verdict for the defendant. Hurley v. Boston, 202 Mass. 68, 88 N. E. 586.

We do not find it necessary to consider more specifically the rulings given and refused, and in accordance with the terms of the report a majority of the court are of opinion that the verdict must be set aside and a new trial granted.

So ordered.

Carrier — termination of passenger's relation.

2. The relation of a passenger to a railroad company ceases when he has alighted from the train upon the platform at his destination, and proceeded far enough towards the exit from the company's property to be out of danger from the movement of the train, and necessity for further relation with the servants of the company has ceased.

The relation of carrier and passenger begins as soon as one intending in good faith to become a passenger enters in a lawful manner upon the carrier's premises to engage passage, and that relation continues to exist until the passenger has been made aware of his arrival at the place of destination, and has had a reasonable time to alight from the car and to leave the premises of the carrier.

When railroad companies, for their own benefit and protection, have certain employees commissioned as railroad policemen, they merely add a third capacity to the other two capacities in which their employees may act. All employees may do certain acts, either in their capacity as individuals or in their capacity as employees. Railroad policemen, duly commissioned, may also do certain acts in their capacity as peace officers of the state. The question in which of three capacities a railroad policeman acted does not differ, in principle, from the question in which of two capacities another employee acted. Both are questions for a jury.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assuming, as we must, that the facts are as testified to by the plaintiff, the case may be stated thus: Plaintiff had been a passenger on the defendant company's road, traveling from Wilmerding to Pitcairn, on the night of October 30, 1907, in company with one Boyer. He had gone from his home in Pitcairn to Wilmerding that day to hunt, and on his return brought his gun with him. Bledsoe, a policeman or patrolman in the employ of the defendant company, with one Reed, also a patrolman in the same service, boarded the same train at Wilmerding, and occupied the same car with the plaintiff and Boyer. When the train arrived at Pitcairn, all these parties alighted, the plaintiff and Boyer first, and, immediately following, Bledsoe and Reed. On either side of the place where the train stopped there is a paved platform for the accommodation of passengers. When the plaintiff was in advance of Bledsoe and Reed some 15 feet, moving over the platform to the subway, he heard Bledsoe say: "Hey there, Berryman." He stopped, and then stepped back. As Bledsoe approached, speaking with Reed, he again stopped, resting the stock of his gun on his foot or on the platform, and covering the muzzle with his hand. As he was thus standing, Bledsoe began shooting at him from a revolver, while only four or five steps away. The first shot took effect in his abdomen and prostrated him on the platform, another followed entering his groin, two more followed striking his right leg above the knee, a fifth struck him in his thumb. Bledsoe and Reed then ran from the scene, and the plaintiff was carried helpless to his home, where, upon examination, it was discovered that there were seven bullet wounds on his person. Plaintiff had given no occasion for offense; was behaving in a quiet, orderly way; had had no altercation with anyone, and had been guilty of no violation of law. The case was submitted to the jury with this instruction as to the law: "If you find this was an unprovoked assault and battery, or unprovoked shooting, without justification, and occurred in the manner in which the plaintiff has testified it did, and you find, at the same time, that Bledsoe was in the discharge of his duty as an officer of this railroad company, and was there at the time in the discharge of the duty which he owed to the defendant company, then you can find for the plaintiff." We are at a loss to construct out of these facts any theory which would justify this submission. Accepting the facts as we have stated them, the attack on the plaintiff was a wilful, wicked, and malicious assault with intent to kill him, or at least inflict upon him grievous bodily injury. The circumstances as detailed would be almost conclusive that the intent was to commit the more serious offense. It having been shown that Bledsoe was a policeman in the defendant company's employ, it may follow presumptively that he was present at the station in the course of his employment, and while there was on duty; but no presumption arises that every act he did while there was done in the discharge of a duty owing to the company. The evidence must show at least circumstances from which a jury can reasonably infer such facts, before the employer can be held answerable for the consequences. When it discloses circumstances which admit of no other inference than that the act complained of was both wilful and separate from duty, the individual committing the trespass alone is responsible. The law is thus stated by Mr. Justice Mitchell in McFarlan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 199 Pa. 408, 49 Atl. 270: "For a wilful or intentional trespass by an employee outside of the line of his duty under his employment, it is settled that the employer is not responsible, even though it be committed while the servant is in the exercise of his employment. But in the latter case its wilful and separate character must appear." That the act of Bledsoe was wilful and malicious, on the plaintiff's showing, admits of no question. Was it something separate from the duty he owed his employer? Let the facts answer. Plaintiff had not been guilty of any violation of law. No information had been lodged against him. He was not disturbing the peace, and manifestly the assault could not have been made with a view to accomplishing his arrest. Plaintiff was peaceably departing from the station on his way to his home, disturbing no one, when he was halted. Without any explanation as to why he was addressed, without a single remark, and while he was resting his gun upon the floor with his hand covering the muzzle, Bledsoe, standing only four or five feet away, began the murderous assault upon him, which only ceased when every load in his revolver had been discharged, and when he had every reason to believe he had killed his victim. Had death followed the assault, Bledsoe's crime, on this evidence, would unquestionably have been murder in the first degree. Now, what is there in the evidence that would support a finding that the assault was committed in discharge of any duty Bledsoe owed to the railroad company? Certainly, the defendant company was not requiring the plaintiff's blood at the hands of Bledsoe, its policeman; nor does it appear that the company had any purpose to serve by having his freedom interfered with in the slightest degree. The company had employed Bledsoe to preserve the peace, not to disturb it; and the case shows an entire absence of anything on the part of the plaintiff, the doing of which could have concerned the company even in the remotest way. The only inference the evidence allows is that the assault was a malicious one to gratify private vengeance of the assailant, disassociated with any duty Bledsoe owed to his employer.

The cases cited by the learned counsel for the appellee in support of their contention that Bledsoe, in committing this assault, was in the line of his duty, are inapplicable. They deal either with cases where a special duty towards the injured party, arising out of contract relation was violated, as in the case of a conductor who, in collecting fares or tickets from passengers, or in preserving peace and order in his car, commits a wilful and malicious assault on a passenger; or where an officer makes violent assault while engaged in making arrests. In every such case the employee is directly in the line of his duty, in the sense that he is presently engaged in doing the work for which he was employed. It is the duty of the conductor to make his collections, and it is his duty to maintain order in the car for the protection of passengers; and it is as well the duty of the policeman to make arrests when proper occasion arises. It is for such purposes these employees are engaged. If the assault in this case had been made by Bledsoe in the course of an attempt to arrest the plaintiff, it might be contended that it was done when in the line of his duty, and it would be a question for the jury to decide; but, as we have said, every circumstance shows that here no arrest was intended. The plaintiff does not assert that it was, shows no circumstance that indicates it, while Bledsoe positively asserts that it was not. Or, if it had been made in the attempt to do anything that Bledsoe was employed to do, as, for instance, keeping the peace, suppressing disorderly conduct, discovering crime, a like result would follow. This is the extent to which the cases cited go. The distinction is too apparent to require further discussion. Ordinarily, whether the assault was committed in the line of the servant's duty is a question for the jury; but no question of fact is ever submitted to a jury except it is raised by the evidence. Here there was no evidence which could possibly support a finding that Bledsoe was in the line of duty under his employment, when he committed the assault. The fact that it was committed at the defendant company's station is of no importance. Plaintiff had been a passenger, but that relationship ceased when he alighted at his destination, and had so far proceeded on his way as to be out of danger from the movement of the train, or further necessity of relation with the servants of the company. The defendant company thereafter owed him no special duty, no contract relation existing between them. But take the other view of the case, and assume that Bledsoe had intended an arrest on justifiable grounds. So far he would unquestionably have been in the discharge of the duty of his employment. But the fact that in the attempt he committed a wanton and malicious assault admits of no possible dispute. No jury could find otherwise on this evidence. We have said quite enough as to that. In such case, where the servant in the discharge of a lawful duty wilfully and maliciously inflicts injury, he alone is responsible for the consequences. The rule respondeat superior applies only where the injury results from the negligent manner in which the duty is discharged. The master cannot be held responsible for the malicious acts of his servants. In Pittsburg, A. & M. Pass. R. Co. v. Donahue, 70 Pa. 119, is was sought to charge the company with liability for injuries inflicted by a conductor on a boy who was a trespasser on the train. In ejecting the boy the conductor struck him upon the head with an iron switch turner and knocked him over. On appeal from the judgment rendered, this court said in a per curiam: "We agree with the counsel for the plaintiff in error that for a wilful and wanton trespass committed by a car driver the company is not responsible." In Pennsylvania Co. v. Toomey, 91 Pa. 256, it was held that where a conductor of a railroad train, acting in the line of his duty, ejects from the platform of a car a person who has no right thereon, the company is liable if he has done it in a careless, negligent, or reckless manner, but not if he maliciously ejects him therefrom. In these cases the common-law doctrine was applied and is alike applicable here. With Bledsoe's explanation of the occurrence we have nothing to do, except to remark that it supplies nothing that is wanting in the plaintiff's case. Upon a careful review of the evidence, we are of opinion that the defendant company was entitled to an affirmative answer to its first point, which was that under all the evidence the verdict should be for the defendant. The refusal of this point is made the first assignment of error.

The assignment is sustained, and the judgment is reversed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

HARVEY H. ATHERTON, Trustee, etc., of James W. Quillen, Appt.,

v.

J. W. GREEN et al.

(103 C. C. A. 298, 179 Fed. 806.)

Bankruptcy — preference — collection — accepting security.

Acceptance by one who has transmitted a mortgage to an insolvent banker for collection, of a deed to real estate and notes of strangers in satisfaction of the proceeds of the mortgage, which the banker transmitted with instructions to accept the same upon hearing that the bank had closed its doors, amounts to treating the transaction as an indebtedness, and terminates the trust relation, where the banker dissipates the proceeds of the collection and closes the bank without funds into which the proceeds can be traced; and the owner of the mortgage is therefore not entitled to a preference over other creditors, but may be required to surrender his security to the banker's trustee in bankruptcy, who is appointed within four months thereafter.

Note. — Bankruptcy: voidability as preference of transfer made in satisfaction of claim for misappropriation of property.

The case of Upham v. New York Loan & T. Co. 76 N. Y. 1, is much like that of ATHERTON v. GREEN. It appeared that the defendant had sent to the bankrupts, Paddock & Company, certain notes for collection, and that they delivered them to another party. Upon demand for a return of the notes, or immediate remittance, the bankrupts delivered other securities to the defendant, and these were sought to be recovered by the assignee in bankruptcy. The court said: "The transaction was not an exchange of securities. The defendant had a claim against Paddock & Company, for the conversion of the notes. The notes had APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern Division of the Southern District of Illinois dismissing a bill filed to set aside certain conveyances which were alleged to be preferential and voidable under the Federal bankruptcy act. Reversed.

Statement by Seaman, Circuit Judge:

The appellant, as trustee of the estate of Quillen, a bankrupt, filed a bill in the district court to set aside conveyances of real estate (a) by the bankrupt to the appellee Green, for the benefit of the appellee Trimmer, and (b) by Green to Trimmer in compliance with the bankrupt's purpose, alleged to be preferential and voidable under the provisions of the bankruptcy act (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418). Upon reference of the issues to a special master and hearing of the testimony, the master found and reported in favor of the appellant for the relief sought in the bill. Exceptions to such findings and conclusions were filed by the appellees; and the trial court, on hearing thereof, sustained the exceptions and dismissed the bill. This appeal is from a final decree accordingly.

The material facts in evidence are uncontroverted and are summarized in the opinion.

Argued before Baker, Seaman, and Kohl-saat, Circuit Judges.

Mr. John M. Elliott for appellant.

Mr. B. M. Chipperfield for appellees.

Seaman, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree appealed from dismisses the appellant's bill, filed to set aside a transfer of real estate made by the bankrupt in favor of the appellees, alleged to be conveyed and accepted in violation of the bankruptcy act. All the circumstances of the conveyances respectively are established by undisputed evidence, and the legal effect thereof, under the provisions of the act referred to, is the sole question raised.

The bankrupt, Quillen, prior to May 20, 1908, was engaged in banking, as sole proprietor of the business conducted under the not been collected, but had been delivered by Paddock & Company to the insurance company, under a claim by the insurance company that they belonged to the company. This acquiescence in the claim concluded Paddock & Company in respect to the right of the insurance company. Paddock & Company had not received any proceeds from the notes, and the securities obtained by the defendant had no relation to or connection with them. The misappropriation of the notes by Paddock & Company was a gross breach of trust. They owed a duty to protect the defendant from loss resulting from their act. But it was a duty which they could not discharge at the expense of their other creditors; and having taken the securities with knowledge, as the jury have found, of the insolvency of Paddock & Company it was an unlawful preference within the provisions of the bankrupt act."

In Sharp v. Philadelphia Warehouse Co. Fed. Cas. No. 12,709a, 19 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 378, it was held that there had been an unlawful preference where the bankrupt had, shortly before bankruptcy, and while insolvent, turned over goods in the place of goods which he had wrongfully abstracted while holding them as a warehouseman.

And in Burgoyne v. McKillip (C. C. A.) 182 Fed. 452, the bankrupt had been a member of a firm acting as loan agents for an insurance company. He converted to his own use a large sum of money belonging to the insurance company, and when this was discovered he executed a trust deed to the insurance company, covering his own property. Within four months a petition in bankruptcy was filed against him. In determining that the trust deed was a void-able preference the court said: "It is contended by complainants there was no preference, because the relation between the company and McKillip was not that of creditor and debtor, the demand of the former was not one provable in bankruptcy, and also that there was a present consideration to sustain the transaction. In case of embezzlement or misappropriation of funds, the person defrauded may at his option assert a demand as upon implied contract to repay, and such a demand is provable in bankruptcy. When the company took from McKillip what was in substance a mortgage upon his property, it clearly did so as a creditor, and it cannot retain it and at the same time abandon the position then assumed. This is not a case of following trust funds. The property was not conveyed to Burgoyne as the property of the company in which its funds had been invested. It was accepted as the property of the debtor, and as security for the payment of money due the company. The funds of the company were not traced into the property, and there was no reclamation of them as trust funds. Though a demand may be founded on a breach of trust, the entire estate of the recreant trustee is not thereby necessarily impressed with a trust. The holder of the demand cannot, as an ordinary creditor, take and hold transfers of property from the insolvent defaulter free from the provisions of the bankruptcy act respecting preferences."

In Smith v. Au Gres Twp. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 870, 80 C. C. A. 145, 150 Fed. 257, 17 Am. Bankr. Rep. 745, involving a mortgage of the bankrupt's stock of goods in favor of a town whose money he had appropriated and used in purchasing a part name of Bank of Ipava, in the village of Ipava, Fulton county, Illinois; and the appellee Green, during all the times in controversy, was cashier of the People's State Bank of Astoria, located in the same county. In May, 1908, the appellee Trimmer placed with the last-mentioned bank, for collection, a note and mortgage owned by him, for $2,100 principal and accrued interest; and cashier Green, for the bank, delivered such note and mortgage to Quillen (as the Bank of Ipava), with instructions to collect principal and interest and return the proceeds to People's State Bank of Astoria for account of Trimmer. Quillen collected the principal on May 13, and on May 16, 1908, collected $121.32 as accrued interest, but failed to remit either amount, and appropriated the proceeds either to his personal use or that of his bank. He went to Chicago on the night of May 18th and was there during May 19th, in alleged effort to obtain means for carrying on the bank, returning to Ipava on the evening of May 19th, and meantime Green had his son call up the Bank of Ipava, by telephone, to inquire about the collection, but ascertained only that Quillen was absent. The Bank of Ipava was not opened after Quillen's return from Chicago; and it appears from the evidence that its doors were closed on the morning of May 20th, with no cash on hand, except $730 in change,—“mostly nickels, dimes, quarters, and pennies,”—and no “deposits of money in banks and elsewhere.”

Petition for voluntary bankruptcy was filed by Quillen June 6, 1908, adjudication thereof was entered June 8th, and the appellant became trustee of the estate in due course. Insolvency of Quillen at all the above-mentioned dates is established, with indebtedness to depositors far in excess of assets.

On May 20, 1908, the bankrupt (without request thereto) executed a deed of conveyance, together with his wife, in favor of the appellee Green, for a village lot which the bankrupt had long theretofore owned, stating the consideration to be $1,700. This instrument was sent to the grantee by mail, together with two promissory notes of the stock, the court merely remarked, in passing, that such mortgage constituted a preference.

On the other hand it was held in McNaboe v. Columbian Mfg. Co. 83 C. C. A. 81, 153 Fed. 907, 18 Am. Bankr. Rep. 684, that where the bankrupt had stolen money from, and afterward restored it to, one who was ignorant of both the theft and the restoration, such money was not recoverable by the trustee in bankruptcy upon the theory that the restoration constituted a preference.

The case of Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. 332, 21 L. ed. 933, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 433, is sufficiently set out in ATHERTON v. GREEN, and is therein distinguished.

The English courts seem inclined to regard the fact that the transfer is made to compensate for a misappropriation of property, as going to the intention of the bankrupt; for it is the rule under the English statute, as well as under ours, that to constitute a preference the debtor must have intended to prefer the transferee over other creditors.

The case of Sharp v. Jackson, 80 L. T. N. S. 841, arose under § 48 of the English bankruptcy act of 1883, which makes transfers within three months before bankruptcy subject to attack as preferences. The bankrupt, two days before bankruptcy, had executed a deed to make good certain breaches of trust by him. This case turned upon the intent and purpose of the debtor, it being held that there was no invalid preference unless the debtor intended to prefer one creditor over others. Lord Macnaghten said: “Now I do not think that this gentleman at the time when he executed this deed was in a position to execute it with free choice at all. I think that he executed it under an overwhelming sense of very imminent peril. The fact that two years before he had had this deed prepared shows to my mind that he had a sense of his dangerous position before his mind at the time; and at the last moment, when it became certain that he would be exposed to bankruptcy and all its consequences, including the examination that would follow, he executed the deed. I think that he executed it simply with the view of protecting himself.” This last remark, doubtless, had reference to protection against criminal prosecution, to which he was subject by reason of the acts constituting the breaches of trust.

In Re Lake, 84 L. T. N. S. 430, a transfer of securities, made shortly before bankruptcy, was upheld upon the theory that there was no intent to prefer creditors, since the debtor, moved by the dictates of an offended conscience, made the transfer under a sense of obligation to make good a breach of trust.

On delivery of property on eve of bankruptcy to one holding execution contract therefor made within the four months' period, as a preference, see the note in 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 901.

On voidability of transfer within four months' period pursuant to executory agreement antedating that period, see the note in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 935.

On validity of transfer to secure pre-existing debt within four months of bankruptcy, in absence of any intent on part of debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, or of reasonable cause on part of creditor to believe that it was intended as preference, see the note in 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 372.

L. A. W.

(one of $575 and the other of $100.25) made by third parties, inclosed with the bankrupt's letter, requesting "Green to hold the deed and notes until he heard definitely that he (Quillen) had closed the bank." Green received these papers May 20th, about noon, and "heard definitely," at about 2 P. M. of the same day, that the bank had closed. He immediately informed Trimmer thereof, executed conveyance of the lot to Trimmer, and delivered over both deed and notes above mentioned. Relief is sought by the trustee in bankruptcy, under the present bill, in respect of the above-mentioned transfer of real estate, without reference to the notes turned in; and the net value of the lot so conveyed appears under the testimony to be about $1,300.

We believe, therefore, these premises for the bill to be established: That the grantees (appellees) respectively accepted the transfer with ample notice of the bankrupt's insolvency; that it was made and received by way, either of satisfaction or security, for the amount theretofore collected for and withheld from the appellees, as above recited, and not as a purchase of the lot, by either appellee, "in good faith and for a present fair consideration," within the exception provided in § 67 (3)e of the bankruptcy act; that prior to such transfer by the bankrupt the lot so conveyed formed a part of his estate, and was neither obtained through nor in any sense represented the proceeds of the above-mentioned collection on account of the appellees; and that the effect thereof was to deplete the estate of the bankrupt for the benefit of the appellees as against general creditors in bankruptcy. Thus the transaction was plainly an unlawful preference, under § 60 of the bankruptcy act, unless the pre-existing relation of the parties—as one of agency or trust, and not that of debtor and creditor—exempts it from such provision.

The decree in favor of the appellees rests (as stated in the opinion filed below) upon these propositions in substance: That the collection was made by the bankrupt as the appellees' agent, and his "wrongful conversion of the money . . . could not establish the relation of creditor and debtor without the assent" of the principals; that such assent was not given; and that the transfer so made by the bankrupt "to make good or partially good the loss" caused by his conversion was (in effect) "an exchange if properties" made and accepted accordingly, and not in violation of the bankruptcy act. In support of this view the opinion cited Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. 332, 21 L. ed. 933, and Holder v. Western German Bank, 68 C. C. A. 554, 136 Fed. 90, 92, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

counsel for the appellee further cites numerous authorities reaffirming and defining the general doctrine that neither a collection thus made nor conversion of the proceeds by the collecting agent creates the relation of creditor and debtor therein, between principal and agent, unless the principal so elects,—all in harmony with the well-settled rule applicable to such trust relation. So, the proceeds of the collection belonged to the principals, and the misappropriation vested no right to the fund in favor of the estate in bankruptcy, and the owner in such case is entitled to follow and recover the amount, in so far as it either remains on hand or is traceable into other investments or property derived therefrom. Failing such recourse to the trust fund, it is optional with the owner to treat the misappropriation as an indebtedness, thereby becoming a creditor on a par with other general creditors of the estate and subject to the bankruptcy provisions applicable to such relation. With neither the property nor its proceeds appearing on hand in any form, the fact that the indebtedness arose through conversion of the property gives the owner thereof no right of preference over general creditors.

When the bankrupt closed his bank on the morning of May 20th, with the proceeds of the collection dissipated, and no funds (except the small change above mentioned) nor bank credits remaining to meet liabilities, the ensuing execution and transmission of the deed of real estate owned by the bankrupt, to be accepted by the appellees as indemnity (in part) for misappropriation of their proceeds, in the event of hearing "definitely that Quillen had closed the bank," can bear no interpretation otherwise, as we believe, than treatment of that transaction as an indebtedness for which the conveyance was thus tendered by way of security or indemnity, and so recognized by the appellees in their immediate and unqualified acceptance, upon advice of closure of the bank. We are of opinion, therefore, that the conveyance was made and accepted as preferential security, out of the general estate of the bankrupt, in the relation of the parties as debtor and creditor, with the property so conveyed neither derived from the misappropriation, nor standing chargeable with the proceeds in any equitable sense; that the transaction is not within the rule upheld in Cook v. Tullis, supra, nor sustainable under any of the authorities cited in support of the decree.

In reference to the case of Cook v. Tullis, which arose under the bankruptcy act of 1867 (act March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 517) containing like provision against preferences, the exchange of securities was made at a time and under circumstances plainly distinguishable from the facts above recited. Homans (the bankrupt) was a banker and had purchased bonds for Tullis, from time to time, which were left with the banker for safe-keeping, inclosed in envelopes, distinctly marked in the name of Tullis, and kept in an individual deposit box. Tullis had permitted Homans to take out and use $20,000 of these deposited bonds, upon his substitution of an equivalent amount of bills receivable and promise to replace the bonds when required; and the bonds were so replaced. Subsequently, in March, 1869, without permission or knowledge on the part of Tullis, Homans used from the deposit, $6,000 of bonds, for which he first substituted bills receivable, and "in April," 1869, substituted for the bills transfer of a note and mortgage (belonging to him) for $7,000 due in ninety days. The mortgage was not paid at maturity, and "in August," 1869, was taken by Homans from its envelop and placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. On August 26, 1869, Homans failed, and was adjudged an involuntary bankrupt September 20th. Tullis ascertained the taking and substitutions last mentioned soon after the failure "signified his acceptance," and directed the attorneys having the mortgage in charge to commence foreclosure. In suit by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the transfer of this security as preferential, it further appeared that Homans was not insolvent when the substitution and transfer was made, and he testified that he inferred (from the earlier transactions) that it would be satisfactory to Tullis and that he "did not apprehend insolvency or bankruptcy." It was there held that the transaction was not in violation of the statute, and that Tullis was entitled to $6,000 of the mortgage proceeds. No sanction appears in that ruling, as we believe, for the present decree in favor of the appellees. The decree of the District Court is therefore reversed, with direction to enter a decree for relief of the appellant as prayed in his bill.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

ILO OIL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

INDIANA NATURAL GAS & OIL COMPANY.

(— Ind. —, 92 N. E. 1.)

Injunction — right — similar delicts — effect.

An injunction against the pumping of oil and gas wells will not be awarded in favor of the owner of neighboring wells, if the latter has been guilty of similar acts, even though in a lesser degree.

(June 10, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Delaware County in defendant's favor in a suit to enjoin the pumping of certain gas and oil wells. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Right of one who pumps oil, gas, or water on his premises to enjoin similar acts of his neighbor.

This note is not concerned with the question whether a person may in any event be enjoined from pumping gas, oil, or water on his premises, but rather whether, in view of the fact that the complainant himself is guilty of the acts complained of, he is in such a position as to ask a court of equity to come to his aid.

The cases discussing the constitutionality of statutes to prevent waste of subterranean water, natural gas, or oil are discussed in a note to Hathorn v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 436.

An extended search has revealed but little authority dealing with the application to a case of the maxim that one who comes into equity must come with clean hands, whereas in ILO OIL CO. v. INDIANA NATURAL GAS & OIL CO., an injunction against the pumping of oil and gas wells was sought to be awarded in favor of the owner of neighboring wells, who himself was guilty of similar acts.

A case somewhat similar is Merrick Water Co. v. Brooklyn, 32 App. Div. 454, 53 N. Y. Supp. 10, affirmed in 160 N. Y. 657, 55 N. E. 1097, where it was held that a corporation pumping water on its premises for sale in other localities cannot complain of similar acts upon the part of another corporation, on the latter's premises. The court said: "In the present case both corporations seek to obtain water in a similar manner, for a precisely similar purpose: i. e., for transportation and sale. Neither party intends to make use of its land for any other purpose than will facilitate the gathering and distribution of water. In this respect their rights are equal, one as great as the other; and we see no reason why the rule should not be applicable as would apply in case either owner desired to improve its land for purposes of use. Then, as we have seen, neither party would be liable for the diversion of percolating water, because each is engaged in the exercise of a legal right, and the rights of each are equal in the use and enjoyment of the land. When both seek to use their land for exactly the same purpose, and neither seeks to improve it for the purpose of beneficial enjoyment, but to make a profit from the business carried on, the right to such use must also be equal.

Monks, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this suit to enjoin appellee from using devices for pumping, and from employing any other artificial power or appliance for the purpose of having the effect of increasing the natural flow of natural gas and oil from wells of appellee. It is alleged in the amended complaint that appellee "has and is, by compressors, pumps, suction lines, and stations, producing a vacuum and suction upon the gas and oil, sand, and rock underlying its leases and leases of the appellant and surrounding territory, and thereby it has been sucking the oil and gas away from appellant's property, and destroying its wells and leases, and that appellee threatens to continue and will continue such application unless enjoined," etc. Prayer for an injunction. Appellee filed an answer in two paragraphs. The first paragraph was a general denial; the second set up in substance that appellant was guilty of the same acts complained of in its complaint, but in a lesser degree. The court, at the request of both parties, made a special finding of facts, and stated conclusions of law thereon. The conclusions of law stated by the court were: (1) The law is with the defendant, and the plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by its complaint herein; (2) that the defendant is entitled to recover its costs in this action laid out and expended. Over a motion for a new trial, judgment was rendered in favor of appellee. The errors assigned by appellant call in question each conclusion of law and the action of the court in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial.

Appellee insists that even if it might be

Under such circumstances, if one gets more than the other, we think there can be no more ground of complaint than would exist if both sought to improve their own land, and one secured more than the other, or one was damaged and the other not. As applied to such obligations, the doctrine of reasonable use and relative rights has never been adopted by any of the courts in this state, nor in any other state, so far as our research has discovered, except in New Hampshire. We are not able to see, therefore, that the act of the defendant has infringed upon any legal right which the plaintiff possessed."

But in Hathorn v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 194 N. Y. 326, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 436, 128 Am. St. Rep. 555, 87 N. E. 504, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 989, it was held that the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact that one who has marketed water naturally flowing from springs on his land does not deprive him of the right to equitable relief against the forcible pumping of the water from the common reservoir and letting it go to waste, for the purpose of securing for sale the gas connected therewith. The court took occasion to say that if the respondents were seeking to restrain the mere marketing of the products of appellant's well, it might be a sufficient answer to say that they were doing the same thing; but that it failed to see how the sale of waters naturally flowing in their springs fairly or equitably forbade them from restraining appellant from continuing, by artificial means, the increased and wasteful flow of waters and gas which was the thing complained of.

G. V.

enjoined from increasing the natural flow of gas and oil by pumping or other artificial means, under the rule declared in Manufacturers' Gas & Oil Co. v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. 155 Ind. 461, 50 L.R.A. 768, 57 N. E. 912, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 672, that appellant is not in a position to obtain such relief because the court found that it was also guilty of the same acts in connection with the matter in controversy. The court, in its special finding, found facts which show that appellant was guilty of the same acts in a lesser degree (in connection with the same matter) which it seeks to enjoin appellee from doing. This finding of the court is challenged by appellant in its motion for a new trial, on the ground that it is not sustained by sufficient evidence. There is, however, evidence to support this finding, and it is well settled that the finding made by a trial court as to questions of fact will not be disturbed when there is evidence to support such finding. Ewbank's Manual of Prac. § 128; *Mead v. As appellant was guilty, although in a lesser degree, of the same acts charged against appellee, the court will leave the parties where it finds them, for the reason that he who seeks equity must do equity, and must come into court with clean hands.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

WISECARVER & REYNARD

v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

Removal of cause — costs — jurisdiction.

1. A state court has jurisdiction to render a judgment for the costs which accrued before the removal of the cause to the Federal court, even though it should eventually be established that the petition which was filed before the accrual of a portion of the costs, such as those on appeal from an order denying the removal, should have been granted.

Costs — judgment — removal of cause.

2. A state court should not enter a judgment for the costs which accrued before it in a case which was removed to a Federal court, until a final determination of the cause.

(October 22, 1909.)

Note. — Power of state court to render judgment for costs in case removed to Federal court and not remanded.

But very little authority has been found on the question whether a state court has jurisdiction to render judgment for the costs therein, while the case is in the Federal court and undetermined.

A case which seems to be directly in point is Williams v. Adkins, 6 Coldw. 615, where, upon the application of one to have the cause against him removed to the Federal court, a judgment at the same time was rendered against him by the state court for all the costs which had accrued up to that time. From this judgment an appeal in error was brought to the supreme court of the state, and it was there said: "The circuit court of Campbell county, upon the question whether or not the cause should APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Jefferson County denying a motion to tax costs to plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's horse while in defendant's possession for transportation which had been removed to the Federal courts. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carroll Wright, J. L. Parrish, and Leggett & McKemey, for appellant:

A removal transfers the whole case, with its incidents and remedies, to the Federal court.

Messrs. Rollin J. Wilson and Crall & Crall, for appellee:

Costs should be governed by the rule announced in the following case.

Palmer v. Palmer, 97 Iowa, 454, 86 N. W. 734.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1906 plaintiff brought action in the district court of Jefferson county against the defendant to recover damages which it alleged it had sustained by reason of an injury to a horse which had been shipped over defendant's line of railroad.

be transferred, had no discretion except simply to determine whether the application came within the provisions of the act of Congress. Upon deciding this question in the affirmative, the right of the plaintiff in error to have the cause transferred became absolute. Upon what ground, then, could the court render judgment against him for costs? In general, the right of one party at law, to recover his costs from the opposite party, results from his final success in the cause. This, by statute, is so far modified that the court may adjudge costs against either party, as terms of continuance, etc. Code §§ 2942, 2943. It is provided by § 3220 that, if any case shall occur, not directly or by fair implication embraced within the provisions of the law, the court may make such disposition of the costs as in its sound discretion may seem right. This has reference to causes where it becomes the duty of the court in disposing of the cause to adjudge the costs. The judgment for costs in this cause cannot be regarded as terms for granting the transfer, for the court had no discretion in the matter. It was not a cause where the law required the court to adjudge the costs. The provisions of the act are that when the application is made in conformity therewith, the state court shall proceed no further, and upon entering copies, etc., in the Federal court, the cause shall proceed as if originally brought there. The judgment for costs in this cause was arbitrary and clearly erroneous, if not void absolutely. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The defendant appeared, filed answer, and a petition for removal to the circuit court of the United States on the ground of diversity of citizenship. This petition was denied on the 3d day of December, 1906, and thereafter the cause came on for hearing at a regular term of the district court, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 and costs amounting to $434.60. Thereafter the cause was appealed to this court, resulting in a reversal, because the court below erred in overruling defendant's petition for removal, and the cause was remanded to the district court of Jefferson county. See 139 Iowa, 596, 117 N. W. 961. The cause was remanded without direction, although the procedendo of course ordered the court below to proceed in said case in a manner not inconsistent with the opinion of this court. Thereafter, and on the 1st day of February, 1909, defendant filed a motion asking that the judgment theretofore entered be canceled and set aside, that it have judgment against plaintiff for the costs of said action in the amount above stated, and that the cause be transferred for trial to the United States circuit court. Plaintiff resisted this motion upon many grounds, chief among which were: (a) That the court was without jurisdiction to do more than order a transfer of the cause; and

The court, until the order of transfer was made, had jurisdiction of the parties, but it may be doubtful if the court at this stage of the case had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of costs."

In National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 27 C. C. A. 116, 51 U. S. App. 496, 82 Fed. 246, it was held that where removal of a cause to the Federal court is denied by a state court, and that decision is affirmed by the appellate courts of the state, but reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the filing of the petition and bond worked a removal, and by it remanded to the state court, with direction to "accept the bond tendered" and "proceed no further in the cause," a judgment thereafter rendered by the state court, awarding the appellant the costs of the action in the various courts, is a nullity.

A case closely related, but not strictly in point, is Oishei v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 102 App. Div. 473, 91 N. Y. Supp. 1034, holding that the fact that, subsequent to the settlement of an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, the cause of action had been transferred to the Federal court, did not deprive the state court of jurisdiction to enforce the lien of the plaintiff's attorney.

After a new trial this doctrine was reaffirmed in 117 App. Div. 110, 102 N. Y. Supp. 368, and the latter case was affirmed without opinion in 191 N. Y. 544, 85 N. E. 1113.

G. V.

(b) that the costs attendant upon the former trial should abide the final judgment rendered in whatever should be determined to be the court of ultimate trial and decision. The trial court ordered that the case be transferred to the United States circuit court; that the judgment theretofore entered against the defendant be set aside; and made an order, concluding as follows: "It is further ordered by the court that the motion of the defendant for judgment against the plaintiffs for the costs of the trial in this court—being the costs of witnesses, court officers, and other fees incurred upon the trial, following the overruling of defendant's motion to transfer to the Federal court—be and the same is hereby overruled, to which ruling the defendant at the time duly excepts, and plaintiff excepts to setting aside of the judgment. It is further found by the court that this is a proper question for appeal to the supreme court, and one which should be passed upon by that court, and this order shall be considered as a certificate for the taking of such appeal."

The appeal is from the latter part of this order, and presents two questions for our consideration. The first of these is the jurisdiction of the district court to render judgment for the costs made therein while the case is in the Federal court and undetermined; and, second, assuming that such jurisdiction exists, should such order be made until the final judgment is rendered by the court which shall finally decide the case? As to the first proposition, we entertain no doubt of the jurisdiction of the district court to render judgment for costs which accrued in that court, even though it should finally hold that the petition for removal filed before the accrual of these costs, or the major part of them, should have been sustained. The second question is of more doubt; but we are constrained to hold that until the final determination of the case no order should be made in the district court regarding the costs taxed in that suit.

It does not appear that the case has been tried in the United States court, nor is there any showing of a judgment therein. Moreover, it does not appear whether a motion to remand has been filed, submitted, or determined in that court. The most that can be said for the record is that the action is now pending there. It may be that this case will eventually be remanded to the district court of Jefferson county for trial, and in that event it would become the duty 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the court trying that case to make a proper order as to costs. If defendant in such event were successful, the entire costs would be charged to the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, plaintiff should secure the verdict, the costs might either be apportioned or taxed to the defendant. Surely this would be true as to some of the items of costs which were taxed as part of the original judgment. Defendant's motion included all of the costs of the action. In no event, as it seems to us, would defendant be entitled to have the costs, made before filing the petition for removal, taxed to the plaintiff. If this case were to be retried in the Jefferson county district court, and the plaintiff were successful, he would be entitled to all costs, save those growing out of and relating to the first trial. The motion to tax the costs was, as it seems to us, premature, and the order denying it must be sustained. All this, however, should be without prejudice to appellant's right to renew this motion, if so advised, upon the final determination of the case.

Our conclusion finds some support in Palmer v. Palmer, 97 Iowa, 454, 66 N. W. 734. In that case it appeared that the action had been transferred to the equity docket, and a hearing had upon the merits, resulting in a decree against the plaintiff. Upon appeal to this court it was determined that a motion to transfer to the equity docket should have been overruled, and the decree was reversed. The case was again tried in the district court as a law action, resulting in a verdict and final judgment for the defendant. Upon motion the district court taxed all the costs, including those made on the first trial of the cause, to the plaintiff. Plaintiff excepted and appealed, and the order was affirmed, the court saying: "We think it has always been the practice that, when one trial has been had and the verdict is set aside by the district court, or the cause reversed in this court, and another trial is had in the district court, the costs of the first trial follow those of the last. In the case at bar the final result showed that the plaintiff instituted and prosecuted an unfounded claim, and in the first trial, as well as the last he was the defeated party, and the order requiring him to pay the costs which accrued in the district court is right."

The order of the District Court is therefore affirmed.

MRS. JENNIE KITHCART

v.

JESSE R. KITHCART

WABASH RAILROAD COMPANY, Gar-nishee, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 124 N. W. 305.)

Assignment — claim for tort — settlement.

1. Where claims for tort may be assigned, a railroad company against which a claim exists for a personal injury cannot, by settlement with the person injured, avoid liability to his wife for the amount due her under an agreement between them in a divorce proceeding that she shall have a portion of the recovery as alimony, which has been confirmed by a decree which made the allowance a lien on the fund to be recovered, after it had notice thereof.

Lien — divorce proceeding — claim against stranger.

2. A decree in chancery granting a divorce may establish a lien in favor of the wife upon a fund due the husband by a third person for an injury negligently inflicted upon him.

(January 20, 1910.)

A PPEAL by the garnishee from a judgment of the District Court for Wright County in plaintiff's favor in a supplementary proceeding to reach funds alleged to have been paid plaintiff's judgment debtor in settlement of a claim for personal injuries, in alleged violation of plaintiff's rights. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, Ch. J.:

In a supplementary proceeding to compel the Wabash Railroad Company, garnishee, to pay to plaintiff a specified part of a sum of money which had been paid by it to defendant in settlement of a claim for damages on account of personal injuries, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff as against said garnishee, and the garnishee appeals.

Messrs. Hewitt & Wright, for appellant:

Garnishment is wholly a statutory pro-

Note. — Validity of provision in decree for alimony declaring a lien on husband's personalty.

The decision in KITHCART v. KITHCART, holding that a lien on the husband's personalty might be created by a decree allowing alimony where its terms so provide, does not seem to be in entire harmony with the few decisions which have considered the question.

The holding of these cases seems to establish the rule that, in the absence of express statutory authority, the court has no power to establish a lien upon the husband's personalty to secure the payment of alimony.

Thus, it was held in Johnson v. Johnson, 22 Colo. 20, 55 Am. St. Rep. 113, 43 Pac. 130, that a court, either by its ordinary powers, or under a statute giving it power to require reasonable security for, and to enforce the payment of alimony in any other manner consistent with the rulings and practice of the court, had no power to decree that the alimony allowed in a divorce case be a lien upon defendant's personal property. The court said: "There seems to be no reason for extending this rule, and in practice we think that liens of this character upon personal property would lead to great inconvenience. Such a decree is unusual and as the usual remedies for the enforcement of a decree for alimony are complete and adequate, there is no reason for resorting to a doubtful remedy."

So, a court has no power to decree alimony a lien on a horse, where in one section of a statute it provides that the court's decrees shall create liens on "lands and tenements;" and in another it expressly provides 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that it may, in cases where the act to be performed is something other than the payment of money, order that it shall be a lien upon both the real and personal estate of the defendant. Yelton v. Handley, 28 Ill. App. 640.

And in Griswold v. Griswold, 111 Ill. App. 269, where the defendant had been enjoined by the lower court from selling or disposing of his personal property, except in the usual course of business, or from disposing of or reducing it so as to endanger the plaintiff's claim for alimony, it was held that a court of equity had no power to make a decree for alimony a lien on personal property.

In Conklin v. Conklin, 93 Minn. 188, 101 N. W. 70, where there was no authority in the court to decree alimony a lien upon personalty, but it had power to order its sale on execution for the payment of alimony, where a decree declaring alimony a specific lien upon personal property, and directing that the plaintiff, to whom the alimony had been granted, retain possession of the property, which she then had, until the amount decreed was paid, it was held that that part of the decree with reference to the specific lien might be regarded as surplusage and immaterial, and that she might hold the property as security.

A judgment in a divorce proceeding awarding a wife a money judgment does not give her a lien upon a policy of insurance on the life of the husband, which was assigned to her before the granting of the divorce, such judgment being in no way connected with the policy. Hatch v. Hatch, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 373, 80 S. W. 411.

Messrs. Sylvester Flynn and J. W. Henneberry for appellee.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1903 plaintiff instituted an action against defendant for divorce and alimony, and in that action the issuance of a writ of attachment against the property of the defendant was authorized by the court. Under this writ of attachment notice of garnishment was served upon the Wabash Railroad Company, requiring it not to pay any debt due by it to said defendant or thereafter to become due. The garnishee answered that it had been served with an original notice of an action by this defendant against it to recover damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been received while in defendant's service, and that said suit had been removed to the circuit court of the United States, where it was then pending. This answer of the garnishee was controverted by the plaintiff, who alleged that the garnishee was indebted to the defendant for personal injuries in the sum of $50,000, and judgment was asked against the garnishee for whatever amount might be awarded her in the action for a divorce. Thereupon a stipulation was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant in the divorce suit, wherein it was agreed that as it might be a long time before the action for damages brought by defendant against the garnishee could be settled, tried, or otherwise disposed of, the plaintiff should receive as permanent alimony one fourth of the defendant's share of whatever sum he might obtain from said garnishee, whether by trial or compromise (defendant's share being the amount recovered or paid less attorney's fees, which should not exceed 50 per cent), and that any decree which should be rendered in favor of plaintiff for alimony should be made a lien upon any money in the hands of the garnishee due or to become due to the defendant on his said claim, and that plaintiff should have judgment against defendant for costs. In pursuance of this stipulation a decree was entered in the divorce proceeding, giving to plaintiff an absolute divorce from the defendant, and judgment by way of alimony for one eighth of the entire amount that defendant should recover, receive, or obtain from the Wabash Railroad Company in his action for personal injuries then pending in the Federal court, and such judgment was declared to be a lien from the date of the garnishment notice upon any judgment which defendant might obtain in said suit and upon any amount that might be agreed upon between defendant and said company in settlement of said claim. It was provided, further, that upon the rendition of judgment against, or upon settlement with, said railroad company and in favor of the plaintiff for one eighth of the amount of such judgment, or of the total amount agreed upon in settlement of said suit, by provision of this decree the railroad company, as garnishee, was to be discharged in the event that defendant failed to recover anything either in settlement or on trial of this said action. This decree was rendered in 1905, and a certified copy thereof was served upon the Wabash Railroad Company as garnishee.

In April, 1908, the plaintiff filed in her original action a supplementary petition, reciting the rendition of the decree and the service of a copy thereof as above stated, and alleged that on March 30, 1908, the Wabash Railroad Company, garnishee, effected a settlement with defendant, whereby it paid to and on behalf of said defendant about $8,000 in full settlement and discharge of the claim which said defendant had against said company for personal injuries, and demanded judgment against the railroad company for a portion of that amount in accordance with the terms of the previous decree. To this supplementary petition the railroad company interposed an answer admitting the settlement, but denying the validity of the decree and conditional judgment, and denying any indebtedness to the plaintiff. It also asked that it be discharged from any and all liability under the garnishment proceeding. The issues thus raised were tried upon a stipulation of facts, from which it appeared that a settlement was made by the railroad company with the defendant Jesse R. Kithcart, in pursuance of which there was paid to him the sum of $4,125 and paid to his attorneys the sum of $1,750, said attorneys having previously filed an attorney's lien for their services; and further that, preceding such settlement, a judgment had been recovered by said Kithcart against the railroad company in the United States circuit court for $8,000, which upon writ of error to the circuit court of appeals was reversed, and that after a mandate had issued to the trial court the case was again noticed for trial, and the plaintiff therein filed an amendment to his petition, wherein he stated more fully the ground upon which he claimed the right to recover. Under these stipulated facts the trial court, hearing the case standing before it on plaintiff's supplemental petition and the answer of the railroad company thereto, entered a decree finding the facts as above recited and giving judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant and the railroad company, garnishee, for the sum of $734.37 and costs.

1. In view of our conclusion upon the issue tendered by plaintiff in her supplementary petition, it is not necessary to consider the effect of a garnishment. Indeed, there is much ground for saying that, if the action was bottomed upon the garnishment alone, it could not be sustained. It appears that, as already stated, plaintiff brought an action for divorce against her husband, Jesse R. Kithcart, one of the defendants herein, in which action she asked for an allowance of alimony. At the time of the commencement of that suit and until the final settlement of the defendant railway company, plaintiff's husband held a claim or cause of action sounding in tort, it is true, against the defendant railway company. In the divorce action it was agreed that plaintiff therein should have and receive as and for her permanent alimony one fourth of whatever sum defendant, her husband, might obtain from the railway company, whether upon trial or by way of compromise; and that any decree which should be rendered for alimony should be made a lien upon all money in the hands of the railway company due or to become due the defendant husband on his claim against the company. Pursuant to the stipulation a decree was granted, giving plaintiff a divorce and awarding her one eighth of the entire amount that her husband should recover, receive, or obtain from the railway company in his action for personal injuries, and the judgment was declared a lien upon any judgment which the husband might obtain in his suit or upon any amount which might be agreed upon between him and the company in settlement of the claim. Provision was also made for a final decree against the railway company in the event judgment went against it, or in case of settlement, which decree was to be in favor of plaintiff and against the railway company for one eighth of the amount of the judgment, or of the amount agreed upon by way of settlement. This decree was rendered in the year 1905, and a certified copy thereof was immediately served upon the defendant railway company. Notwithstanding these agreements and decrees, the railway company, in the year 1908, settled with plaintiff's husband, paying no attention to her claims or to her decree, and now claims that it is fully released and discharged, and that plaintiff has no claim against it.

One holding a claim against a railway company, no matter whether scunding in tort or based upon contract, may, in this state, assign the same or a part thereof, and after notice of such assignment to the railway company it is bound thereby, and must respect such assignment. At common law claims growing out of tort could not be assigned; but in this jurisdiction all things in action are assignable. Code, §§ 3044, 3461. Under these sections it has been held that a liability for a tort may be sold, transferred, or assigned so as to give the holder priority over an attaching creditor of the assignor. Weire v. Davenport, 11 Iowa, 49, 77 Am. Dec. 132. In that case Wright, J., speaking for the court, said: "But it is, in the second place, contended that the liability of the city was for a tort, and that this could not be assigned. This was true, at common law, so far at least that the right of action for such an injury could not be transferred. What change the Code has made in this respect we need not stop to inquire, for the reason that we entertain no doubt but that such a liability may be sold or transferred, if bona fide, so as to give the holder a priority over an attaching creditor of the transferor. It may be sold just as a horse or any other property may be, and the title pass just as completely. And, whether the transferee could sue in his own name or not, the vendor still could not deny his title, nor could the creditors of such vendor. Not only so, but there was an action pending at the time of this assignment, and the transfer related to and included the verdict and judgment as well as the mere cause of action. That this might be done, in the absence of fraud, so as to give the assignee or vendee a good title to the judgment, and a right to control it as his own property, we entertain no doubt. Robinson v. Weeks, 6 How. Pr. 161; Hodgman v. Western R. Corp. 7 How. Pr. 494; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 78; McKee v. Judd, 12 N. Y. 622, 64 Am. Dec. 515. So far as the plaintiff was concerned, notice 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the assignment was only necessary to protect the assignee against the subsequent acts of the assignors, as their subsequent sale or transfer or the like. The Code has not narrowed the assignability of claims. Whatever could be assigned before may still be, and some claims are made negotiable which before were not. In addition to this, a right of action is given to the assignee of some claims in his own name which did not exist at common law. It is by no means true that only those instruments or claims which are specifically named in chapter 58 can be assigned. To mention none other, a judgment is not mentioned, and yet it has been held that it may be assigned so as to give the holder a right to sue thereon in his own name, Edmonds v. Montgomery, 1 Iowa, 143." See also Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 497-502; Clews v. Traer, 57 Iowa, 459-466, 10 N. W. 838; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513-520, 17 N. W. 31, 21 N. W. 9; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 296-299, 22 N. W. 906, 28 N. W. 612.

The stipulation entered into by the defendant husband with plaintiff, his wife, as a basis for the decree as to alimony, amounted to a voluntary assignment of one eighth of the cause of action held by the husband against the railway company. That defendant had notice of this assignment appears from the record, and it had this notice before it settled with the plaintiff's husband. After notice it could not pay to the assignor in disregard of plaintiff's claim. But whether this be true or not, the decree rendered in the divorce case, in so far as it relates to alimony, undoubtedly transferred to plaintiff one eighth of the amount which the husband might recover, or which might be paid him in settlement of his claim against the railway company. This decree was entered, as shown upon its face, by and with the consent of the husband; but, had it been entered without his consent against his wishes, the legal effect would be the same. The decree transferred one eighth of the claim to the plaintiff, and made her claim a lien upon the amount recovered or paid in settlement of the cause of action held by the husband. A copy of this decree was served upon the railway company, so that it had actual notice thereof. That this decree as to alimony amounted to a transfer or assignment of one eighth of the claim from the defendant husband to his wife is, as we think, perfectly clear; and, as defendant railway company had actual notice thereof, it was in position to protect itself, and it cannot now be heard to urge in defense that it paid the entire claim to the assignor. There is no need to discuss the question of lis pendens, for defendant railway company had actual notice, both of the stipulation and of the provision of the decree, before it settled with the defendant husband. It is also entirely immaterial that it was not made a party to the divorce proceedings, or that the garnishment was of no validity. It could not, no doubt, be held as a garnishee; but, if the decree amounted to an assignment of part of the claim or cause of action as between plaintiff and her husband, it is not necessary that the railway company should have been made a party to the divorce proceedings. Notice of the assignment, whether it be held voluntary or involuntary, is all that is required.

In support of these conclusions, we quote the following from Freeman on Judgments, 4th ed. vol. 2, §§ 425, 426: "It is no valid objection to an assignment that at the date of its execution no judgment existed. 'The assignment carries the whole title to the subject-matter of the action, and, of course, to the judgment, when perfected. As between the parties to the assignment, clearly the whole right passes to the assignee, and the defendant, the moment the judgment is perfected, becomes the debtor of the assignee, and not of the nominal plaintiff.' An assignment of a judgment not yet recovered need not purport to be an assignment of a judgment. Every transfer of an assignable cause of action pendente lite has the effect of assigning any judgment subsequently recovered thereon.

. . . We find the rule laid down in some decisions, in general terms, that 'secret assignments cannot be allowed to entrap innocent parties.' This rule, though manifestly of a very equitable character, is, we think, hardly sustained by the reported decisions. If it is strictly true in any case, it is in regard to the effect of an assignment without notice upon the rights of the judgment debtor. It is undoubtedly true that if the assignee gives no notice of the change of ownership in the judgment, and permits the assignor to control the execution, the judgment debtor will be protected in all payments which he may make to the apparent judgment creditor. While it is said that notice of an assignment need not be given directly to the judgment debtor, yet there is no doubt that he is protected in all payments made to the judgment creditor until he has either actual notice of an assignment, or notice of such facts as put him upon inquiry, and are therefore equivalent to actual notice. . .

. One not a party to a judgment who holds lands subject to the lien thereof is protected in payments made to secure a release of such lien from an assignment of the judgment of which he had no notice. On the other hand, the assignee will be protected from all acts of the parties after notice of the transfer."

In Ohio and in Illinois it has been held that a judgment debtor cannot compromise with an assignor after notice of the assignment, and thus defeat the claim of the assignee. See Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Volkert, 58 Ohio St. 362, 50 N. E. 924. From this case we quote the following: "The same principle would apply to the case of an assignment of part of a debt. In each case a trust would be created in favor of the equitable assignee on the fund, and would constitute an equitable lien upon it." By other of the authorities such transfer is said to create an interest in the fund in the nature of an equitable property. By others it is denominated an equitable assignment. But, whatever term is applied to it by way of description, the result reached is to give to the assignee a property right in the thing assigned,—a right which is cognizable by and enforceable in a court of equity. Authorities in support of the proposition here advanced are so abundant that one is at loss which to select. The following will be found, as we think, conclusive upon the subject: Public Schools v. Heath, 15 N. J. Eq. 22; Field v. New York, 6 N. Y. 179, 57 Am. Dec. 435; People ex rel. Dannat v. The Comptroller, 77 N. Y. 45; Whittemore v. Judd Linseed & Sperm Oil Co. 124 N. Y. 565, 21 Am. St. Rep. 708; 27 N. E. 244; Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 99 Am. Dec. 423; First Nat. Bank v. Kimberland, 16 W. Va. 555; Phillips v. Edsall, 127 Ill. 535, 20 N. E. 801; Fourth Street Nat. Bank v. Yardley, 165 U. S. 634, 41 L. ed. 855, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439; Price v. The Elmbank (D. C.) 72 Fed. 610; National Exch. Bank v. McLoon, 73 Me. 498, 40 Am. Rep. 388; 2 Freeman, Judgm. § 426. See also Stanbery v. Smythe, 13 Ohio St. 501; Gamble v. Carlisle, 3 Ohio N. P. 279, 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 48, opinion by Smith, J., and authorities there cited. . . . The right of the debtor to compromise with his creditor is not disputed, but it is not a right of so high a character as to override every other right which courts respect. The books are full of cases holding that where a debt has been assigned, and a debtor has knowledge of the assignment, any attempt to settle the case with the assignor, and ignore the claims of the assignee, will be held to be futile so far as the rights of the latter are concerned. Harris Co. v. Campbell, 2 Am. St. Rep. 472, and note; (68 Tex. 22, 3 S. W. 243); Field v. New York, supra; Brill v. Tuttle, 81 N. Y. 454, 37 Am. Rep. 515; McDaniel v. Maxwell, 21 Or. 202, 28 Am. St. Rep. 740, 27

Pac. 952; Schilling v. Mullen, 55 Minn. 122, 43 Am. St. Rep. 475, 56 N. W. 586; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1280; Hughes v. Trahern, 64 Ill. 48; Ullmann v. Kline, 87 Ill. 268; Stoddard v. Benton, 6 Colo. 508. . . . It thus appears that the right of a debtor to compromise means only that his right to compromise will be preserved as respects his dealing with the real parties in interest, of whose claims he has knowledge; and, if this be so, the release by one of the parties in interest cannot affect the portion of the debt belonging to another. As held in Upjohn v. Ewing, 2 Ohio St. 13: 'One or more of several joint creditors, between whom no partnership exists, cannot release the common debtor, so as to conclude their co-creditors who do not assent to such release.' . . . The duty of the court to protect the interest of an assignee of a chose in action is elsewhere in the opinion recognized in these words: 'It is by no means our intention to shake the well-established principle that a court of law will protect the interest of the bona fide assignee of a chose in action, after notice to the debtor of the assignment. The rule is convenient, and necessary in the administration of justice, to secure parties against fraud and circumvention.' How could parties be secured against 'circumvention' if the rule were established that, although a judgment debtor have full knowledge of an assignment or part of a judgment to a third person, yet he may, without the knowledge, and behind the back of that assignee, negotiate an alleged compromise with the original creditor which will discharge the entire debt? It is confidently submitted that neither by any process of right reasoning, nor upon any respectable authority, can such a proposition be maintained."

These quotations from that opinion are eminently sound, and, if applied to the facts now before us, should result in an affirmance of the judgment. Moreover, it was competent for the court to declare a lien in the divorce proceeding upon the money which should eventually be found due upon trial, or be paid, to the defendant Kithcart in settlement of his claim. This decree may not, in and of itself, have been binding upon the railway company, because it was not a party thereto, and perhaps the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply. But it was given actual notice of the decree, and, as it stood indifferent as between plaintiff and her husband, the decree, in so far as it attempted to dispose of the funds between the wife and husband, and specifically created a lien upon the fund, was binding upon the railway company after due notice of the provision thereof. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ordinarily a judgment is not a lien upon choses in action or an other form of personalty until levy thereon by execution; but a decree in chancery may in terms create and establish liens upon both personal and real estate, and all persons having notice of such liens are bound thereby. As to real estate the prevailing rule of lis pendens applies. Whether this rule also applies to personalty there is no need now to determine, for the railway company had actual notice of the decree. Although the case of Smith v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 720, 10 N. W. 244, has reference to an attorney's lien, much that is said therein may be considered as applicable to this branch of the present discussion.

The judgment against the defendant railway is correct, and it is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE DUFFEY

v.

CONSOLIDATED BLOCK COAL COMPANY,
NY, Appt.

(— Iowa —, 124 N. W. 609.)

Evidence — burden of proof — assumption of risk.

1. The burden of proving nonassumption of risk cannot be laid upon a servant seeking damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by his master's negligence.

Pleading. — assumption of risk.

2. A master must plead assumption of risk to be entitled to present such defense to the jury, in an action by his servant

Note. — The distinction between the term "assumption of risk" as used in reference to the ordinary risks incident to the employment, and as used with reference to the risks arising out of the negligence of the master, which is so clearly stated in the foregoing opinion, is frequently overlooked by the courts, with the result that much confusion has arisen. This question has been discussed at length in the note to Scheurer v. Banner Rubber Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207.

Where the risks in question are merely the ordinary risks of the service, the phrase "assumption of risk" does not express any distinctive rule of law, but merely expresses the legal principle that the master is not an insurer of the safety of his servant, and as is pointed out in DUFFEY v. CONSOLIDATED BLOCK COAL Co., a specific pleading of the assumption of risk of the ordinary dangers incident to the service adds nothing to the general denial, and this is almost universally asserted wherever the precise question is passed upon by the courts.

On the other hand, the term "assumption of risk" as applied to risks arising out of the to hold him responsible for personal injuries, where he relies on assumption of risk in its true sense, which refers to risks arising out of negligence of the master which are known to, and the danger of which is appreciated by, the servant.

Same — sufficiency of allegation.

3. A mere allegation that the injuries for which a servant is suing his master were such as he assumed the risk of in his employment amounts to no more than a general denial, and does not raise the question of assumption of risk of the employer's negligence.

Master and servant — assumption of risk — negligence of master.

4. The defense of assumption of risk in its true sense in an action by a servant for injuries caused by the master's negligence has reference to those risks arising out of negligence of the master which is known to, and the danger from which is appreciated by, the servant.

Evidence — accident — measurements of place.

5. It is not reversible error to permit a witness in an action by a servant to hold his master liable for personal injuries, who testifies as to measurements taken immediately after the accident, to state that he was a member of a committee whose duty it was to investigate the circumstances of accidents, and that he took the measurements in making such examination.

Appeal — nonprejudicial evidence.

6. The admission of immaterial evidence will not require a reversal if it is nonprejudicial.

Evidence — damages — expressions of pain.

7. Witnesses for a servant may testify in an action to hold his employer responsible for personal injuries, to expressions of existing pain at a time long subsequent to the date of injury.

Appeal — trial — order of evidence.

8. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit questions to be put to a witness on recross-examination, where no excuse is given why they were not asked upon the cross-examination, where the witness has been finished with once and recalled, and the party offering him has finished with him.

Evidence — negligence of servant — propriety of conduct.

9. Upon the question of the negligence of a driver in a mine, seeking to hold his employer liable for personal injuries due to his coming in contact with the roof of the tunnel, evidence is competent that it was proper and customary for him to ride upon the drawbar at the rear of the car, where he was when he was injured, rather than upon the tail chain at the mule's heels.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Appanoose County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

master's negligence is an affirmative defense relied upon by the master to relieve him from the prima facie case made out against him by proof of his negligence, and, being an affirmative defense, it must, according to the weight of authority, be pleaded. Much confusion has arisen by general statements to the effect that assumption of risk need not be pleaded, for statements to that effect in cases dealing solely with the assumption of the ordinary risks incident to the employment have been cited as authority for decisions dealing with risks arising out of the master's negligence.

As is shown in the earlier note, the so-called Missouri rule, which is followed in the majority of the Missouri cases, is to the effect that the servant never assumes the risk of the master's negligence, even though 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) he may be aware of it. In several instances the Missouri courts, being called upon to pass upon a cause of action arising in another state, have stated that the Missouri rule is not different from the rule existing in other states, and, as authority for such a declaration, have quoted from decisions in other jurisdictions statements which seem to uphold that view, because in such cases the courts have not distinguished between the assumption of the ordinary risks of the service and the assumption of the risks arising out of the master's negligence. Were the courts to make a distinction as clearly as did the court in the DUFFEY CASE, there could be no excuse for citing the decisions in other states to support the Missouri doctrine, which has never been recognized in any other jurisdiction. Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of the injuries complained of the plaintiff was a coal miner and an employee of the defendant. The defendant was operating its mine in what is known in the record as the "low coal" district. The coal vein in this region is thin, and the entries are correspondingly low, usually running less than 5 feet in height. On the day of the accident the plaintiff was directed by the pit boss to engage temporarily in driving a mule in one of the entries, known in the record as the "first left entry." That is to say, the cars were drawn by a mule, and the plaintiff was required to bring in loaded cars from the miner's rooms, and to take back empty cars for distribution thereto. According to plaintiff's evidence, he was not familiar with the work, and he entered some degree of protest against it. The pit boss assured him that it was a safe entry, and pressed the service upon him. According to his understanding, the mule presented some elements of danger. She would "kick and balk." Because of this fact, and because of his lack of experience, he entered upon the work with some trepidation, and doubtless with some lack of skill. He made two round trips without incident, and was engaged upon the third when the accident happened. While bringing in a string of loaded cars, he was caught between the load and a rock overhead, which protruded from the roof at one side of the entry several inches lower than the face of the rock on the other side thereof. In his previous trips he had necessarily passed this point five times, but had not observed this condition of the roof. He had not passed under this protruding rock, but had passed to one side of it, where the roof was higher. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence, and no serious complaint is made as to the form of the instructions. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $150.

1. Appellant complains because the trial court failed to instruct the jury on the subject of assumption of risk. Appellant submitted to the trial court three instructions on the subject, which the trial court refused. The first of these requested instructions laid upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that he did not assume the risk involved in passing through the entry at the place of injury. This was clearly erroneous as an abstract proposition. Assumption of risk is an affirmative defense, and the burden is upon the defendant to plead it and prove it. Assuming that the other two instructions asked on the subject were correct as abstract propositions of law, they were properly refused because the defendant had not pleaded such defense. The only reference to the subject contained in its answer is the following: "Defendant further states that whatever injuries, if any, the plaintiff received, were such as he assumed the risk of in his employment by the company." The term "assumption of risk" has come to be used in a twofold sense. It is often said that an employee assumes the ordinary risk that is incident to his employment. This form of assumption of risk is often pleaded by defendants in personal injury cases, although it is quite unnecessary to do so. Assumption of risk in its true sense has reference to those risks arising out of the negligence of the master, when such negligence is known to the employee, and the danger therefrom appreciated by him. In the first form herein indicated, a specific pleading of assumption of risk of the ordinary dangers incident to an employment is a mere amplification of the general denial, and adds nothing to it in a legal sense. In the second form herein indicated, it is an affirmative defense, and must be specifically pleaded as such. Sankey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 39, 91 N. W. 820; Mace v. H. A. Boedker & Co. 127 Iowa, 731, 104 N. W. 475; Martin v. Des Moines Edison Light Co. 131 Iowa, 734, 106 N. W. 359; Beresford v. American Coal Co. 124 Iowa, 39, 70 L.R.A. 256, 98 N. W. 902. The most that can be said of defendant's pleading in this respect is that it sets up an assumption of risk in the first form. There is no suggestion in it that plaintiff knew the defect complained of, or that he ought to have known it, nor any suggestion that he knew, or ought to have known, of the danger arising therefrom. The trial court therefore properly refused to submit the issue to the jury.

2. Complaint is made because the court permitted the witness Coop to testify as to the duties of the "pit committee," of which he was a member. This witness had made a measurement of the height of the entry at the alleged place of the accident immediately after it happened. The testimony complained of was given in explanation of the circumstance of measurement. He stated, in substance, that when an accident happened it was the duty and "general custom" of the pit committee to examine the circumstances of the accident, and that that was how he came to make the particular measurement. The testimony was purely explanatory, and was, in a sense, personal to the witness. It was clearly within the discretion of the trial court to permit it, and we can see nothing in it that was in any sense prejudicial to the defendant.

There was much inquiry of witnesses throughout the trial on the subject of "general custom," and appellant complains of it en masse. It is urged upon us that proof of "general custom" has become entirely too common in the trial of cases in the "low coal" district. It is urged in substance that it has become the "general custom" of lawyers in personal injury cases in such district, to supply all deficiencies of evidence as to real facts with proof of some "general custom." We find nothing in this case that affords the appellant any just ground of complaint. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show freedom from contributory negligence. The cross-examination by defendant was directed towards showing contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. As bearing upon this question, the usual and customary method of doing the work was properly shown. These usual and customary methods were often referred to as "general custom." The most that can be said is that it presented a slight inaccuracy in the use of terms.

3. As bearing upon the customary method obtaining in the mine, the plaintiff produced a written agreement said to obtain between the miners and operators, and identified it by a witness as being the one "in force" at the time of the alleged accident. To this the defendant objected as incompetent, immaterial, and secondary, and the mere conclusion of the witness. We see little materiality to the evidence complained of, and the court might well have excluded it on that ground. On the other hand, it was plainly nonprejudicial. That the defendant deemed it nonprejudicial is indicated by the fact that later in the trial it introduced the same agreement in evidence.

4. Certain witnesses on behalf of plaintiff were permitted to testify to his complaints of existing pain at a time long subsequent to the date of the injury. It is urged that this was improper, and that such evidence should be confined to a time approximating the date of injury. Under our previous decisions, this question is not even debatable. Keyes v. Cedar Falls, 107 Iowa, 509, 78 N. W. 227; Hamilton v. Mendota Coal & Min. Co. 120 Iowa, 149, 94 N. W. 282; Taylor v. Star Coal Co. 110 Iowa, 40, 81 N. W. 249.

5. One Martin was examined by the plaintiff, and testified as to the nature of the duties which devolved upon a driver in the mine. The defendant complains because of the refusal of the court to permit certain cross-examination. The line of such examination is indicated by the following question: "Mr. Martin, in this class of mines, it is a matter of common knowledge among all the miners who work in a mine like this, that these entries change overnight, is it not?" This question was pertinent and proper as cross-examination. The question, however, was put by the defendant to the witness as a recross-examination after the plaintiff had closed his direct examination. There was no claim of oversight on the part of the defendant, and no reason stated why the question was not put during the cross-examination proper. The plaintiff was entitled to the last word with his witness. This was the second time that the witness was called to the stand. The defendant had had the privilege of cross-examination and recross-examination when the witness was first called. He had rested his cross-examination upon the second call. It was within the proper discretion of the trial court to terminate the examination when it did.

6. Other points are argued by counsel, but the foregoing are illustrative of them all. We cannot take the time to discuss them in detail. The following points in the brief speak for themselves: "(5) A witness should not be allowed to answer a question which calls for an invasion of the province of the jury. . . . (7) What the witness himself would expect to find is inadmissible. (7½) It is legitimate cross-examination of an expert to ask questions pertinent to the matter involved. (8) A witness should not be allowed to say a person looked better, or that he believed a person to be more vigorous, before than after an injury. (9) It is an invasion of the province of the jury for a witness to say that there is greater or less liability to be struck under certain conditions. (10) It is a conclusion that mules are liable to take to strangers."

We have no occasion to take issue with the appellant on any of the foregoing propositions, but they present nothing decisive for our consideration. As to the last-stated proposition, the complaint is that the character of the mule was proved by "general custom." That line of proof seems to have been acquiesced in at the trial. Even the defendant proved that it takes some time for a driver to "get onto the way of a mule." Only one mule was involved in this particular case. The testimony was not altogether harmonious as to what a man of ordinary courage might reasonably expect from her. Whether she should be deemed a gentle mule or a kicking mule would seem to depend upon the point of view. One of defendant's witnesses testified that she was not a kicking mule, although he had "seen her kick." Whether he intended thereby to classify her as gentle or as merely normal does not appear. She was said to be twenty years old, and this was deemed to be in her favor. While this lengthened her history and possibly enlarged her reputation, it tended to soften her normal propensities and to reduce her expectancy. To the plaintiff, at least, she seemed a present peril.

Defendant's witnesses contended that the plaintiff ought to have taken his position on the "tail chain" at her heels, with one hand upon her tail, and the other upon the front end of the car. It is said that this position enables the driver to keep his head below the sky line of the mule's back, and that it is one from which he may be easily dislodged in case of accident. But the plaintiff chose to ride upon the "drawbar" in the rear of the first car, and preferred the risk of unknown danger to that which was obvious and imminent. His witnesses testified that this was a proper place, and in accord with the "general custom." This latter "general custom" has arisen somewhat in deference to the "general custom" of mules. It is in this wise that the propensities of the motive power have been come involved in the legal subject of "general custom." This is the concrete case. We see no way to apply it to any legal principles with entire safety to the great body of the law, which might well deem the "drawbar" preferable to the "tail chain" in such an application. Unique as the subject is, we are disposed to the opinion that the evidence was generally competent. But whether competent or incompetent, it is certain that the defendant was not hurt by it.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment below is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

S. L. CLUTE

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC
RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Kan. —, 111 Pac. 431.)

Carrier — delay in transportation — right of consignee.

Notwithstanding title may have been retained by the consignor, the consignee of goods may sue the carrier for losses he has sustained through the negligent delay in their transmission, although he refuses to accept them because not sooner delivered.

(November 5, 1910.)

Headnote by MASON, J.

Note. — Right of consignee who refuses to accept goods to maintain action for damages against carrier.

Where there has been no rescission of the sale, actions for conversion have been maintained by consignees after a refusal by them to accept the goods from the carrier on the ground of unreasonable delay, the question of the consignee's right to maintain the action not being raised or discussed. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Pfeifer, 90 Ark. 524, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1102, 119 S. W. 642; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Saulsbury, 126 Ky. 179, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 431, 103 S. W. 254.

And in Baumann v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 35 Misc. 223, 71 N. Y. Supp. 632, where goods delayed in transit had become worthless from negligent exposure to moisture, after the consignee had refused to receive them, he was allowed to recover, his right to sue not being questioned.

And the refusal of a consignee through a mistake as to the identity of the shipment, to receive goods, the title to which passed to him on delivery to the carrier, will not preclude his maintaining an action against the carrier for a wrongful refusal to subsequently make a delivery, where the goods

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Clark County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for losses alleged to have resulted from defendant's failure promptly to transport and deliver certain goods tendered it for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. A. Low and Paul E. Walker, for appellant:

The plaintiff, not being a party to the contract, cannot recover from the carrier for any damage he may have sustained on account of the breach of the contract between the railway company and the consignor, as such damages cannot be the natural consequence of the alleged breach.

Law, p. 1050; McNeal v. Braun, 53 N. J. L. 617, 26 Am. St. Rep. 441, 23 Atl. 687; Neimeyer Lumber Co. v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 54 Neb. 321, 40 L. R. A. 534, 74 N. W. 670; Detroit Southern R. Co. v. Malcomson, 144 Mich. 172, 115 Am. St. Rep. 390, 107 N. W. 915.

If any liability could be charged to the carrier, the measure of damages for the unreasonable delay was the difference between the market value of the machines at the time and place they should have been delivered and the market value at the time and place they were actually delivered.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 142 Iowa, 309, 120 N. W. 672.

In order for damages to be recoverable upon the breach of a contract, they must be the direct and proximate result of the wrong complained of. Damages which are remote and speculative cannot be recovered.

were still in their hands; and there can be no question as to the right of such consignee to maintain the action. Bacharach v. Chester Freight Line, 133 Pa. 414, 19 Atl. 409.

But where the consignee has refused to accept goods shipped on his approval, it has been held that he cannot maintain an action against the carrier for their loss while they were being returned to the consignor.

Thus in Gurwitz v. Weir, 127 App. Div. 352, 111 N. Y. Supp. 557, where a consignee received goods by express for inspection, with the privilege of returning them if they did not suit, it was held that he could not maintain an action against the carrier for their loss, where he returned them; since he was not the owner.

And the same holding was made in Nathan v. Missouri P. R. Co. 135 Mo. App. 46, 115 S. W. 496, where the consignee had refused to accept goods because they were not what he ordered, and had reshipped them to the consignor.

And where goods were shipped to a consignee who was not bound to receive them unless they conformed with certain conditions, the consignor was held to have a right of action against the carrier for negligence, where the consignee did not accept the goods because of damage resulting from the carrier's negligence. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Boggs, 134 Ill. App. 348. The court 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

said: "The corn having failed to come up to grade at Nashville, and the purchaser not asserting any rights under his contract of purchase and bill of lading, which appellee had indorsed and delivered to it, the sale was never consummated, and the right of action for damages against the party responsible therefore is in appellee."

And where a consignee refused to receive goods sold on credit, on the ground of unreasonable delay, which ground was not well taken, and the consignor when communicated with by the carrier ordered the shipment returned to him, it was held that the consignee could not maintain an action of conversion against the carrier, there being no act in defiance of his right or any exercise of dominion over the goods to his exclusion. Stafsky v. Southern R. Co. 143 Ala. 272, 39 So. 132.

For a note on right of consignee as against carrier to reject consignment of freight for delay in transportation, see Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Saulsberry, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 431.

And for a note on the right of agent, factor, broker, or commission merchant to whom goods are consigned for sale, to maintain action against a common carrier for damage to or loss of goods during transit, see Grinnell-Collins Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 437. J. T. W.

If the plaintiff wished to regulate the receipt of his machines by the preferences of certain persons with whom he had been negotiating, this fact should have been brought to the attention of the carrier at the time the shipment was made, and in the absence of such action the special damages suffered by reason of the peculiar conditions cannot be recovered.

8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 557, 596; Buffalo Barb Wire Co. v. Phillips, 64 Wis. 338, 25 N. W. 208; Thomas, B. & W. Mfg. Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 62 Wis. 642, 51 Am. Rep. 725, 22 N. W. 827.

If damages other than the difference in the market value at the time when they should have been delivered and the time when they were delivered are demanded, the special character of such damages must be shown by both the pleadings and the evidence to be such as were contemplated by both parties when the property was received for shipment.

Special damages on account of loss arising from failure to deliver goods within a reasonable time cannot be recovered except upon allegation and proof that the railway company had notice of the special circumstances at the time of the shipment.

Messrs. F. C. Price and J. B. Hayes for appellee.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

S. L. Clute, an implement dealer, ordered several harvesting machines of the manufacturer, and they were shipped from Wichita to Minneola, consigned to him, over the Rock Island railroad. He claimed that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

there was an unreasonable delay in their transportation, and that they arrived too late to serve the purpose for which they were ordered, namely, for sale during the harvesting season upon orders already taken. He refused to receive them, and sued the railroad company for the profits he would have made by selling them if they had arrived in time. He recovered, and the defendant appeals.

The appellant claims that under the evidence the plaintiff bought the machines with the understanding that the manufacturer was to make delivery at Minneola; that therefore the title remained in the shipper, and, as the plaintiff refused to receive them, he never acquired any interest in the property, and cannot maintain the action. The abstract does not clearly show a retention of title by the shipper. Ordinarily the right of action for delay or damages is in the consignee. 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 510, 511. In Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Commercial Guano Co. 103 Ga. 590, 593, 30 S. E. 555, 556, it was held that where, by reason of injury to the goods in transit, the consignee refuses to receive them, the consignor may sue; but this does not negative the right of the consignee to recover for any loss on his part. The court said: "In the event of liability by the carrier, the only question which remains for determination is whether or not the plaintiff, who sues, has been damaged, and, if so, to what extent." Much artificial and technical reasoning has been employed to determine the proper plaintiff in an action of this sort. The consignor has been allowed to recover for the benefit of the consignee (6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 513, note 91), and the consignee for the benefit of others having an interest (6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 511, note 84). These refinements are not in harmony with the spirit of the Code. Neither the consignor nor the consignee can be said to be a stranger to the transaction. The carrier has notice of the interest of each, and, if either suffers an injury through its fault, he should be permitted to obtain redress in his own name in a direct action against the wrongdoer. This is the effect of the decision in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Peru-Van Zandt Implement Co. 73 Kan. 295, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1058, 117 Am. St. Rep. 468, 85 Pac. 408, 87 Pac. 80, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 790, where it was held that an agent to whom his principal sent goods for sale might recover for his commissions lost through the negligent delay of the carrier.

It is contended that the measure of damages for delay in the delivery of goods by a carrier is necessarily the difference between their value when actually delivered and what they would have been worth upon seasonable delivery. This is the usual, but not the universal, rule. "In addition to this difference in market value, the carrier will be liable also for such other and incidental damages as naturally and proximately flow from the delay." 3 Hutchinson, Carr. 3d ed. § 1366. It is also argued that the damages here recovered were too remote, and could not have been anticipated by the carrier. The same contention was made under substantially similar circumstances in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Peru-Van Zandt Implement Co. supra, and held untenable.

The trial court required a remittitur from the verdict rendered; but the excess was not of such an amount or character as to show passion or prejudice, and did not require a new trial.

Although the orders taken by the plaintiff for the machines were not unconditional, the evidence justified submitting to the jury whether his sales were lost by the unreasonable delay of the defendant, and the verdict is conclusive on those points.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

GOODFELLOW TIRE COMPANY

v.

MYRTLE P. HURLBUT, Park and Boulevard Comr.

(— Mich. —, 128 N. W. 410.)

Highway — power to forbid use.

Since owners of property abutting on a highway have the absolute right of access thereto, a statute empowering commissioners to make reasonable rules and regulations concerning the use of a boulevard, and providing that no connections therewith shall be allowed without a permit from the commissioners, does not authorize the refusal of a permit.

(November 11, 1910.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment denying a petition for mandamus to compel the issuance of a permit to allow relator to construct a driveway connecting the roadway of the boulevard with his premises. Mandamus awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. May & Dingeman, for relator:

An abutting owner has two distinct kinds of rights in the street,—the public 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one, which he enjoys in common with other citizens, and private rights, which arise from his ownership of contiguous property. Among the private rights are: The right of free and unimpeded ingress and egress to and from his property for himself and animals and goods . . . and the right to have the street kept open and continued as a public street for the benefit of his contiguous property.

28 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 856, 863.

Respondent's refusal to grant the permit deprived the owner of the ordinary use of his property, and this under the law is, unquestionably a taking for which compensation must be made.

Ranson v. Sault Ste. Marie, 143 Mich. 668, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, 107 N. W. 439.

Messrs. P. J. M. Hally, for respondent:

It was the intention of the legislature to permit the park and boulevard system of the city to be used, not for business, but for pleasure, and to be preserved as such for the use and enjoyment of the public.

McQuillin, Mun. Ord. § 520; Randall v. Evening News Asso. 101 Mich. 566, 60 N. W. 301; Howe v. Lowell, 171 Mass. 575, 51 N. E. 536; West Chicago Park v. Farber, 171 Ill. 146, 49 N. E. 427.

The city holding this land does so, not

Note. — Right of abutting owner to join his land to street by driveway or walk.

This note does not discuss the right of a municipality to cut off or render difficult access to and from his land by an abutting owner by a change of grade, nor his right to compel the municipality to make the connection of his land with the traveled part of the highway, but is confined to the right of abutting owner himself to make the connection.

As to right of abutting owner to continue enjoyment of pass way across highway, see note to Snively v. Washington Twp. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918.

In addition to the general right to use the highway which he possesses in common with the rest of the public, the owner of land abutting on a highway has a special right or easement of access to and from his land, of which he cannot be deprived without just compensation.

It follows that he has a right to construct a driveway or other suitable approach in front of his premises, from his land to the traveled part of the highway, if done in such a way as not to interfere with the rights of the public.

Thus, it was held in Highway Comrs. v. Ely, 54 Mich. 173, 19 N. W. 940, that an abutting owner "has a right of access to the public street, and, if necessary for him to reach the traveled part, he has the right to bridge a ditch or construct a grade for that purpose; but in doing so he has no right as an agency of the state, but in its corporate, individual capacity, having private rights which the people have a constitutional right to enjoy undisturbed.

Thompson v. Moran, 44 Mich. 602, 7 N. W. 180.

The commissioner's discretion in the premises should not be disturbed by the extraordinary writ of mandamus.

Abrey v. Livingstone, 95 Mich. 181, 54 N. W. 714.

Mr. J. J. Speed, also for respondent:

The legislature had power to provide for the laying out of the boulevard, to provide for its improvement, and to regulate and limit its use.

Com. v. Davis, 162 Mass. 510, 26 L.R.A. 712, 44 Am. St. Rep. 389, 39 N. E. 113; McCormick v. South Park, 150 Ill. 516, 37 N. E. 1075; Brooklyn Park v. Armstrong, 45 N. Y. 234, 6 Am. Rep. 70; Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 110 Mich. 384, 35 L.R.A. 859, 64 Am. St. Rep. 350, 68 N. W. 304; Seovel v. Detroit, 146 Mich. 93, 109 N. W. 20.

Mandamus will not ordinarily issue to compel the performance of an act within the discretion of an officer, and this is especially so when the duty of the officer requires an investigation and determination of facts.

People ex rel. Horn v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 15; Sheldon v. Stewart, 43 Mich. 574, 5 N. W. 1067.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator is a Michigan corporation, whose principal business is that of filling automobile tires with a composition claimed to render them puncture proof. It also sells and handles automobile accessories. It is the owner of the north 95 feet of the easterly 100 feet of lots 2 and 3, and the southerly 5 feet of lot 1, of Frisbee & Foxen's subdivision of part of fractional section 31. These lots are at the corner of the boulevard and Woodward avenue in the city of Detroit. Lots 1, 2, and 3 front upon Woodward avenue. On the front 100 feet of the lots a block of stores three stories high is erected; at the rear of said stores, and between them and the alley, the relator is erecting a two-story building for the purpose of carrying on its business. Its property fronts on the boulevard. It applied to the respondent for a permit to give access to its building to and from the

to wilfully obstruct such ditch or highway, his rights as a private landowner being subordinate to the public right of constructing and keeping the highways in repair."

So, also, in Sandpoint v. Doyle, 14 Idaho, 749, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 497, 95 Pac. 945, where a municipality erected a bridge 450 feet long across a small stream 25 feet wide and the adjacent ravine or depression in the natural surface of the ground, and such bridge was of a height of 20 feet from the ground at the place where it passed alongside the lot of an abutting property owner located in the ravine, it was held that the municipality was without the power and authority unqualifiedly to prohibit and deny the property owner the right to erect a platform on his own lot to such height as to enable him to go from his building to the bridge, and to connect such platform with the bridge by proper and substantial railings, and, by such means and in such manner, exercise the right of ingress and egress.

And in Metcalf v. Boston, 158 Mass. 284, 33 N. E. 586, where the street commissioners and city council had laid out a street 200 feet wide, but graded a width of only 60 feet in the center, in an action of mandamus brought by abutting landowners to require the city to grade the street and fit it for travel through its entire width, the court said: "It is contended that the abutting landowners have a right to require the construction of the road up to the lines of their lots for convenience of access. Undoubtedly, they have a right of access to the road from their lots; but roads are constructed for the use of the public, and there is no law requiring cities and towns to construct approaches from the houses or lots of adjacent landowners to the traveled part of the way, or to grade and construct the way up to the lines of the lots, to enhance the value of the property. If the construction of the road in a reasonable way for public use will be likely to make access to the road from a neighboring lot difficult, and to require a large expenditure on the part of the owner in the construction of a passageway, that will be taken into account in assessing the damages. The petitioners in the present case own the fee of the street to the center opposite their land, and they have a right to make for themselves driveways to the wrought part of the street in any reasonable way which does not interfere with the use of the street by the public." This language was quoted and approved in Atty. Gen. v. Boston, 186 Mass. 209, 71 N. E. 574.

But the owner of land abutting on a highway, in order to reach the traveled part of the road, can use only that part of the highway in front of his own land, and has no right to construct and grade a driveway in front of his neighbor's land, though within the limits of the highway, and though, owing to a steep declivity in front of his own land, it was reasonably necessary for him to take such diagonal course in order to obtain convenient and safe access to the traveled part of the highway; and if he should attempt to do so, he would become a trespasser on his neighbor's land. Burr v. Stevens, 90 Me. 500, 38 Atl. 547.

boulevard by means of two driveways. The commissioner having denied the application for permission to construct the driveways, a petition for a writ of mandamus was filed in the court below, and, on denial of this petition, the cause was brought to this court by certiorari.

The claim of the respondent is stated by his counsel as follows (we quote from the brief): "The respondent further says in his answer that, under the statute relating to said office of commissioner of parks and boulevards of said city of Detroit, and to the parks and boulevards of said city, he submits he has the sole charge and management and control of said parks and boulevards, and of the improvements and maintenance thereof, and he avers it was and is within his exclusive judgment and discretion, as to whether a permit should be issued for the construction of said driveway, and, in the exercise of such judgment and discretion, he refused to issue a permit therefor. This respondent respectfully submits that this court has no jurisdiction to control the exercise of the discretion of this respondent, to command him, as against his judgment in the premises, to issue permits for the construction of driveways on said boulevard, or determine when, how, or where said driveways shall be made; and he makes this submission as in the nature of a demurrer to said petition."

One of the counsel for respondent says in his brief that "almost this identical question here contended for was presented to this court in a case which is entitled Abrey v. Livingstone, 95 Mich. 181, 54 N. W. 714. The jurisdiction of the commissioner in that case and in this is similar, and the act there construed is the act here under consideration. Abrey desired to have ingress and egress from the land under the control of the park commissioners to his land which abutted upon its holdings, and his right for that purpose was denied." An examination of that case will show that the act which was construed was not the one before us now, but was act No. 391, Local Acts 1879. In disposing of the case Justice Long, speaking for the court, said, in part, as follows: "The complainants filed their bill in the Wayne circuit court in chancery, setting up that they are the owners of the lands adjacent to these strips, and have a frontage thereon. They procured their titles to these lands after Kanter and wife deeded the approach to the bridge to the city, and now claim that such approach is in its entire width a public street, through which they have the right of ingress and egress from their lands. It is claimed by the defendants that it is their intention to ornament these strips outside of the walks, and, to prevent encroachments thereon, to erect necessary fences or walls along the outer sides of the same. The complainants seek by their bill to enjoin the defendants from erecting and maintaining these fences or walls. Defendants claim that these pieces of land are not a part of the public highway, but that the city may devote them to the purposes of a park, and shut off the approaches from either side. Complainants' bill was dismissed in the court below, and they appeal. It is contended by counsel for complainants that these parcels of land have always been regarded throughout their entire width by the common council and the board of public works as a street; that the strip of land from Jefferson avenue to the river was purchased for the purpose, and no other, of an approach to the bridge and a continuation or extension of the boulevard to the bridge. This piece of land was purchased by the city under the power granted by the above-named act." The court held in that case, with the defendant, that the land had never been a highway, and sustained the contention of the city. The boulevard was called into existence by virtue of act No. 374, Local Acts 1879. When the boulevard was established, much of it, including the land now belonging to the relator, was in the country outside of the city limits. Section 10 of the act gave to the commissioners the following powers: "To adopt plans, for constructing, laying out, improving, ornamenting, and beautifying the said boulevard, and shall have a supervisory and superintending control of the execution of such plans. They shall also have a like control and management of the maintenance and care of the said boulevard, and shall have power to make all reasonable rules and regulations concerning the use of said boulevard, and for the protection of the same." Section 14 of the act reads: "Whenever the said boulevard, or any part thereof, shall be opened, either by grant or conveyance, or by proceedings in invitum, the same shall, under such reasonable rules and regulations as shall be adopted by the said board of boulevard commissioners, be common and public, for the uses and purposes of such boulevard."

After the city limits were extended so as to take in the boulevard, legislation was had to meet the new conditions. The respondent is the successor of the previous commissioners. The act of 1879 was amended May 24, 1895, and May 4, 1901. By the act of 1895 (Acts 1895, No. 436), numerous detailed provisions were added further regulating or empowering the commissioners to regulate the use of the parks and boulevards. For example, prohibiting the bringing or the driving of animals, excepting horses, in the parks and boulevards; limiting the rate of speed, restraining the use of footpaths, grass plats, and other portions thereof, excepting upon carriage drives, by vehicles; preventing the obstruction of roadways, the injuring of property, the destruction of or interference with plants, trees, grass, etc. Heavy traffic was forbidden excepting where there was no alley in rear, and then only to the nearest cross street. Funeral and other processions were prohibited, as was also the playing of games and the speeding of horses, excepting at places designated by the commissioner. The act of 1901 (Acts 1901, No. 417) provided for a single commissioner of parks and boulevards in place of the board of commissioners, and re-enacted many of the sections of the act of 1895, substituting "commissioner" in place of "commissioners" or "board." In its present form both of these acts contained the following (Local Acts 1895, p. 595, No. 436, § 39; Local Acts 1901, p. 414, No. 417, § 39): "No person shall dig, remove, or carry away any sward, sand, turf, or earth in or from any public park or boulevard, and no person shall open or dig up or tunnel under any part or portion of the boulevard without a permit from the commissioner of parks and boulevards, and, before granting any such permit, the applicant therefor shall be required to deposit with the secretary of said commissioner such sum of money as the superintendent of the boulevard, or such other officer as the commissioner may designate for that purpose, shall estimate will fully cover any expense to be incurred by the commissioner in connection with such opening or tunneling, and the commissioner may make suitable regulations and conditions with respect to issuing said permits. And said commissioner may retain the actual expense, which shall be certified by the superintendent, which may be incurred by the commissioner in connection with any work done by him, for the purpose of restoring any roadways, sidewalk, planting place, or other portion of said boulevard, and the secretary shall refund to the person to whom said permit shall be issued the difference, if any, between the amount deposited and the amount so certified by the superintendent. Carriage or driveways and footwalks connecting with any premises adjoining the boulevard, or hitching posts thereon, shall be allowed only on a permit issued under this section, and the material used in making such ways, walks or posts shall be determined by the said commissioner."

the commissioner may deny relator the right to construct any driveway from his premises to the boulevard.

At volume 28 of Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 856, it is said: "An abutting owner has two distinct kinds of rights in the street,—the public one, which he enjoys in common with all citizens, and private rights, which arise from his ownership of contiguous property. Among the private rights are: The right of free and unimpeded ingress and egress to and from his property for himself and animals and goods, . . . and the right to have the street kept open and continued as a public street for the benefit of his contiguous property." In the same volume, at page 863, it is said: "Abutting owners have an indefeasible right of access to and from their property to the street." In the notes many cases are cited which sustain the text.

Counsel for respondent cite McCormick v. South Park, 150 Ill. 516, 37 N. E. 1075; but that case is not conclusive in favor of the respondent. Indeed, it is said in the opinion: "Undoubtedly, the owners of lots bordering upon streets or ways have the right to make all proper and reasonable use of such part of the street for the convenience of their lots, not inconsistent with the paramount right of the public to the use of the street in all its parts. Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L.R.A. 393, 35 N. E. 141, and cases cited. In the absence of legislative direction or municipal declaration of what such rights shall be, what is to be deemed a reasonable and proper use will depend, in a large degree, upon the public usage in like instances, and upon the local situation. General use by lot owners, and acquiescence therein by the public and public authorities, may always be resorted to as evidence of what is a reasonable and proper use, and of the existence of the right. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 521, 553, 585, 794; Van O'Linda v. Lothrop, 21 Pick. 292, 32 Am. Dec. 261; Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234; Nelson v. Godfrey, 12 Ill. 22."

Scovel v. Detroit, 146 Mich. 93, 109 N. W. 20, is also cited. In the opinion in that case occurs the following: "In 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. § 656, it is said: 'Public streets, squares, and commons, unless there be some special restrictions, when the same are dedicated or acquired, are for the public use, and the use is none the less for the public at large, as distinguished from the municipality, because they are situate within the limits of the latter, and because the legislature may have given the supervision, control, and regulation of them to the local authorities. The legislature of the state represents the public at large, and has, in the absence of special constitutional restraint, and subject (according to the weight of more recent judicial opinion) to the property rights and easements of the abutting owner, full and paramount authority over all public ways and public places."

Our attention has not been called to a case holding that an abutting owner might be deprived of ingress and egress by means of a driveway to and from his property to the highway in front of it. Certainly, when the legislature, in 1879, gave to the commissioners authority "to make all reasonable rules and regulations concerning the use of said boulevard," no one supposed they might deny the right of the abutting owner to construct a driveway to the boulevard. The provision in § 39, reading: "Carriage or driveways and footwalks connecting with any premises adjoining the boulevard, or hitching posts thereon, shall be allowed only on a permit issued under this section, and the material used in making such ways, walks, or posts shall be determined by the said commissioner,"—does not contemplate that the permit shall be denied, but the inference is a fair one that it shall be allowed upon suitable regulations and conditions.

The Commissioner, instead of refusing the permit, should have granted it subject to reasonable regulations and conditions as to number, location, plan of construction, and material used therein, and it will be so ordered.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES N. FULLER, Appt.,
v.

CITY OF JACKSON.

(Two Cases.)

(— Miss. —, 52 So. 873.)

Evidence — judicial notice — intoxicating quality of liquor.

1. The court takes judicial notice of the fact that a liquor containing more than 2 per cent of alcohol by weight will intoxicate.

Intoxicating Liquor — prohibition — intoxicating effect.

2. The statutory prohibition of the sale of malt liquor makes the sale of such liquor unlawful regardless of the amount of alcohol it contains or its intoxicating quality.

Note.—As to whether statutes forbidding the sale of a certain class or classes of liquor include nonintoxicating liquor of that class, see notes to Luther v. State, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1146, and Bowling Green v. McMullen, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — nonintoxicating quality.

3. The prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquor does not apply to a beverage which contains less than 2/10 of 1 per cent of alcohol.

(Anderson and Smith, JJ., dissent.)

(May 30, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from judgments of the Circuit Court for Hinds County convicting him of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of an ordinance of the City of Jackson. Case No. 14,306 reversed. Case No. 14,307 affirmed.

Statement by Anderson, J.:

These cases, being governed by practically the same principles, are considered together. The defendant was convicted in two cases for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors under the ordinances of the city of Jackson, and appeals to this court.

As authorized by § 3410, Code 1906, the municipal authorities adopted a general ordinance making all offenses against the criminal laws of the state, occurring within the limits of the city, not amounting to a felony, violations of the city ordinances and punishable as such. In each case the affidavit charged the defendant, Fuller, with selling "vinous, malt, alcoholic, intoxicating, and spirituous liquors," etc., in violation of § 1746, Code 1906, which had become an ordinance of the city as above set forth. There was an agreed state of facts in each case. In case No. 14,306 the facts agreed on are as follows: "The defendant did sell in the city of Jackson, Hinds county, Mississippi, a beverage known as 'Brewett' on the date mentioned in the affidavit filed herein. He sold it for cash and received the money for it. The said beverage sold by the said Fuller contained by volume .18 of 1 per cent of alcohol, and by weight .13 of 1 per cent of alcohol. The said beverage did not contain enough alcohol to make it intoxicating to any extent when drunk to excess. The said beverage so sold was not in fact an intoxicating liquor."

In this case the court gave the following instruction for the plaintiff: "The court instructs the jury, for the plaintiff, that if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did on the date named in the affidavit sell a beverage known as 'Brewett,' and that the said liquor contained some alcohol, although not a sufficient amount of alcohol to make the said beverage intoxicating to any extent when drunk to excess, you should find him guilty as charged." And refused instructions Nos. 1, 2, and 3 on behalf of the defendant, as follows: "No. 1. The court instructs the jury to find the defendant not guilty. No. 2. The court instructs the jury, for the defendant, that a liquor is not, within the meaning of the statutes of this state, alcoholic, unless it contains a sufficient amount of alcohol to make it intoxicating to some extent when drunk to excess. No. 3. The court further instructs the jury for the defendant that if you believe from the evidence that the defendant did on the date named in the affidavit sell a certain beverage known as 'Brewett,' and that the said beverage contained the small per cent of alcohol shown by the evidence, and that the said percentage of alcohol was too small to make the said liquid intoxicating to any extent even when drunk to excess, then you should find the defendant not guilty."

In case 14,307 the agreed facts are as follows: "The said defendant did on the date laid in the affidavit herein sell for cash, in the city of Jackson, Hinds county, Mississippi, as a beverage, a certain liquor known as 'Malt Ale.' The said beverage sold by the said defendant on the said date contained by volume 2.70 per cent of alcohol and by weight 2.12 per cent of alcohol.

The court gave the following instruction for the state: "The court instructs the jury, for the plaintiff, that if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant on or about the date named in the affidavit sold a certain liquor known as 'Malt Ale,' and that the said liquor was sold as a beverage and contained 2.12 per cent of alcohol or 2.70 per cent, then you will find the defendant guilty as charged." And refused the following instructions asked on the part of the defendant: "The court instructs the jury, for the defendant, that the burden is upon the city of Jackson to prove that the liquor charged to have been sold is intoxicating to some extent when drunk to excess; that it is not sufficient merely to show that the said liquors contained a small amount of alcohol. The court further instructs the jury that, unless you believe from the evidence that the said liquor sold by the defendant contained a percentage of alcohol large enough to make the same when drunk to excess intoxicating to some extent, then you will find the defendant not guilty."

The giving of the charges asked for the state, and refusing those asked on behalf of the defendant, are assigned as error.

Messrs. Flowers, Fletcher, & Whitfield for appellant.

Mr. James R. McDowell for appellee.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The paragraph of § 1746 of the Code of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1906, which is the ordinance of the city under which the defendant was convicted, is as follows: "If any person shall (a) sell or barter, or give away to induce trade, or keep for sale or barter, or to be given away to induce trade, any vinous, alcoholic, malt, intoxicating, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks, which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication, in any quantity less than 1 gallon, without having a license therefor in pursuance of this chapter," etc. The language, "which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication," qualifies the terms "vinous, alcoholic, malt, intoxicating, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks." There are alcoholic drinks which are known to the law to be intoxicating. Within this class are alcohol, wine, beer, ale, porter, whisky, brandy, gin, rum, and perhaps others. Such liquors, according to the common understanding, are intoxicating. The courts take judicial notice of the fact that they are alcoholic liquors, and will produce intoxication when drunk to excess. 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 61-63; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 198-201. There will be found collated in these two authorities the cases on this subject. In a case where the liquor in question belongs to this class, it is not necessary for the state to prove that it will intoxicate when drunk to excess; while, on the other hand, if it is not within this class which the court judicially shows are intoxicating, it is necessary for the state to prove that if drunk to excess it will cause intoxication. The term "alcoholic" is a general term which seems to have been thrown in rather for good measure than for any purpose. The statute is directed against alcoholic intoxicants. The sale of alcoholic liquors is prohibited provided they contain sufficient alcohol to intoxicate when drunk to excess.

The history of what is commonly known as the "prohibition movement" in this state, which resulted in the enactment of the statutes on this subject now in force, shows that it was directed against the sale of intoxicating liquors. Construing all these statutes together it is apparent that the object of the legislature was to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. This is clearly demonstrated by §§ 1747, 1748, 1749, 1750, 1752, 1755, 1758, 1759, 1765, 1767, 1773, 1776, 1791, 1794, 1797 and 1798 of Code 1906, and also chapter 117 of the Laws of 1908, which is a memorial to Congress, to enact a law to prevent the issuance of United States revenue license to any person selling "intoxicating liquors" in any locality where the sale is prohibited by local laws.

It is contended that the case of Edwards v. Gulfport (Miss.) 49 So. 620, is authority for the instructions given in these cases for the state. The liquor sold in the Edwards Case was "Pabst Mead," containing 4.6 per cent alcohol to each bottle; and the testimony showed that two bottles of it would intoxicate an average man. The court charged the jury that, if the liquor sold was a malt or alcoholic liquor, they should find the defendant guilty, whether shown to be intoxicating or not. Judge Whitfield uses this language in that case: "This case falls squarely within the case of Reyfelt v. State, 73 Miss. 415, 18 So. 925. On the evidence in this case it is perfectly manifest that a conviction is proper on either one of the two grounds: First, that the liquor was shown to be both an alcoholic and a malt liquor; and, second, that it was shown to contain enough alcohol to make an average man drunk if he drank two bottles." Marks v. State, 159 Ala. 71, 133 Am. St. Rep. 20, 48 So. 864, is referred to as authority for the Edwards Case. It is true that in the Marks Case (reviewing the statute substantially the same as § 1746, Code 1906) the Alabama court held that the language, "which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication," did not relate to each and all the liquors preceding it. However, the court held further in that case (exactly contrary to what was held in the Edwards Case): "Whether a beverage containing 1.46 per cent alcohol by weight, and 1.88 per cent by volume, and 1.20 per cent maltose, making about 2½ teaspoonfuls of alcohol to the pint, is an alcoholic, spirituous, vinous, malt, or intoxicating liquor, or whether if drunk to excess it will produce intoxication, is a question of fact for the jury." The Reyfelt Case is not authority for the Edwards Case. In the former the liquor sold was home-made wine; and the court held it was unlawful to sell it, regardless of the opinion of witnesses that it would not intoxicate. The decision of the court was manifestly correct, because wine is one of the liquors which has an accepted judicial meaning, and judicially known to be intoxicating when drunk to excess.

It is contended on behalf of the state that the purpose of the legislature was to prohibit the sale of all drinks as beverages containing alcohol in any quantity, however small; the object being not alone to lessen drunkenness, but to put out of reach of the people drinks which have a tendency to create a thirst for intoxicants. There is nothing in our statutes, nor in the history of the "prohibition movement," to indicate such purpose.

If the charges complained of in the instant cases, and which were authorized by the Edwards Case, are the law, then if a person should sell, as a beverage, a barrel of water with a teaspoonful of alcohol in it, he would violate this statute; and so would the owners of soda fountains, selling the usual cold drinks, using various extracts in the same, containing a small portion of alcohol for their preservation.

These views necessitate, in my judgment, the overruling of so much of the Edwards Case as holds that the charge in question in that case was a correct statement of the law. That case stands alone, unsupported, and is unsound.

In both of these cases the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find a verdict for the defendant, because neither of the drinks sold were shown to be intoxicating when drunk to excess. In case No. 14,307, if the "Malt Ale" sold had been proven to be ordinary ale, then the jury would have been authorized to convict, whether the ale was shown to be intoxicating or not when drunk to excess; ale being in the class of liquors which are judicially known to be intoxicating.

Both of these cases are therefore reversed and remanded.

Smith, J., dissenting:

I feel constrained to differ with both of my brethren in the construction put by them upon the statute in question. When this statute was under review in Reyfelt v. State, 73 Miss. 416, 18 So. 925, this court said: "The statute, for a violation of which the appellant was convicted, makes it unlawful to sell, inter alia, any 'vinous or alcoholic' liquor. The defendant sold home-made wine made from the grape and from blackberries, which wine he and his witnesses swore would not intoxicate. He asked the court to instruct the jury to acquit, if it believed from the evidence the wine would not produce intoxication. This the court declined to do, but charged the jury to convict if the sale of wine was proved. This action of the court was correct. The legislature, believing in chemistry, and that the process of fermentation of the juice of the grape will produce alcohol, has seen fit to prohibit the sale of such product, and, regardless of the opinion of the witnesses that this prohibited article would not intoxicate, the sale was unlawful, for the legislature prohibited such sales because it thought that alcoholic wines would, in some instances, intoxicate."

This was a square adjudication that the words, "which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication," did not qualify the terms "vinous, alcoholic, malt, intoxicating, or spirituous liquors." The court in its opinion said nothing about judicial notice, but held that it was unnecessary to prove that vinous or alcoholic liquor was intoxicating, for the sole reason that the legislature had so ordered. The same argument with reference to the qualification of these words by the words, "if drunk to excess will produce intoxication," was made in that case by counsel for appellant, as was made in the case of Edwards v. Gulfport (Miss.) 49 So. 620. This latter case announced no new construction of the statute, but simply followed the Reyfelt Case. The legislature has adopted the construction put upon this statute in the Reyfelt Case by twice re-enacting it. I do not think, therefore, that these cases should be overruled; neither do I think they should be qualified to the extent of saying that "when the beverage sold contains a sufficient quantity of alcohol to constitute the dominant quality of the beverage, and is the thing on account of which it is sold, there is then a violation of the law, even if it be conclusively shown that the beverage will not intoxicate." The statute does not provide that alcohol must be the "dominant quality of the beverage," but in express terms prohibits the sale of alcoholic liquor without reference to its intoxicating quality and irrespective of the amount of alcohol which it contains. Gilbert v. Husman, 76 Iowa, 241, 41 N. W. 3; Sawyer v. Botti (Iowa) 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1007, 124 N. W. 787.

The words "alcoholic liquor" have a plain and definite meaning; that is, a liquor containing alcohol; and, since the legislature has not limited the amount of alcohol such liquor must contain in order to come within the prohibition of the statute, this court has no right to do so. The legislature meant to establish and fix a certain guide for the court in administering this statute, and did not intend to leave it to the juries to say when alcohol was, or when it was not, the dominating quality of the liquor.

A suggestion of error having been filed, Mayes, Ch. J., on June 20, 1910, handed down the following response:

The same appellant is here on appeal in two cases,—one being No. 14,306 and the other No. 14,307. For convenience I follow the method adopted by Justice Anderson, and discuss the two cases in this opinion. Both cases charge the unlawful sale of "vinous, malt, alcoholic, intoxicating, and spirituous liquors." Both originated in prosecutions conducted for a violation of the ordinance of the city of Jackson, in the court of the police justice of the city. The ordinances of the city prohibiting the sale or barter of intoxicating liquors are rescripts of chapter 115 of the Acts of 1908. In discussing these cases, therefore, I shall deal with them as though they arose under the act.

The facts in both cases are agreed to, and on the trial in the circuit court the agreed facts constituted all the testimony. In case No. 14,306 it was agreed that the beverage sold was "Brewett," and contained .18 of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and .13 of 1 per cent of alcohol by weight. There is no proof in the record as to how this "Brewett" is made,—that is to say, whether or not it is a malt liquor,—nor is it proven to be vinous or spirituous. The agreed facts show only that it contains a small quantity of alcohol. Under the agreed facts this beverage, therefore, if a prohibited liquor, must be such a prohibited liquor as falls within the class designated as "alcoholic liquor." Case No. 14,307 charges the same offense; but the agreed facts show that the beverage in that case was "Malt Ale," and contained 2.71 per cent of alcohol by volume and 2.12 of alcohol by weight. In this last case the agreed facts concede that it is a malt liquor.

It may be also stated that I take judicial notice of the fact that any liquor containing more than 2 per cent of alcohol by weight will intoxicate, as a matter of fact, if drunk to excess. See full report of case of United States v. Cohn, 2 Ind. Terr. 474, 52 S. W. 41. In the Cohn Case, in the proof found in the report of the case, it is shown by expert witnesses that beverages containing more than 2 per cent of alcohol will intoxicate, and the trial court in that case took judicial notice of it. It is also shown in that case that the government fixed 2 per cent of alcohol, by weight, as in truth constituting an intoxicating liquor. I feel, therefore, that I am safe in saying that I shall take judicial notice of a fact so well established by proof and legislative action.

Chapter 115, p. 116, Laws 1908, enumerates certain classes of liquors which cannot be sold, or bartered, under any condition. The statute prohibits the sale of such liquors as it expressly names, without regard to their intoxicating or nonintoxicating quality, and without reference to what quantity of alcohol may be contained in them. If a party is charged with merely selling an "alcoholic liquor," and such liquor is neither vinous, malt, nor spirituous, if the quantity of alcohol is so negligible as not to constitute the beverage sold an "alcoholic liquor," of course there can be no conviction of a sale of such liquors, even if it be shown that in truth there is some alcohol in the beverage. There must be enough alcohol in it to make it "alcoholic" by me when these cases were first before the court, it follows therefrom that I concur with Brother Mayes in holding that the liquor sold in cause No. 14,307, known as "Malt Ale," containing 2.71 per cent of alcohol by volume, and 2.12 per cent of alcohol by weight, is both a malt and an alcoholic liquor, and therefore its sale is prohibited by the statute. It also follows that I dissent from the view expressed by him that the liquor sold in cause No. 14,306, which contained .18 of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and .13 of 1 per cent of alcohol by weight, is not an alcoholic liquor. In my opinion the amount of alcohol which a beverage contains is immaterial. Its sale is prohibited by the statute if it contains any alcohol.

OMAHA ELECTRIC LIGHT & POWER COMPANY, Appt.

(— Neb. —, 128 N. W. 505.)

Highway — trimming of trees — electric light company — rights.

1. In the absence of a valid legislative act or municipal ordinance granting to public service corporations authority to trim shade trees growing in the streets of metropolitan cities without compensating the abutting owner for damages thereby inflicted, and enacted before the lot owner

Headnotes by Root, J.

Note. — Liability to abutting owner for mutilating trees in highway by erecting poles or stringing wires.

The early cases upon the question of the liability to abutting owners for mutilating trees in highway by erecting poles or stringing wires are covered in the note to Cartwright v. Liberty Teleph. Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1125, and this note includes only the decisions which have passed on the question since that time.

Neither a city nor a telephone company has a right to cut an abutting owner's trees situated immediately in front of their lot, unless a necessity for the act exists. Betz v. Kansas City Home Teleph. Co. 121 Mo. App. 475, 97 S. W. 207.

And in the absence of evidence of such necessity the presumption is that the cutting was unlawful. Ibid.

So, a telephone company occupying a street as a licensee is liable to an abutting owner for the removal or damage done to trees planted by such owner inside the curb line. State v. Graeme, 130 Mo. App. 138, 108 S. W. 1131.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plants trees in that part of the street contiguous to his lot, an electric light company is liable to the owner for damages accruing to his lot by reason of such trimming.

Limitation of action — wrongfully trimming trees in street.

2. In such a case, the statute of limitations does not commence to run in favor of the electric light company until it trims the trees.

(Sedgwick, J., dissents.)

(November 16, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages caused by the alleged unlawful trimming of certain shade trees. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Weaver & Giller and W. W. Morseman for appellant.

Messrs. W. W. Slabaugh, C. M. McElfresh, and Shotwell & Shotwell, for appellee:

The constitutional provision that "the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor" applies.

Welton v. Dickson, 38 Neb. 767, 22 L.R.A. 496, 41 Am. St. Rep. 771, 57 N. W. 559; Vanderburgh v. Minneapolis, 98 Minn. 329, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741, 108 N. W. 480; Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. 53 Neb. 631, 39 L.R.A. 751, 74 N. W. 67; Bronson v. Albion Teleph. Co. 67 Neb. 112, 60 L.R.A. 426, 93 N. W. 201, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 639; Cosgriff v. Tri-State Teleph. Co. 15 N. D. 210, 5

Before trimming or removing trees planted inside the curb line by an abutting owner, a telephone company should proceed under the statute to have the damage assessed, or should make an agreement with the owner. Ibid.

A landowner is entitled to damages done to shade trees by trimming and removing limbs during the erection of poles and the stringing of wires in the street upon which his lot abuts, by a telephone company, without his consent, although the company had a franchise to use the street for the establishment of such lines; since the use in question is an additional burden upon the fee. Osborne v. Auburn Teleph. Co. 189 N. Y. 393, 82 N. E. 428.

And it was held in Kellar v. Central Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 53 Misc. 523, 105 N. Y. Supp. 63, that one could recover for the damage sustained by him through the injury done by a telephone company to a tree immediately in front of his premises, although he did not own the fee.

And a street railway company which, without a license, erects a feed wire through trees standing upon the sidewalk,

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages caused, as alleged by the defendant, in trimming shade trees in a street and contiguous to the plaintiff's lot. The plaintiff prevailed, and the defendant appeals.

There is no conflict in the evidence. In 1884 the city council of the city of Omaha granted to the defendant's assignor a franchise to transact a general electric light business in said city, and granted said assignor a right of way upon and over the streets, alleys, and public grounds in said city for the purpose of erecting and maintaining the poles, wires, and appurtenances necessary for the transaction of said business. In 1895 the plaintiff purchased a lot in said city. At that time two maple trees were growing between the sidewalk and the curb line in that part of Fortieth street contiguous to said real estate. About 1902 the defendant erected poles and attached wires thereto in the line of said trees in said street. At that time the wires were suspended above the trees. Subsequently limbs of the trees grew up to, among, and above said wires and interfered therewith. In 1908 the building inspector of said city gave the defendant permission to trim the trees, and, without the plaintiff's knowledge or consent, its servants cut off the limbs with-near the curb line, and, by passing a current through the wire, kills and injures the trees, is guilty at least of trespass, making it liable for nominal damages. Bathgate v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 75 N. J. L. 763, 70 Atl. 132.

But he could not recover the damages provided for by a statute giving treble damages for despoiling trees on the land of another, since such statute is penal, and the right is given on the theory of an injury to the land of the person injured. Ibid.

And an abutting owner who planted and nurtured trees in the street, with the acquiescence of the city, has a sufficient title to recover for an injury done to them by a telephone company in the erection of its line, although she may not own to the center of the street. Osborne v. Auburn Teleph. Co. 111 App. Div. 702, 97 N. Y. Supp. 874, reversed on other ground in 189 N. Y. 393, 82 N. E. 428.

Where a statute provides that "no person or corporation shall have a right to cut, mutilate, or injure any shade or ornamental tree, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining their line, without consent of the owner of the land on which it grows; or if his consent cannot be obtained, unless the selectmen, upon petition, after notice to and hearing the parties, decide that the cutting or mutilation is necessary, and assess the damages that will be occasioned the owner thereby; nor until the damages are paid or tendered,"—an electric light company which cuts limbs from an abutting owner's trees standing near the line of the street, without his consent or authority from the selectmen, is liable to the owner in an action of trespass. Darling v. Newport Electric Light Co. 74 N. H. 515, 69 Atl. 885.

And under a statute authorizing telephone companies to construct and maintain lines of wire or other material, "providing the same shall not injuriously interfere with other public uses of the said places, streets, and highways, or injure any trees located along the lines of such streets or highways," a telephone company is liable, if, by trimming, it injuriously injures an oak tree standing on an abutting owner's land, whose limbs extend over into the street. Boland v. Washtenaw Home Teleph. Co. 161 Mich. 315, 126 N. W. 425.

And the fact that the company had trimmed the tree before the plaintiff's title began will not justify their trimming it after he acquired title. Ibid.

So, under a statute providing that "if any person shall wilfully and unlawfully cut down, or destroy by belting, topping, or otherwise destroy or injure any fruit or shade trees of another," he shall be liable to a fine, a judgment against a telephone company was affirmed, where it appeared that it had cut down oak and hickory trees located on the abutting owner's property, but bordering on the highway. Russellville Home Teleph. Co. v. Com. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 132, 109 S. W. 340.

A city cannot authorize a telephone company, without compensation, to cut and injure trees belonging to abutting owners which are located between the street and the sidewalk, notwithstanding the city's right to destroy them where the public use of the street demands it. Brahan v. Meridian Home Teleph. Co. (Miss.) 52 So. 485.

If the owner of a fee makes an agreement, by himself or an agent, giving a telephone company the right to construct a telephone line upon her side of the highway, the company has the right to cut or trim trees standing upon such land, so far and to such an extent as is reasonably necessary for the proper construction and operation of the line. Jordan v. Delaware & A. Teleph. & Teleph. Co. (Del.) 75 Atl. 1014.

And a wife may ratify such an agreement made by her husband, with reference to her lands, so that she will be bound by its terms. Ibid.

So, a contract between an abutting owner and a telephone company whereby the former, for a consideration, grants the latter the right to operate lines, and do the necessary trimming of trees to clean wires "18 inches on and along my property in J. county," covers land owned by the first party, but occupied by other persons, as well as that occupied by himself. Nachand v. Cumber-

in the center of the head of the trees, some 15 feet below the tops thereof, thereby damaging them and depreciating the value of the plaintiff's property. The plaintiff charges that the defendant acted maliciously, unlawfully, and wilfully in trimming her trees. The court instructed the jury that, if they found from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant by trimming said trees damaged the plaintiff's lot, they should find in her favor.

The defendant does not argue that the damages are excessive, but its counsel contend that the evidence does not establish that the defendant acted maliciously or unlawfully, nor prove that the plaintiff's trees were trimmed more severely than was necessary to enable the defendant to safely and successfully convey currents of electricity over its wires, and for these reasons the defendant is not liable for such damages as the plaintiff may have suffered. The defendant admits that the plaintiff's grantor had the right to plant, and she had the authority to maintain, the trees in question, but that the defendant also had authority to construct and maintain its poles and wires in said streets, and that the individual's right to maintain the trees is at all times subordinate to a superior authority on the part of the defendant to trim or remove them whenever such action might become necessary in the construction or maintenance of its electric light plant. It is further argued that, since the defendant's right to use the street was granted in 1884, the plaintiff's cause of action accrued at that date, and the statute of limitations bars a recovery in the instant case.

1. It may be conceded that the proof fails to establish that the defendant's servants acted maliciously in trimming the plaintiff's trees, and yet there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict. The allegations with respect to malice and unlawful acts were and are immaterial. They could have been stricken from the petition, and were properly ignored by the court in its charge to the jury. The city of Omaha holds title to its streets and alleys in trust for the benefit of the public. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. 53 Neb. 631, 39 L.R.A. 751, 74 N. W. 67. The city council had authority to grant the defendant's assignor a right of way over the streets and alleys in the city for the construction and maintenance of the poles and wires in question; and the use of those streets for that purpose is a public use. Plattsmouth v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 80 Neb. 460, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 654, 127 Am. St. Rep. 779, 114 N. W. 588. If the defendant had the right under its franchise to trim the plaintiff's trees, but in the exercise of that authority it damaged her property, it should respond in damages under § 21 of article 1 of the Constitution, which reads: "The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor." Harmon v. Omaha, 17 Neb. 548, 52 Am. Rep. 420, 23 N. W. 503; Plattsmouth v. Boeck, 32 Neb. 297, 49 N. W. 167; Omaha v. Flood, 57 Neb. 124, 77 N. W. 379; Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. supra; Bronson v. Albion Teleph. Co. 67 Neb. 111, 60 L.R.A. 426, 93 N. W. 201, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 639; Brown v. Asheville Electric Co. 138 N. C. 533, 69 L.R.A. 631, 107 Am. St. Rep. 554, 51 S. E. 62; State v. Graeme, 130 Mo. App. 138, 108 S. W. 1131; Daily v. State, 51 Ohio St. 348, 24 L.R.A. 724, 46 Am. St. Rep. 578, 37 N. E. 710.

The defendant's counsel argue with great force and learning that the owner of plaintiff's lot at the time the trees were planted was charged with notice that in the proper use of said street for a public purpose it might become necessary to trim or even remove the trees, and her property rights therein are subject to the greater right of the public, and that the defendant

And such owner cannot recover unless he shows that the trees trimmed were not an obstruction to the lines, or that more was trimmed than necessary to clean the lines. Ibid.

And a telephone company which has maintained a line running along a highway, for seven years, and during that time has cut out the undergrowth which interfered with its line, without objection being made, is not liable to one who took the property by descent, for a statutory penalty for wilfully or maliciously cutting, where it cuts only such small growth as interferes with its line. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Martin, 93 Miss. 505, 46 So. 247.

anyone to "wilfully and maliciously, or wantonly and without right, enter the premises of another, and cut, take away, destroy, etc., any fruit tree, ornamental, or shade tree," cannot be upheld unless his act was wantonly and wilfully done. State v. Graeme, 130 Mo. App. 138, 108 S. W. 1131.

An injunction will not be granted at the instance of an abutting owner to restrain a telephone company from cutting trees and shrubs along the highway in the erection of its lines, since the remedy at law is adequate. *Hobbs v. stands in the shoes of the public with respect to the acts referred to in the petition. There is no proof in the record that the city council of the city of Omaha ever enacted an ordinance for the purpose of controlling the planting or maintenance of shade trees upon the streets of said city, or providing that such trees might be trimmed or removed whenever they interfered with the public service, and without compensation to the lot owner, or that said trees were planted subject to any ordinance other than one directing that limbs of shade trees shall not be permitted to grow within a certain distance of the sidewalks in said city; nor is there any proof that the plaintiff, in maintaining her trees in the condition in which they existed before defendant trimmed them, violated any ordinance of the city. The defendant, therefore, must justify under the terms of its franchise, and the Constitution of the state. An application of the fundamental law to the record in this case amply supports the judgment of the district court.

2. To the argument that the plaintiff's cause of action arose in 1884, it is sufficient to say that the owner of the plaintiff's lot could not know at that time that the defendant would erect the poles and string the wires in question; nor could the plaintiff have known, when the wires were strung, that defendant would years thereafter trim her trees, and thereby damage her property. It was feasible to remove such wires to the alley, and it was possible they would be placed in conduits beneath the surface of the street before the necessity might arise for trimming the trees. The plaintiff's cause of action arose when her property was damaged, and the statute does not bar that action.

The judgment of the District Court is right, and is affirmed.

Letton, J., concurring in conclusion:

I concur in the affirmance, but do not agree to much that is said in the opinion. The petition alleges a wilful and malicious cutting, breaking, and injury of plaintiff's trees, and damages to her property. The answer pleads defendant's franchise, and that it was necessary to trim the trees in order to carry on its business. The evidence for the plaintiff clearly showed a reckless and wanton mutilation of the trees. This evidence was not contradicted, nor was any proof offered to show that the wholesale cutting was reasonably necessary. The fact of the existence or non-existence of malice as charged is immaterial. With the issues and proof in this condition, the verdict was justified. The court instructed the jury properly as to the measure of damages, and the general instructions as to the right of plaintiff to recover damages could not, under the proofs in this case, prejudice the defendant. The wires when erected were above and clear of the trees, and the growth of the trees extended the limbs among the wires. Under these circumstances, I think the defendant had the right to trim the trees so often and to the extent that was reasonably necessary to exercise its franchise, but that this right should have been exercised in such a manner as to inflict as little injury as possible to the property; that if it neglected for years to trim, and thus allowed the growth of large limbs the removal of which would mutilate and damage the trees, it would be liable for such damages to the property rights of the tree owner as might be thereby occasioned.

I am further of opinion to quote the language of the opinion in Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Francis, 109 Ala. 224, 31 L.R.A. 193, 55 Am. St. Rep. 930, 9 So. 1, that "if the city or other corporation invested with the right of eminent domain, acting under municipal authority, proceeds to cut or trim trees planted on a sidewalk by the owner of abutting property under lawful authority, when no necessity for such cutting exists, or when the cutting clearly exceeds the necessity, and consequential injury results therefrom to such abutting property, the owner will have his appropriate remedy at law to redress the injury."

Reese, Ch. J., concurring:

I concur in the affirmance of the judgment of the district court. I do not believe that any corporation or person has any higher right to the property of another than has the owner himself, even though that corporation or person be in the enjoyment of a "franchise," or it be what is known as a "public service" corporation or person. The fact that the city has conferred upon defendant the right to use the streets for its poles and wires—and that is all there is of the so-called franchise—does not give it the right to injure or destroy the property of others without compensation, any more than it gives a private individual the right to destroy or injure the property of his neighbor which happens to be in his way or renders the enjoyment of his own any the less. The trees were rightfully growing on and in connection with plaintiff's property at the time the alleged franchise was granted. According to the usual course of nature, those trees would grow up. As well might defendant have chopped them down in anticipation of their natural upward growth.

as to wait until they had become more valuable, and then, without consent or payment and by the force and authority of might, practically ruin them. The rights of persons ought to be held just as sacred as the rights of property, and of the single individual as sacred as those of the multitude.

Sedgwick, J., dissenting:

The city has title to its streets, as stated in the majority opinion, and can, of course, regulate and control the use of the streets in planting and maintaining trees therein, and in the use of poles and wires for public service. It is said in the opinion that the council had authority to grant a right of way over the streets for these poles and wires, and that the use of the streets for that purpose is a public use, and "if the defendant had the right under its franchise to trim the plaintiff's trees, but in the exercise of that authority it damaged her property, it should respond in damages under § 21 of article 1 of the Constitution, which reads: 'The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor.'"

This, it seems to me, fails to decide the questions presented. Did the defendant have the right to occupy the space which the city had allowed it to take under its franchise, to the exclusion of all except the city? If it did, should the plaintiff have prevented her trees from infringing upon that space, and if she neglected that duty, would she thereby become a trespasser? If the defendant found the animals or trees of others trespassing upon its property and so injuring the service, would it have the right to remove such encroachments in a reasonable and prudent manner? These are the questions, as it appears to me, that ought to be decided in this case. If the defendant had a right to the space it occupied, and for that reason had the right to prevent the plaintiff from crowding into that space with her trees, the trimming of the trees is not taking or damaging them for public use, any more than if the city should trim them to prevent them from interfering with the use of the sidewalk. As well hold that to drive trespassing animals from the capitol grounds would be damaging them for public use. It might, of course, be a great damage to them if they could not obtain feed elsewhere, but the act of driving them away would not be within the constitutional prohibition. I understand the above language quoted from the majority opinion to mean that the court intends to hold that, because the original location of the lines and poles along this street cast an additional burden upon the adjacent property, therefore each trimming of the trees from time to time, to prevent their infringing upon these lines and poles, will be an additional damage or taking of the property for public use. I think I ought to protest against such holding.

If the occupation of the space in the street allotted to defendant, and the proper maintenance of its lines and poles within that space to the exclusion of the owner of the adjacent lots, in any way affected and lessened the value of the lots, damages to the lots so caused might be claimed or waived when the lines and poles were located and the burden thereof cast upon the adjacent lots. Afterwards damages caused by any improper or unlawful use of the space appropriated, or by negligent or malicious conduct on the part of defendant in the use of its property and rights, could be recovered by the party injured, but not damages caused by the original occupation of the street, and the lawful use of the franchise and location granted to defendant by the city. Damages caused by the original location of the lines and poles, or that necessarily resulted therefrom, are presumed to have been received or waived at the time of the appropriation of the space allotted by the city for that purpose.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

COLORADO TELEPHONE COMPANY,
Appt.,

v.

CHARLES G. FIELDS.

(— N. M. —, 110 Pac. 571.)

Contracts — telephone service — construction.

1. An ambiguous or doubtful contract between a telephone company and a municipal corporation in which it is to trans-

Note. — Right of telephone company to require patron to pay for installing or transferring instruments.

No case has been found in which the question as to the right of a telephone company to require a patron to pay for installing or transferring instruments has been squarely presented, as in COLORADO TELEPHONE CO. v. FIELDS, though the rulings in the following cases construing rate regulations fixed by the public seem broad enough to control the question here presented:

In Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 250, 53 Am. Rep. 201, 5 N. E. 178, it was held that the word "telephone," used in a statute prescribing the maximum rental charges for the use of such instruments, referred to an apparatus composed of all the usual and act business, as to the rights of the public under it, will be construed in favor of the public rights.

Same — construction — general intent.

2. To the construction of a contract between a telephone company and a municipality in which it is to transact business, the rule applies that where a contract as a whole discloses a given intention, if certain words or clauses taken literally would defeat the intention, it will be construed, if possible, so as to be consistent with the general intent.

Same — telephone service — short term rate.

3. A contract between a municipal corporation and a telephone company seeking to do business within its limits, that the rental rates for instruments shall be a certain amount per annum, merely fixes a mode of computation, and applies to contracts for a portion of the year as well as to yearly contracts, and therefore the company cannot charge at a higher rate for short term contracts than for yearly ones.

Telephone — transferring instruments — burden.

4. A telephone company whose maximum rentals are fixed by contract with the municipality in which it is to transact its business cannot enforce a regulation requiring patrons to pay a charge in addition thereto, for installing and transferring instruments.

(August 9, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Bernalillo County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover compensation for removing and installing a telephone instrument. Affirmed.

Statement by Parker, J.:

The appellant received from the city of Albuquerque a grant of a privilege and license to erect in, upon, across, and along and under all streets and alleys of the city of Albuquerque, such poles, wires, and fixtures, and to construct such underground conduits, as may be necessary for the operation of a telephone exchange in said city. Section 6 of the ordinance making said grant is as follows: "Sec. 6. This franchise shall be null and void unless the said Colorado Telephone Company, its successors or assigns, shall, within fifteen days necessary instruments for the transmission and reception of telephonic messages, and not to a single instrument only. To the same effect is Central U. Teleph. Co. v. Bradbury, 106 Ind. 1, 5 N. E. 721.

In the Hockett Case it appeared that the telephone company contracted to extend its line several miles in the country to the subscriber's residence, and to supply complete equipment, which consisted of several improved instruments to give more efficient service. The contract price included charges for construction and maintenance, and greatly exceeded rental charges fixed by the statute. In a suit to collect the penalty provided by the statute for exceeding the maximum rental charges, it was held no defense that the company could not supply the facilities provided for in the contract, for the rental fixed by the statute, without serious loss, since there was nothing which required a telephone company to construct a new line against its will, or to maintain an old one longer than it may feel inclined to do so in the exercise of a legitimate business discretion.

And in Chicago Teleph. Co. v. Illinois Mfrs. Asso. 106 Ill. App. 54, it was held that the words "telephone service" in an ordinance regulating rates for such service, which was accepted by the company upon receiving its franchise, include subsequent improvements which may be made to render the service more efficient.

And in Johnson v. State, 113 Ind. 143, 15 N. E. 215, it was held that a fixed charge of $1 per month, in excess of the rate allowed by the statute, for the use of the telephone by nonsubscribers, which was charged and collected whether the telephone was used by nonsubscribers or not, and without regard to the number of such persons who may use it, is a violation of the law making it a criminal offense to charge or collect a sum in excess of the amount fixed by the statute. The court said: "It is true that defendant divided the monthly sum of $4, which he charged and collected from Mr. Lute Wile for the use of 'one telephone only,' into two items, one of which he designated as rental and the other as a monthly charge 'for nonsubscribers;' but, divided the $4 as he might, and designate the items as he might, the fact remains and is apparent that defendant did thereby 'charge, collect, or receive, for the use of one telephone only, a sum in excess of $3 per month,' to wit, the sum of $4 per month. Having done this, the statute says he 'shall be deemed guilty of a public offense,' etc."

But a statutory prohibition against charging or receiving "more than $50 per annum for the use of a telephone on a separate wire" does not require a telephone company to furnish such additional equipment, as wall cabinet and desk, auxiliary bells, etc., for which separate charges had theretofore been made. Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Manning, 186 U. S. 238, 46 L. ed. 1144, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881.

from the date of the passage hereof, execute and enter into a contract with the mayor and city council relative to conditions not provided for. . . ." Appellant thereupon entered into a contract with the city of Albuquerque, and, among other things, obligated itself "to maintain telephone rental rates not to exceed the following amounts within a radius of 1 mile of its central office in Albuquerque: . . . One party residence, $36 per annum." Appellee, a resident of the city of Albuquerque, applied to appellant to install one of its phones in his residence for a term of three months, and, pursuant to the request, the appellant installed a set of its instruments at an expense of $2.50. Thereafter appellee moved his place of residence to another locality in the city, and applied to the appellant to move its instruments so supplied to him to his last place of residence, and to install the same for a term of three months. The appellant, pursuant to the request, did remove the instruments and install them in the appellee's last-named place of residence at an expense of $2. At the time appellee applied for the installation of the phone, and when he applied to have the same removed to his last place of residence, he was aware of the existence of a rule theretofore promulgated by appellant, to the effect that on all contracts for less than one year's rental, a charge of $2.50 would be made for installation and a charge of $2 for removal of instruments. Appellee refused to make a contract for one year's rental, and refused to pay the installation and removal charges. Thereupon, appellant brought its action for $4.50 against appellee. Appellee demurred to the complaint upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and, the appellant electing to stand upon its complaint, the cause was dismissed at the cost of appellant. From this judgment, appellant appeals.

Messrs. Marron & Wood, for appellant:

The plaintiff's contract with the city of Albuquerque does not prohibit a reasonable installation or removal charge to a person wishing to contract for less than a year's service.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the foregoing statement it appears that there is a single question involved in this appeal, viz., What is a proper construction of the charter and contract of appellant?

Appellee contends, in support of the judgment of the court below, that, in construing a grant of power to corporations of the class of appellant, they are to be strictly construed against the grantee, and that nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit terms, and cites in support of his proposition Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. 130 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 837, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 409; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 478, and many other cases from the Supreme Court of the United States. Appellant does not deny this proposition, but, on the other hand, expressly admits it as correct. Appellant, however, attempts to draw a distinction between the grant of a right of this nature and a contract made in pursuance of such grant, and, as a condition therefor, he claims that a different rule of construction is to be adopted in regard to the contract. Counsel cites in 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

support of this proposition Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Manning, 186 U. S. 238, 46 L. ed. 1144, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881. We do not deem that case as applicable to the facts in this case. In that case the question was whether an act of Congress prohibiting a charge of "more than $50 per annum for the use of a telephone on a separate wire" included such additional equipment as a wall cabinet, auxiliary bells, etc. In view of those facts, the court said: "In other words, there is no presumption of an intent to interfere with the management by a private corporation of its property any further than the public interests require, and so no interference will be adjudged beyond the clear letter of the statute." On the other hand, appellee cites Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 736, 77 C. C. A. 267, 147 Fed. 1, a case in the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, in which the court, after examining numerous cases, extracts from them the following rule, which we adopt, viz.: "Where the meaning of a grant or contract regarding such a suspension or regarding any public franchise or privilege, is ambiguous or doubtful, it will be construed favorably to the rights of the public. Where the grant or the contract is clear and plain, it will be protected and enforced." It thus appears that the true rule is that both the grant and the contract, in case of ambiguity or doubt, are to be construed favorably to the rights of the public, and we so hold. In the consideration of this contract, a certain other well-known rule of construction is applicable. Where a contract as a whole discloses a given intention, if certain words or clauses taken literally would defeat the intention, it will be construed, if possible, so as to be consistent with the general intention. 2 Page, Contr. § 1113.

Another consideration entering into a proper construction of this contract is as to the proper definition of the words "per annum" in relation to the rental charge. The words "per annum," of course, usually mean by the year, but they have often been held to have a somewhat different meaning. Thus, in Ramsdell v. Hulett, 50 Kan. 440, 31 Pac. 1092, the words "per annum" in a note were held to mean merely the rate of interest, and had nothing to do with the time when the interest was to be paid. To the same effect, Cooper v. Wright, 23 N. J. L. 200, and Tanner v. Dundee Land Invest. Co. 8 Sawy. 187, 12 Fed. 648. In State ex rel. Abbott v. McFetridge, 64 Wis. 130, 24 N. W. 140, the court held that, in fixing the rate of license for railroads, "per annum" meant in the year preceeding the date of fixing the license, Cassoday, J., strongly dissenting, and applying the same construction to the words "per annum" which we do in this case. In Haney v. Caldwell, 35 Ark. 156, it was held that a contract to pay an engineer $2,500 per annum salary was not an employment for a definite period, but that the words "$2,500 per annum" were a mere measure of compensation. In State, Stanford, Prosecutor, v. Fisher Varnish Co. 43 N. J. L. 151, a contract increasing the salary of an employee in the sum of $104 per annum merely increased the weekly salary, and did not convert the contract into an annual one. The words "per annum" were used only as a mode of computation.

In view of what has been heretofore stated, we may approach the consideration and construction of this contract as follows: A public service corporation is desirous of securing a charter authorizing it to use the streets of the city of Albuquerque for its purposes in the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system. The city council is desirous of protecting the people of the city of Albuquerque from unjust charges for telephone service, and consequently exacted from the public service corporation the contract in question. It is perfectly apparent that the city council did not intend to prescribe maximum rental rates for only a portion of its inhabitants within the district mentioned in the contract. It proposed to prescribe maximum rental rates for all of its people. It therefore did not contract merely for those people who would make an annual contract for a telephone, but the words "per annum" were inserted in the contract as furnishing a mode of computation merely for a rental charge. This evidently was the sense in which the words were used by the city. To conclude otherwise would be to convict the city council of the grossest failure in duty. In view of the rules of construction hereinbefore noted, there seems to be no difficulty whatever in holding that this is the true construction to be placed upon this contract. It is clearly susceptible of such construction, and the rules of construction seem to require it.

Appellant seems to justify the charges for installation and removal on the ground that they are made in pursuance of a reasonable regulation on their part. We cannot understand, however, that a regulation can under any circumstances be adopted by a public service corporation which will result in increasing a rental charge above what has been fixed by contract as a maximum charge. This was attempted in Johnson v. State, 113 Ind. 143, 15 N. E. 215, and it was held to be invalid. And the obligation to furnish telephone service at not to exceed a specified rental charge certainly must include the installation of a usable appliance connected with a system.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the lower court will be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Pope, Ch. J., and McFie, Mechem, and Wright, JJ., concur. Abbott, J., having tried this case below, did not participate in this opinion.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

THEODORE R. CONVERSE, Receiver of Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company,

v.

CARRIE G. CLARK PARET, Appt.

(228 Pa. 156, 77 Atl. 429.)

Corporation — stockholders' liability — trustee.

A trustee who permits stock to stand on the register of the corporation in his individual name, without disclosing the fact of the trusteeship, is not entitled to the benefit of a provision in a statute creating a stockholders' liability, that no person holding stock as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee shall be personally subject to any liability as a stockholder.

(May 2, 1910.)

Note. — Personal liability of executor, administrator, or trustee on corporate stock belonging to estate or trust, but standing in his name.

This note includes only cases where the representative character of one appearing as stockholder is not indicated on the books of the corporation; hence cases are excluded where the word "trustee" or the like appeared in connection with the stockholder's name. Neither does it include the right of the corporation or its receiver or creditors to recover from the cestui que trust or the estate of decedent, etc.; nor the right of the trustee, etc., to reimbursement from the trust estate, cestui que trust, etc. As to liability of pledgee of stock as a shareholder, see note to Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, J. S. Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, supplementing a note to Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139.

Cases like Brown v. Allebach, 166 Fed. 488 (reversed on point of practice in 103 C. C. A. 16, 179 Fed. 32); Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776; McKim v. Glenn, 66 Md. 479, 8 Atl. 130; Mann v. Currie, 2 Barb. 294, upholding liability of broker or other person in whose name the stock stood solely for convenience of parties in effecting transfers, are omitted; as are also cases APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor, notwithstanding a verdict for defendant, in an action brought to recover certain assessments which had been levied on the corporate stock of the Minnesota Thresher Manufacturing Company, which had become insolvent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. B. Holmes, for appellant:

When, upon the reorganization of a Minnesota corporation, stock in the reorganized company is issued to the executrix of a deceased stockholder in the original company, and, by the mistake or oversight of the officers of the company, said stock is issued to the executrix in her individual name, without the addition of the word "executrix," such executrix, upon the insolvency of the company, is not personally liable for the amount of an assessment.

Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 510, 51 L. ed. 1163, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Straw & E. Mfg. Co. v. L. D. Kilbourne Boot & Shoe Co. 80 Minn. 125, 83 N. W. 38.

A discrimination should be made between those who hold stock in their own right and those who hold it merely in a representative capacity or as trustees or by the way of collateral security.

Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10.

Statutes which impose individual liability on stockholders for the debts of the corporation are to be strictly construed.

like Bird's Case, 4 De G. J. & S. 200, upholding liability of agent who subscribes for stock in his own name, without disclosing the fact of agency.

One to whom stock is issued by the corporation, who allows himself to appear on the books of the corporation as the owner, is liable personally to creditors of the corporation, as though he were the absolute owner, even though he is in fact but a trustee. Baines v. Babcock, supra; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met. 525 (dictum); Grew v. Breed, 10 Met. 576 (holding trustee liable whether trust relationship appeared on books of company or not); Mann v. Currie, supra; Re Central Bank, 18 Ont. App. Rep. 489; King's Case, L. R. 6 Ch. 196.

One who subscribes for shares of stock in his own name is liable on such subscription, though he signed upon a secret trust for another. Ollesheimer v. Thompson Mfg. Co. 44 Mo. App. 172.

Effect of statutes.

One who appears on the register of stockholders as the absolute owner of shares, it being forbidden by statute for a trust to be recorded upon the register, will, as to creditors, be placed upon the list of contributories, although he in fact holds the shares as trustee. Chapman's Case, L. R. 3 Eq. 361 (for, the company itself); Mitchell's Case, L. R. 9 Eq. 363; Ex parte Bugg, 2 Drew. & S. 452.

The person appearing on the books of the corporation as stockholder is the only person to whom a liquidator of the company can look, though he is insolvent, and is trustee for a solvent cestui que trust. Hemming v. Maddick, L. R. 9 Eq. 175.

Under a statute providing that "no person holding stock in any corporation as executor, administrator, conservator, guardian, or trustee, . . . shall be personally subject to any liability as stockholder of such corporation," one who holds stock as trustee for another is nevertheless liable as stockholder to creditors, where the trust relationship is not indicated on the books of the corporation. Sherwood v. Illinois 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Trust & Sav. Bank, 195 Ill. 112, 88 Am. St. Rep. 183, 62 N. E. 835.

One section (5152, U. S. Rev. Stat. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3465) of the national banking law enacts that "persons holding stock as executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees shall not be personally subject to any liabilities as stockholders." Under this statute one whose representative character appears on the face of the books of the bank is not personally liable. Lewis v. Switz, 74 Fed. 381.

But where the representative character does not appear on the books, one appearing thereon as stockholder is estopped to show, as against creditors, that he is in fact only a trustee. Davis v. First Baptist Soc. 44 Conn. 582, Fed. Cas. No. 3,033; Bundy v. Jackson; 24 Fed. 628; Yardley v. Wilgus, 56 Fed. 965; Lewis v. Switz, supra; Kerr v. Urie, 86 Md. 72, 38 L.R.A. 110, 63 Am. St. Rep. 493, 37 Atl. 789 (where stockholder was a self-appointed attorney or trustee of her infant child).

Or even that he is a trustee for the bank itself. Bundy v. Jackson and Lewis v. Switz, supra.

Thus, where by statute national banks are forbidden to purchase their own shares of stock, except when necessary to prevent loss on a debt previously contracted in good faith, and are required to dispose of it within six months on pain of having a receiver appointed, the president and cashier of a bank, who appear on the books as stockholders, are estopped, when sued as such, to prove that they in fact hold the stock for the bank, and that it was stock originally owned by the bank and put in their names to avoid a forfeiture of the bank's charter, or for any other deceptive or illegal purpose; nor can they avoid liability by retransferring the stock to the bank. Bundy v. Jackson, supra.

So, one who permits his name to appear as stockholder of a national bank, without anything to indicate that the stock was held in trust, cannot show as a defense to O'Reilly v. Bard, 105 Pa. 569; DeHaven v. Pratt, 223 Pa. 633, 72 Atl. 1068.

Defendant is not estopped from proving that she held the stock as executrix.

Messrs. Wilton A. Erdman and George H. Butler for appellee.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James B. Clark, a citizen of the state of Connecticut, died in August, 1894. By his last will he appointed his wife, the defendant in this action, executrix, and gave her the full use and control of his entire estate until his only son should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, at which period the will directed that whatever estate then remained should be divided equally between widow and son. At the time of his death Clark was the owner of forty shares of the capital stock of the Northwestern Manufacturing & Car Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Minnesota. In 1884 the Thresher Manufacturing Company, also a Minnesota corporation, acquired the assets of the manufacturing and car company, and substituted its own stock for that of the former. The defendant, as executrix of the will of Clark, surrendered the certificates of stock that were in her husband's name, and received in exchange certificates for forty shares in the thresher company in her own name, an assessment by a receiver, that it was taken by the bank in part payment of an indebtedness due the bank by a stockholder, to save itself from loss, and was put in his name to hold in trust for the bank. Lewis v. Switz, supra.

But one appearing on the books of a national bank as the owner of stock, but who in fact is merely a trustee, cannot be held liable as stockholder for the debts of the bank, where the real owner was sued as 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Carrie G. Clark. She had given no directions as to the transfer, but the stock so issued to her was carried on the stock ledger and also upon the stub of the certificate book as the stock of Carrie G. Clark. The promoters of the new company organized a voting trust, and in December, 1887, the defendant delivered to the trustees the certificates that had been issued to her in her own name, signing at the same time an agreement in which she averred that she individually was the owner of the stock, and receiving in exchange a trustees' receipt which recited that the stock was held by them for Carrie G. Clark. Upon surrender of the trustees' certificate in 1894, a certificate for forty shares of the capital stock in her then name, Carrie G. Clark Paret, was issued and receipted for by her. Once in 1886, and again in 1897, defendant voted by proxy the stock standing in her name. In 1901, at the suit of a creditor, the Minnesota Thresher Company was adjudged insolvent, and the plaintiff in this action was appointed receiver. Under the laws of Minnesota, stockholders in corporations such as this are held liable to the amount of their stock at its par value. The courts directed two assessments on the capital stock of the company, one in 1902, of 36 per cent, and one in 1907, of 64 per cent. At these dates the defendant's home was in Monroe county in this state. Action was there brought against her for the recovery of these assessments. The defense set up was that the defendant was not the beneficial owner of the stock, but that the same belonged to the estate of her deceased husband; that the stock had not been issued in her name at her direction; that she continued to hold it in her name because unadvised that such fact indicated individual ownership on her part; that she had no knowledge of how it was registered on the books of the corporation; that she never asserted ownership over it; that as executrix of her husband's will she had fully accounted for it,—subsequent, however, to the insolvency of the corporation,—and had transferred it to her son, who was a legatee under the will. On the trial of the case defendant testified very fully in support of these averments contained in the affidavit of defense, and nothing was offered by way of contradiction.

stockholder and judgment obtained against him, even though execution was returned wholly unsatisfied, as both cannot be held. Yardley v. Wilgus, supra.

The statute above quoted refers not alone to a trustee appointed by a will or by the order of a court or judge, but the relation of trustee and cestui que trust may exist without such formal action. Lucas v. Coe, 86 Fed. 972.

R. A. E.

It was submitted to the jury to determine the question of ownership of the stock; and it was further submitted to them—unnecessarily, since there were no facts in dispute—to determine whether defendant was estopped from claiming that she was not the owner of the stock by reason of anything she had done or failed to do in connection with the certificate which had been issued to her.

Whether an estoppel results from established facts is a question for the determination of the court. Lewis v. Carstairs, 5 Watts & S. 205. On both issues the finding was for the defendant. A motion for judgment non obstante followed. The court in a lengthy opinion filed sustained the motion, and directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, on the ground that, under the statutes of Minnesota as construed by the highest judicial tribunal of that state, "the liability of a person to assessment on stock in an insolvent corporation is fixed by the names in which the stock stands on the stock register of the corporation when it ceases to be a going concern, irrespective of who is the real or absolute owner thereof, subject, of course, to the knowledge of the person sought to be charged of how the certificates are actually issued, or to acts which make the person a party to its appearing on the stock register." It is conceded that, as a general statement of the law of Minnesota governing the liability of stockholders of insolvent corporations, this is correct; but the applicability of the general rule to cases such as that under present consideration is denied. Section 13 of the General Statutes of Minnesota of 1840-1858 reads as follows: "No person holding stock in such corporation as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, and no person holding stock as collateral security, shall be personally subject to any liability as a stockholder of such corporation; but the person pledging such stock shall be considered as holding the same, and shall be liable as a stockholder accordingly, and the estates and funds in the hands of such executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee shall be liable in like manner as the testate or intestate would have been if he had been living, or the ward or person interested in such trust funds would have been if he had been competent to act, and held the same stock in his own name." In repeated decisions the supreme court of the state has held that the exemption from liability allowed by this statute when the stock is held as collateral security extends only to cases where the fact of such collateral holding appears on the stock register. Of the cases cited by the learned trial judge, we need only refer to Dunn v. State 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bank, 59 Minn. 221, 61 N. W. 27; Harper v. Carroll, 66 Minn. 487, 69 N. W. 610, 1069; Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans J. S. & Co. 106 Minn. 85, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 118 N. W. 55.

That no case has been found where an executor has been held liable individually for an assessment on stock belonging to an estate in his hands, but which was registered in his own name, is without significance. It means nothing more than that no case involving such fact has yet arisen. The conclusion is irresistible that the construction placed on the statute with respect to the rights of those holding stock as collateral security must necessarily be the same with respect to the rights of one holding as executor, guardian, or trustee. It is impossible to find any distinction between them in the statute, and no reason can be suggested why they should be distinguished. The learned trial judge was entirely correct in accepting it as the settled law of Minnesota, upon the authorities cited, that the exemption allowed by the statute can be claimed only when the registry of the stock discloses that it is held by the party to whom the certificate had been issued, not as owner, but as pledgee or trustee.

A like statute with this, in the state of Missouri, has received similar judicial construction there, a fact unimportant except that the construction placed on the statute by the Missouri court met with disapproval and dissent in the Supreme Court of the United States. The reference is to the case of Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10. There the circuit court had sustained the right of a party registered as the holder of stock to show that in point of fact it was held as collateral security. On appeal the United States Supreme Court affirmed the circuit court, notwithstanding the supreme court of Missouri had meanwhile decided in several cases that the registry as it stood was conclusive against the party; the Supreme Court of the United States asserting its right to disregard these decisions, and its unwillingness to be bound by them. The basis of this affirmation was that, when the circuit court rendered its decision in the case, the question raised had not then been adjudicated by the Missouri supreme court, and the former court having adopted its own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, as it had a right to do, such interpretation was not to be disturbed because of the fact that a different interpretation had been adopted by the state court after the right had accrued to the circuit court. True, the case holds that a construction of the statute which would give the holder of the stock the right of exemption from liability when it is shown that, notwithstanding the registry of it in his own name, he holds it as collateral, is supported by the better reason, and refers approvingly to decisions in Maryland and New York where similar statutes have been so construed; but the court makes it very clear that its decision, though contrary to that of the Missouri supreme court, is not an attempt to overrule or set aside the latter, except as a controlling authority in the particular case then under consideration. The opinion proceeds: "Since the ordinary administration of the law is carried on by the state courts, it necessarily happens that by the course of their decisions certain rules are established which become rules of property and action in the state, and have all the effect of law, and which it would be wrong to disturb. This is especially true with regard to the law of real estate and the construction of state Constitutions and statutes. Such established rules are always regarded by the Federal courts, no less than by the state courts themselves, as authoritative declarations of what the law is. But, where the law has not been thus settled, it is the right and duty of the Federal courts to exercise their own judgment, as they also always do in reference to the doctrines of commercial law and general jurisprudence. So, when contracts and transactions have been entered into, and rights have accrued thereon under a particular state of the decisions, or when there has been no decision, of the state tribunals, the Federal courts properly claim the right to adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, although a different interpretation may be adopted by the state courts after such rights have accrued. But even in such cases, for the sake of harmony and to avoid confusion, the Federal courts will lean towards an agreement of views with the state courts, if the question seems to them balanced with doubt." As thus explained, the case of Burgess v. Seligman, supra, is not an authority governing in the present issue. It is enough to know that the Minnesota courts have repeatedly, since the decision in Burgess v. Seligman (1882), reasserted their adherence to the construction they originally gave this state statute, notably in Harper v. Carroll, supra, decided in 1896. The suggestion that the Minnesota cases holding a pledgee liable where the registry discloses nothing inconsistent with his ownership of the stock rests on the fact that, when rendered, there was no statute in existence exempting pledgees from liability, is simply an unsupported suggestion, and nothing more. If the statute which we have above quoted was ever either wholly or in part repealed, so far as it relates to holders of stock as collateral, it was for the appellant to show the fact. In Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, J. S. & Co. supra, decided in 1908, there is a clear recognition of the existence of the statute. It is there said: "It is well settled that one to whom corporate stock has been transferred in pledge or in trust or as collateral security for money loaned, but who appears on the books of the corporation as the general owner thereof, is liable as a stockholder for the debts of the corporation." The language here used is significant not only with respect to the existence of the statute, but it connects trustees with pledgees in such a way as to leave no doubt that the construction given the statute applies equally to both.

Aside from these controlling considerations, we see no equity in the defense here attempted on the facts as established. That question, however, need not be discussed. It is sufficient that under the laws of Minnesota the defendant is estopped from asserting ownership of the stock in anyone but herself. The judgment is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

R. B. ALLEN

v.

TUSCARORA VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(— Pa. —, 78 Atl. 34.)

Limitation of action — amendment of complaint — change from common law to statutory action.

1. The complaint in an action by a railroad employee for injuries caused by failure of the company to use cars equipped with couplers in ordinary use cannot, after the limitation period has elapsed, be amend-

Note. — Amendment of pleading after limitation period by changing from common law to statute, or vice versa, or from statute of one jurisdiction to statute of another.

The earlier cases as to amendment after limitation period by changing from common law to statute, or vice versa, are covered by the note to Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bagley, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 287.

There seems to be some conflict among the different jurisdictions as to whether a cause of action at common law and one based upon a statute, or a cause of action based upon a statute of one state and one based upon a statute of another state or a Federal statute, where the basic transaction is the same, are the same cause of action or are different and distinct from each other. If they are the same, an amended so as to charge failure to comply with the act of Congress requiring interstate railroad companies to equip their cars with automatic couplers, and depriving them of the defense of assumption of risk.

Pleading — departure — change from common law to statutory use.

2. A departure arises where a complaint charging liability of a railroad company to an employee for injuries caused by the use of couplers not of the ordinary type is amended so as to show that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce, and did not use the couplers required by the act of Congress.

(July 1, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Juniata County in favor of plaintiff in an ment changing from one to the other after the statute of limitations has run is proper, and relates back to the time of the original pleading, so as to avoid the bar of the statute; but if they are held to be different and distinct from each other, the amendment, in some jurisdictions, as indicated in ALLEN v. TUSCARORA VALLEY R. Co., is not allowed after the limitation period has elapsed; while in others it is permitted, but a plea of the statute of limitations is thereafter allowed as a bar to recovery upon the amendment.

Common law to statute, or vice versa.

Thus, where an original complaint alleged in one count the negligent causing of the death of plaintiff's intestate by defendant's failure to provide a reasonably safe and secure place for him to perform the duties of his employment, a new count under a statute, charging that the negligent death of the intestate resulted from obeying orders to which it was his duty to conform, may be added by amendment after the expiration of the limitation period, and relates back to the filing of the original complaint, so as to cut off the defense of the statute of limitations. Alabama Consol. Coal & I. Co. v. Heald, 154 Ala. 580, 45 So. 686, second appeal, 53 So. 162. In this case, the court said: "It will be observed that the wrong complained of is identical,—the wrongful death of the intestate,—whether the recourse sought is under the common law or statute, or both; and a judgment on either count would be a complete bar to a recovery in the second suit."

And in Townes v. Dallas Mfg. Co. 154 Ala. 612, 45 So. 696, an action for personal injury to an employee, the court, overruling defendant's contention that the trial court's error in sustaining an objection to an amendment to the complaint after the limitation period was harmless, as the amendment would have been subject to the plea of the statute of limitations, said: "The amendment offered was within the lis pen- 30 L.R.A. action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent adoption and use of improper couplings. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. M. M. Pennell, for appellant:

In permitting amendments to declarations, the cause of action must remain substantially the same.

Steffy v. Carpenter, 37 Pa. 41; Royse v. May, 93 Pa. 454.

The court will not permit a plaintiff to change or enlarge his ground by an entirely new and different cause of action, especially when, by the statute of limitations, it would work an injury to the opposite party.

Trego v. Lewis, 58 Pa. 463.

When an amendment substitutes a new dens, and related back so as to cut off the statute of limitations, unless the original complaint was barred. The gravamen of the action is failure of the defendant to properly light its premises while the plaintiff was at work . . . which is the cause of action as set forth in the original as well as the amended complaint. It may be that counts 3 and 4 were attempted under the statute, and that the amendment is framed under the common law; but this was not necessarily such a departure as to prevent its relating back."

So, where an original complaint in an action for personal injuries stated a cause of action within a statute, based upon the negligence of an employee of defendant to whose orders plaintiff was bound to conform, and did conform, and who ordered plaintiff to work in a place of danger outside of his employment, an amendment of the complaint, after such statute has been declared unconstitutional, and after the limitation period for an original action has expired, which amounts to but a restatement of the facts in the original complaint, going to show a right of action in favor of plaintiff under the common law, relates back to the time when the action was commenced by the original complaint, and is not subject to the bar of the statute of limitations. Oolitic Stone Co. v. Ridge (Ind.) 91 N. E. 944. The court said: "Both the former and the present complaint involve the same transaction and injury. The gravamen of the action, as disclosed by both complaints, is the personal injury sustained by the appellee, due to the fact or facts that he was by appellant ordered outside of his employment, to work in an unsafe and dangerous place, without any warning or admonition in respect to that fact, and by reason thereof suffered the injuries of which he complains. It is manifest that a judgment rendered upon the former complaint would bar a recovery on the amended complaint."

But where, under an amended declaration in an action for wrongful death, based upon a statute, and alleging a cause of action in favor of the deceased's parents, it was necessary to prove that the cause of the accident was wilful on the part of the defendant. but it was not necessary to allege or prove that deceased had exercised due care, or was not guilty of contributory negligence, a further amendment, after the limitation period had expired, making the administrator plaintiff, and basing the cause of action upon common-law liability, and under which it is necessary to allege and prove that deceased was in the exercise of due care, and had not assumed the risk or been guilty of contributory negligence, substitutes a new and different cause of action, and is subject to a plea of the statute of limitations. Bradley v. Chicago-Virden Coal Co. 231 Ill. 622, 83 N. E. 424.

and different cause of action, and debars the defendant of the privilege of pleading the statute of limitations, it will not be allowed.

So, where, under certain counts of a declaration as originally filed in an action for personal injuries, charging defendant with common-law negligence merely, it was necessary, in order to recover, that plaintiff prove that he himself had not assumed the risk, and was in the exercise of due care for his own safety, an amendment of such counts, made after the limitation period, under which it is incumbent upon plaintiff to prove that his injury resulted from the wilful failure of the defendant to comply with certain provisions of a statute, and under which the defenses of assumed risk and contributory negligence are not available to defendant, states a new cause of action and is to be regarded as a new suit, begun when such amendment is filed, and is subject to a plea of the statute of limitations in bar. *Henderson v. The cause of action is the particular matter for which the suit is brought, and when the object of an amendment is not to forsake this, but to adhere to it, and effect a recovery upon it, it is the duty of the court, when the merits of the case cannot otherwise be reached, to permit the amendment.

filed a demand against the estate of a decedent, based on a bank certificate of deposit, alleging merely that the bank had been a copartnership and decedent the owner of stock therein, and thereafter, and after the period of limitation had expired for the presentation of claims against the estate, filed without objection an amended petition, the object of which, as of the original, was to hold the estate on the ground of partnership, but which pleaded additional facts and statutes upon which such liability of the estate of decedent was predicated, its purpose being to set forth that the former corporate life of the bank had ceased by virtue of a statute when it received the deposit while conducting the bank as a going concern, as had been done for several years, without any intention to wind up its affairs, and that by reason thereof the stockholders became merely partners, doing a banking business as a partnership, and that deceased, under another statute, was liable as one of such partners.—it was held that the amendment was the substitution of a new action and was barred by the statute of limitations. The court said: "One test constantly made is whether evidence to prove one will support the other. . . . The rule is clearly illustrated by the decision in McHugh v. St. Louis Transit Co. 190 Mo. 85, 88 S. cause of action or in the law applicable to the facts of the case. The several acts of Congress formed a part of the law applicable to the case, of which the court was bound to take notice, whether pleaded or not.

Drake v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 24; Erie City v. Schwingle, 22 Pa. 390, 60 Am. Dec. 87.

Mestrczat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trespass at common law, brought July 1, 1904, by the plaintiff, a brakeman in the employ of the defendant company, to recover damages for injuries received in its service while he was in the act of coupling cars. The statement was filed with the præcipe, and averred, inter alia, as follows: "It then and there was the duty of defendant corporation to adopt and use couplings for its cars of ordinary character and reasonable safety, according to the usages, habits, and ordinary risks of the business; but the defendant corporation, not regarding its duty in the premises, at or about February 29, 1904, at Juniata county aforesaid, carelessly and negligently adopted and used the pin and link coupler, a kind of coupler not then in ordinary use, but more dangerous than the usual and ordinary coupling employed by railroads, by reason whereof plaintiff, while engaged in coupling cars so as aforesaid supplied and fitted with the pin and link coupler, due to the negligence of defendant corporation, in the lawful performance of his work, and exercising due and proper care, on or about February 29, 1904, aforesaid, at the county of Juniata, was caught by the left hand between the two protruding irons, called 'bull noses,' parts of the couplings, and thereby his left hand was badly cut, bruised, lacerated, and torn," etc.

In December, 1908, a rule was granted on the defendant to show cause why the statement should not be amended; and on January 21, 1909, the rule was made absolute, and the statement was amended so as to read, inter alia, as follows: "That said defendant corporation at the time of committing the grievances hereinafter mentioned was engaged in interstate commerce by

And this difference was as to the character of the proof, and not as to the quantity of proof only. The entire proof required by the original petition would not have been sufficient under the amended petition."

Statute of one jurisdiction to statute of another.

Where an original declaration in an action for the wrongful death of an employee on a steamship on a voyage on the high seas was based upon statutes of the state where the action was brought, but one count thereof stated every substantial fact necessary to create a cause of action under the statutes of another state which is the domicile of the defendant corporation, an amended declaration based upon the statutes of the latter state, and filed after the limitation period fixed therein, as it does not change the essential nature of such original count, nor set up a new cause of action, relates back to the time of filing the original declaration, and avoids the bar of the limitation. De Valle Da Costa v. Southern P. Co. 100 C. C. A. 313, 176 Fed. 843.

But where an action for wrongful death was brought by deceased's widow, as such, under a state statute giving her alone the right of action, for her sole benefit, an amendment of the declaration changing the relation in which she sues from that of widow to that of administratrix, for the benefit of herself as widow and her children, and changing her cause of action to one under the Federal employers' liability act, giving the right of action against an interstate carrier for the death of an employee to the personal representative of deceased alone, for the benefit of his widow and children, or dependent next of kin,—while permissible, yet, if made after the limitation period against actions under the latter statute, does not relate back to the time of the commencement of the original action, so as to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, being in effect the bringing of a new action under the Federal statute. Hall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 157 Fed. 464, affirmed in 98 C. C. A. 664, 174 Fed. 1021. The court said: "A recovery in her name alone, under the state statute, would not be a bar to another action against this defendant, growing out of the same wrongful act, in a suit under the Federal statute," and "her recovery as widow would be no bar to a recovery under the Federal statute, at least, in so far as her three children are concerned, who were neither a party to, nor interested in, any suit in the name of the widow as such. . . . The amendment is a departure, therefore, from law to law. The amendment changing the beneficiary is in effect the bringing of a new suit."

And in an action in a state court, based upon a statute of the state, to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which occurred in Canadian waters, and was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant, a corporation of said state, a writ of mandamus will not be granted to compel the court to permit the filing of an amended declaration based upon a Canadian statute, after the expiration of the limitation periods prescribed by the latter statute. *Wingert v. railroad and a common carrier, and did haul on its line cars used in moving interstate traffic, not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact, and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars, none of its cars being so equipped with couplers as aforesaid, in violation of act Congress, March 2, 1893, chap. 196, § 2, 27 Stat. at L. 531, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3174, and its supplements; that the train aforesaid was not composed of four-wheel cars or eight-wheel standard logging cars where the height of such cars from top of same to center of coupling does not exceed 25 inches, used exclusively for the transportation of logs." The defendant objected to the allowance of the amendment on the ground that it introduced a new and different cause of action which was barred by the statute of limitations. The first assignment alleges error in making the rule absolute and permitting the plaintiff to amend the statement of claim. As we are of opinion that this assignment must be sustained, the other assignments become immaterial and need not be considered or determined. The amendment to the statement of claim, allowed by the court, brought the case within the act of Congress of March 2, 1893, and alleges that the cars were equipped with couplers in violation of the act. This statute was enacted, as its title declares, to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads engaged in interstate commerce, by compelling common carriers to equip their cars with automatic couplers, etc., and makes it unlawful for a common carrier to haul or permit to be hauled any car used in moving interstate traffic not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact. Section 8 of the act provides: "That any employee of any such common carrier who may be injured by any locomotive, car, or train in use contrary to the provisions of this act shall not be deemed thereby to have assumed the risk thereby occasioned, although continuing in the employment of such carrier after the unlawful use of such locomotive, car, or train had been brought to his knowledge." The original statement, as observed, was at common law, and alleges that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from the defendant company having carelessly and negligently adopted and used the pin and link coupler, more dangerous than the usual and ordinary coupling employed by railroads. Prior to the act of Congress, employees of common carriers assumed the risks and dangers naturally and ordinarily incident to their employment, which included the risks and hazards arising from the performance of their duty in coupling cars. If the employee was injured in the discharge of that duty, and it was a risk which he assumed, the carrier was not responsible. But the act changes the liability of the carrier when engaged in interstate commerce, and what was lawful at common law before the passage of the act is made unlawful by the act. The statute abrogates the common law pro tanto, and imposes a liability on the carrier different from that imposed by the common law. The latter gives the employee a right of action for an injury resulting from a negligent act exposing him to a danger which he did not assume in entering the carrier's service; but the statute deprives the carrier of the protection and defense of the risk assumed by the employee, which it had at common law. The act of the carrier in failing to equip its cars with automatic couplers is declared to be unlawful, and is forbidden under the penalty, imposed by § 8, that the employee, if injured, shall not be deemed to have assumed the risk of his employment. The act of Congress is the basis of the plaintiff's claim, as laid in the amended statement, while, in the original statement, the basis of the claim is the failure of the carrier to perform its common-law duty to him as its employee. The amendment is not a restatement, or the statement in a different form of the same cause of action, but the averment of a statutory cause of action in which the liability is different and greater than in an action at common law. It deprives the defendant of a valuable right, viz., the defense of the assumption of risk by the plaintiff, which is not permissible. Kaul v. Lawrence, 73 Pa. 410. We think it clear that the amendment to the statement of claim introduced a new and different cause of action, which was barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore, under the well-settled rule in this state, it should not have been allowed.

In support of the contention that the amendment did not change the cause of action, the learned counsel for the plaintiff claims that the language of the original statement was not changed in any way by the amendment, which, it is alleged, consisted simply of an addition to the original statement, and directed attention to the act of Congress, and its supplement, as being applicable to the facts of the case. But, it will be observed, in the amendment there was a departure, not only from the facts as laid in the original statement, but also from the law as applicable to the facts in the original statement. In other words, there was a departure, not only from fact to fact, but from law to law. A departure in pleading may be either in the substance of the action or defense, or the law on which it is founded. 2 Saunders, Pl. & Ev. *807. The original statement, it is true, averred the injuries of the plaintiff and the alleged negligent act of the defendant by which they were caused, but there was no intimation in the statement that the carrier was engaged in interstate commerce, or that the defendant's cars were equipped with couplers in violation of the act of Congress. Proof of the existence of these two additional facts was required to sustain the action as amended, and this is one of the tests in determining whether the amendment introduces a different cause of action. Wabash R. Co. v. Bhymer, 214 Ill. 579, 73 N. E. 879. It is apparent that, without this amendment, the act of Congress could have had no place in the case, and could not have been invoked to deprive the company of its defense that the plaintiff assumed the risks or dangers of his employment. If, however, all the facts necessary to bring the case within the act of Congress had been included in the original statement, it would have been insufficient as a statement under the act without a reference to the statute. Bolton v. Georgia P. R. Co. 83 Ga. 659, 10 S. E. 352. It is also true that if, as claimed by the plaintiff, all the facts necessary to sustain a recovery on the amended statement were set forth in the original statement, the amendment would still be a change or departure from the original statement, not from fact to fact, but from law to law,—from an action founded on the common law to one founded on a statute abrogating the common law, which is equally effective to prevent an allowance of the amendment. In such case the plaintiff bases his right of recovery upon other and different law, instead of other and different facts, and it constitutes a departure from the original cause of action. Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 39 L. ed. 983, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877; Boston & M. R. Co. v. Hurd, 56 L.R.A. 193, 47 C. C. A. 615, 108 Fed. 116.

Our conclusion is supported by numerous decisions in this and other jurisdictions in which the same doctrine has been announced and applied. Dunbar Furnace Co. v. Fairchild, 121 Pa. 563, 571, 15 Atl. 656, 657, was a common-law action of trespass to recover damages for cutting and carrying away timber standing on the plaintiff's land. After the statute of limitations had run, the court allowed the plaintiff to amend his statement so as to permit him to recover treble damages under the act of March 29, 1824, for cutting and converting timber trees. This court reversed the common pleas, and held that the amendment introduced a new cause of action, and should not have been allowed. In the opinion it is said: "It has been many times decided that, in order to recover under that act [of 1824], it is necessary to declare specially upon its terms, and that a common-law action of trespass will not suffice. . . . The difficulty with the present case is that there is not only no conclusion, 'contrary to the form of the statute,' etc., but there is no allegation of any other kind that the action is brought under the statute." The case was again in this court (Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co. 128 Pa. 485, 498, 18 Atl. 443, 444, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 242), and again it was held that the amendment could not be allowed. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Clark said: "This action of trespass, being brought at the common law, was brought to redress the injury done, by an award of compensation; but the action under the statute is not for a redress of the injury. It is to recover a penalty prescribed by the statute, which, as a police regulation, is intended for the protection of real property from waste by those who either negligently or wilfully intrude upon the lands of others. The cause of action accruing under this statute, although arising on the same matter, is different from that accruing at common law, and whilst, perhaps, they may be joined in one action, there can be but one recovery. An amendment to a declaration will not be allowed if a new cause of action is thereby introduced."

In Bolton v. Georgia P. R. Co. 83 Ga. 659, 660, 10 S. E. 352, 353, an action by an employee against the defendant company, it was said, in refusing an amendment to the statement: "If, however, he commences his action and relies upon his common-law right, we do not think he can amend his common-law declaration by setting out the statute and relying upon that for his right to sue and for his recovery. In this case the original declaration was founded upon the common-law right. Nothing was even intimated therein to the effect that he relied upon the statute. According to the decision in Exposition Cotton Mills v. Western & A. R. Co. 83 Ga. 441, 10 S. E. 113, and cases cited therein, made at this term, this amendment would have added a new and distinct cause of action." This case also meets the argument of the plaintiff's counsel in the present case, that the language of the original statement was not changed by the amendment. The court says (page 661 of 83 Ga.): "But it is argued by counsel for plaintiff in error that all of the facts required by the Alabama statute to be pleaded were already pleaded in the declaration, and that simply to mention the statute in the amendment, and recite the same facts therein, would not be a new cause of action. While it may be true that all the facts required by the Alabama statute had been set out in the declaration, still those facts alleged in the common-law declaration were mere surplusage and had no legal vitality, and would have been so regarded by the court trying the case. It required the pleading of the statute to give them any vitality at all. As we have seen, that statute is not mentioned or intimated in the original declaration, and hence to have allowed the amendment offered would have been allowing the introduction of a new cause of action."

Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 295, 39 L. ed. 983, 990, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, 881, was an action by an employee against a railroad company, based upon the common law of master and servant, and was brought to recover damages for an injury which had happened to the plaintiff in Kansas while on duty there. It was held that an amended petition which changes the nature of the claim, and bases it upon a statute of Kansas giving the employee in such a case a right of action against the company, in derogation of the common law, is a departure in pleading, and sets up a new cause of action. The trial court allowed the amendment, and in reversing the judgment, Mr. Justice White, in an exhaustive opinion, discusses the right to amend an original statement in such cases. He says, inter alia: "A suit based upon a cause of action alleged to result from the general law of master and servant was not a suit to enforce an exceptional right given by the law of Kansas. If the charge of incompetency in the first petition was not per se a charge of negligence on the part of the fellow servant, then the averment of negligence apart from incompetency was a departure from fact to fact, and therefore a new cause of action. Be this as it may, as the first petition proceeded under the general law of master and servant, and the second petition asserted a right to recover in derogation of that law, in consequence of the Kansas statute, it was a departure from law to law. . . . It is argued, however, that, as all the facts necessary to recovery were averred in the original petition, the subsequent amendment set out no new cause of action in alleging the Kansas statute. If the argument were sound, it would only tend to support the proposition that there was no departure or new cause of action from fact to fact, and would not in the least meet the difficulty caused by the departure from law to law. Even though it be conceded that all the facts necessary to give a right to recovery were contained in the original petition, as this predicated the assertion of that right on the general law of master and servant, and not upon the exceptional rule established by the Kansas statute, it was a departure from law to law. The most common, if not the invariable, test of departure in law, as settled by the authorities referred to, is a change from the assertion of a cause of action under the common or general law to a reliance upon a statute giving a particular or exceptional right."

We are all of opinion that the amendment allowed by the court below introduced a new cause of action, barred by the statute of limitations. The first assignment of error must, therefore, be sustained.

The judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

HUGH MONROE and Wife, Respts.,

v.

W. C. STAYT and Wife, Appts.

(57 Wash. 592, 107 Pac. 517.)

Landlord and tenant — estoppel — lease to husband — wife's community.

1. That a wife who, with her husband, was in possession of land as a community, claiming title when he took a written lease for the property from a rival claimant, refused to sign it, will not prevent its constituting an estoppel upon her right to set up the community title in an action for unlawful detainer, where she remained in possession of the property under the lease until its expiration.

Same — statutory provision — effect.

2. An estoppel on a wife, who with her husband, was in possession as a community of real estate when he took a written lease of the property from another claimant, which she did not sign, to deny the title of the landlord, is not prevented by a statute providing that he should not sell, convey or encumber the community real property unless she joined in the deed.

(March 9, 1910.)

Note. — Estoppel of tenant's wife to deny landlord's title.

It is the purpose of this note to review the cases involving a discussion of the question as to whether the estoppel of the husband as tenant to deny the landlord's title will affect the wife. And this treatment excludes cases where for any reason the rule of estoppel as between tenant and landlord would not apply to the husband tenant himself; and also cases involving the question whether particular acts of the wife, other than those in relation to the tenancy, will estop her.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Stevens County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. J. Webb and W. C. Stayt for appellants.

Messrs. Post, Avery, & Higgins and Joseph & Grinstead, for respondents:

In all possessory actions between landlords and tenants in respect to demised premises, a tenant, as long as he remains in possession of the demised premises, is absolutely precluded from denying the validity of the title under which he entered or agreed to hold.

Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 682, 697; Knowles

v. Murphy, 107 Cal. 107, 40 Pac. 111; Mason v. Wolff, 40 Cal. 246; Felton v. Mil-lard, 81 Cal. 540, 22 Pac. 750, 21 Pac. 533; Meyer v. Beyer, 43 Wash. 368, 86 Pac. 661; Gore v. Altice, 33 Wash. 335, 74 Pac. 556; Morris v. Healy Lumber Co. 33 Wash. 451, 74 Pac. 662; Jochen v. Tibbells, 50 Mich. 33, 14 N. W. 600; Parrott v. Hungel-burger, 9 Mont. 526, 24 Pac. 14; Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794.

A lease does not have to be signed by a lessee if he accepts it and pays rent, or holds possession under it.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 77.

The interest of the lessee is only a chattel interest, and the wife of the lessee does not have to join with the husband in order to effect any transfer or assignment of it.

The authorities are few, and in the main support the decision announced in MONROE v. STAYT.

Thus, in Russell v. Erwin, 38 Ala. 44, where the husband and wife jointly accepted a lease, it was held that the estoppel which precludes a tenant from denying his land-lord's title, without first surrendering the possession under the tenancy, applies equally to his wife, living with him and occupy-ing simply as his wife under the tenancy. And to the same effect is Heister v. Brown, 11 Lanc. Bar, 159.

And in Taylor v. Eckford, 11 Smedes & M. 21, it was held that, as the husband would not be permitted to buy another title to defeat the title to land which he had previously conveyed to one under whom he thereafter held as tenant, so neither could his wife defeat such title by subsequently purchasing the property under an execution against her husband on a judgment older than the deed to the landlord.

In Lewis v. Adams, 61 Ga. 559, it was held that the widow of one who had deeded land to plaintiff, and immediately there-after became his tenant, which relation continued until the death of the grantor, was estopped to dispute the landlord's title on ejectment brought against her by the grantee after the grantor's death, while she was remaining in the possession which the deceased husband had held, and claiming solely on his right.

In Merki v. Merki, 113 Ill. App. 518, af-firmed in 212 Ill. 121, 72 N. E. 9, where a widow claimed a homestead estate in land occupied by her husband at the time of his death as a tenant, the court, in holding that she could not, as against her husband's landlord, set up such an estate without first delivering up possession, said: "John Merki, Sr., by reason of his being plaintiff's tenant, was estopped from denying the title of the plaintiff, and so was the defendant after her husband's death. Whatever right of possession she had grew out of his, and terminated when he died. . . . Even assuming that she had a homestead, still, having obtained possession from the tenant, her husband, she held it in the same ca- 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) capacity as he, and could not set up the home-stead or any paramount or adverse title without first delivering up the possession to the plaintiff."

In Love v. Dennis, Harp. L. 70, the wife of a tenant, remaining in possession after her husband's death, was held estopped to set up a title against the husband's land-lord. A motion for a new trial was made in this case on the ground that the above rule did not apply since, as the relation of husband and wife was dissolved by death, she must be considered as a stranger to the landlord; but the court refuted the argument, saying: "Now the defendant in this case must be considered as a tenant. When she entered, it was by virtue of the lease to her husband; she was then by law identified with him; they were one. If the term was unexpired at his death, it would inure to the benefit of the estate of the deceased. But suppose she was not tech-nically a tenant; the point cannot be dis-puted, that anyone who goes into possession by permission of another, whether as ten-ant or otherwise, must restore such posses-sion."

But in Giles v. Pratt, Dud. L. 54, the widow of the deceased occupant of land was held not estopped from setting up a title in herself by her own possession after the husband's death, by the fact that her husband in his lifetime acknowledged that he held under another.

And in Shew v. Call, 119 N. C. 450, 56 Am. St. Rep. 678, 26 S. E. 33, cited in MON-ROE v. STAYT, the court, in holding that a married woman was not estopped to deny the title of defendant's devisor, who was the purchaser at a void foreclosure sale of the land, which was originally owned in part by the wife and in part by her hus-band, under a mortgage which had been placed upon the land to secure the hus-band's debt, in a suit by her to set aside the void sale, by the fact that she was in possession of the land with her husband, who, subsequent to the sale, became the tenant of the purchaser, said: "We put our judgment upon the ground that the plaintiff is not the tenant of the defend-Tibbals v. Iffland, 10 Wash. 451, 39 Pac. 102; 1 Wood, Land. & T. 2d ed. pp. 143, 149; Gear, Land. & T. § 2.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs brought this action to recover possession of certain town lots in the town of Kettle Falls. The property was held under a lease executed by plaintiff Hugh Monroe, who it is admitted was acting as well for his wife as for himself. The term of the lease was six months, and the stipulated rent was $10 per month, payable in advance. The lease was signed by defendant W. C. Stayt alone, who with his wife thereafter occupied the property under the lease, paying rent for the full term. Upon its expiration they refused to pay rent for a longer time, and refused to quit or vacate the possession of the property on demand. In answer to a complaint drawn under the forcible entry and detainer statute, defendants set up the several defenses: That W. C. Stayt did not act for and in behalf of his wife in the acceptance of the lease; that she never signed the lease or agreed to its terms, and for that reason the community was not bound thereby; that at the time the lease was executed, the defendants, as a community, were in the lawful, peaceable, and quiet possession of the property as owners thereof, and at the time were disputing the ownership and rights of plaintiffs; that the lease was executed upon the express understanding that it should not affect the ownership or property rights of either party to it; that defendant Elizabeth M. Stayt refused to sign or enter into the lease, which fact was well known to the plaintiff Hugh Monroe. The case went to trial upon these issues, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. Defendants have appealed.

The rulings of the trial court were based upon the theory that appellants were estopped to deny respondent's title. While many assignments of error are made, the determination of the case must rest upon the answer to the question whether the wife, who is a member of the community, and who with her husband enters into possession of leased property, is bound by the act and agreement of her husband as evidenced by the paper writing. Appellants do not deny, but say that "where the husband leases property from a stranger, and he and his wife enter into the possession of the property under the lease, the wife cannot dispute the title of the third party from whom possession was acquired, nor can the community dispute such title, for, in such cases, not only the husband, but also the wife, and the community composed of husband and wife, have entered into the possession of the property under the lease, and in such cases the wife became the party privy to the lease, and is therefore equally bound with the husband." The point is then made that, before the respondents can recover, they must show that the relation of landlord and tenant exists between them and appellants as a community; that such relation does not grow out of the occupancy or possession, but must exist as the result of a contract; that the wife not having entered into the written contract, the community is not bound, and therefore ap-ant. The case states that the husband rented, and paid rent to defendant's deviser. But this does not make the plaintiff his tenant. Tenancy is the result of a contract between the landlord and the tenant, whereby, in legal contemplation, the tenant admits the title of the lessor, and will not allow him to dispute this title while he still remains in possession. And it is true that this estoppel is held to apply to privies as well as to the original lessee. But it is the contract, followed by possession, that creates the estoppel. Possession without the contract will not. But the plaintiff is not affected by this rule. She made no contract with Call [defendant's deviser]. It is not contended she did. And though she is the wife of Peyton Shew [the tenant], she is no privy in estate under or through him. She claims no estate through, by, or under his contract with Call. Privy means a privy in estate,—a property right acquired from the lessee by contract or inheritance. . . . We therefore hold that the plaintiff is not the tenant of the defendant, nor is she a privy in the estate under her husband, and is not estopped to bring and prosecute this action."

30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Cleveland v. Alba, 155 Ala. 468, 46 So. 757, where a grantee of land with all oyster and riparian rights leased a fronting oyster bed to the grantor husband, the wife, a party to the deed, but not to the lease, was held not estopped from denying the grantee's title to the oysters beyond the boundaries prescribed by a statute giving to owners of land the right to plant and gather oysters in front of their land to a specified distance, since they were not embraced in the deeds executed by her, although the husband, by reason of his lease, was estopped from denying the right of the grantee to the oysters, whether within or without the statutory boundaries. This decision seems to be upon the ground that the wife was not bound by the lease because she was not a party thereto, and in this respect is in direct conflict with Monroe v. Stayt, where even a refusal to sign the lease was held not sufficient to work an estoppel. It should also be noted that the earlier Alabama case of Russell v. Erwin, set out supra, although seemingly conflicting, was not mentioned in the opinion.

G. J. C.

pellants have a right to set up their equitable defenses. The case of Shew v. Call, 119 N. C. 450, 56 Am. St. Rep. 678, 26 S. E. 33, is relied on. There the husband rented property and paid rent to the owner. It was held under the facts of the case that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist. Aside from the fact that it was an action to cancel a deed, and not controlling as an authority in this kind of a case, the law is settled in this state. In a case where the right to recover in an action of unlawful detainer was challenged upon the ground that there was no written lease or contract establishing the relation of landlord and tenant, it was held that an occupancy, such as we have here created the relation. Oregon & W. R. Co. v. Vulcan Iron Works, 57 Wash. 372, 106 Pac. 1120. The court there said: "All the essential elements of a tenancy would seem to exist, unless we sacrifice substance to mere form; and, while only a landlord may avail himself of the summary proceeding by unlawful detainer, the relation of landlord and tenant may exist or be created without an express contract." Mrs. Stayt, having adopted and acted upon the contract of her husband, comes within the general rule, and, like her husband, is estopped to deny the title of the landlord, and this irrespective of the fact that the community relationship existing between her husband and herself was not considered when the contract was entered into. Both appellants being bound by the lease, their title, if they have any, cannot be tried out in this form of action. Meyer v. Beyer, 43 Wash. 368, 86 Pac. 661; Carlson v. Curran, 42 Wash. 647, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 260, 85 Pac. 627; McGrew v. Lamb, 31 Wash. 485, 72 Pac. 100; Gore v. Altice, 33 Wash. 335, 74 Pac. 556; Chezum v. Campbell, 42 Wash. 560, 85 Pac. 48, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 921; Morris v. Healy Lumber Co. 33 Wash. 451, 74 Pac. 662; Bond v. Chapman, 34 Wash. 606, 76 Pac. 97; Phillips v. Port Townsend Lodge No. 6, F. & A. M. 8 Wash. 529, 36 Pac. 476.

Neither did the court err in refusing to hear the testimony of a third party, to the effect that Mrs. Stayt had refused to sign the lease. Having occupied the premises under the contract of her husband, who was competent to contract in her behalf, it was immaterial whether she signed the lease or not. We have not overlooked the contention that the husband could not bind the wife as a lessee, under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5918, wherein it is provided that the husband shall not sell, convey, or encumber the community real property, unless the wife joins in the deed or instrument evidencing the conveyance or encumbrance. This section can have no possible application to this 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) case. The promise to pay rent for demised premises is not an encumbrance of community real property.

The judgment is affirmed.

(153 N. C. 275, 69 S. E. 234.)

Insurance — indemnity — liability to defend action — uninsured claim.

One who undertakes to indemnify a manufacturer against loss from liability imposed by law for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by any person not employed by the assured, while at or about the work of the assured, and to defend any suit brought to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by the policy, is not liable for the costs and counsel fees and the amount paid in compromise of a suit brought by a boy injured while trespassing upon its property for the purpose of gaining a view of the interior of a theater on the adjoining property, under circumstances absolving the assured from liability for the injury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Vance County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of indemnity insurance. Reversed.

Statement by Walker, J.:

This action was brought on a policy of insurance to recover a loss alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff. In October, 1907, Walter H. Briscoe was injured by falling into a sunken tub or shallow well of hot water on the land of J. H. Bridgers, in Henderson, North Carolina, a narrow strip of land 4 feet wide between the Henderson Amusement Company building or theater and the land of the Henderson Lighting & Power Company. The well was located and placed by the amusement company for its own purposes when its theater was erected, about one year before the accident. The well was placed touching the building and immediately under a window of the building to a room which was used as a dressing room of the theater. The well was under the exclusive control of the amusement company. The power company had no concern, no duty, and no responsibility in respect to it. It was not in possession of it, and did not use it for any purpose. At the time of the accident it was covered over with loose boards. There was an open space between the strip on which the well was located and the building of the power company, which open space was the property of the power company, and is about 18 feet wide. This space is not fenced in, but opens on Spring street. Briscoe had been upon the open space belonging to the power company before, and had been ordered off by this company.

From Spring street, opposite said space, the machinery or boilers or furnaces of the power company are not visible. From the well, where the accident happened, none of the machinery, furnaces, or boilers are visible. Briscoe at the time of the accident was at the well, which is directly under the window of the amusement company, peeping in at the window, and he fell in the well and was injured. There is no evidence that Briscoe was invited to go upon the land of the Henderson Lighting & Power Company, or that he was allured, attracted, or induced to go there by the machinery of this company. There is no evidence that he went on the premises in order to view the machinery, and there would have been no danger to him in viewing the machinery through the door or window. Briscoe was not even a licensee. He was a trespasser at the time of the accident. The power company owed him no duty in respect to the well. He was a youth thirteen or fourteen years old, bright, intelligent, and bad. The public were in the habit of using

SON LIGHTING & P. Co. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY Co.

So, in Munson v. Standard M. Ins. Co. 84 C. C. A. 210, 156 Fed. 44, affirming 145 Fed. 957, cited in HENDERSON LIGHTING & P. Co. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY Co. it was held that, under a marine policy insuring a tug against legal liability for loss or damage to tows by collision or stranding, the assured could not recover the expenses of the successful defense of a suit to recover for such loss or damage.

And in Xenos v. Fox, L. R. 4 C. P. 665, also cited in HENDERSON LIGHTING & P. Co. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY Co. it was held, under a marine policy indemnifying the assured if he should become liable to "pay as damages" any sum by or in pursuance of any award if the vessel covered by insurance should run down or damage any other ship, the costs incurred by the assured in successfully defending the suit for running down another vessel were not recoverable from the insurer.

And in Lawrence v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. 124 App. Div. 545, 108 N. Y. Supp. 939, affirmed without opinion in 192 N. Y. 568, 85 N. E. 1112, also cited in HENDERSON LIGHTING & P. Co. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY Co., the court, upon the authority of Cornell v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, without discussion, refused recovery to an assured for the expenses of maintaining a successful defense to an action brought against him for an accident covered by the policy.

As to the right of an assured in an indemnity policy to recover the amount expended by him in compromising suits for injuries covered by his contract of insurance, where it appears that he is not in fact legally liable for the claim asserted, authority is lacking, since a search has failed to disclose any other case than HENDERSON LIGHTING & P. Co. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY Co. in which that specific question was discussed, though in the three following cases the right of an assured to recover the amount expended by him in compromising the suit against him was upheld, the question as to his legal liability not having been raised:

In St. Louis Dressed Beef & Provision Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 201 U. S. 173, 50 L. ed. 712, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400, it was held that the amount paid by an employer in the prudent settlement of suits against it founded on the negligence of an employee might be recovered from the insurer against loss because of such negligence, who had denied all liability and refused to defend the suits as provided in the policy, although such policy contained a condition against compromising any claim without the written consent of the insurer, and provided that no action should lie against the insurer for any loss under the policy unless it should be brought by the insured himself to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment after trial of the issue. Mr. Justice Holmes, in deliv-the open space between the two buildings, and this was alleged by Briscoe in his amended complaint. Briscoe brought suit against the power company to recover damages for the injury, and this court sustained a demurrer to his complaint, and held that, according to the facts as stated in the complaint, no legal liability of the power company to Briscoe had been alleged. 148 N. C. 396, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 62 S. E. 600. Briscoe amended his complaint, and the power company again demurred. This demurrer was overruled, with leave to answer over, and an appeal taken, but not prosecuted. The power company thereupon compromised and settled Briscoe's claim by the payment of $100 and the costs, and brings this action to recover the same and $500 for counsel fees, alleging that the settlement with Briscoe was a perfectly reasonable one and was made after the casualty company had been notified to defend that suit, and had refused to do so upon the ground that the power company had failed to give notice of the claim and to comply with the other requirements of the contract respecting suits brought against it. The $100 and the costs were paid by the power company before this action was commenced, but no counsel fees had been paid.

The policy of insurance provides as follows:

ering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "The defendant, by its abdication, put the plaintiff in its place, with all its rights. To limit its liability as if its only promise was to pay a loss paid upon a judgment is to neglect the meaning and purpose of the reference to a judgment, and even the words of the promise. The promise in form is to indemnify against loss by certain kinds of liability. The judgment contemplated in the condition is a judgment in a suit defended by the defendant in case it elects not to settle. The substance of the promise is to pay a loss which the plaintiff shall have been compelled to pay, after such precautions and with such safeguards as the defendant may insist upon. It saw fit to insist upon none. We assume that the settlement was reasonable, and that the plaintiff could not expect to escape at less cost by defending the suits. If this were otherwise, no doubt the defendant would profit by the fact. The defendant did not agree to repay a gratuity, or more than fairly could be said to have been paid upon compulsion. But a sum paid in the prudent settlement of a suit is paid under the compulsion of the suit as truly as if it were paid upon execution."

In Southern R. News Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1217, 83 S. W. 620, the court declared that the insured in an indemnity policy might compromise a claim against it, if it acted in good faith and

(1) The defendant will indemnify the plaintiff against loss from liability imposed by law upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries or death accidentally suffered while this policy is in force by any person or persons not employed by the assured while at or about the work of the assured, described in the schedule, during the prosecution of the said work at the place or places described in the schedule subject to the following conditions:

(2) Upon the occurrence of an accident, the assured shall give immediate written notice thereof, with the fullest information obtainable at the time, to the company's home office or to the company's authorized agent.

(3) If thereafter any suit is brought against the assured to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by this policy, the assured shall immediately forward to the company's home office every summons or other process as soon as the same shall have been served on him, and the company, at its own cost, will defend such suit in the name and on behalf of the assured, unless the company shall elect to settle the same or to pay the assured the indemnity provided for in condition A hereof.

(4) The assured shall not voluntarily assume any liability, nor shall the assured, without the written consent of the company with reasonable prudence such as a prudent person similarly situated would have done for himself, and that this would bind the insurer to pay to the assured the loss actually sustained, of which the compromise would be evidence though not conclusive, adding that other evidence might also be admitted to show whether it was or was not a judicious and fair settlement.

And in Bradley v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 46 Misc. 41, 93 N. Y. Supp. 245 (reversed in 112 App. Div. 536, 98 N. Y. Supp. 797, without reference to the question here discussed, upon the ground that there was no contract of insurance between the parties covering the injury in suit) recovery was allowed for a settlement made by the assured in good faith, where the sum was advantageous to the insurer "and for such an amount as a jury, upon the facts established, would have been warranted in awarding."

This note is confined to decisions involving indemnity insurance, and therefore does not include such cases as Morette v. Bostwick, 127 App. Div. 701, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1021, cited to support the conclusion reached in HENDERSON LIGHTING & P. CO. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO., which was an action by the grantee against the grantor in a full covenant warranty deed to recover money expended by the former in extinguishing a claim against the land conveyed.

previously given, incur any expense or settle any claim except at his own cost.

(5) No action shall lie against the company to recover for any loss under this policy, unless it shall be brought by the assured for loss actually sustained and paid in money by the assured in satisfaction of a judgment, after trial of the issue, nor unless such action is brought within ninety (90) days after such judgment by a court of last resort against the assured has been so paid and satisfied.

The defendant moved for judgment of non-suit upon the evidence, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted. It was agreed that, subject to this exception, a jury trial should be waived, and that the court should find the facts and answer the issues in the case. This was done and the facts, as stated herein, are selected from the findings of the court as those which are essential to a decision of the case in the view taken of it by this court. The court concluded as matters of law that the Briscoe claim is covered by plaintiff's policy and that, by denying liability in its answer, the defendant had waived its right to notice of the Briscoe claim and to a judgment after trial in his action. Judgment for the amount of the compromise, attorney's fees, and costs ($370) was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

The accident to Briscoe, for which the power company was in nowise responsible, imposed no legal liability upon that company and was not covered by the policy.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general rule of construction applied by the courts to all contracts of insurance is that while, like other contracts, they should be so construed as to give effect to the intention of the parties, yet, where there exists any doubt as to that intention, it is always to be resolved strictly against the insurer and in favor of the insured. Vance, Ins. 429. When, however, the intention is clearly stated, it should be enforced according to the will of the parties as thus expressed, for in such a case there is no room for construction. The terms of the policy in question are, we think, free from any doubt of ambiguity. The defendant undertook to indemnify against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the assured (the plaintiff) for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by any person not employed by the assured, while at or about the work of the assured and during the prosecution of the said work at the place described in the schedule. We have held, after careful consideration of all the essential facts, that the power company is not liable in damages for the injuries to Walter Briscoe, resulting from his fall in the vat. Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. 148 N. C. 396, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 62 S. E. 600. The facts, as now presented to the court, are much stronger against his right to recover than those which we formerly considered. The clause of the policy by which the defendant agreed to defend any suit brought against the assured refers explicitly to a suit brought "to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by the policy," and, in order to determine whether the casualty company was under any duty or obligation to defend the Briscoe suit, we must first ascertain whether the law imposed a liability upon the power company for the accident to him, for, if it did not, his claim is plainly not covered by the policy, as it refers to a claim founded upon a liability imposed by law, and not to false or fictitious claims. The indemnity is against loss from liability, and it would be stretching, if not perverting, the meaning of the words, to extend the application of them to all suits, and require the casualty company to defend them without regard to the legal liability of the assured. An accident covered by the policy is one for which the assured is liable under the law, for it is so expressly stated in the policy. If, therefore, the casualty company refused to defend the Briscoe suit for any reason, it cannot be held liable for the expense of a defense or settlement made by the insured, unless in some way it is made to appear that the latter was liable to Briscoe. The question has been considered and decided, in a case substantially identical with ours in all of its features. In Cornell v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 175 N. Y. 239, 67 N. E. 578, the court, after deciding that, if the injuries did not occur under such circumstances as to impose a legal liability upon the insured therefor, they are not within the protection of the policy, thus refers to the duty of the indemnity company to defend suits. "In the next clause of the policy, the defendant became obligated to defend certain actions when brought against the plaintiff. If the defendant was bound by the contract to defend the eleven suits referred to, or any of them, there would be a legal basis for a recovery in this action to the extent of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in making a defense which the defendant had agreed to make. But the cases which the defendant was bound to defend are carefully defined and limited by the terms of the policy. That obligation is limited to 'claims made against the insured and covered by this policy.' The defendant did not stipulate to indemnify the plaintiff against the costs and expenses of defending himself against fictitious or groundless suits. The protection afforded to the plaintiff by the policy was against some actual legal liability directly occasioned by his business operations." And again: "If the injuries embraced in the eleven suits were not covered by the indemnity clauses of the policy, and yet the defendant had assumed the obligation to defend, it must follow that it assumed the obligations to defend suits for injuries not covered by the policy. That proposition must be maintained in order to hold the defendant liable for the claims in question. It can be maintained only by disregarding the plain words of the policy, or adding to them some qualification that the parties did not express in words. The suits that the defendant stipulated to defend are very clearly defined in the contract. In the first place, they are defined as suits for injuries covered by the policy, and all agree that the injuries upon 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which the eleven suits were based are not, and none of them were, injuries of that character. On the contrary, they are admitted to be injuries not included in the policy at all, since no liability was imposed upon the insured in consequence. In the second place they were defined as suits which the defendant should fail to settle or pay the damages claimed therein, and surely no one will claim that the defendant assumed any obligation to settle or pay false or unfounded claims. The obligation to defend is expressly limited to cases where the insured was liable upon the facts and circumstances of the accident causing the injury. If such facts and circumstances did not exist and were not susceptible of proof, then the defendant could ignore the suits, as it did." Cornell v. Travelers' Ins. Co. has been cited with approval in several cases. In the recent case of Nesson v. United States Casualty Co. 201 Mass. 71, 131 Am. St. Rep. 390, 87 N. E. 191, an action upon a policy similar to the one now being considered, the court held that the principal agreement of the defendant was to indemnify the plaintiff against loss from actual legal liability for damages on account of accidental injuries of the kind described in the policy, but the averments of the declaration tended to show that there was no such liability on the part of the plaintiff for the accident in question, and, as there was no averment of the existence of such a liability, it was plain that the plaintiff could not recover. It was also held that the clause as to defending suits was inserted for the benefit of the insurer and that, if it elected not to defend, its liability under the provision for paying indemnity is not enlarged, but remains unchanged. To the same effect are Munson v. Standard M. Ins. Co. (C. C.) 145 Fed. 957, affirmed in 84 C. C. A. 210, 156 Fed. 44; Xenos v. Fox, L. R. 4 C. P. 665; Lawrence v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. 192 N. Y. 568, 85 N. E. 1112; Creem v. Fidelity & C. Co. 132 App. Div. 241, 116 N. Y. Supp. 1042; Morette v. Bostwick, 127 App. Div. 702, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1021. In Creem v. Fidelity & C. Co. supra, the court decided that in an action on a policy indemnifying an employer against damages for personal injuries, the insured is not entitled to recover the expenses incurred in successfully defending an action brought by the person injured, when the policy covered only claims for which the insured was legally liable. The most recent case on the subject is White v. Maryland Casualty Co. (June 1910) 139 App. Div. 179, 123 N. Y. Supp. 840, reported in Ins. Law Journal, p. 1357, where it appears that the policy was issued by the defendant in this case, and the suit of the person injured against the the insured was settled out of court. The action was brought by the insured to recover the amount of money paid in compromise and for expenses. The court held that the insurance company was not compelled by its agreement to defend an action against the insured, unless the latter were legally liable to the plaintiff therein. The two cases are identical, and the following language, taken from the opinion in that case, states succinctly the true principle applicable to them, as established by the authorities: "The respondents' contention that 'a party indemnified may hold his indemnitor for money paid for a prudent settlement' ignores the fact that a legal liability on the part of the person indemnified must exist, and the amount paid must be reasonable. A party so paying assumes the risk of being able to prove the facts upon which his liability depends, as well as the reasonableness of the amount which he pays. Dunn v. Uvalde Asphalt Paving Co. 175 N. Y. 214, 218, 67 N. E. 439. This being the rule, it is necessary that facts tending to show such conditions be pleaded." A demurrer was sustained because it did not appear from the complaint that the plaintiffs were legally liable to the person injured. The decision goes beyond what it is necessary to decide in this case; for it is there held that, by the terms of the policy, the legal liability of the insurer must rest upon a judgment in the action rendered against the insured after trial of the issues.

The plaintiff relies upon St. Louis Dressed Beef & Provision Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 201 U. S. 173, 50 L. ed. 712, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 400, but that case is easily distinguished from this one, if the latter part of the opinion does not directly sustain our ruling. There, as stated by Justice Holmes, who delivered the opinion of the court: "The fact was that this driver was an employee of the plaintiff, and the accident and the damages were [therefore] covered by the policy." It was, of course, the duty of the indemnity company to defend such a suit. The sixth question asked by the lower court was as follows: "Under the terms of the policy may the liability of the assured to the injured person and the extent of that liability be litigated, in the first instance, in an action between the assured and the assurer, where the assurer has denied its liability under the policy, and has refused to defend an action brought against the assured by the injured person?" It was answered in the affirmative, with this qualification or comment, "so far as the question is warranted by the facts set forth," evidently referring to the admitted fact that the assured was liable to the injured person as, perhaps, rendering an answer to the question unnecessary to a complete disposition of the case. The answer, though, shows that in the opinion of the court it is necessary at some stage of the controversy or of the litigation between the parties to establish the fact of such liability as a condition precedent to the insured's right of recovery against the insurer. In Richards on Insurance, § 481, the general rule is stated to be that the insured must show a liability on account of an injury covered by the policy, in order to maintain an action against the insurance company. See, also Davidson v. Maryland Casualty Co. 197 Mass. 167, 83 N. E. 407; Wollman v. Fidelity & C. Co. 87 Mo. App. 677; Worcester & Suburban Street R. Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 180 Mass. 263, 57 L.R.A. 629, 91 Am. St. Rep. 275, 62 N. E. 364; Phillipsburg Horse Car Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 160 Pa. 350, 28 Atl. 823; Biays v. Chesapeake Ins. Co. 7 Cranch, 415, 3 L. ed. 389. Even if the view suggested by the plaintiff be an equitable one, and it admits of grave doubt, we cannot adopt it, as the parties have not so contracted, and we cannot do it for them. We have nothing to guide us but the words of a plainly expressed agreement which must be interpreted as the parties evidently intended it should be.

It is unnecessary to answer the other questions, whether the defendant waived the notice of the claim of the injured person required to be given to it, and whether the liability of the insured to such person must first be fixed by a judgment against the insured, followed by payment of the judgment, before the insured can recover of the indemnity company, or whether compliance with that provision was also waived by the company when it refused to defend. The injury to Briscoe was not one of the kind insured against by the defendant, as he was not entitled to recover damages on account of a bodily injury accidentally suffered by him while at or about the work of the assured during the prosecution of said work, as described in the schedule annexed to the policy. The defendant was not, in law or in fact, responsible for the injury to him, even in the slightest degree, and he was not "at or about the work of the assured," within the evident meaning of those words, when he was injured. There was no causal connection between the "work" of the power company or its prosecution and the injury to the boy. Briscoe v. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. 148 N. C. 396, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 62 S. E. 600.

We are therefore of the opinion that the indemnitor, not being answerable for the principal loss in this case, cannot be so for the subsequent damages, costs, and expenses paid in the settlement of the suit between Briscoe and the plaintiff. The defendant was not bound to defend a suit upon a claim not within the terms of its policy, and especially so in the case of a groundless claim. If not required to defend, it cannot be charged with the costs and expenses of a defense, or of a settlement made by the assured for its own benefit, however reasonable that settlement may be. To hold otherwise would impose upon the defendant a liability which it not only has not assumed by its contract with the assured, but which by the very terms of the policy is excluded therefrom. The costs and expenses incurred in defending against Briscoe's claim for damages were not the result of any legal wrong done by the power company to him for which it is indemnified, but of the claim for damages pressed with commendable zeal, but misplaced confidence, by a plaintiff without a case, which would surely have judicially appeared if the power company had not settled, but defended to the end. Plaintiff was in no danger of an adverse judgment after our decision in the Briscoe Case. Briscoe achieved partial success by the weakening of the plaintiff, when it should not have been dismayed by the continued prosecution of a claim, which a little more reliance upon the former decision of this court should have convinced it was without merit.

Upon the facts found by him, the learned judge, "sitting as a jury," should have instructed himself differently as to the law, and answered the second issue, "was the said claim (of Briscoe) covered by plaintiff's policy?" in the negative, but, as there is no evidence to sustain the plaintiff's cause of action, viewing the testimony in the most favorable light for him, the non-suit should have been allowed and the action dismissed. Judgment to that effect will be entered in the court below.

Reversed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Trail County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective highway, the defective condition of which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Skulason & Burtness, for appellant:

If defendant was negligent in the performance of his contract, the plaintiff's remedy is against the board of drain commissioners, or the township, or the county; and the municipality in turn has its remedy against the defendant. The plaintiff cannot sue the defendant.

Morgan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for damages caused by defects in a highway through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The controlling facts are included in the following summary: In October and November, 1907, the defendant was engaged in constructing a drain in Trail county, under a contract with the county drainage board of said county. The drain was to be constructed in accordance with plans and specifications which were made a part of the contract. The drain extended nearly north and south, and intersected a highway running east and west at the point where the injury occurred. At the point of intersection with the highway a bridge had been built over the drain by the public authorities. The drain was about 11 feet deep at the bridge. The dirt from excavating the drain was dumped on the highway. The dirt was dumped on the highway at the east approach to the bridge, and to about 45 feet from the bridge.

The allegation of the complaint in reference to the condition of the highway at this point is as follows: "That between the 20th day of October, 1907, and the 10th day of November, 1907, the defendant, while engaged in excavating said ditch or drain, placed and deposited a large quantity of dirt scraped out of said ditch, in the roadbed of the public highway running east and west between said sections 5 and 8, and at a point where said highway crosses the said ditch, near the southwest corner of section 5, in said township and range; that the defendant wholly failed and neglected to level down said dirt so placed in the roadbed of said highway, but left the same in an extremely rough and uneven condition, the dirt being deposited in mounds which had frozen solid, leaving depressions and holes in said road which rendered said public highway extremely unsafe and dangerous for public travel; that the defendant carelessly and negligently allowed the said dirt to remain in said highway and in that portion thereof used by the public in traveling, without leveling or smoothing down the same; that the depressions or holes in said highway, made by depositing dirt from said ditch, were from 12 to 18 inches in depth, and the said highway at said point was carelessly and negligently allowed by defendant to remain in said condition, causing the said highway at that point to be dangerous and unsafe for public travel." The complaint further alleges that on the 23d day of November, 1907, the plaintiff was driving along said highway in the exercise of due care, and was driving in the ordinary way, at a slow speed, and, while driving in that manner, one of the wheels of said wagon ran into a depression in said highway and partially overturned said wagon, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured, and was damaged in the sum of $5,000.

The answer is, in effect, a general denial. The issues were submitted to a jury, and a verdict was found in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 and interest from the date of the injury. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. Judgment was entered on the verdict. The defendant appeals from this judgment, and presents the following contentions as a basis for the reversal of the judgment: (1) No privity of contract existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, therefore no duty was imposed upon the defendant to place the highway in proper condition. (2) The drainage board would not be liable for damages, as it was engaged in the performance of work of a public nature, as a state agency; therefore the defendant would not be liable for damages while engaged in that work as the agent of the drainage board. (3) The evidence fails to show that the highway was unsafe at the particular place at the time of the injury, and fails to show that the defendant ever caused it to become unsafe or dangerous for travelers. (4) The defendant was under no duty or obligation to keep the road in proper condition for travel, and his acts were not the proximate cause of the injury, and at most only the remote cause. (5) The plaintiff was guilty of negligence that contributed to the injury. No exception was taken to the instructions to the jury, nor to the admission or rejection of evidence. The appellant's contentions are that the evidence does not justify a judgment in plaintiff's favor for the foregoing reasons. We will consider these questions in the order named.

The defendant claims that the action is one for damages growing out of a breach of a contract between the defendant and the drainage board, and that damages growing out of the failure on defendant's part to comply with the contract cannot be recovered by the plaintiff, as he was not a party to that contract. In other words, no privity of contract existed between the plaintiff and the defendant.

We do not agree with the defendant's contention as to the cause of action set forth in the complaint. It is not a cause of action for damages growing out of a breach of contract. It is one for damages growing out of the defendant's tort in rendering the highway dangerous through his negligence in leaving the dirt thereon in piles and not leveled off. The contract is not set forth in the complaint nor mentioned therein. It was not offered in evidence by the plaintiff, but by the defendant. It is true, the complaint contains an allegation to the effect "that, in doing the work of excavating the said ditch or drain at the time hereinafter mentioned, the defendant placed and deposited a portion of the dirt taken from said ditch or drain in the roadbed of the public highway running east and west along the section line between sections 5 and 8, in said township and range; that it was defendant's duty, when such dirt had been placed in the roadbed of the said highway, to level down the dirt so placed there so as to make a smooth and good road for public travel." Defendant contends that this clause shows that plaintiff claims damages for a breach of duty under the contract. We do not think that this contention can be upheld. There is no other fact or conclusion alleged in the complaint from which the inference that this refers to a duty arising from the contract can be drawn. The statement that defendant owed a duty to level the dirt after placing it on the highway harmonizes with what is a legal duty devolving upon everyone, not to obstruct or make the highway dangerous for travel. From the whole complaint, our conclusion is that the duty mentioned in this allegation of the complaint refers to a duty imposed by law, and not to the contract referred to in the evidence. Defendant relies upon Styles v. F. R. Long Co. 67 N. J. L. 413, 51 Atl. 710, as sustaining his contention in this regard. In that case it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to bring the action for damages under the contract between the defendant and the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Passaic. In that case the following statement of the law in Appleby v. State, 45 N. J. L. 165, was approved: "A duty, the breach of which is an actionable wrong, may arise from a contract, or be imposed by positive law, independent of contract. In the first case, the party to the contract only can sue . . . in the other case, any person injured may sue if he be one of the class of persons for whose benefit the duty is imposed."

The same principle was subsequently announced by the same court in the same case, reported in 70 N. J. L. 301, 57 Atl. 448. This case is, therefore, not in point, as the cause of action was based upon a contract alone. In this case, although there existed a contract between the drainage board and the defendant, still the liability as pleaded does not depend on the contract, but arises out of a legal duty devolving upon the defendant, as well as the public in general, not to obstruct or make the highway dangerous for travel. Such a duty being to the public generally may be enforced by anyone if damages occur on account of the failure to perform that duty. The liability in this case arises by reason of the fact that the defendant negligently placed a nuisance in the highway, which rendered it dangerous for travel, and a violation of § 6641, Rev. Codes 1905. Inasmuch as the liability pleaded is not based upon a contract, it is not necessary for us to determine whether there was a breach of the contract in this case. In support of our conclusion that the complaint in this case properly alleged a cause of action growing out of a breach of duty on the part of the defendant, see Nye v. Dibley, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Crist, 116 Ind. 446, 2 L.R.A. 450, 9 Am. St. Rep. 865, 19 N. E. 310, the court said: "The right to interfere with a highway is coupled with the duty to make it as safe as it was before it was disturbed; or, at least, to use reasonable care and skill to do so. This duty is violated if there is a failure to restore it to its former condition in all cases where the exercise of reasonable care and skill can effect a restoration."

The defendant also urges that he was engaged in excavating the drain as the agent of the drainage board, and contends that no liability can be upheld against him as agent, as his principal would not be liable as a matter of law. So far as this case is concerned, it is immaterial whether the drainage board could be held for damages or not, as it clearly appears that the relation of principal and agent did not exist between the defendant and the drainage board by virtue of the contract. A reading of that contract shows that the defendant independently contracted to dig the drain in accordance with plans and specifications which were made a part of the contract. The drainage board exercised no control or supervision over the work or over the defendant while engaged in doing the work. Under the contract the drainage board reserved the right to terminate the contract in case the work was not being done in accordance with the plans and specifications, and the right to cause the drain to be completed by someone else in case the defendant failed to perform the contract. In the following cases, closely similar so far as the facts are concerned, the relation between the parties was held not to be that of principal and agent: Atkins v. Field, 89 Me. 281, 56 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 Atl. 375; Hilsdorf v. St. Louis, 45 Mo. 94, 100 Am. Dec. 352; Bennett v. Mt. Vernon, 124 Iowa, 537, 100 N. W. 349; Herrington v. Lansingburgh, 110 N. Y. 145, 6 Am. St. Rep. 348, 17 N. E. 728; Shute v. Princeton Twp. 58 Minn. 337, 59 N. W. 1050. See also 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 187. The cases cited by the defendant are not in point, as the principals in those cases reserved authority in themselves while the work was being done.

It is next claimed that no negligence was shown on appellant's part. The question of his negligence was submitted to the jury under instructions which were not excepted to. It cannot be maintained or claimed, as a matter of law, that no negligence was shown, or that contributory negligence was shown, as the testimony on that question is in conflict. In other words, there was such conflict in the testimony that rendered the question of negligence one for the jury. As to the condition of the road before and after placing and leaving of the dirt thereon, the witnesses differ in their testimony. The condition of the road is variously described. Some of the witnesses described it as "pretty rough," as "hilly and uneven," and as having "high and low places." Another witness states that he had extreme difficulty in driving over this road in safety about this time. The dirt from the drain was taken therefrom in scrapers and dumped on the road, and left in piles, and it was wet, and became hard by reason of becoming frozen. Some of the depressions or low places at this point were 8 or 10 inches deep. Before dumping the dirt there, the road was smooth and even, and there was no drop from the road to the bridge. After placing the dirt there, there was a drop of about 10 inches from the road to the bridge. From this evidence we deem it too clear for debate or question that the verdict cannot be disturbed so far as the dangerous condition of the road is concerned, and that this condition was caused by the defendant is also settled by the verdict, and cannot be disturbed for the same reason. As to both grounds the verdict is amply sustained.

The evidence is not definite as to the precise point on the road where the depression was that caused the load to tumble over. The trial court, at appellant's request, submitted a special question of fact to the jury, bearing on this question, which was as follows: "Were both right-hand wheels of the wagon on the bridge when the wagon upset?" The jury answered "No." Appellant now contends that this finding is not sustained by the evidence. There are facts which tend to indicate that a contrary finding might be justified. None of the witnesses, however, saw the wagon when it tipped over. Plaintiff is therefore better enabled to know what the truth was in this regard. His evidence shows that the wagon tipped over just as the right front wheel went on the bridge. The road and bridge were not at right angles with each other at this point; hence, one front wheel struck the bridge before the other did. The sudden drop from the road to the bridge would naturally cause the team and wagon to move ahead to some extent, after the load commenced to tip, or even after the plaintiff was thrown, with the straw, into the ditch.

The plaintiff also testifies that the right hind wheel went into one of these depressions, and right after that fact the front wheel came upon the bridge and dropped and caused the load to tip over. Whereas the testimony is contradictory as to where the wagon was after the accident happened, in reference to whether it was all on the bridge or not, it is beyond dispute that the cause of the tipping over of the wagon was a defect in the highway, which was struck just before the wagon went upon the bridge. We think the finding is sustained by the evidence, which shows that the wagon did not tip over after the two right-hand wheels were on the bridge, and that these four wheels were not on the bridge when the plaintiff was thrown from the load, and this evidence is not necessarily inconsistent with the evidence that the wagon was wholly on the bridge when the witnesses first saw it after the accident.

It is forcibly urged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence that should defeat his right to recover damages. His testimony is not clear, and in some respects is contradictory, but the question of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury under instructions not objected to. He was driving on a wagon on which was a load of flax straw, 8 feet high, which was loaded in the usual manner. The alleged contributory negligence is based on the fact that the plaintiff drove over this rough road knowing its dangerous condition. In other words, he testifies that he observed the rough condition of the road a long distance before he reached the bridge where the injury occurred, and drove over the same, notwithstanding that fact. His explanation for driving over this rough road after seeing it is that he could not turn around or otherwise avoid going over it after he saw it. The plaintiff was endeavoring to follow the tracks of those who had driven over this same road about this time. The evidence shows that he exercised the greatest care in driving the team. It seems to be well sustained by the authorities that it was not incumbent upon him to stop and forego using the road because it looked rough or dangerous. In Elliott on Roads and Streets, 2d ed. § 636, the rule is stated as follows: "The fact that a traveler voluntarily attempts to pass, with knowledge of the defects or obstruction, is not ordinarily conclusive evidence of a want of due care, but if he has, or ought to have, notice thereof, he must exercise such care as the circumstances demand; and if an ordinarily prudent person would not attempt to pass, under the circumstances, he will be guilty of contributory negligence."

In McTiver v. Grant Twp. 131 Mich. 456, 91 N. W. 736, the court said: "But the true test is, Was the danger arising from the known defect obviously of such a character that no person in the exercise of ordinary prudence would attempt to pass over the highway at that point? If not, it is not negligence, as matter of law, for one to attempt to pass over a highway known to be defective."

In Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Crist, supra, the court said: "If it were granted that the plaintiff had knowledge that she would be exposed to some danger in attempting to ride along the highway made unsafe by the defendant's wrong, that fact, of itself, would not, in such a case as this, necessarily preclude a recovery. Knowledge is not always a bar to a recovery. It is not a bar in such a case as the present, for the plaintiff was not bound to refrain entirely from using the only highway which gave her access to her home or led from it. . . . It is quite clear that it cannot be said in this case that the danger was one which the plaintiff was bound to shun, or assume, at her own peril, all the risk attending the attempt to pass it. The case is not one of plaintiff casting himself upon a known danger which a prudent person would not have encountered." See also Pyke v. Jamestown, 15 N. D. 157, 107 N. W. 359; Ouverson v. Grafton, 5 N. D. 281, 65 N. W. 676; Overhouser v. American Cereal Co. 118 Iowa, 417, 92 N. W. 74.

Whether defendant was guilty of negligence was clearly a question for the jury, in this case, as in all cases, unless the evidence is so clear that reasonable men would not reach a different conclusion therefrom. The same is true as to the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. This court has recently considered these questions with the result stated above. Pendroy v. Great Northern R. Co. 17 N. D. 433, 117 N. W. 531; Kunkel v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (N. D.) 121 N. W. 830.

It is further claimed that the board of drain commissioners should be held responsible, and not the defendant. The commissioners are not shown to have done, or caused to be done, any act that caused the injury. What the board authorized the defendant to do in reference to placing the dirt on the highway and leveling it was not unlawful or prohibited, and could not render the highway dangerous to travelers; therefore no cause of action for violation of any duty is shown against the board.

This disposes of each assignment. It follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

All concur.

ANNISTON CORDAGE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(161 Ala. 216, 49 So. 770.)

Telegram — suit by addressee.

1. The addressee of a telegram may sue the company in tort for loss sustained by its alteration of the message, if it was for his benefit, and the company had express or implied knowledge of that fact.

I. Scope of note.

To make clear the right of one to whom a telegram has been sent and unduly delayed in delivery, to sue the telegraph company for damages sustained on account of the delay, it was found necessary not only to take and cite every case of the kind, whether resulting in victory or defeat, but also to state briefly the causes of the defeats. Every victory of the addressee of a delayed telegram over the telegraph company at fault, as a matter of course, affirmed the plaintiff's right to maintain the action, but all defeats by no means denied that right;

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Anniston in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure correctly to transmit a telegram. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Willett & Willett for appellant.

Messrs. Knox, Acker, & Blackmon and Campbell & Johnston, for appellee:

To entitle the sendee of a telegram to recover damages, it must appear by the complaint that the plaintiff either directly or per alium was a party to the contract.

on the contrary it is not going too far to say that none did so in toto. This will appear quite plainly upon an examination of the citations.

II. The English doctrine.

In England it is settled law that the liability of a telegraph company for damages in not delivering, negligently delaying the delivery of, or erroneously transmitting, a telegraphic message, depends wholly upon the contract it entered into upon the receipt of the message, to transmit and deliver it to the person addressed; and hence that no action for any breach of that contract lies against it except in favor of the other party to such contract.

The view of the English courts is that the obligation of a telegraph company to use due care and skill in the transmission of a despatch is one arising entirely out of the contract, and, as there is ordinarily no contract between the person to whom a message is addressed and the messenger which undertakes its delivery, there is no cause of action in the former's favor arising from the latter's negligence in performing the contract. Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706.

The first step to be established when the recipient of a telegram sues the telegraph company for damages due to its negligence in connection with the despatch, remarked Lush, J., in Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. supra, is that there is a contract between the defendant and the plaintiff.

No action lies in an English court against a telegraph company at the suit of a person to whom a telegram intrusted to it for transmission and delivery is addressed, for damages for nondelivery of, or negligent delay in delivering, the message, when there is no contract between the company and the addressee, unless possibly in case the company has been guilty of a fraud in that association. Dickson v. Reuter's Telegr. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 62.

We took time to consider owing to the importance of the case, said Denman, J., in Dickson v. Reuter's Telegr. Co. supra, but after referring to the cases cited by Mr. Herschell, we came to the conclusion that the case is, in effect, governed by the decision of Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. supra.

The case of Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. supra, as a matter of course, set the law for Canada, and, accordingly, was followed in Feaver v. Montreal Telegr. Co. 23 U. C. C. P. 150, in which a demurrer was sustained to a declaration by a plaintiff to whom a telegram was sent, and by negligence not delivered, to his damage.

In Georgia alone in the United States, it is held that in the transmission of a telegraphic message, the telegraph company is the agent of the sender, and the sender is bound by the terms of the message, and the person to whom the message is addressed must look to the sender of the message, and not to the telegraph company, for any damages which he may sustain by reason of error in transmitting the despatch. *Western U. Of the cases of Western U. Telegr. Co. v. James, 90 Ga. 254, 16 S. E. 83, and Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443, was said in Brooke v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 119 Ga. 694, 46 S. E. 826, that, while they contain language indicating a view contrary to the doctrine that had been announced in the cases of Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760, and Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Flint River Lumber Co. 114 Ga. 576, 88 Am. St. Rep. 36, 40 S. E. 815, holding 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A party making an offer by telegraph is responsible for the correct transmission of his message, and is bound by it in the terms in which it is delivered to the party addressed.

9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 294; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Flint River Lumber Co. 114 Ga. 576, 88 Am. St. Rep. 36, 40 S. E. 815.

Denson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case, brought by that in the transmission of a telegram the telegraph company was the agent of the sender, to whom, and not to it, a person to whom it was addressed must look for any damages which he should sustain by reason of an error in transmitting the message, such cases at best were only physical precedents, and made no ruling binding upon the court in conflict with the doctrine of the last-mentioned cases. "In both," it was said, "it is true, the action was maintained by the sendee of the message, but in neither was [the question of] his right to maintain an action against the telegraph company raised."

We recognize the force of the argument, said the court in Brooke v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 119 Ga. 694, 46 S. E. 826, that, independently of any question of agency, a telegraph company owes a duty to the public, for the neglect of which it should be held liable in damages. The general assembly, however, has not seen fit to enact any legislation on the subject, and we do not feel justified in departing from a principle of law which has been recognized by this court for many years, namely: that in transmitting a telegram the telegraph company is the agent of the sender, and the person to whom the telegram is addressed must look to the sender, and not to the telegraph company, for any damages that he may sustain by reason of an error in the despatch.

An action on contract by a person to whom a telegram is sent, brought against the company for damages for delay in delivery, is not maintainable where the relation of principal and agent did not exist between him and the sender. Ford v. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. 124 Ala. 400, 27 So. 409; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Adams, 154 Ala. 657, 46 So. 228; Heathcoat v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 156 Ala. 339, 47 So. 139; McGehee v. Western U. Telegr. Co. (Ala.) 53 So. 205.

If the sender of a telegram is the agent of the person to whom it is sent for the purpose of sending it, then, manifestly, the person addressed is a party to the contract made by and with the telegraph company the sendee of a telegraphic message, to recover damages of the defendant for a negligent mistake of the defendant's agents in transmitting the message from Trio Manufacturing Company, at Forsyth, Georgia, to plaintiff, at Anniston, Alabama. The message delivered at Forsyth was in this language:

Forsyth, Georgia, Oct. 2, 1906.
Anniston Cordage Company,
Anniston, Alabama.

Offer thirty thousand three and four ply eighths sixteen half. Quick reply.
[Signed] Trio Manufacturing Company.

The mistake in the transmission of the message consisted in the substitution of

for the transmission and delivery of the despatch, in the capacity of principal. The right of the person addressed, when he occupies the relation of principal to the sender, his agent, in respect of the delayed despatch, to maintain an action against the telegraph company for the damages sustained by its breach of the contract to transmit and deliver the message, appears to be beyond dispute.

In jurisdictions where the right of a person to whom a telegram is sent, and negligently delayed in delivery to his damage, is held to depend upon his privity of contract with the telegraph company, he must, in order to maintain an action against the company, certainly an action ex contractu, establish the existence between him and the sender of the delayed message, of the relation of principal and agent, unless in the rare case where he may have directly in person contracted with the telegraph company to transmit and deliver the delayed despatch.

When the relation of principal and agent exists, and is known by the telegraph company to exist, between the sender of a telegram and the person to whom it is addressed, the latter may maintain an action against the telegraph company for delay in delivery, if damaged thereby, and is entitled to recover at least the price paid for transmitting the message, and in any event nominal damages. Kennon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 92 Ala. 399, 9 So. 200.

One to whom a telegram is addressed may maintain an action against the telegraph company for delay in delivering it, upon plea and proof that the sender was his agent and the despatch related to the agency, all of which the telegraph company knew. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 93 Ala. 32, 30 Am. St. Rep. 23, 9 So. 414.

If, in delivering and paying for the message, the sender discloses the relation of the person to whom it is addressed as his principal, the principal may and should sue for damages for the breach of the contract promptly to deliver such message. Ibid.

The sending of a message by telegraph calling for a reply establishes a contractual "fifteen" for "sixteen" where it occurred in the message.

The first question presented by the record is the right of the plaintiff, sendee, who was not a party or privy to the contract in pursuance of which the message was sent, to maintain an action in tort for the error committed in transmitting the message. Many questions in respect to the law applicable to the liability of telegraph companies for negligence in transmitting messages have been decided by this court; but we are not aware that the precise question now presented has ever been here determined, notwithstanding appellee's counsel seem to think the case of Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Ford, 117 Ala. 672, 23 So. 684; Id. 124 Ala. 401, 27 So. 409, determinative relation between the sender and the telegraph company in respect of the answer, so as to entitle the former to maintain an action in case of delay in the delivery of the reply message. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cunningham, 99 Ala. 314, 14 So. 579.

The cases decided by this court, it was said in the opinion in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adair, 115 Ala. 441, 22 So. 73, in which the sendee of the telegram was plaintiff, were those in which the complaint showed that the plaintiff, either directly or through another, was a party to the contract; and the opinions seem to concede the proposition that if such relationship did not exist, an action for the breach of the contract could not be maintained by the sendee.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed cannot maintain an action against the telegraph company for negligence in transmitting and delivering it, without alleging and proving that he was, either directly or by his agent, a party to the contract to send and deliver the message. Ibid.

The person to whom a telegram is addressed has no right to recover for the failure to deliver or for the delay in delivering it, without alleging or proving a contract to which he is a party or privy, between himself or his agent and the telegraph company, when his action is based upon the contract and brought to recover damages resulting from its breach. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Ford, 117 Ala. 672, 23 So. 684.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed, who has previously agreed with the telegraph company to have all despatches addressed in a particular way delivered to him, is entitled to maintain an action against a telegraph company for its failure promptly to deliver such a despatch to him, where he has sustained damages in consequence of the delay. Milliken v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 110 N. Y. 403, 1 L.R.A. 281, 18 N. E. 251, reversing 21 Jones & S. 111.

In that case, the New York court of appeals remarked that some of the authorities in the United States went to the extent of holding a telegraph company to of the issue in appellee's favor. It will be discovered from a reading of that case that it was an action ex contractu by the sendee, for breach of a contract alleged to have been made by the telegraph company with the sender, for the benefit of the sendee, and as his agent. The court held against the right of recovery, on the ground that the proof failed to show that the message was sent for the benefit of the plaintiff, as alleged. Brickell, Ch. J., in the opinion, among other things, said: "The right of the sendee to maintain an action for damages against the telegraph company for failure to deliver the message or for error in the message delivered has been frequently before the courts. In England it is held that the sendee, in the absence of such facts as make him a party or privy to the contract, has no right of action against the telegraph company." After citation of authorities the opinion continues: "In thus holding, the English courts apply to telegraph cases the principle established by them that no cause of action arises in favor of a stranger to a contract because of a breach of duty growing out of the contract." Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 107.

But the court left undecided the question here in hand, as that was a case ex contractu, and not in tort. The English doctrine, that the addressee of a telegram message cannot sue the company for error or negligence, in its transmission or delivery, because the obligation of the company springs entirely from the contract between rest under a legal duty to the person to whom a despatch is addressed, to transmit it correctly and deliver it to him promptly, when he is the party solely interested, but added that it was unnecessary in that case to pass upon that question, and therefore it expressed no opinion upon it, because in that case the relation of the sender as agent of the recipient existed and was established.

In Loper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 Tex. 689, 8 S. W. 600, the court reversed a judgment sustaining the company's general demurrer to a petition, and remanded the cause for trial upon the ground that, although a telegram is neither prepared, delivered, nor paid for in person by one for whose benefit it is sent, yet if it is prepared, delivered, and paid for by another or others at his special request, there is a contract between the telegraph company and him, and such company, if it has knowledge of the urgency and importance of the despatch, is liable to him in damages for its negligence in transmitting and delivering the message.

In the superior court of Montreal, in Bell v. Dominion Teleg. Co. 25 Lower Can. Jur. 248, Johnson, J., held the defendant liable in damages for negligence in delivery to the plaintiff of an answer to a despatch he had sent by it. The controversy in that case was concerning the effect of a printed stipulation upon the reply blank form, assented to by the sender, by which the company claimed immunity from liability for unrepeat messages. The case of Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706, was not cited, but is distinguishable because in the Canadian case there was privity of contract between the plaintiff and the telegraph company.

In an action ex contractu against a telegraph company, by the person to whom a telegraph message was addressed and delayed in delivery, proof that he had arranged with the sender of the despatch to send it in case of the illness of his wife, which the despatch announced, and that the receiving agent of the company was informed of such arrangement when the despatch was handed in, is sufficient to establish the agency of the sender and the necessary contractual relation between the company and the plaintiff. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rowell, 153 Ala. 295, 45 So. 73.

An allegation in the complaint of a person to whom a telegram was addressed and delayed in delivery, in an action for a breach of the contract against the telegraph company, averring that the despatch was sent pursuant to a previous arrangement between the plaintiff and the sender, is a sufficient averment that the sender acted as the agent of the sendee in sending the message. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cleveland (Ala.) 53 So. 80.

A person to whom a telegram is sent, but not delivered promptly or within a reasonable time, cannot maintain an action against the company for damages for a breach of its contract to transmit and deliver the despatch, unless he was a party to such contract or a privy to it, as the principal of the sender. McGehee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ala.) 53 So. 205.

If the person to whom a telegram is addressed is the one interested in its correct and diligent transmission, and is to bear the expense of sending it, he is to be regarded as the person with whom the contract is made. De Rutte v. New York, A. & B. Electric Magnetic Teleg. Co. 1 Daly, 547.

The courts have decided in some cases that when the person to whom a negligently delayed despatch was addressed was an undisclosed and unknown principal of the sender, he could not maintain an action against the company, nor recover damages for its breach of contract. These decisions were so plainly unsound that many of the courts which rendered them recanted, and afterwards held there was no difference between a known and an undisclosed principal in such cases.

The rule that a principal may maintain suit upon a parol contract made by his agent with a third person, although the agency is not disclosed at the time of the making of the contract, applies in actions against telegraph companies. Milliken v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra.

it and the sender, and the sendee is not a party or privy thereto, does not prevail generally in this country. The cases are not in harmony upon the question. We have examined them, and conclude that the weight of authority is to the effect that the addressee of a message may sue the telegraph company in his own name, and recover such damages as he may have sustained by reason of its negligence, when the message was intended for his benefit, and the company either had knowledge of that fact or had notice of such facts as would be the equivalent of knowledge. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 543; Gray, Communication by Teleg. § 65; Thomp. Electricity, § 427; Joyce, Electric Law, § 1008; 21 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 509; Frazier v. Western U. Teleg.

The person to whom a telegram is addressed and negligently delayed in delivery is entitled to maintain an action against the telegraph company for the damages which he has sustained by reason of such delay, where the sender of the message was his agent for the purpose of sending it, and sent it for his benefit, although the telegraph company had no knowledge that the relation of principal and agent existed between the recipient and the sender. Ibid.

A principal to whom a telegram has been sent by his agent, and negligently delayed in transmission or delivery, may maintain an action for damages upon the contract against the telegraph company, notwithstanding the agency was not disclosed to the company, and was unknown at the time of the sending of the despatch. Manker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 137 Ala. 292, 34 So. 839.

The Alabama supreme court in the case of Manker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, in an action ex contractu by the recipient of a telegraphic message sent by her brother, and summoning her to the bedside of her dying father, and delayed in delivery, overruled the cases of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allgood, 125 Ala. 712, 27 So. 1024, and Lucas v. Southern R. Co. 122 Ala. 529, 25 So. 219, which had held that an undisclosed principal could not recover for a breach of contract made by his agent, and, in so doing, remarked: "These cases followed and were based upon expressions contained in Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 435; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419; Kenyon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 92 Ala. 399, 9 So. 200, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 93 Ala. 32, 30 Am. St. Rep. 23, 9 So. 414. A review of these later cases leads us to the conclusion that what was stated in those cases with regard to showing by the proof that the agency was disclosed was nothing more than dictum. Upon more mature consideration, we are not able to see any sufficient reason

Co. 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396, and notes (45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 319, 78 Pac. 330).

The case of Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, is a well-considered one by the supreme court of Oregon, and we adopt a part of the opinion in that case as tersely expressing our own views of the law governing the question: "A telegraph company is not a common carrier in the sense that it is an insurer against mistakes in the transmission of messages, or delay in their prompt delivery; but it is an instrument of commerce and a public service corporation. It therefore owes the duty to those for whose benefit it undertakes to transmit and deliver messages, to transmit and deliver them without unreasonable delay. For a violation of this duty, or for for holding that a principal may not maintain an action on a contract made by his agent, though such principal be not disclosed in the making of the contract. . . . We are therefore of the opinion that what was said in the cases of Daughtery, Henderson, Kenyon, and Wilson, supra, upon this question, should be disapproved, and the cases of Allgood and Lucas, supra, should be overruled."

The action of Harkness v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Iowa, 190, 5 Am. St. Rep. 672, 34 N. W. 811, was brought by the undisclosed principal of both the sender and the recipient of a telegram which was unreasonably and negligently delayed in delivery, to the damage of the plaintiff, and a judgment against the telegraph company was affirmed. It was contended in behalf of the telegraph company that the contract was made with the sender, and that he could only recover thereon the amount paid for the message, and this was all that the plaintiff could recover, because she was unknown to the company in the transaction. We do not concur in this proposition, said the court, but think that, as the telegram was sent and received for the benefit and use of the plaintiff, she may recover such damages as she has sustained, subject only to any payments in liquidation of damages made by the company to the sender of the message before it had knowledge that it was for her use, and that she was the principal in the transaction.

III. The American doctrine.

Under the English rule, the person to whom is sent a telegram altered in transmission, never delivered, or inexcusably delayed in delivery, no matter what damages he thereby sustains, may not maintain suit against the delinquent telegraph company, unless he entered into the contract with it either directly in person, or as principal through the sender as his agent.

But under the rule prevailing in the United States an action against a telegraph company for damages resulting from a negligent delay in delivering a telegram may a negligent performance thereof, it is responsible to the party for whose benefit the contract was made, whether it be the sender or the addressee. . . . But the right of an addressee to recover is necessarily grounded upon the contract between the company and the sender, whether the action be in form technically for a breach of contract or one sounding in tort. Without the contract under which the message was forwarded as a foundation for the cause of action, no recovery whatever could be had. In order for the addressee to sue, it is essential, therefore, that it appear that he was to be benefited by the contract for sending the message, and that fact was known to the company when it received the message for transmission, either from its language or otherwise."

There is not pretense, by averment in either count of the complaint, that the defendant at the time it received the message for transmission, was given any information that it was for the benefit of the sendee. The question then arises: Is the language of the message sufficient to convey such information? We think it easy of demonstration that it is not; and it suffices to say, without entering into a discussion of the point, that this court holds that the message, in its wording, is not such as would charge the transmitting company with the information that the sendee is the party for whose benefit it is sent.

Upon the foregoing considerations, it follows that the complaint fails to show any duty owing from the defendant to the plaintiff, or any breach of such a duty. Therefore no error was by the trial court committed in sustaining the demurrer to the several counts of the complaint. It is needless to discuss any other question presented. On the question of damages, however, see Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra, the cases there cited, and the notes to the opinion.

Let the judgment of the City Court be affirmed.

Dowdell, Ch. J., and Simpson and Mayfield, JJ., concur.

be maintained either by the sender of the despatch or the person to whom it is addressed, if either of them sustains damage. Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880.

It is well settled in the United States, according to the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dubois, 128 Ill. 248, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, 21 N. E. 4, that the receiver of a telegraphic despatch may maintain an action against the telegraph company through whose negligence the message has been altered or changed, for such loss as he has sustained by reason of having been led to act upon the despatch.

In England, said the court in Yunker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 125 N. W. 577, where the action against the telegraph company is regarded as ex contractu, the addressee of a message may not sue, no matter what his damages. Some few American courts follow the English doctrine, but the great majority of them hold that as a general rule an addressee may recover the damages suffered by him.

While it seems to be the prevailing rule in England, said the court in Fererro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 455, 35 L.R.A. 548, that the carrier of a telegram is under no legal obligation to one to whom it has been directed by another, although altered before delivery, and acted upon by him to his injury, and that the recipient is without remedy, that doctrine has rarely, if ever, met with approval by the courts of this country.

The English cases deny the right of the person to whom a telegram is sent to recover damages for default either in its transmission or its delivery, on the ground that there is no privity of contract between him and the telegraph company. Many of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the American cases, however, according to the court in Hadley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, give a more liberal construction in favor of the person to whom a despatch is sent, and this more liberal construction has been adopted as the better and more reasonable rule by this court.

It is the doctrine of the English courts that the receiver of a telegram may not maintain suit against the telegraph company, on the ground that the obligation of the company springs entirely from contract and that the contract for the transmission of the message is with the sender of it. This doctrine, however, said the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dubois, supra, has never prevailed in the United States.

The supreme court of Iowa in Herron v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Iowa, 129, 57 N. W. 690, in affirming a judgment recovered against a telegraph company by the person to whom a despatch was addressed, and not delivered, said: There were no contractual relations between the company and the plaintiff, and some authorities hold that in such cases the person injured may not recover, but the rule which seems to prevail generally in this country is to allow the person to whom a despatch is sent, even though sent by a person under no obligation to send it, to recover of the telegraph company damages caused by delay in the transmission.

It is well settled in England, said the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, 66 Miss. 549, 6 So. 461, that the person to whom a telegram is sent may maintain no action for the negligence of the company in delivering the message, even though he acts upon the message finally delivered and sustains a pecuniary loss. But in America the contrary rule is announced where injury results to the addressee of the message, although the courts are not agreed upon the principle upon which the action rests. While it may be difficult to reply to the criticisms of the grounds upon which the American decisions rest, it must be regarded as settled by an almost unbroken current, that the telegraph company is under responsibility to the sendee, at least in those cases in which injury results from the delivery of an altered message.

The view taken by the English courts, that the liability of a telegraph company to the recipient of a message arises only from its negligence, that there can be no negligence unless it owes a duty to the party aggrieved, and that such duty must arise either out of a contract or by some rule of law, and that the sender has, but the person to whom the message is sent has not, a contract with the company, so that the supposed duty does not arise out of contract, and the law has imposed none out of consideration of public policy, is a view that has never been accepted in this country, according to the court in Elsey v. Postal Telegr. Co. 15 Daly, 58, 3 N. Y. Supp. 117, but the doctrine prevails in the United States that persons who receive messages without any contract with the company may be compensated in damages for injuries which they sustain by the negligence of the company in transmitting or delivering the despatches.

It is held in England, according to the court in McLeod v. Pacific Teleph. Co. 52 Or. 22, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810, 94 Pac. 568, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1239, rehearing denied in 52 Or. 28, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954, 95 Pac. 1009, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1241, that the obligations of a telegraph company arise entirely from the contract between it and the sender of the message, and that the addressee, not being a party or privy to such contract, may not sue thereon; but this rule does not prevail in this country, and here the courts have, with practical unanimity, sustained the right of the addressee to sue and recover such damages as he may have suffered by reason of the negligence of the company in not delivering the message.

In Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Woodard, 84 Ark. 323, 105 S. W. 579, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 354, it was insisted that there could be no recovery because there were no contractual relations between the company and the plaintiff, to whom the delayed telegram was addressed. This, said the court in reply, is the English rule upon the subject, and there are a few cases in America that have followed the English courts. But the great weight of authority, in fact, almost all of the American authorities, are against the rule. It has become so thoroughly established that it is called the "American doctrine" on the subject, to allow the addressee of the telegram to recover for damages flowing from a failure to deliver or correctly deliver the telegram sent him. . . . This court early aligned itself with the American decisions. Recently it reiterated the right of the addressee to recover under the mental anguish statute (citing Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Ford, 77 Ark. 531, 92 S. W. 528).

The question whether a telegraph company owes any duty to the person to whom a telegram is addressed, in the transmission of the message, inasmuch as it sustains towards him no contractual relation, and such persons only as sustain such a relation to the company may have a remedy against it, is one of very great importance to the public and the telegraph companies, said the court in Wolfskehl v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 46 Hun, 542, 12 N. Y. S. R. 555, and neither the elementary writers nor the adjudicated cases furnish much assistance in its solution, for they are quite inharmonious and unsatisfactory, and throw but little light upon the question.

Circumstances in which a person to whom a telegraphic despatch is sent may recover damages for a mistake or default in the transmission of the despatch, or for an unreasonable delay in its delivery, or for its nondelivery, are, according to the court in Hadley v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, various and incapable of an exact hypothetical definition, applying alike to all cases that may occur.

While the right of the addressee of a telegram to recover for a delay in its delivery is almost universally recognized in America, said the court in Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Woodard, supra, yet the grounds of recovery are variously sustained; some of the courts holding that the contract of the sender inures to the benefit of the addressee, and others holding that the suit is an action of tort, and others holding that it is one for a breach of public duty.

While it may be regarded as the settled rule in this country that the addressee of a telegram may maintain an action against the company for any damage he may have suffered by reason of the company's negligence in not delivering the message, the courts have not agreed upon a common reason for it, according to the court in McLeod v. Pacific Teleph. Co. supra. Some of them hold that the sender of a message is the agent of the addressee, and the latter, as principal, can maintain an action for breach of the contract, or for tort if he is injured by negligence in the performance of the contracted duty. Others maintain that where the contract discloses that it is for the benefit of the addressee, he may sue for a breach of it, under the rule that a third person has a right of action upon a promise made for his benefit, although a stranger both to the promise and the consideration. Others are of the opinion that the company is a bailee, and the message is the property of the party to whom it is addressed, in analogy to the consignee of goods. Others, and perhaps the majority, seem to rest the doctrine upon the public duty which the company owes to any person beneficially interested in the message or service which it undertakes to transmit or perform, whether the sender or the receiver, or both.

The court in Yunker v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Iowa) 125 N. W. 577, gave the reasons for the rule adopted by a majority of the American courts, that the person to whom a telegram is addressed may recover of the telegraph company damages that he has sustained in consequence of the negligence of the company in transmitting or delivering the despatch, as follows:

(1) A telegraph company is a public agency, and responsible, as such, to anyone injured by its negligence, or, at least, it is the common agent of the sender and receiver, and responsible to each for any injury sustained by them, respectively, by its negligence. (2) Where the receiver is the beneficiary of the contract, the injury, if any, caused by the company's negligence, must be to him. (3) The message is the property of the person addressed, in analogy to a consignee of goods. (4) Where it appears upon the face of the message that the sender is the agent of the receiver, the latter, as the principal, may maintain an action for breach of the contract, or for a tort if injury is done him by negligence in the performance of the duty contracted to be done.

The supreme court of North Carolina in Young v. Western U. Tele. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L.R.A. 689, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, 11 S. E. 1044, summed up the reasons for holding a telegraph company responsible for its negligence in delivering a despatch, to the recipient of the telegram, as follows:

(1) That a telegraph company is a public agency, and responsible, as such, to anyone injured by its negligence, or, at least, it is the common agent of sender and receiver, and responsible to each for any injury sustained by them, respectively, by its negligence; (2) that in a case like this, the receiver is the beneficiary of the contract, and the injury, if any, caused by the company's negligence, must be to him; (3) the message is the property of the party addressed, in analogy to a consignee of goods; (4) that upon the face of a message summoning the person to whom it is addressed to attend his dying wife, the sender is the agent of the receiver, and the latter, as the principal, may maintain an action for breach of the contract, or for a tort if injury is done him by negligence in performance of the duty contracted to be done.

IV. The theory of liability for a breach of a public duty.

A telegraph company is a public agent and exercises a public employment. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L.R.A. 744, 14 S. W. 649.

It is a public servant, bound to exercise due diligence in transmitting and delivering messages to the persons to whom they are addressed. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Cleaver, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 301.

Bound, also, to act whenever called upon and paid or tendered its reasonable charges. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Dubois, 128 Ill. 248, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, 21 N. E. 4.

Telegraph companies are like common carriers in that the law imposes upon them a duty which they are bound to discharge. Ibid.

By virtue of its public employment, it is the duty of a telegraph company, for a reasonable consideration, to receive and transmit over its wires messages, with that integrity, skill, and diligence which appertains to the business of telegraphy. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Short, supra.

A telegraph company, in analogy to a common carrier, is under the obligation and duty to the public to perform the service it undertakes in a prompt and skillful manner, and for any breach of such obligation and duty it is liable to the person injured. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Hope, 11 Ill. App. 289.

A telegraph company, being a common carrier for the transportation of intelligence for hire, owes a duty in reference to its business to the public, and may be held liable for a breach of that duty. Butler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 62 S. C. 222, 89 Am. St. Rep. 893, 40 S. E. 162.

The business of a telegraph company, like that of a common carrier, is in the nature of a public employment, because it holds out to the public its readiness and willingness to transmit intelligence for anybody and everybody upon the payment of its charges. De Rutte v. New York, A. & B. Electric Magnetic Tele. Co. 1 Daly, 547.

While a telegraph company is not charged with the absolute liability of a common carrier, yet it is engaged in a public employment for hire, and is bound to exercise care and diligence adequate to the obligations it assumes, to transmit messages safely and correctly and to avoid errors and mistakes; and in this respect it is a common carrier, and much of the law of carriers applies to it. Wolfskehl v. Western U. Tele. Co. 46 Hun, 542, 12 N. Y. S. R. 555.

A telegraph company, while not an insurer, and hence not responsible for errors beyond its control, is, like a common carrier, a public servant, bound to exercise care and diligence adequate to discharge the duties it has undertaken, and for a negligent, inexcusable failure to do so, is liable in damages to persons injured in consequence. Abraham v. Western U. Tele. Co. 11 Sawy. 28, 23 Fed. 315.

In an action against a telegraph company for a breach of its public duty as a common carrier for the transportation of intelligence for hire, a contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant is not essential. Butler v. Western U. Tele. Co. supra.

The gist of an action by the person to whom a telegram is addressed is the negligence of the defendant company in failing to perform a duty imposed upon it by law. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Burris, 102 C. C. A. 386, 179 Fed. 92.

The reason generally assigned by the courts in the United States which decline to follow the English rule, for holding a telegraph company liable to the person to whom the telegram is addressed, for negligent delay in transmitting and delivering it, is that such company is a public agency, and as such is bound to exercise ordinary care in receiving, transmitting, and delivering messages, and therefore is responsible to anyone injured by its negligence in the discharge of its public duties. Ibid.

A majority of the American courts, according to the court in Fererro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 455, 35 L.R.A. 548, have rested the rule so generally adopted by them, recognizing the right of the recipient of a telegram to maintain an action against the telegraph company in case of damage by the negligent alteration of the message in the course of transmission, upon the idea that the telegraph company is engaged in exercising a public franchise having relation to the commerce of and between the states, and, consequently, that it owes to the sender of the message a double duty, one arising out of the contract and the other by virtue of the general obligation to perform the undertaking assumed, and, to the person addressed, a single duty by virtue of the same general obligation.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 563, 46 Am. Rep. 278, the court reversed a judgment overruling the railroad company's demurrer to a petition alleging negligence in failing to transmit and promptly to deliver a telegram sent over a telegraph line owned and operated by the railroad company, announcing the sudden death of the wife and child of the plaintiff's son; but the court in so doing put it upon the ground that the plaintiff had not, by the default alleged, sustained any damages that he was entitled to recover in the action, although it recognized the fact that, by reason of the public character of the employment which the railroad company had assumed, a duty existed upon its part to deliver the message to the plaintiff without unnecessary delay, and that the failure to perform such duty, if attended by at least normal damages to the plaintiff, gave him a sufficient ground for an action, even in the absence of a contract to which he was a party.

It was contended in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fenton, 52 Ind. 1, that the person to whom a telegram was addressed which the telegraph company had negligently delayed delivering, and who had lost employment in consequence, was not entitled to maintain an action, because there was no privity between him and the company, whose contract was wholly with the sender of the message; and in support of that contention the English case of Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706; Allen, Teleg. Cases, 437, was cited. If, said the Indiana tribunal, we are to regard the decision in the case referred to as the law applicable to this case, there was no valid cause of action. but it seems to us 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) that this may be too narrow a view of the question. A telegraph company, exercising corporate franchises, whose business it is to transmit and deliver messages, owes certain duties to the public, and among those duties is that of delivering without unreasonable delay messages which are thus transmitted. For a violation of that duty, the company, it would seem, ought to be responsible to the party injured. But however this may be in the absence of any statute on the subject, we have a statute clearly broad enough to authorize a person to whom a despatch is sent to recover in a proper case, though the relation of contractors does not exist between him and the company.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ford, 77 Ark. 531, 92 S. W. 528, while the action was brought by the person to whom the delayed telegram was addressed, the right of action rested upon the statute of the state of Arkansas (Kirby's Dig. 7947) providing that "all telegraph companies doing business in this state shall be liable in damages for mental anguish or suffering, even in the absence of bodily injury or pecuniary loss, for negligence in receiving, transmitting, or delivering messages; and in all actions under this section, the jury may award such damages as they conclude resulted from the negligence of the said telegraph company." It will be observed, said the court in reference to the question of the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, that our statute does not make the right to recover such damages depend upon any contractual relation existing between the telegraph company and the person injured by its negligence, but declares in broad terms that all telegraph companies doing business in the state shall be liable for mental anguish, for negligence in receiving, transmitting, or delivering messages. In fact, the right of an addressee to recover damages at all is not based upon contract, as none exists. The court thereupon proceeded to quote from Thompson on Electricity, § 427, as follows: "The true view which seems to sustain the right of action in the receiver of the message, or in the person addressed where it is not delivered, is one which elevates the question above the plane of mere privity of contract, and places it where it belongs, upon the public duty which the telegraph company owes to any person beneficially interested in the message, whether the sender or his principal, where he is agent, or the receiver or his principal, where he is the agent."

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hope, 11 Ill. App. 289, an action by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, to recover damages for delay in delivering it, it was insisted by the company that there was no contract between it and the plaintiff, and that the liability of the company was wholly with the sender of the message, who alone had any right of action; and in support of that proposition there was cited the English case of Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706, Allen, Teleg. Cas. 437, as to which the court said: That case does so hold, but in the note following the case in Allen, it is said that this is not the American rule on the subject, but that the company is a public servant in many respects like a common carrier, and is under a duty to perform the service it undertakes, in a prompt and skillful manner, and that for a breach of this duty, it is answerable to the party injured by its neglect, whether that party be the sender or the receiver of the message.

. . . In many instances the transaction with a telegraph company is wholly for the benefit of the receiver, and not for that of the sender. So it was in this case, and it would be unjust that the telegraph company should escape liability for its negligence upon the ground that no injury had been sustained by the person with whom the contract was made; and, if liable at all, it should be held for all the actual, proximate damages occasioned by its negligence.

Where the relation of principal and agent does not exist between the sender of a telegram and the person to whom it is sent, the latter may maintain an action against the telegraph company for negligence in transmitting or delivering the despatch only ex delicto. McGehee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ala.) 53 So. 205.

No contract relation exists between a telegraph company and the person to whom a telegram is addressed, and the latter, for any damages which he may have suffered by the negligence of the company in transmitting or delivering the despatch, must sue in tort, and not upon contract. Webbe v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 169 Ill. 610, 61 Am. St. Rep. 207, 48 N. E. 670.

With apparent unanimity the courts of our states, said the court in Fererro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 455, 35 L.R.A. 548, have upheld the right of a receiver of a telegram to maintain an action on the case as for a tort committed, whenever he shall have sustained actual damage without his own fault, in consequence of the negligent alteration of the message in the process of transmission.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed, and who suffers damage by the failure of the company to deliver it with promptitude, may maintain an action either ex contractu or ex delicto. He may maintain the former by relying upon a breach of the contractual obligation to deliver the message, or the latter by relying upon a breach of duty in failing to deliver, whether that duty arose out of the contract or was one imposed by law. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Krichbaum, 132 Ala. 535, 31 So. 607.

This doctrine was applied to a demurrer for misjoinder, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waters, 139 Ala. 652, 36 So. 773.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jackson, 163 Ala. 9, 50 So. 316, the rule which requires the person to whom a telegram is addressed, to establish the agency of the sender in order to recover damages for a breach of the company's contract by negligently delaying its delivery, was held not to apply to actions ex delicto, upon the authority of the principal case, but a recovery was overthrown in consequence of errors by the trial court in instructing the jury.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 2 Ga. App. 376, 58 S. E. 517, the court, in reversing the judgment, declared that the case was controlled by the decision of the supreme court in Brooke v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 119 Ga. 695, 46 S. E. 826, in which it had been held that in the transmission of a telegram the telegraph company was the agent of the sender, and that the recipient must look to him, and not to the company, for damages arising out of an error in the transmission of the message. In another paragraph of the syllabus, however, the court seemed not to rest upon such a proposition, but to hold that if the action was for a breach of the contract, the terms of the contract between the sender and the company would be controlling, but that it would be otherwise in an action ex delicto, for a breach of public duty.

The court, in Whitehill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 Fed. 499, conceded that some authorities based the American rule of the liability of telegraph companies to persons to whom messages were sent and negligently delayed in transmission or delivery, upon grounds other than that of contract, and held that the action is based upon the negligence of the company in performing its duty in its public capacity as a common carrier of messages; but, it added, the Supreme Court of the United States having held otherwise, the decisions of that court were conclusive upon all the Federal courts, regardless of what the state courts have decided.

V. The theory of contract made for the benefit of the person addressed.

The rule that one for whose benefit other persons have entered into a contract may recover the damages he has suffered by a breach of such contract, from the person in default, has in several cases in the United States been invoked successfully to obtain and uphold a recovery of damages against a telegraph company for its failure to deliver, or delay in the delivery of, a telegram addressed to the plaintiff.

The liability of a telegraph company for a breach of its public duty to transmit intelligence arises in instances where the contract is made for the benefit of the plaintiff. Butler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 62 S. C. 222, 89 Am. St. Rep. 893, 40 S. E. 162.

Upon the principle that a person for whose benefit a promise to another, upon a sufficient consideration, is made, may maintain an action on the contract in his own name against the promisor, the person to whom a telegram is addressed, sent by another for his benefit, may maintain an action against a telegraph company for damages sustained in consequence of the failure of the company to deliver the despetch. West v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Kan. 93, 7 Am. St. Rep. 530, 17 Pac. 807.

The person to whom a telegram is sent, and for whose benefit it is sent, is entitled to recover direct damages resulting to him from the negligent failure of the telegraph company to transmit and promptly to deliver the despatch. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Woods, 56 Kan. 737, 44 Pac. 989.

Where the person to whom a telegram is addressed is the sole beneficiary of the message, and the contract with the company to transmit and deliver it is made for his benefit, he may maintain an action against the company for damages in case of a negligent failure promptly to deliver the despatch. Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880.

The party who in fact was to be served by the transmission and delivery of a telegram, and who has suffered damage by the negligent and inexcusable delay of the telegraph company in transmitting and delivering it, is authorized to maintain an action against the company, and it is wholly unimportant as to whose agent the sender of the message was, or whether he was previously instructed to send it. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cook, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 99 S. W. 1131.

A telegraph company undertakes the performance of a particular service for a stipulated reward paid either by the sender or the recipient of the telegram, and the service and duty is undertaken for the benefit of both. Either party, therefore, who sustains damage from the negligent performance of such duty, has a remedy by action against the company. Wolfskehl v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 46 Hun, 542, 12 N. Y. S. R. 555.

A person to whom a telegram is sent, and for whose benefit it is transmitted, announcing the death of his son and asking for directions as to the disposal of the corpse, is entitled to recover damages of the telegraph company in case of a negligent and inexcusable delay in delivering, or failure to deliver, the despatch. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jump, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 531.

Upon the principle that an action lies upon a contract made by the defendant for the benefit of plaintiff with a third party, without the plaintiff's being privy to the consideration, an action lies by the person to whom a telegram is sent to recover damages for negligence in delivering it, by virtue of § 887 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, which provides that "telephone or telegraph companies shall be liable for special damages occasioned by the failure or negligence of their operators or servants in receiving, copying, and delivering despatches." Markel v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 19 Mo. App. 80.

The addressee of a telegram may maintain an action against a telegraph company for a violation of its duty, or negligent performance of it, in respect of such despatch, only upon the theory that he was the person intended to be benefited by the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contract between the company and the sender of the despatch, and that he has been injured by the failure of the company to perform such contract. Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 319, 78 Pac. 330, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396.

It is not essential to the right of the addressee of a telegram sent for his benefit, to a recovery of damages when he is injured by the negligence of the company in transmitting or delivering the despatch, to allege or prove that the contract between the sender and the company was for his sole and exclusive benefit, but merely that he was to be benefited by the performance of such contract. McLeod v. Pacific Teleph. Co. 52 Or. 22, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810, 94 Pac. 563, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1239, rehearing denied in 52 Or. 28, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954, 95 Pac. 1009, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1241.

A person for whose benefit a telegram is sent, and negligently not delivered, or inexcusably delayed in delivery, is entitled to recover exemplary damages for mental anguish, where the telegram announced the serious illness of his daughter, upon allegations and proof that the failure or delay to deliver was wholly wanton and grossly negligent on the part of the telegraph company. Butler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 62 S. C. 222, 89 Am. St. Rep. 993, 40 S. E. 162.

A person to whom a telegram is sent announcing the mortal illness of his brother is a beneficiary of the contract between the sender and the telegraph company, for its transmission and delivery, and, if the telegraph company unreasonably and inexcusably neglects or delays the delivery of the despatch, is entitled to recover damages. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hale, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 79, 32 S. W. 814.

A telegram from a daughter to her mother informing the latter of the former's illness is sent for the benefit of the mother, as well as for that of the daughter, and if the company negligently and inexcusably delays its transmission and delivery, the mother, to whom the despatch was addressed, is entitled to maintain an action against the company as the beneficiary of the contract between it and the sender, for the transmission and delivery of the message. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Clark, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 563, 38 S. W. 225.

It is a rule in England and in some of the courts in this country that the person to whom a telegram is addressed cannot maintain an action against the company for delay in delivering the message, upon the ground that there was no privity of contract between him and the telegraph company in the absence of notice to the company that the contract was made for his benefit; but in most of the states, said the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burris, 102 C. C. A. 386, 179 Fed. 92, it is held that a person to whom a telegram is sent for his benefit or information has a right of action against the company for negligent delay in its transmission and delivery.

Some of the American courts, according to the court in Fererro v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 App. D. C. 455, 35 L.R.A. 548, take the ground that the person to whom a telegram is addressed may be the beneficiary of the contract made upon the delivery of the message to the telegraph company for transmission, and that his right of action against the company does not depend upon whether the sender had been constituted his agent for the purpose, but upon the question who was to be served in the transaction and who has been damaged.

The rule adopted in Indiana, which recognizes the right of the person to whom a telegram is addressed to recover damages which he may have sustained by the neglect of the company in transmitting and delaying to deliver the despatch, according to the court in Hadley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, does not rest alone upon the doctrine of breach of duty of the telegraph company to the public as a public corporation, but receives much support from the equitable doctrine that one person may contract with another in such a way as to inure to the benefit in whole or in part of a third person, who may, at his option, enforce so much of the contract as was intended to be for his benefit or demand compensation for its non-performance.

The question was raised by a demurrer to the petition in Barrack v. Postal Teleg. Co. 12 Ohio, S. & C. P. Dec. 78, whether or not the receiver of a business telegram was entitled to recover damages for the failure of the company or its unreasonable delay to deliver a telegram, and the court disposed of it in overruling the demurrer, by saying: The rule in England has always been that the right of action against a telegraph company is founded upon the contract of sending, and therefore that the addressee could not recover, not being a party to the contract: that that right would belong to the sender alone, except perhaps in a case of fraud, or where the sender was the agent of the addressee. But this view of law has never been adopted in this country, but the receiver or addressee has always been allowed to maintain his action where he could prove actual damage; the courts holding that the addressee, while not an actual party to the contract of sending, comes within the rule that where two parties contract for the benefit of a third, the third party may sue for damages resulting from the breach of the contract. The addressee is the beneficiary of the contract of sending, and is entitled to sue in his own right for damages when, by the negligence of the company, he is deprived of the benefit he would otherwise have received.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sweetman, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 435, 47 S. W. 676, there was affirmed a judgment against the telegraph company for mental anguish suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the inexcusable negligence and delay of the company in the delivery of a despatch announcing that his wife was dying, and it 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was contended in behalf of the telegraph company that, having made no contract with the plaintiff, it was under no liability to him, to which contention the court replied: It is well settled in Texas "that the person for whose benefit a telegraph message is sent, and who is named in the message, or of whose interest therein notice is given to the company at the time, may sue upon it in case of injury from the negligence of the telegraph company," and "that the company receiving the message must take notice of the purposes for which the message was sent, as disclosed by the language of the message, and in case of messages relating to serious sickness or death, it must be held to know that the person for whose benefit it is sent has a serious interest in the prompt delivery of it." The court added that it is not an open question in Texas, but has been settled through numerous decisions that mental anguish is a proper basis for damages in such cases.

Whatever may be the true reason for the rule which prevails in the United States, that the person to whom a telegram is addressed may maintain an action against the telegraph company, if injured by its negligence in transmitting or delivering the despatch, it is established, according to the court in McLeod v. Pacific Teleg. Co. 52 Or. 22, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810, 94 Pac. 568, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1239, rehearing denied in 52 Or. 28, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954, 95 Pac. 1009, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1241, that when an addressee will be benefited by the contract between the sender and the company, and, with knowledge of that fact, the company attempts the performance of the service, it is bound to exercise reasonable and proper care to discharge the duty thus assumed, and will be liable to the addressee for such damages as he may suffer by reason of the negligent performance of such duty.

The English rule, declared the court in Whitehill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 Fed. 499, is that the addressee of a telegram cannot maintain an action against the company at all, as there is no contract between the parties. The English cases hold that the contract being with the sender, he alone can recover of a telegraph company for its breach in failing correctly to transmit and diligently to deliver the message; but the American courts, with practical unanimity, have declined to follow this rule, and have held that the addressee may recover. The grounds upon which the American rule is based is that where two persons make a contract for the benefit of a third person, the latter may maintain an action thereon if it is broken.

There seems to be a small class of cases, said the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 154 Ala. 657, 46 So. 228, where the sender can sue ex contractu; that is, where the sender employs the telegraph company to communicate a message solely to benefit the person to whom the message is directed. But if the sender sends the message for his own benefit, notwithstanding it may benefit the sendee also, there is no ground for the imputation that he intends to part with his right of action for a breach of the contract.

The mere fact that the contract between the sender of a message by telegraph and the telegraph company, if fully performed, will benefit the person to whom it is addressed, does not of itself entitle such person to maintain an action to recover damages resulting from the failure promptly to deliver such telegram to him. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Ford, 117 Ala. 672, 23 So. 684.

When the contract between a telegraph company and the sender of a telegram is made for the benefit of the sender alone, and not for the benefit of the recipient, the person to whom the telegram is addressed is not entitled to recover damages against the telegraph company for a delay in delivering the despatch, where the only damage claimed is for mental distress and suffering. Curd v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Ky.) 119 S. W. 746.

A telegraph company owes a duty to transmit and deliver messages only to persons of whose beneficial interest in the telegram the company receives information either from the face of the telegram itself or from other sources. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weniski, 84 Ark. 457, 106 S. W. 486.

The person to whom a telegram is addressed, and negligently delayed in transmission or delivery, may not maintain an action against the telegraph company for damages, unless the company knows or is chargeable with notice that the message was for his benefit. Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 319, 78 Pac. 330, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396.

Inasmuch as in any case the right of the person to whom a telegram is addressed to maintain an action against the telegraph company is founded upon the contract between the company and the sender, it is essential, in order that he may recover, that it appear that he was the beneficiary of such contract, and that the fact that he was to be benefited by its performance was known to the company when it received the message for transmission, either from its language or extraneously. Ibid.

In Rutner v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Okla. 234, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 770, 37 Pac. 1087, it was held that the person to whom a telegram is addressed may not maintain an action against a telegraph company for its neglect, delay, or failure to deliver a telegram, in the absence of evidence that it was sent by his agent or was sent for his benefit, and that the telegraph company had actual or constructive notice that it was sent for his benefit. In that case, however, the message was one announcing a death, and damages claimed were for mental pain and suffering alone, and nothing appeared in the message indicating the relationship between the deceased and the person to whom the message was addressed. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

VI. Effect of printed conditions on the sending form.

Assuming that the stipulations and conditions which telegraph companies print upon the blank forms on which they require messages they are employed to transmit and deliver to be written constitute provisions in the contract between the sender and the company, the question of the effect of such stipulations and conditions upon the rights of the person to whom the telegram is addressed, and who sues for damages sustained in consequence of the negligence of the company in delaying its delivery, has frequently engaged the attention of the courts, and been productive of considerable differences of judicial opinion.

The recipient of a telegraph message is bound by the terms of the agreement made by the sender with the telegraph company. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L.R.A. 744, 14 S. W. 649.

While the person to whom a telegram is addressed has a right of action against the telegraph company for damages sustained in consequence of neglect or failure promptly to deliver the message, he is none the less bound by the terms of the contract between the company and the sender of the despatch, for its transmission. Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 Kan. 230, 45 Pac. 598.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed has a right of action against a telegraph company for any damage he may sustain in consequence of its negligence in transmitting or delivering the message to him, but is none the less bound by the terms and conditions of the contract made between the company and the sender of the despatch. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443.

If the right of the addressee of a telegram to maintain an action against the telegraph company for failure or inexcusable delay to transmit and deliver the message depends, as it does depend in the opinion of the court in Whitehill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 136 Fed. 499, upon the contract made between the company and the sender, that right is, of course, subject to the terms of that contract.

The right of the person to whom a telegram is addressed to recover of the telegraph company damages sustained by him for a violation of its duty, or an inexcusably negligent performance of its duty, promptly to transmit and deliver a despatch, is necessarily grounded upon the contract between the company and the sender, according to the court in Frazier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 319, 78 Pac. 330, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396, whether the action be in form technically for a breach of contract or one sounding in tort.

While it is competent for a telegraph company to make proper rules and regulations for the transaction of its business affairs, which will bind those who transact business with it in the line of its duty, yet it may not by such rules and regulations limit any common-law or statutory right, or absolve itself from any legal obligation. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Meek, 49 Ind. 53.

The person to whom a telegram is addressed, and who sustained special damages in consequence of the neglect of the telegraph company promptly to deliver it, is entitled to maintain an action for damages, under the Indiana statute (Rev. Stat. 1881 § 4177), and is not bound by the terms and conditions imposed by the telegraph company upon the sender as a part of the contract for transmitting the message. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. McKibben, 114 Ind. 511, 14 N. E. 894.

Whatever may be the correct view, said the court in Webbe v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 169 Ill. 610, 61 Am. St. Rep. 207, 48 N. E. 670, of the conditions printed by a telegraph company upon blank forms used for the sending of despatches, as being regulations or contracts, when the controversy is between the sender of the despatch and the telegraph company, we are of the opinion that the distinctions have no application when the controversy is between the company and the receiver of the despatch, they afford no proof of contract between the telegraph company and the person to whom the message is addressed, and he therefore may not be held bound by such conditions or stipulations.

A judgment against a telegraph company recovered by a person to whom a telegram sent by his wife, informing him of the serious illness of his child, and requesting his presence, and inexcusably and negligently delayed in transmission and delivery, was affirmed in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 69 Tex. 739, 7 S. W. 653, against the contention of the company, first, that the failure to deliver was excusable because of inability to find the addressee after a proper and reasonable effort, and, second, because of stipulations printed upon the blank upon which the message was written, exempting the company from liability for mistake or delay in transmission or delivery or for the nondelivery of any unrepeatable message, whether by negligence of its servants or otherwise.

In Manville v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 37 Iowa, 214, 18 Am. Rep. 8, a judgment recovered by the person to whom a telegram was addressed and unreasonably delayed in delivery, against the telegraph company, was affirmed. In that case the only questions contested related to the binding character of the condition printed upon the telegraph blank with respect of unrepeatable messages, and the proper measure of damages recoverable.

The negligence of a telegraph company in delivering to the plaintiff a reply telegram, in answer to a despatch he had previously sent to the sender calling for such reply, was held by Johnson, J., of the superior court, of Montreal, in Bell v. Dominion 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Telegr. Co. 25 Lower Can. Jur. 248, not excused by a printed indorsement on the reply blank form assented to by the sender, relieving the company from liability for an unrepeatable message.

It was held in Monsees v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 127 App. Div. 289, 111 N. Y. Supp. 53, that an action would not lie against a telegraph company by the person to whom a despatch was sent, and delayed in delivery because of a mistake in changing the spelling of the recipient's name, for a sum beyond the amount of toll paid, where the message had been written upon a blank of the company stipulating for exemption of liability in case of unrepeatable messages, and the despatch was not repeated.

A judgment against a telegraph company, in favor of the recipient of a telegram negligently delayed in delivery, was affirmed in Hendricks v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 126 N. C. 304, 78 Am. St. Rep. 659, 35 S. E. 543, where the controversy was over the question of fact as to negligent delay, and whether or not the liability of the company had not been avoided by certain rules and regulations printed upon the despatch.

In Beasley v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 39 Fed. 181, an action by a brother for damages for delay in delivering a message sent him by his sister, announcing a turn for the worse in the illness of a relative and summoning the addressee to attend at once, was submitted by the court to the jury, with liberty to find a verdict for the plaintiff, under instructions directed almost wholly to the question as to whether there had been in fact any delay not excusable, and as to whether or not the printed stipulations relieving the company of liability were binding in the particular case by reason of the message having been written originally upon a paper which did not contain them, and copied by the defendant's agents upon a regular blank. The theory of that case was that the sender of the message was the agent of the plaintiff who sent it.

A telegraph company sued for damages by a person to whom a telegram was addressed which it negligently delayed delivering has sometimes succeeded in escaping liability on the ground that the claim in suit had not been presented to it within sixty days, and was therefore barred by printed stipulation upon the blank used in sending the despatch.

It was held in Eaker v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 75 S. C. 97, 55 S. E. 129, that a judgment in favor of the person to whom a despatch announcing the mortal illness of his father had been addressed, and which was delayed for twenty-seven hours in delivery, should be reversed because of the failure to present the claim within sixty days stipulated for when the despatch was received for transmission.

The telegraph company was successful in an action brought by a person to whom a telegram was addressed announcing that his son had run away from school, in Baldwin v. Western U. Telegr. Co. (Tex.

Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 890, upon the ground that the claim had not been presented to the telegraph company within the time limited by a printed stipulation upon the back of the message.

A judgment against a telegraph company, in favor of a woman to whom a despatch had been sent announcing her brother's death, and the purpose to bury the body the same day unless otherwise instructed, and which had been unreasonably and inexcusably delayed in delivery, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Vanway (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 414, chiefly upon the ground that the claim for damages had not been presented to the company within ninety days, as required by a stipulation printed upon the despatch, which the court held to be a reasonable one.

A client who sued the telegraph company for damages for its negligent delay to deliver to him a business telegram from his attorney was defeated in Manier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 94 Tenn. 442, 29 S. W. 732, upon the double ground that the delay in delivering the telegram had not resulted in his damage, and that he was bound by the stipulation of the sender of the despatch exempting the company from liability for damage claims unless the claim should be presented within sixty days.

In Davis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 Ky. 527, 92 Am. St. Rep. 371, 54 S. W. 849, the company had succeeded in the court below upon a demurrer to the action by the person to whom a telegram was sent announcing the death of his brother and the time of the funeral, which had been negligently delayed in delivery, upon the ground that a stipulation in the contract for the transmission of the despatch required the presentation in writing of the claim for damages to be filed with the company within sixty days, and had not been complied with; but this ruling was reversed by the court of appeals, and the cause remanded for trial on the merits upon the ground that, at least, as between the company and the addressee of a telegram, such stipulation was void as contrary to public policy.

The courts are divided in opinion, according to the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Longwill, 5 N. M. 308, 21 Pac. 339, as to whether a stipulation between the sender of a message and the company, providing that a claim for damages shall be presented within a day named, or within a reasonable time, may be entered into and upheld as a contract. Instead of being a reasonable business regulation, we think the condition named and annexed to the message was an effort on the part of the company to restrict its legal liability to sixty days. It would introduce into the local jurisprudence of every state, territory, or country in which it is sued, a species of private statute of limitation or nonclaim. It would avoid the policy of the state or territory in the matter of the time in which actions both in tort and contract should be brought. But aside from this we think there can be no sound reason for holding that in cases where no contract for total immunity from legal responsibility may be made, one may be made for a conditional release or discharge, because public policy alike denies the power to contract on the subject in either instance.

The telegraph company in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Snodgrass, 94 Tex. 284, 86 Am. St. Rep. 851, 60 S. W. 308, contested its liability to plaintiff, whose agent had sent him a despatch which had been unreasonably delayed in delivery, upon the ground that the message had not been paid for because the sender was in the employ of the telegraph company, but was held liable notwithstanding.

VII. Special statutes authorizing actions by addressees of delayed telegrams.

In several states there have been enacted special statutes making telegraph companies liable either to a definite money penalty or in damages, for negligence in transmitting and inexcusable delay in delivering telegrams intrusted to them. The statutes which impose specific money penalties are esteemed generally to inure to the benefit alone of senders of despatches, and to afford recipients no rights of action. The statutes which merely enable persons to bring suits against telegraph companies in case they sustain damages are held by most courts simply to confer rights to maintain suits for such damages as are recoverable at common law. There have been enacted in some of the states, however, statutes which authorize recoveries to be had where the damages suffered were mental anguish unaccompanied by physical injury or pecuniary loss.

The generally accepted doctrine both in this country and in England, said the court in Hadley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, has so far been that it is only the sender of a despatch who occupies that privity of contract or relation with the telegraph company which is necessary to the maintenance of a suit for a penalty imposed by statute for neglect or error in receiving, transmitting, or delivering a telegram.

An act of the legislature of Mississippi, approved March 18, 1886 (p. 91), provided that if any telegraph company shall neglect, fail, or refuse to transmit and deliver within a reasonable time, without good and sufficient excuse, any message delivered to it for such purpose, the injured person shall recover the sum of $25 in addition to such damages as are now allowed by law; and it was held that under this statute the person to whom a telegram is addressed, as well as the sender of it, is entitled to maintain an action and recover damages for an inexcusable and negligent delay of the telegraph company to deliver the despatch. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Allen, 66 Miss. 549, 6 So. 461.

Only the sum fixed in the Mississippi statute (March 18, 1886, p. 91) is recoverable by the person to whom a telegram is addressed, for a breach of the telegraph company's contract promptly to deliver the despatch, unless the language of the message or extraneous information is such as to advise the company that additional damages were contemplated by the parties. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Clifton, 68 Miss. 307, 8 So. 746.

The person to whom a telegram is addressed, and not delivered or negligently delayed in delivery, whether or not entitled to recover damages in proper case, is not entitled to recover the penalty of $100 imposed by New York Laws of 1890, ch. 566, § 103, since that applies only to the sender of the despatch. Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 40 Misc. 443, 82 N. Y. Supp. 675.

The statute of New York (Laws 1890, p. 1152, chap. 566, § 103) which provides that "every such corporation shall receive despatches from and for other telegraph or telephone lines or corporations, and from and for any individual, and, on payment of the usual charges by individuals for transmitting despatches, as established by the rules and regulations of such corporation, transmit the same with impartiality and good faith and in the order in which they are received; and if it neglects or refuses so to do, it shall pay $100 for every such refusal or neglect to the person or persons sending or desiring to send any such despatch, and entitled to have the same so transmitted," affords a remedy only to the sender of a despatch, and not to the recipient. Ibid.

The statute of California imposing a duty upon telegraph companies promptly to deliver telegrams was construed by the court as entitling the person to whom a message was addressed to recover if damaged by a failure to deliver the despatch; but the plaintiff to whom a telegram was addressed, and grossly and inexcusably delayed for nearly a month, was denied a recovery in Pacific Pine Lumber Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Cal. 428, 56 Pac. 103, upon the ground that the only damage alleged was a damage to the sender of the despatch, and not to himself.

The statute of Indiana (1 Gavin & H. § 2, p. 611) enacts that telegraph companies shall be liable for special damages occasioned by failure or negligence of their operators or servants in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering despatches. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Meek, 49 Ind. 53.

Under the Indiana statute (1 Gavin & H. § 2, p. 611) making telegraph companies liable for special damages which result from the failure or negligence of their operators or servants in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering despatches, a telegraph company is liable to the person to whom a telegram is addressed, for special damages sustained by him in consequence of its negligence in transmitting or delivering the message. Ibid.; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fenton, 52 Ind. 1; Western 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

U. Teleg. Co. v. McKibben, 114 Ind. 511, 14 N. E. 894.

Telegraph companies are held in Hadley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, to be liable under the Indiana statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4177) and also upon the general principles of the common law, for special damages due to failure or negligence in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering messages.

There can be no doubt, said the court in Herron v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Iowa. 129, 57 N. W. 606, under these authorities (after citing certain cases) and the sections of the Code of Iowa, to wit: "1328. Any person employed in transmitting messages by telegraph must do so without unreasonable delay, and anyone who wilfully fails thus to transmit them . . . is guilty of a misdemeanor" and "1329. The proprietor of a telegraph [company] is liable for all mistakes in transmitting messages made by any person in his employment, and for all damages resulting from a failure to perform any other duties required by law," that the right of plaintiff (the addressee) to recover does not depend upon a contract made by or for him.

Our statute, said the court in Yunker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Iowa) 125 N. W. 577, citing Iowa Code, § 2163, makes a telegraph company liable for all damages resulting from failure to perform its duties, and we have held that an addressee may sue and recover the damages sustained by him.

In Graham v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 La. 1069, 34 So. 91, the trial court had dismissed an action against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a message to a mother announcing the mortal illness and approaching death of her son, upon the ground that there was no cause of action in such case for mental pain and anguish, unattended by an injury to a person's property, health, or reputation. This dismissal was reversed upon the ground that the statute law of Louisiana (Civil Code, art. 1934) authorized a recovery of damages for a breach of contract having for its object the gratification of some intellectual enjoyment, whether in religion, morality, or taste, or some convenience or other legal gratification, although there was no pecuniary loss or depreciation by the parties in money.

A statute of Minnesota (Laws 1885, chap. 208, § 5) provides that, if any person or company owning or operating a telegraph line in that state shall fail to transmit a message within a reasonable time, or shall fail to deliver the same to the party to whom the message is addressed, if known, within a reasonable time after the arrival at its destination, or if it is shown due diligence has not been exercised after reception thereof for that purpose, they "shall be liable in a civil action at the suit of the party injured, for all actual damages sustained by reason of such neglect or omission." The object of this statute, according to the court in Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L.R.A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078, was to establish the rule, first, that the party injured, whether sender or addressee, may maintain an action; and, second, that the company should be liable for all actual damages proximately resulting from the breach of its contract, regardless of whether or not it was advised of the nature of the subject-matter of the message; but it does not enable the person to whom a telegram is sent, and not delivered, or unreasonably delayed in delivery, to maintain an action to recover damages solely for mental pain and suffering.

After the decision in the case of Lewis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 S. C. 325, 35 S. E. 556, denying a recovery to a plaintiff summoned by his brother to attend upon his dying father, for damages for mental suffering and distress, unconnected with bodily injury or pecuniary loss, for the negligent delay of the company in delivering the message, the legislature of South Carolina, by an act approved February 20, 1901, made telegraph companies doing business in that state, from and after the passage of the statute, liable in damages for mental anguish or suffering, even in the absence of bodily injury, for negligence in receiving, transmitting, or delivering messages. That statute was held constitutional in Simmons v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 63 S. C. 425, 57 L.R.A. 607, 41 S. E. 521.

A statute of the state of Virginia (Va. Code, § 2900) providing that any person injured by the violation of a statute may recover damages from the offender that he has sustained by reason of the violation, although a penalty or forfeiture for such violation should be imposed, unless expressly mentioned to be in lieu of damages, was construed by the court in Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 54 Fed. 634, as not affording the addressee of a sickness or death telegram a right of action for mental anguish caused by the delay of the company to deliver the despatch, notwithstanding the statute (Va. Code, § 1292) prescribing the duties of telegraph and telephone companies, and penalizing their neglect or failure to perform such duties. The argument of the court was that the purpose of § 2900 was simply to preserve to an injured person who already had an action at common law, the right to maintain the action, notwithstanding the wrongdoer might have paid the penalty for his wrongdoing under a penal statute of the state.

The courts, in the absence of statutes, it was said in the opinion in Rowan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 149 Fed. 550, are not agreed upon the question of the right of an addressee of a message, who does not stand in any contract relation with the telegraph company, to recover damages sustained by him for the negligent failure to deliver the despatch; and the statute of Iowa (Code 1897, § 2163) providing that the proprietor of a telegraph or telephone line is liable for all mistakes in transmit-ing or receiving messages made by any person in his employ, or for any unreasonable delay in their transmission or delivery, and for all damages resulting from failure to perform that or any other duty required by law, the provisions of any contract to the contrary notwithstanding, makes the company liable only to any party who sustains damages because of its neglect, and creates no right of action for damages not previously recognized as recoverable.

VIII. The damages recoverable.

a. The rules for ascertaining damages.

The principles governing courts in awarding damages for breaches of contracts analogous to contracts to transmit and deliver telegrams were clearly stated by Baron Alderson in the well-known case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502. "Where two parties," said he, "have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as to the probable result of the breach of it. Now," he continued, "if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances. . . . For, had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of the contract by special terms as to the damages in that case, and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them."

Although Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, was an action against a common carrier for a breach of contract to transport and deliver goods, and common carriers of goods and telegraph companies are not under the same rule of responsibility (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L.R.A. 744, 14 S. W. 649), nevertheless, the courts generally, but not unanimously, agree that the stated rules apply in actions against telegraph companies for breaches of contracts to transmit accurately and promptly deliver telegraphic messages.

While the duties of a telegraph company, said the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fatman, 73 Ga. 285, 54 Am. Rep. 877, are similar to those of ordinary common carriers, and so much so as to make it proper to call them, and in many respects treat them, as quasi common carriers, yet as their charges are based on the number of words, and not on weight, as carriers of ordinary freight, or on value, as express companies, the rule of liability should not be the same, as respects notice or no notice of the value of the despatch.

The courts in New York, Minnesota, Maryland, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, Nevada, and Maine, according to the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. 22 Fla. 637, 1 Am. St. Rep. 222, 1 So. 129, following the case of Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, hold that only nominal damages may be recovered from a telegraph company undertaking to send a telegram, unless the sender informs the operator of the special circumstances which constitute its importance and the need of its correct and prompt transmission. These cases, continued the court, are decided upon the theory that the principles of law regulating the conduct of common carriers applies equally to the transmission of messages by the electric telegraph system. The business of one is to transport from one locality to another some tangible object of weight and dimension. Experience does not suggest in such a transaction any other liability than compensation for its value if lost or destroyed in the transportation, or such damages for its delay as the object itself might suggest. The business of the other is the transmission from one to another, and from one locality to another, of information or intelligence, nothing in itself, but, as the basis and groundwork that is to influence the conduct of others, is in this respect of the very first importance. One is limited to the transportation of tangible things, the other to the transmission of the intangible. There is no similarity in the services to be performed, in the nature of the things to be transported or transmitted, or the purposes to be effected, and, as a consequence, none as to the measure of damages for failure to perform their respective agreements.

b. The recovery of pecuniary losses.

In England, where, as already stated, no action against a telegraph company by a person to whom a telegram is sent lies, save where a contractual relation exists between him and the company, he cannot recover even a pecuniary and direct loss, in the absence of the element of privity of contract.

A person who offers by telegraph merchandise for sale to a prospective customer, who in turn names a price which he is willing to pay, cannot recover damages from a telegraph company consequent upon its mistake in naming the price offered in the reply despatch, because the liability of the company rests wholly upon its contract with the sender of the message, and there is no privity between it and the person to whom the message is sent. Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 706.

In the state of Alabama, where the English rule has prevailed to a certain extent, an applicant for employment summoned by telegraph to report for duty cannot maintain an action ex contractu against the telegraph company, which has negligently delayed delivering the message from the employer, because, according to the court in Ford v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 124 Ala. 400, 27 So. 409, the sender of the message did not sustain the relation of agent toward the person to whom it was sent.

In all jurisdictions where the right has been recognized of the person to whom a telegram has been sent to maintain at all an action against the telegraph company, to recover the damages he has sustained by the negligence of the company in respect of the despatch, the courts are accordant as to his right to recover pecuniary loss.

A telegraph company is liable to the person to whom a telegram is addressed, for damages to him resulting naturally and in the usual course of business, from its failure to send or deliver a despatch correctly and promptly, regardless of the disclosing by the sender of its importance to the receiving agent of the company. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hyer Bros. 22 Fla. 637, 1 Am. St. Rep. 222, 1 So. 129.

A telegram in the words, "Have work, come at once," was held in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hines, 96 Ga. 688, 51 Am. St. Rep. 159, 23 S. E. 845, sufficiently definite and explicit to put the telegraph company on notice as to the character of the damage that the person to whom it was addressed would probably sustain by negligence of the company in unreasonably delaying the delivery of it, and to entitle such person, where the company had negligently failed promptly to deliver the despatch, to recover damages.

For the failure by gross negligence of a telegraph company to deliver for several days a telegram from a prospective employer to a traveling salesman, closing a contract of employment for the ensuing year as the culmination of previous negotiations, so that the contract is lost, the telegraph company is liable to such salesman in damages amounting to the difference between the agreed price to be paid for his services and the amount he was able to earn during the time the contract would have run if made. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Valentine, 18 Ill. App. 57.

A person who has lost employment in consequence of the negligent delay of a telegraph company to deliver a telegram addressed to him by the prospective employer is entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company, according to the Indiana supreme court, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fenton, 52 Ind. 1, upon the general principle that the defendant exercises corporate franchises, and is charged with public obligations, and therefore is liable to any member of the public who sustains damages by its failure to discharge a public duty. But, in Indiana at all events, it is liable under a statute embodying that principle with respect to the transmission and delivery of telegrams.

One who has lost employment in consequence of the failure of a telegraph company to deliver within a reasonable time a telegram to him from his prospective employer is entitled to maintain an action for damages under the Indiana statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4177), Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McKibben, 114 Ind. 511, 14 N. E. 894.

The court in McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 Iowa, 356, 43 L.R.A. 214, 70 Am. St. Rep. 205, 78 N. W. 63, affirmed a judgment against the telegraph company for damages in favor of the person to whom a telegram was addressed and negligently delayed in delivery, where the delay prevented the plaintiff from arresting a fugitive criminal, and earning a public reward offered for his apprehension. The court held that the action was based on the negligence of the telegraph company in the performance of a duty in its public capacity as a common carrier of messages.

The inexcusable and negligent omission of a telephone company to call a person to whom a long-distance message is addressed to receive a message offering him employment, which to the company's knowledge will be beneficial to him, entitles him to maintain an action and recover damages against the company for the loss that he sustains in consequence. McLeod v. Pacific Teleph. Co. 52 Or. 22, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 810, 94 Pac. 568, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1239, rehearing denied in 52 Or. 28, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 954, 95 Pac. 1009, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1241.

The delay and negligence of a telegraph company to deliver a message sent to one who has applied for employment and has been accepted, summoning him to the place of work to begin his duties, renders the company liable in damages to the addressee of the despatch, where it appears that, in consequence of his failure to receive it, another person was employed in his stead. Stumm v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 140 Wis. 528, 122 N. W. 1032.

The negligent delay of a telegraph company to deliver a message to a lawyer, summoning him to attend court to defend a person charged with crime, entitles the person to whom the message is addressed to recover of the telegraph company the penalty given by the Mississippi statute and, in addition, the fee that he would have earned, and has lost in consequence of the delay in the delivery of the message, because the nature and urgency of the case is apparent upon the face of the despatch. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McLaurin, 70 Miss. 26, 13 So. 36.

A physician and surgeon summoned by telegraph to attend a suffering patient is entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company for its unreasonable delay and inexcusable negligence in delivering the despatch to him, whereby he was prevented from attending the call until after the patient had died. Fairley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Miss. 6, 18 So. 796; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Longwill, 5 N. M. 308, 21 Pac. 339.

A physician to whom is addressed, but not delivered, a telegram summoning him to attend a patient professionally, is entitled under the statute of Wisconsin making a telegraph company liable for all damages occasioned by failure to transmit and deliver telegrams intrusted to it, to maintain an action against the company for loss of the fees which he would have earned by rendering the service the telegram called upon him to do. Barker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 134 Wis. 147, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 533, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1017, 114 N. W. 439.

The action of Mood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 40 S. C. 524, 19 S. E. 87, was brought by a physician to recover damages for the loss of compensation for services which he would have earned but for the delay of the telegraph company in delivering a telegram addressed to him, and its failure altogether to deliver another telegram addressed to him summoning him to attend an injured patient; but the court held the complaint bad on demurrer for failure properly to set out special and consequential damages, and notice to the company of the damages in contemplation, and, reversing a judgment in the physician's favor, ordered a new trial upon that ground.

A telegraph company which has unreasonably and negligently delayed the delivery of a despatch addressed to a ship broker is liable to him in damages for the loss of his commissions due to a failure to receive the despatch in time. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fatman, 73 Ga. 285, 54 Am. Rep. 877.

A cotton broker commissioned to buy cotton, who has telegraphed his principal for instructions concerning a particular purchase, is entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company which he has sustained in consequence of gross and inexcusable delay to deliver an answering despatch containing such instructions in cryptic language. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weiting, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 444.

A broker in lands is entitled to maintain an action against the telegraph company for damages in delaying inexcusably a telegram addressed to him, where, by reason of such delay, he has lost a sale, and his commissions thereon, of real estate which he was employed to sell. Harper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 111 Mo. App. 269, 86 S. W. 904.

In Hise v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 137 Iowa, 329, 113 N. W. 819, the person to whom a telegram was erroneously addressed by the sender, and delayed in delivery, was held entitled to recover damages for the loss of his commission upon the sale of real estate, notwithstanding the error on the part of the sender, and notwithstanding also that a subsequent sale of the property was made, by which he received a larger commission.

The Oregon supreme court in Frazier v. Western U. Tele. Co. 45 Or. 414, 67 L.R.A. 319, 78 Pac. 330, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396, held that the plaintiffs, who were real-estate brokers, were not entitled to recover damage for the loss of commissions upon the sale of real estate consequent upon the failure of the telegraph company to deliver a despatch from the owner of property listed with them for sale, directing the acceptance of an offer previously made, and put the decision on the ground that the telegraph company did not know, either expressly or impliedly that the addressees were land brokers, and consequently did not contemplate such damages as consequential upon its negligence in delaying delivery of the despatch. The court declared that an exhaustive examination of the cases holding that the addressee of a telegram might sue the company for negligence had disclosed that in all of them the company knew or was chargeable with knowledge that the message was for his benefit, and that no case had come under its observation in which the addressee was permitted to recover in any other circumstances.

For inexcusable negligence in delivering a message, a telegraph company is liable in damages to the person to whom the message was addressed, where the message contained information of the acceptance of a business proposition made by the recipient to the sender, and which failed of being carried into effect because of such delay. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Kemp Bros. 55 Ill. App. 583.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed, calling for his presence at the place from which it is sent on a particular day, is entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company covering the reasonable expenses of his journey and the value of his time lost in making it, if, by the negligence of the company, the telegram by error specifies the wrong date. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L.R.A. 744, 14 S. W. 649.

The plaintiff in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Oastler, 90 Ark. 268, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 119 S. W. 285, was refused a recovery for more than a small amount which she had paid for traveling expenses on account of a telegram from her husband received on Saturday erroneously announcing his expectation of being at home that day when he had written Sunday, the next day, where the despatch was corrected on Sunday, and the sender of it arrived at the time designated.

A client to whom a telegram sent by his attorney has been inexcusably delayed in delivery, and who in consequence has suffered damage, is entitled to recover such damage from the telegraph company, upon the ground of its negligence. Martin v. Western U. Tele. Co. 1 Tex. Civ. App. 143, 20 S. W. 860.

in favor of a partnership, for the failure promptly to deliver a business telegram sent to it, was affirmed in Postal Tele. Co. v. Levy (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. 134.

In Brewster v. Western U. Tele. Co. 65 Ark. 537, 47 S. W. 560, the senders of the telegram and the person to whom it was addressed were all partners in business, and the telegram related to business of the partnership. The action was brought by the firm as partners, and the negligent delay of the telegraph company was not controverted, the only question being as to the measure of damages, and whether any damages beyond the price paid for the telegram could be recovered at all.

A judgment in favor of the person to whom a telegram was addressed, for the value of cattle drowned by a river flood which he failed to guard against in consequence of not receiving in time advice from his agent, the sender of the telegram, of the rising of the river, was affirmed in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Pauley, 157 Ala. 615, 47 So. 654.

The person to whom a telegram was addressed notifying him of the condition of the live stock market at the place where the sender of the despatch was, and advising him to delay shipping cattle for a time, and who sustained a loss in consequence of the negligence and delay of the telegraph company in delivering the despatch, was held entitled to recover damages against the telegraph company, in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Woods, 56 Kan. 737, 4 Pac. 989.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed and sent by a previous arrangement between him and the sender, advising him to ship cattle for sale in the sender's market as soon as possible, and which is unreasonably and inexcusably delayed in delivery by the negligence of the telegraph company, is entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company, which he has sustained in consequence of such delay, by the loss of a sale, for depreciation in the price of cattle in the market because of the lapse of time. Whittemore v. Western U. Tele. Co. 71 Fed. 651.

A judgment against a telegraph company which negligently delayed the delivery of a despatch sent to the plaintiffs, announcing a shipment of cattle for reshipment by them to Europe, in favor of the persons to whom the telegram was addressed, was affirmed in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Lehman, 105 Md. 442, 66 Atl. 266.

A judgment against a telegraph company recovered by a ranchman, for damages for delay in delivering a telegram to him announcing a sale of a herd of cattle that had been rounded up awaiting the receipt of a despatch, and which had been turned loose on the range in consequence of its nondelivery, so that it was necessary again to round up the beasts, was affirmed in Pruett v. Western U. Tele. Co. 6 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 25 S. W. 794.

The telegraph company was held liable, and a judgment against it affirmed, for the failure to deliver a despatch accepting the plaintiff's offer, previously made by letter, to purchase a number of head of cattle, and asking him to come quickly, notwithstanding the contention that the plaintiff had an adequate remedy upon his contract of purchase with the owner of the cattle, who had sold the beasts to another purchaser because of not hearing from the plaintiff, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Snow, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 275, 72 S. W. 250.

The telegraph company in Mitchell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 12 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 33 S. W. 1016, successfully contended upon the trial that the plaintiff, to whom it had negligently delayed delivering a telegram from his son announcing a failure of the water supply upon his ranch and requesting instructions for the care of his cattle, was not entitled to recover, because the damages which he claimed were not so much due to its negligence in delivering the despatch as to his own negligence in not making proper provision for the watering of his stock before leaving home; but the judgment in favor of the company obtained upon this theory was reversed by the court of civil appeals, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. True, 101 Tex. 236, 106 S. W. 315, held that the facts established beyond controversy the liability of the telegraph company to the person to whom a despatch was addressed and inexcusably and negligently delayed in delivery, for such damages as he could prove by proper evidence, and that the only question before the court upon an appeal from the judgment against the telegraph company was whether the messages and attending circumstances charged the company with such notice of the nature of the transaction to which the despatch referred as to make it liable for the damages to the plaintiff consequent upon the failing of a negotiation for the purchase of cattle, and, as the court concluded that the company did not have the requisite notice to render it liable, the judgment was reversed.

In Fisher v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 119 Wis. 146, 96 N. W. 545, the plaintiffs had sent a despatch to a person having a stock of tobacco for sale, accepting conditionally an offer of sale and requesting an answer, and sued for damages for a delay in delivering the reply, which closed the transaction by a refusal to accept the suggested condition. The court held that, notwithstanding the Wisconsin statute making telegraph companies liable for all damages occasioned by failure or negligence of their employees in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering messages (Stat. 1898, § 1778), there could be no recovery because no legal damages were shown as the proximate result of the breach of the company's duty to deliver. The precise ground upon which the trial was decided did not appear, and in opening the opinion affirming the judgment, Marshall, J., writing for the court, said that while there was much authority to the effect that the addressee of a telegram, the sender not being his agent nor making a contract for his benefit, must sue for the breach of duty constituting actionable negligence or not at all, and could not maintain an action for a breach of contract, that question need not then be decided.

In Swan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 67 L.R.A. 153, 63 C. C. A. 550, 129 Fed. 318, the plaintiff sought to recover of the telegraph company damages on account of having lost an opportunity to purchase mining stock, because of not receiving, until after a close of the stock exchange on the day that the message was sent, a telegram addressed to him by a mining expert advising the purchase; but in that case, by stipulation between the parties and their attorneys, it was agreed that no claim against the company was made by the plaintiff on account of negligent delay in transmitting and delivering the message, and that that question might be considered by the court as eliminated from the case, the ground of recovery resting on the addition by the company to the signature of the sender of the figures and initials, "3.27 P. M.," thus misleading him in respect of the time the despatch had been sent. The court upon error reversed the trial court, and ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the difference in the price between the market rate of the stock upon the day the despatch was sent and the amount paid by the plaintiff the next day.

c. The recovery for mental suffering.

It is hornbook law that for a wrong without a legal injury no cause of action accrues, and no remedy is afforded by the courts. It is therefore of prime importance in the investigation of the subject in hand to ascertain whether the negligence of the telegraph company sued for damages resulting from its delay in delivering a message inflicted any legal injury upon the plaintiff. In by far the greater number of cases where the question was debated whether or not legal damage had ensued, the controversy waged concerning the right to recover for mental anguish unaccompanied by physical suffering. The courts are in hopeless conflict upon this question, and all that can be done for the student of the subject is to spread before him in detail their discordant decisions.

If the plaintiff in an action against a telegraph company based upon its delay to deliver a despatch has sustained no legal damage by such delay, he must fail in the action, whether he was the sender of the telegram or the person to whom it was sent. Hence, in jurisdictions where mental suffering and anguish, unconnected with physical injury or pecuniary loss, are not esteemed legal damage, the company escapes liability even when inexcusably negligent.

In Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 3 Dak. 315, 19 N. W. 408, the action was brought by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, announcing the death of his sister and the time fixed for the funeral, on account of a delay of five days in delivering it, but, inasmuch as the only damage alleged in the complaint was mental distress and anguish, the court held the complaint demurrable for failure to allege legal damage.

In the following cases brought against telegraph companies by persons to whom telegrams were addressed and negligently delayed in delivery, the plaintiffs were refused judgments because the only damages they claimed were grounded in mental suffering and distress, unconnected with physical or pecuniary injury, and the courts held these were not recoverable. The question of the right of the plaintiffs to maintain suit was left out of view.

Blount v. Western U. Tele. Co. 126 Ala. 105, 27 So. 779; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Blocker, 138 Ala. 484, 35 So. 468; Peay v. Western U. Tele. Co. 64 Ark. 538, 39 L.R.A. 463, 43 S. W. 965; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Ferguson, 157 Ind. 64, 54 L.R.A. 846, 60 N. E. 674, 1080; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Briscoe, 18 Ind. App. 22, 47 N. E. 473; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Adams, 28 Ind. App. 420, 63 N. E. 125; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 13 L.R.A. 859, 24 Am. St. Rep. 300, 9 So. 823; Connell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L.R.A. 172, 38 Am. St. Rep. 575, 22 S. W. 345; Morton v. Western U. Tele. Co. 53 Ohio St. 431, 32 L.R.A. 735, 53 Am. St. Rep. 648, 41 N. E. 689; Kester v. Western U. Tele. Co. 55 Fed. 603; Kline v. Western U. Tele. Co. 3 Ohio N. P. 143; Lewis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 57 S. C. 325, 35 S. E. 556; Davis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 46 W. Va. 48, 32 S. E. 1026; Tyler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 54 Fed. 634; Alexander v. Western U. Tele. Co. 126 Fed. 445; Rowan v. Western U. Tele. Co. 149 Fed. 550.

In Clay v. Western U. Tele. Co. 81 Ga. 285, 12 Am. St. Rep. 316, 6 S. E. 813, the person to whom a despatch was addressed, asking him to meet a certain train for the purpose of arranging for the shipment further on of a corpse, failed to recover because the court held he had not sustained any damage by the failure of the company to deliver the despatch in time to enable him to meet the train.

A person to whom a telegraph message announcing the dying condition of his brother was sent, but by gross negligence of the company not delivered promptly, and who consequently was unable to reach his brother's bedside before death had occurred, was held in Chapman v. Western U. Tele. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L.R.A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, 15 S. E. 901, not entitled to recover more than nominal damages simply for mental suffering; but the right of the recipient of the despatch to maintain the action was not questioned. This case was followed and its doctrine reiterated in Giddens v. Western U. Tele. Co. 111 Ga. 824, 35 S. E. 638.

The question litigated, and decided in favor of the defendant, in International Ocean Tele. Co. v. Saunders, 32 Fla. 434, 21 L.R.A. 810, 14 So. 148, was as to the right 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) to recover damages for mental pain and suffering in an action against the telegraph company for failure promptly to transmit and deliver a telegraph despatch announcing the mortal illness of the plaintiff's wife. The case, however, conceded the right of the plaintiff, who was the person to whom the despatch was addressed, to recover at least nominal damages.

It was decided in Curtin v. Western U. Tele. Co. 16 Misc. 347, 38 N. Y. Supp. 58, reversing 14 Misc. 459, 72 N. Y. S. R. 200, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1111, that a person to whom a telegram announcing the death and time of the funeral of a brother was addressed, and inexcusably delayed in delivery, was entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company; but that decision was reversed in 13 App. Div. 253, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1109, upon the ground that mental suffering, the only damage alleged and proved in the case, afforded no legal basis for the recovery of pecuniary damages.

In Kightlinger v. Western U. Tele. Co. 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 630, a demurrer was sustained to a declaration in an action against a telegraph company by the person to whom a despatch was addressed, informing him of the serious and dangerous illness of his father, and which the company negligently delayed in delivering, where the only averment of damage was that the plaintiff had been by such delay "hindered and prevented from seeing his father alive, and ministering to his wants and comfort," the court being of the opinion that this allegation did not set forth actionable damage, or even allege mental anguish and grief.

One to whom a telegram has been addressed and promptly delivered announcing the serious illness of his wife's mother, and who has in return sent another despatch to the sender asking as to the condition of the sick woman and whether the presence of his wife was necessary, was held not entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company for its failure to deliver a third despatch announcing an improvement and that the illness was not dangerous, where the only damage alleged was continued anxiety and mental distress. Rowell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 75 Tex. 26, 12 S. W. 534.

The plaintiff in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Kuykendall, 99 Tex. 323, 89 S. W. 965, to whom a telegram had been addressed and unreasonably delayed in delivery, which announced the death of her brother and that the sender was coming with the corpse, was denied a recovery against the telegraph company for mental anguish alleged to have been suffered because, on account of the delay, the coffin could not be opened so as to enable her to review the remains, on the ground that such damages were not reasonably to be contemplated by the company as consequent upon delay in delivering the message.

In De Voegler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 10 Tex. Civ. App. 229, 30 S. W. 1107, the plaintiff, a youth away from home, was held not entitled to recover damages against the telegraph company for mental distress consequent upon its failure promptly to deliver to him money which his mother had transmitted to him by telegraph at his request.

The humiliation suffered by a sister because her brother had died at a distant place, and was buried at the cost of strangers on account of leaving no means, is not a proper ground of recovery against a telegraph company for its delay in promptly delivering the telegraphic message announcing the death and asking instructions as to the disposal of the corpse. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McNairy, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 78 S. W. 969.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of the person to whom a telegram was addressed, announcing the death and the time of the funeral of his father, and which was negligently delayed in delivery, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Butler, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 28, 99 S. W. 704, upon the ground that the plaintiff's mental distress due to his inability to be present and comfort his mother in her bereavement was not a proper element of damage in such a case.

The negligent delay of a telegraph company to deliver a message to parents announcing that their son, who had been seriously ill, was better, affords the parents no ground of action to recover for mental anxiety and distress alone. McCarthy v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 56 S. W. 568.

A judgment against a telegraph company for negligent and inexcusable delay in delivering a message addressed to the plaintiff, announcing the illness of his daughter, in consequence of which he missed a train that he might have taken to his daughter's home six hours earlier, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Barrett (Tex. Civ. App.) 118 S. W. 1089, upon the ground that there had been included in the judgment damages for mental distress consequent upon the nondelivery of a reply to a telegram the plaintiff had sent inquiring as to the then present condition of his daughter, when the proof showed that that was unchanged.

The court in Goodhue v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 122 S. W. 41, affirmed a judgment in favor of a telegraph company in an action instituted by a daughter to recover damages for mental distress consequent upon the negligent delay of the company to deliver a despatch informing her of the mortal illness of her father, upon the curious ground that the delay to deliver the despatch had not produced her anxiety and mental distress, but had only prolonged the suffering which already existed, and arose from a great desire to reach her father and home at the earliest possible moment.

In Connelly v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 100 Va. 51, 56 L.R.A. 663, 93 Am. St. Rep. 919, 40 S. E. 618, the plaintiff was defeated in an action against the telegraph company to recover damages for negligent delay in delivering a telegram addressed to him, announcing the death of his father. His right to maintain the action apparently was not contested, since there was a statute at that time in the state of Virginia providing a penalty of $100 to the addressee of a telegram for the failure to transmit and deliver a despatch, and a further statute permitting any person injured by a violation of that act to recover such damages as he might sustain, notwithstanding the imposition of a statutory penalty or forfeiture; but the court reached its conclusion upon the ground that only mental distress and suffering were alleged as damages, and for these, when unaccompanied by pecuniary injury or physical pain, no recovery could be had.

In Summerfield v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Wis. 1, 41 Am. St. Rep. 17, 57 N. W. 973, the court reversed a judgment in favor of the person to whom a despatch announcing that his mother was dying, and requesting his presence, was sent and unreasonably delayed in delivery, upon the ground that damages for mental suffering alone were not recoverable in that state. There was, however, a statute (Laws of 1885, chap. 171, Sanborn & B. Anno. Stat. § 1770b) which made telegraph companies "liable for all damages occasioned by failure or negligence" of their servants in receiving, copying, transmitting, or delivering messages, and Cassoday, J., dissenting from the conclusion of the court upon the ground that the statute gave a right of action in such cases, said pertinently: "If the statute gives no right of action for any damages except such as were recoverable at common law, then its enactment was an idle ceremony."

In sustaining a demurrer by the telegraph company to a declaration in an action wherein the plaintiff alleged negligence in a telegraph company in delaying the delivering of a message to him from his sister, which prevented him from reaching the deathbed of his brother-in-law, the court in Chase v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 10 L.R.A. 464, 44 Fed. 554, said: "The negligence of the defendant is sufficiently averred; and it seems to be settled in this country, contrary, however, to the English cases, that the receiver of a telegram may recover damages actually sustained by negligent delay in delivery. An examination of the adjudged cases, however, shows that the great weight of authority is against recovery in a case like this for mental suffering alone."

The person to whom a telegram is addressed, and negligently and inexcusably delayed in delivery by the agents of the telegraph company, it was held in Crawson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 47 Fed. 544, may not recover for mental suffering alone, unaccompanied by other injuries. The court intimated in that case, however, that the action would be maintainable if the negligence of the company had been so gross as to indicate malice, and if there were any physical pain and suffering so that the mental distress might be taken into consideration as a natural and proximate result of the physical pain.

It was held in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wood, 21 L.R.A. 706, 6 C. C. A. 432, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. 471, that a person to whom a telegram was addressed might not recover of the company damages for failure to deliver the message, where he was not a party to the contract under which it was sent, and where the company was not informed, either by the language of the message or otherwise, that the contract was for his benefit; but in that case the damages claimed were for mental distress and suffering alleged to be due to the negligence of the company in failing promptly to deliver to the plaintiff a telegram announcing the dangerous illness of his father, and the reasoning of the court is directed generally to the proposition that such damages, when not accompanied by physical or pecuniary injury to the plaintiff, do not constitute a cause of action.

In Gahan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 59 Fed. 433, an action at law to recover damages from a telegraph company for failure to deliver to the plaintiff a message from his brother announcing the death and time of burial of another brother, the court said in beginning the opinion: The case is somewhat new, and yet it has been pretty well adjudicated, and, outside of the decision of Judge Maxey, in Beasley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. 181, every time it has been touched by the Federal courts, it has been clearly and unequivocally held that the action may not be maintained. He was referring to damages for mental anguish alone. The court, however, in that case, put the actual decision upon the ground that the statute of Minnesota had provided in clear and unequivocal terms that no action should be maintained except for actual damages, and construed the phrase "actual damages" to exclude damages for mental suffering and distress.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sklar, 61 C. C. A. 281, 126 Fed. 295, the plaintiff, to whom had been addressed and unreasonably and negligently delayed in delivery a telegram announcing the death of her daughter, and asking instructions as to the disposition of the corpse, was held not entitled to recover of the telegraph company for mental suffering and distress alone, notwithstanding the provisions of the state statute (Shannon's Code [Tenn.] §§ 1837, 1838) requiring all telegraph messages to be delivered without unreasonable delay, and making the telegraph company liable in damages to the party aggrieved for the violation of its duty in that respect, and notwithstanding also that the state courts of Tennessee had construed such statute as affording the right of action, which the Federal court denied.

A telegraph company is liable for special damages resulting from a negligent delay in transmitting or delivering a telegram only when notice of the facts which give rise to such damages is received by such company, either from the face of the telegram or from other sources. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weniski, 84 Ark. 457, 106 S. W. 486.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a father to whom had been sent a telegram announcing the fact that his wife was about to be confined, and which telegram was negligently delayed, so that the plaintiff was unable to be present with his wife at the birth of the child, or to attend the funeral, where the infant subsequently died, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Craven (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 633, because the proof was lacking that the infant's death occurred at the time of birth, and therefore that the company could not be charged with notice such as to make it liable for damages with respect of the inability of the father to be present at the subsequent death and funeral of the child.

A telegraph company which has negligently and inexcusably delayed the delivery of a telegram announcing illness or death has frequently escaped a judgment in a suit by the person to whom the delayed message was addressed, because the relationship between the plaintiff and the person who was ill or had died was not so close that the damages claimed to have resulted from the delay could fairly be said to have been contemplated by the company at the time it contracted to transmit and deliver the despatch, and the contents of the message itself did not imply or give notice of such damages, nor did the company have any extrinsic knowledge concerning them.

In Davidson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1292, 51 S. W. 830, the court affirmed the judgment in favor of the company, denying a recovery of damages for negligent delay in delivering a telegram announcing the death of the mother of one of the plaintiffs and mother-in-law of the other, the plaintiffs being husband and wife. The ground taken by the court was that, inasmuch as the wife was not a party to the message, or mentioned in it, or known by the telegraph company to exist, she could not maintain the action, and that her husband, as son-in-law of the deceased, was not a relative near enough to be entitled to recover damages for mental anguish brought about by inability to attend the deceased in her last moments.

In Lee v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 130 Ky. 202, 113 S. W. 55, the person to whom a telegram was addressed announcing the death of a relative, and which was unreasonably and negligently delayed in delivery, was denied a recovery against the telegraph company upon the ground that the relationship between himself and the deceased was not sufficiently near to entitle him to recover for mental distress. The court laid down the rule that where damages are sought for the failure to send or deliver a telegram announcing the sickness or death of a relative, a recovery may not be had unless the relationship between the parties is that of parent and child, husband and wife, sister and brother, or grandparent and grandchild. This rule was admitted to be an arbitrary one, but was defended upon the theory that the peculiar and speculative nature of the doctrine upon which the right of recovery rests in cases of this character makes it necessary that there should be limitations placed upon it. The court conceded that the restrictions named by it were not satisfactory, but that, as the line must be drawn somewhere, it seemed appropriate to put it at the point where the parties were united by close blood relation or marriage ties.

Under the rule adopted in the state of Kentucky, allowing actions by the persons to whom telegrams are addressed and delayed in delivery to blood relatives or husbands and wives, where the message announces death or mortal illness, and mental suffering and distress alone are relied upon as damages, a recovery was denied the plaintiff in Randall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 859, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 277, 107 S. W. 235, because the only relationship between him and the deceased person named in the message was a betrothal of marriage.

The controversy in Holler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 149 N. C. 336, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 475, 63 S. E. 92, an action by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, to recover damages for negligence in delaying its delivery, which resulted in the defeat of the plaintiff, was wholly over the question of the right of the plaintiff to recover damages for mental suffering, where his relationship to the person whose death the despatch announced was not disclosed by the terms of the message, or otherwise known to the company.

A judgment against a telegram company for mental distress suffered by the recipient of a despatch announcing the serious illness of his daughter-in-law, and unreasonably delayed in delivery, was reversed in Amos v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 S. C. 259, 128 Am. St. Rep. 845, 60 S. E. 660, upon the ground that the statute of that state allowing recovery for mental anguish caused by delays in delivering telegrams did not authorize a recovery by the plaintiff, without specific allegations and proof of notice to the telegram company of such a tender affection between the recipient and the person whose illness was announced in the despatch, as was not to be implied from an ordinary relation of father-in-law and daughter-in-law.

A judgment against a telegram company in favor of a person to whom a telegram was addressed, announcing the death and time of burial of his brother-in-law, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Coffin, 88 Tex. 94, 30 S. W. 896, upon the ground that the relationship between the deceased and plaintiff was not such in and of itself as to entitle the plaintiff to the recovery of special damages, and to give notice of their contemplation to the telegram company, without express allegations and express extrinsic disclosure.

The telegram company was excused from liability and damages for the negligent delay in delivering a telegram announcing the death and time of funeral of the plaintiff's niece, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 97 Tex. 22, 75 S. W. 482, upon the ground that no such relation existed between uncle and niece, without express notice to the telegram company, as would imply that mental anguish would ensue, so as to be within the contemplation of the parties to the despatch, from failure or delay promptly to transmit and deliver the message.

A judgment recovered against a telegram company by the addressee of the telegram delayed in delivery, which announced the death of her brother-in-law, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMillan (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 298, upon the ground that, the deceased not being related by blood to the plaintiff, damages for mental anguish, in the absence of express notice, were not contemplated by the company as a consequence of delay in delivering the message.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Garrett (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 649, reversed a judgment against a telegram company recovered by a person who was prevented by its negligent delay in delivering a despatch addressed to him, from visiting his dying stepfather, upon the ground that the relationship of stepfather and stepson was not sufficient in and of itself, without notice to the company, to make the company liable for mental distress and suffering.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson (Tex. Civ. App.) 76 S. W. 600, the supreme court having laid down the rule that mental anguish of the person to whom a telegram was addressed, announcing the death of his niece, and negligently delayed in delivery, did not constitute a basis for recovery, because the relationship between the parties was not sufficient to put the company upon notice that such damages would be claimed in consequence of its delay in delivering the despatch, thereupon a judgment against the company which the uncle had recovered was reversed, and final judgment dismissing the action was rendered in its favor, by the court of civil appeals.

A telegram company has occasionally escaped a judgment when sued for damages resulting from its negligence in not promptly delivering a telegram announcing the serious illness or death of the spouse of, or a close relation by blood to, the plaintiff, upon the ground that it had no knowledge, either from the language of the message or otherwise, of the relationship, and, hence, that it could not be said that the damages claimed were in law within its contemplation as consequent upon its default.

A judgment recovered by a husband and wife against a telegram company for delay in delivering a despatch addressed to the wife, sent by her father announcing the death of her mother, was reversed in Kirby v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 77 S. C. 404, 122 Am. St. Rep. 580, 58 S. E. 10, upon the ground that the damages recovered were not of such a character as to be within the contemplation of the telegram company as consequent upon the delay in delivering the despatch.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217, 18 Am. St. Rep. 37, 13 S. W. 70, a married woman was denied a recovery against the telegraph company for its negligence in failing to deliver with promptitude a despatch to her husband announcing the serious illness of a third person, upon the ground that there was nothing in the wording of the despatch to put the company upon notice that such married woman was a relative of the person said to be ill (she was in fact his daughter), or that she was present at the place to which the despatch was addressed, or that her presence at the bedside of the sick was desired.

There was, according to the court in Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Gotcher, 93 Tex. 114, 53 S. W. 686, nothing in a telegram which had been unreasonably delayed in delivery sufficient to give notice to the telegraph company that the mental suffering of the plaintiff's wife, the death of whose father, it announced, was within the contemplation of the parties to the despatch, the wife not being named in or addressed by the message, and therefore a judgment in the plaintiff's favor was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 71 Tex. 723, 2 L.R.A. 766, 10 S. W. 323, the right of a person to whom a telegram announcing the death of his brother and the time appointed for the funeral, to maintain an action against the telegraph company for inexcusable delay in delivering the message, was admitted, but the plaintiff in that case was held not entitled to recover the damages alleged in his complaint, because the language of the despatch was not such as to import any family relationship between himself and the deceased, so as to charge the telegraph company with notice of its urgency and importance.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, supra, in so far as it laid down the doctrine that to warrant a recovery against a telegraph company by a person to whom a death message is sent, and not promptly delivered, the relationship of the addressee and the deceased should appear from the language of the despatch, was overruled in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carter, 85 Tex. 580, 34 Am. St. Rep. 826, 22 S. W. 961, reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 20 S. W. 834, in which the trial court had followed the overruled case.

A judgment against a telegraph company was reversed, and a new trial ordered, in the case of Arial v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. C. 418, 50 S. E. 6, upon the ground that the plaintiff, who had sent messages summoning his father's brothers to the bedside of his dying father, the reply to one of which was negligently delayed in delivery, so that he was uncertain whether his uncle was coming or not, was not entitled to recover damages under the mental anguish statute of South Carolina because the terms of the despatch which had been delayed in delivery were such as to leave it uncertain whether the uncle intended to come or not.

The right of a person to whom a telegram is addressed, and not delivered, or inexcusably delayed in delivery, by the negligence of the telegraph company, has been recognized, and judgments in favor of such persons against the company have been affirmed in a very large number of cases throughout the United States. In some of these cases a right to maintain an action against a telegraph company was given by statute to whosoever might suffer damage by the company's negligence in transmitting and delivering a telegram; in others the right of the person to whom a telegram was addressed, to maintain an action in such circumstances, rested upon general principles; in none of these cases, however, so far as the reports disclose, did the company controvert the abstract right to maintain the suit, but it relied in each upon other grounds of defense.

It is the established doctrine in Texas that damages for mental anguish caused by the failure of a telegraph company to deliver promptly a telegram announcing the mortal illness of a near relative of the person addressed are recoverable in an action by such person against the telegraph company. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. May, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 176, 27 S. W. 760.

In cases where telegrams are sent announcing to the person addressed that a parent or child, husband or wife, brother or sister, is seriously ill, dying, or dead, and calling for the addressee's presence at the bedside of the sick or the funeral of the dead, notice to the company is implied, and the company is held to contemplate that substantial damages will be suffered, and great distress of mind experienced, by the person addressed, if such a telegram is unduly, negligently, and inexcusably delayed in transmission or delivery.

In the following cases this doctrine was applied, and judgments recovered against telegraph companies by recipients of telegrams unduly delayed in delivery were severally affirmed:

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Blackmer, 82 Ark. 526, 102 S. W. 366; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Todd (Ind. App.) 53 N. E. 194; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Newhouse, 6 Ind. App. 422, 33 N. E. 800; Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L.R.A. 72, 57 Am. St. Rep. 294, 62 N. W. 1; Hurlburt v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Iowa, 295, 98 N. W. 794; *Potter v. Western U. Teleg. W. 625; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Parsley (Tex. Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 226.

And in virtually every one of such cases the only damages claimed and recovered were for mental anguish, suffering, or distress.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Boots, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 542, 31 S. W. 825, the alleged delay in delivering a despatch addressed to the plaintiff, announcing that his wife was dying and summoning him to her at once, was only some thirty minutes, but was just sufficient to make him miss a train, and the court affirmed a verdict in his favor, against the contention of the telegraph company that the actual delay was not negligent upon its part.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Todd (Ind. App.) 53 N. E. 194, the person to whom a telegram announcing the death of his father was addressed, and unreasonably delayed in delivery, was permitted to recover damages for mental anguish on the ground that such damages were recoverable where other nominal damage was shown to have been sustained, and the nature of the message was such as to indicate to the telegraph company the probable distress and mental suffering of the recipient, if it were not delivered. As we understand the rule, said the court in reaching this conclusion, it is that where the sender or the addressee of a telegraphic despatch can show himself entitled to nominal damages by reason of the violation of his legal right under the statute providing for special damages, he may recover for mental anguish suffered by him as the effect of a breach of duty, if the message be one which on its face indicates to any person of ordinary intelligence that such injury will result to an average person so wronged.

A very similar result was reached in Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Newhouse, 6 Ind. App. 422, 33 N. E. 800, in an action by a person to whom a despatch had been sent by his daughter, announcing the mortal illness of his mother, and delayed in delivery.

The decisions of this court, said Hoke, J., in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina in Dayvis v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 139 N. C. 79, 51 S. E. 898, have established the principle that the addressee of a telegram, where there has been a wrongful failure to deliver or negligent error in transmitting the message, may, in certain circumstances, recover compensatory damages for mental anguish, where the message is for his benefit or concerns his domestic or social interest, and this independent of any bodily or substantial pecuniary injury; and in that case a judgment recovered by a husband for the failure of a telegraph company to deliver a telegram from his wife, announcing that she had taken the wrong train by mistake and would be delayed a day in reaching him, was affirmed.

Upon the question whether the recipient could maintain an action against a telegraph company for gross negligence in delaying for several days the delivery of a message announcing that his wife was at the point of death, the supreme court of North Carolina in Young v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L.R.A. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, 11 S. E. 1044, adopted the view expressed in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (§ 560), that a telegraph company is responsible for its negligence to a person to whom a message is addressed as well as to the sender, and added that there was ample authority to the same effect, and that, although this was not the English rule, it was stated in several text-books of authority to be the invariable rule in this country.

In McInturf v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 81 Kan. 476, 106 Pac. 282, a judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a married woman, for damages sustained by an unreasonable delay to deliver, and an alteration of the date in, a telegram to her announcing the death of a relative, on account of which she made unnecessarily a fruitless journey, was affirmed. The right of an addressee of a telegram to maintain the action was not challenged, but the controversy was over the question of the right of the plaintiff as a married woman to maintain the action in her own name, the principal loss having been that of her husband in being deprived of the services of his spouse during her absence on the journey.

A judgment in favor of a telegraph company in an action brought by a husband and wife to recover damages for mental anguish sustained in consequence of the negligent delay of the company to deliver a despatch addressed to the wife, announcing the death of her sister, was reversed in Brown v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 85 S. C. 405, 67 S. E. 146, upon the ground that the trial court was in error in directing a verdict for the company upon the ground that the South Carolina statute did not apply to a message deliverable outside the state.

In Wadsworth v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 86 Tenn. 695, 6 Am. St. Rep. 864, 8 S. W. 574, a telegraph company demurred to the declaration of a husband and wife in a suit for negligent and unreasonable delay in delivering two telegrams addressed to the wife, one announcing that her brother was dying and the other his death, upon the ground that no pecuniary or physical injury was alleged, and that mental suffering alone would not sustain the action. The demurrer having been sustained in the first instance, the supreme court on appeal (Lurton, J., and Folkes, J., dissenting), reversed the judgment, and held the suit maintainable. "Clearly," said the court in the majority opinion, "the declaration discloses a cause for some damage, and to this extent it must be conceded the action in sustaining the demurrer was erroneous."

The doctrine of the foregoing cases has been applied to sustain judgments against telegraph companies recovered by persons to whom telegrams negligently delayed in delivery were addressed, announcing illness or death of a grandparent or grandchild, a parent-in-law or child-in-law.

A judgment against a telegraph company for damages due to the failure and negligent delay in delivering a telegram to the plaintiff, from her father announcing that her grandmother was dying, was affirmed in Poulnot v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 69 S. C. 545, 43 S. E. 622.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a person to whom a despatch was sent, announcing the mortal illness of his grandmother, and which was never transmitted at all, was affirmed in Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Blake, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 224, 68 S. W. 526, notwithstanding the contention of the company that the contract had been made in another state, the law of which did not allow damages for mental anguish in such cases.

A judgment against a telegraph company for negligently delaying the delivery of a telegram addressed to the plaintiff, announcing the death of his grandchild, was affirmed in Cobb v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 85 S. C. 430, 67 S. E. 549.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a grandmother who was prevented by the negligent and inexcusable delay of the company in delivering a telegram to her announcing the death, of her grandchild, from seeing the remains and attending the funeral, was affirmed in Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Porterfield (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 850, and a rehearing of the case was afterwards denied. A note by the reporter states that a writ of error was granted by the supreme court, but, at the time of writing this note, the action of the supreme court upon such writ of error, if granted, has not been reported.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Ark. 219, 122 S. W. 489, affirmed a judgment, and denied a rehearing of an appeal, in an action charging negligence in delivering to the plaintiff a telegram from his father-in-law, announcing the death of his mother-in-law and summoning him to attend the funeral at once. The only contest in the case was over the plaintiff's right to recover damages for mental suffering and anguish under the Arkansas statute, in view of the lack of a closer relationship between the plaintiff and the deceased.

The person to whom a telegram was addressed and negligently delayed in delivery was successful in obtaining and holding a judgment against the telegraph company, in Bennett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 128 N. C. 103, 38 S. E. 294, but the only question made was whether his relationship as father-in-law was sufficient to entitle him to recover damages for mental suffering because of inability, consequent upon the delay of the telegraph company, to attend the funeral of his daughter-in-law.

In Herring v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 882, a judgment in favor of the telegraph company in an action by the recipient of a telegram which the company had negligently failed to transmit and deliver, notifying him of the death of his father-in-law, was reversed and a new trial ordered for error on the part of the trial court in instructing the jury.

The entire controversy in Hunter v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 N. C. 458, 47 S. E. 745, was over the right of the plaintiff, the recipient of a telegram announcing the death and time of funeral of his second cousin, to recover damages against the telegraph company for mental suffering on account of its negligence in delay in delivering the message, and not at all over the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action; and a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the telegraph company was affirmed.

IX. Delay and damage,—cause and effect.

To entitle anyone to maintain a suit against a telegraph company for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the inexcusable delay of the company to deliver a telegram, such delay must have been the proximate cause of the damage. There are several cases in which a judgment recovered against a telegraph company, by a person to whom a telegram negligently delayed in delivery was addressed, was reversed because the reviewing court deemed the damages too remote and speculative to be attributed to the delay as their proximate cause. Such decisions necessarily admit the abstract right of the plaintiffs to maintain their actions.

The court in Johnson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 Miss. 58, 89 Am. St. Rep. 584, 29 So. 787, an action by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, to recover damages for failure to deliver it, was of the opinion that the damages sued for were altogether too remote and speculative to be recoverable in such an action. The right of the plaintiff to maintain the action was not challenged.

A judgment against a telegraph company recovered by a woman to whom a telegram had been sent on Sunday announcing the apprehended death of her sister, and which was negligently delayed in delivery, was reversed in Smith v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 72 S. C. 116, 51 S. E. 537, but upon the ground that the evidence adduced upon the trial was not sufficient to establish that the delay in delivering the telegram was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's alleged mental anguish.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Linn, 87 Tex. 7, 47 Am. St. Rep. 58, 26 S. W. 490, reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 895, the action by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, announcing the mortal illness of his sister and asking him to come and bring another sister, was held maintainable, but the damages claimed and recovered in the trial court, notwithstanding their recovery had been affirmed by the court of civil appeals, were deemed by the supreme court to be not the proximate result of the failure of the telegraph company promptly to deliver the message, and therefore too remote to constitute a cause of action.

The delay of a telegraph company in not promptly delivering money sent through its agency to a person who, in consequence of its not being received in time, is ejected from her home for nonpayment of rent, does not entitle the person to whom the despatch was addressed to maintain an action against the telegraph company to recover damages for mental distress, unaccompanied by a physical injury; neither is such an eviction a proximate result of the delay. Stansell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 Fed. 668.

X. Conduct of recipient unaffected by delay.

If, notwithstanding a delay in delivering a telegram, even when that delay has been due to the negligence of the company, the person to whom the telegram is sent is able to do all that he might have done, had the message been delivered with the utmost diligence and promptitude, no legal damage has resulted from the delay, and therefore neither the sender nor the recipient of the despatch has a cause of action.

In each of the following cases, in which the suit was brought by the person to whom the delayed telegram was addressed, it appeared that the plaintiff neither refrained, nor was prevented, from doing aught that he might or would have done, had there been no delay in delivering the despatch; hence, that he had suffered no legal injury by the delay, and therefore was not entitled to recover in the action:

A judgment in favor of the recipient of a telegram announcing the mortal illness of a brother was reversed in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Gulledege, 84 Ark. 501, 106 S. W. 957, because the evidence showed that, while the company had unduly delayed the delivery of the despatch, yet the plaintiff himself received it in time to have reached his brother before the latter's death, and himself unreasonably delayed starting.

A judgment in favor of the telegraph company against the person to whom a telegram was addressed was affirmed in Tharpe v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Ark.) 127 S. W. 730, because the testimony in the case showed that, notwithstanding some delay on the part of the telegraph company in delivering the despatch, its recipient could not, even if he had received it in time, have been present at the funeral of his mother, whose death the message announced, and therefore that the delay in delivering the despatch had not occasioned any legal injury.

A person to whom a telegram is addressed, announcing the dangerous illness of his son, is not entitled to recover damages for mental suffering consequent upon his not seeing his son before death, notwithstanding the negligence of the company in delivering the despatch, if he could not in any event have reached his son in time, if the despatch had been delivered promptly. Howard v. Western U. Tele. Co. 119 Ky. 625, 84 S. W. 764, 86 S. W. 982, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1065.

A judgment in favor of the recipient of a telegram which the company negligently failed to deliver because he lived outside of its free delivery limits, notwithstanding the expense of making special delivery had been guaranteed by the sender, which notified him of a depressed state of the cattle market and advised against shipments of cattle, was reversed in Reynolds v. Western U. Tele. Co. 81 Mo. App. 223, upon the ground that the negligence of the company in delaying delivery did not damage the plaintiff, because he had from other sources fuller and confirmatory information as to the actual state of the market, and shipped his cattle notwithstanding.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of the person to whom a despatch was addressed and negligently delayed in delivery was affirmed in Hughes v. Western U. Tele. Co. 72 S. C. 516, 53 S. E. 107, where the despatch announced the death of the plaintiff's brother, but did not name the time of the funeral, and where, in point of fact, the funeral had been appointed for a time at which the plaintiff could not have attended even if the despatch had been delivered promptly, but where, upon the face of the despatch, it did not appear but that the plaintiff, if he had received the despatch in time, might in all probability have reached his deceased brother's household before the burial.

A judgment against a telegraph company for its negligent failure promptly to deliver to the plaintiff a telegram announcing that her sister was dying was reversed in Roberts v. Western U. Tele. Co. 73 S. C. 520, 114 Am. St. Rep. 100, 53 S. E. 985, because the court was held to have erroneously refused a request by the telegraph company to instruct the jury that if the jury found that the plaintiff had no intention of attending the funeral of her sister, even if she had been informed in time to have enabled her to do so, she had suffered no damage from the delay, and the verdict should be for the company; the court being of the opinion that upon the facts disclosed it would have been impossible for the plaintiff to have reached her sister before death, even if the telegram had been promptly delivered, and if she had no intention of attending the funeral, she was not injured by the delay.

The court, while reversing the judgment in Cumberland Teleph. Co. v. Brown, 104 Tenn. 56, 50 L.R.A. 277, 78 Am. St. Rep. 906, 55 S. W. 155, upon the ground that the trial court erred in refusing to charge, as requested by the company, that the plaintiff must establish by the evidence his intention and ability to be present at his daughter's bedside before her death, where the despatch announced her mortal illness, in case it had been promptly delivered, conceded the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action.

In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Hendricks, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 63 S. W. 341, a judgment recovered by a father against a telegraph company for negligence and delay in delivering a despatch announcing that his son was dying was reversed upon the ground that the court, in charging the jury, authorized it to find a verdict for damages because the plaintiff had failed to reach the presence of his son before death, when the evidence showed that he could not have reached him in time if the despatch had been delivered with the utmost promptitude. The error was avoided upon a second trial of the case, and a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the company was affirmed on the second appeal, in 29 Tex. Civ. App. 413, 68 S. W. 720.

The court, in Western U. Tele. Co. v. McFadden, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 582, 75 S. W. 352, reversed a judgment in favor of the person to whom a telegram was sent, announcing the illness of her daughter and requesting her to call the sender by telephone, where the facts showed that the despatch had been negligently delayed in delivery, but that, notwithstanding, the plaintiff had employed the telephone and summoned her daughter home, upon the ground that there was nothing in the wording of the despatch to sustain a claim for damages for mental suffering in the plaintiff's not being able to go and bring her daughter.

A person who is not prevented from attending the funeral of her sister by the delay of a telegraph company in delivering a telegram to her announcing the sister's death, but who is distressed only for the time requisite to procure a postponement of the funeral so as to enable her to be present, is not entitled to maintain an action for damages against the telegraph company on account of its delay. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Reed, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 84 S. W. 296.

A judgment against a telegraph company for failure promptly to deliver a message announcing the death of a brother of the plaintiff's wife was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bell, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 462, 92 S. W. 1036, because it did not appear to have been alleged in the petition, neither was it proved, that if the message had been promptly delivered, the wife not only could but would have journeyed to the place of her brother's funeral and reached it in time, which allegation and proof the court deemed essential to the making out of the cause of action.

Where a person to whom a telegram announcing the mortal illness of her father is sent and delayed in delivery would not have had the time and opportunity to be present at her father's death and attend his funeral, if the telegram had been delivered with the utmost promptitude, she sustains no damage from the delay, and therefore is not entitled to recover substantial damages for mental anguish and distress upon the theory that the funeral would have been postponed if the despatch had been delivered in time. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Motley (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 51.

If, in an action against a telegraph company by a person to whom a telegram has been sent, announcing the death of his mother, and unreasonably and inexcusably delayed in delivery, it is established that the recipient would not, had the despatch been delivered promptly, have been able to reach the place where the funeral was held, he is not entitled to recover damages for mental suffering and distress because of the delay in delivering the despatch, notwithstanding his testimony to the effect that a prompt delivery of the telegram would have enabled him to procure a postponement of the funeral. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stone (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 144.

When a telegram to a father of a dying child simply announcing a change for the worse in her condition was unreasonably delayed in delivery, but notwithstanding such delay he acquired knowledge from other sources which enabled him to be present at the funeral, he was held not to be entitled to recover damages from the telegraph company on account of such delay, upon the ground that he was unable by reason thereof to take with him his wife and daughter. Weatherford, M. W. & N. W. R. Co. v. Seals (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 841.

A judgment in favor of a father against a telegraph company for its negligent delay in delivering a telegram to him announcing the impending death of his child, so that he was unable to be present and attend the funeral, was affirmed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waller (Tex. Civ. App.) 47 S. W. 396, despite the contention of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

company, first, that the plaintiff did not have the money to pay his railroad passage, and, second, that he could not have reached the place of funeral in time to attend it, if the despatch had been promptly delivered, where the testimony showed that a debtor owed him money and that the funeral was actually postponed to await the arrival of the train upon which he could have traveled, had the despatch been delivered to him promptly.

A prima facie case is made out by the plaintiff in an action against a telegraph company for damages in delaying the delivery of a message announcing the mortal illness and expected death of his father, by proof that he could and would have reached his father's home in time for the funeral, on the second day after the message was sent, if it had been delivered promptly, and therefore it is prejudicial error in such a case for a trial court to direct a verdict for the telegraph company. Lawrence v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 26.

The principal contention relied upon by the defendant to reverse a judgment against it in favor of a person to whom a telephone call was sent, and not transmitted or delivered until after an inexcusable and negligent delay, where the message announced the dying condition of the plaintiff's father and requested his presence, was that the plaintiff, when he got the message, might have proceeded by wagon, or taken an earlier freight train instead of the train that he did take, and thus have reached his father before he became unconscious; but the court held the contention not sufficient to overturn the judgment, because the plaintiff was entirely ignorant concerning the freight train, and the ill health of his wife made it imprudent and dangerous to proceed by wagon. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Taylor, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 79, 63 S. W. 1076.

XI. Failure to establish inexcusable delay.

If a delay in delivering a telegram was not due to any negligence of the telegraph company, or was excusable, no recovery may be had against such company for damages sustained by reason of such delay, irrespective of whether the injured plaintiff was the sender of the message or the person to whom it was addressed.

In each of the following cases, in which suit was brought by the person to whom a delayed telegram was sent, the company successfully controverted the charge of negligence, and excused the delay, without contesting the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action:

The contest in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Merrill, 144 Ala. 618, 113 Am. St. Rep. 66, 39 So. 121, was not over the right of the person to whom a telegram was addressed to recover of the telegraph company upon suffering damage from the failure promptly to deliver, but was entirely taken up with the question as to whether or not, in the circumstances disclosed, the company had really inexcusably delayed transmission and delivery as a question of fact.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ford, 77 Ark. 531, 92 S. W. 528, a judgment in favor of the recipient of a telegram delayed in delivery was affirmed, but the controversy was waged over the question of whether or not the delay was excusable in consequence of the arrival of the despatch at the receiving office on New Year's Day, when the regulations of the company provided for the suspension of the business of delivery; and, while the court held that the regulation was a reasonable one, the company was denied the advantage of it, for failure to permit its request for an instruction in such form as clearly to present the question.

A judgment in favor of the person to whom a telegram was addressed was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crenshaw (Ark.) 125 S. W. 420, upon the ground that the evidence failed to establish any negligence on the part of the company in delivering the message.

The right of the person to whom a telegram is addressed to maintain an action against the telegraph company for delay in delivering the despatch was conceded in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Van Cleave, 107 Ky. 464, 92 Am. St. Rep. 366, 54 S. W. 827, but the plaintiff was defeated in that case because the court was of the opinion that, as a matter of law, there had been no delay in the delivery of the particular despatch.

The right of a person to whom a telegram was addressed announcing the death of her daughter and the time appointed for the funeral, to maintain an action for damages against the telegraph company in case of inexcusable delay in delivering the despatch, until too late for the recipient to attend the funeral, was not contested in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cross, 116 Ky. 5, 74 S. W. 1038, 76 S. W. 162, but the plaintiff in that case was defeated upon the ground that the company had used proper diligence to deliver the despatch, and was not chargeable with any negligence.

A judgment against a telegraph company for damages for alleged negligence in failing to deliver a telegram, recovered by the person to whom a message was addressed informing him of the death of his father, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cox, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 941, 96 S. W. 594, upon the ground that negligence in delivery had not been proved, because no evidence was submitted respecting the time at which the company received the message.

The entire controversy in Harper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 92 Mo. App. 364, was over the question as to whether the company was liable in damages for its failure to deliver a despatch to the person to whom it was addressed, at a place specially designated by him for such delivery, when the despatch was addressed by the sender to and promptly delivered at another place. The right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, if the facts were as contended by him, was not controverted.

In Cranford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 138 N. C. 162, 50 S. E. 585, a joint action by the recipient of a despatch and his wife, the plaintiffs were defeated in their action, because they failed to make out a case of negligence against the company.

The trial court dismissed, upon the ground that there was no evidence of actionable negligence, and action by the person to whom a telegram was addressed against the telegraph company for delay in delivering it, where the message announced the death of his brother, in Woods v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 N. C. 1, 128 Am. St. Rep. 581, 61 S. E. 653; but this was held to be error, and the judgment was reversed upon appeal and a new trial ordered.

In Sweet v. Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. 22 R. I. 344, 53 L.R.A. 732, 47 Atl. 881, the plaintiff was the person to whom a telegram was addressed, and the issue was upon the fact of negligent delay in delivering the despatch, which arrived at the terminal office late at night after closing hours, and was not delivered until the next morning. The court held that, as a matter of law, there was no negligent delay on the part of the company, and hence no cause of action.

The defense of a telegraph company to an action by the addressee of a despatch announcing the death and time of funeral of his mother, which was delayed in transmission and delivery until too late to enable the plaintiff to attend the funeral, was based altogether upon the theory that such delay as there was had been caused by the act of God in grounding the wires through a falling tree; but the judgment was affirmed upon the ground that the evidence did not show that the act of God was the sole cause of the proved delay. Fail v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 80 S. C. 207, 60 S. E. 697, rehearing denied in 80 S. C. 213, 61 S. E. 258.

A judgment in favor of a telegraph company, dismissing the action of the person to whom a despatch was addressed and delayed for ten days in delivery, was affirmed in Lewis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 84 S. C. 54, 65 S. E. 941, upon the ground that the addressee, a married woman, was named in the despatch by her individual Christian name and was only known by the name of her husband, so that the delay was held excusable.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wingate, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 394, 25 S. W. 439, a person to whom a telegram was addressed announcing the death of his mother was held entitled to maintain an action against the telegraph company for delay, but was denied a recovery in that particular case, because the lapse of time between the reception of the despatch and its delivery was held to be excusable, being simply during the hours of the night.

It is not an unreasonable delay, which affords a right of action against a telegraph company, to hold a telegram sent as a night message and received after office hours until the next morning. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. DeJarles, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 109, 27 S. W. 792.

The right of the person to whom telegrams were sent announcing the illness and death of his sister, to maintain an action against the telegraph company for inexcusable delay in delivering the messages, was recognized in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. DeJarles, supra, but the plaintiff in that case was held not entitled to recover, because, as a matter of law, there had been no negligent delay in delivering the despatches.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Terrell, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 30 S. W. 70, despatches announcing the serious illness of the plaintiff's daughter failed promptly to reach the plaintiff, but the telegraph company was held not liable, because the messages were in fact delivered promptly to the person in whose care they had been addressed.

The only contention made by the telegraph company against the judgment in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Gahan, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 657, 44 S. W. 933, was based upon the theory that it had been excused by the sender of the message from making any particular effort to find the addressee and deliver the despatch, by a statement at its receiving office made by the sender to the effect that the addressee might not be at the place to which the despatch was sent, because the family had not heard from him for some time.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a plaintiff to whom was addressed a telegram announcing the death of his mother, which he did not receive in time to attend her funeral, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McConico, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 610, 66 S. W. 592, upon the ground that the company was not guilty of any negligent and inexcusable delay, because the despatch arrived on Sunday when its receiving office was closed about half past one, and was delivered within fifteen or twenty minutes after it reopened at four o'clock in the afternoon.

A telegraph company is not chargeable with delay or negligence in delivering a despatch addressed in care of a person other than the one for whom it is intended, where it promptly tenders a delivery to such person and he refuses to receive it. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 318.

In Hargrave v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 687, the parents were defeated in an action against the company upon the ground of its delay in delivering a despatch announcing the death of their daughter, upon the ground that the facts showed proper and diligent effort on the part of the company to find the addressee and deliver the despatch, and that, as a matter of law, the company was not negligent.

A telegraph company which promptly delivers at the place where it is addressed a message announcing the very serious illness of the mother of the person to whom it is addressed is not negligent and not liable in an action by the addressee simply because no inquiry was made by the messenger or other persons as to the then present whereabouts and accessibility of the addressee, he being absent from the place to which the telegram was sent. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Redinger (Tex. Civ. App.) 63 S. W. 156.

In Davis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 46 W. Va. 48, 32 S. E. 1026, the court reversed a judgment against a telegraph company, recovered by a plaintiff to whom a telegram summoning him to the funeral of his mother had been addressed and delayed in delivery, upon the ground that the evidence showed the delay to be simply that occasioned by the observance of reasonable office hours on the part of the telegraph company at its terminal office, and therefore it was not negligently dilatory, and also, upon the ground that damages were simply those for mental suffering and distress, which in that state did not afford a cause of action when unaccompanied by other injury, physical or pecuniary.

Ross v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 28 C. C. A. 564, 52 U. S. App. 290, 81 Fed. 676, was a unique case. It was an action brought by a widow against the telegraph company to recover damages because of its failure to deliver promptly to her deceased husband a message sent to him warning him that four men were in pursuit of him with the purpose of killing him. The message was not promptly delivered, because the operator at the terminal office, who was also the mayor of the town, received at the same time a message from a judge asking him not to permit the deceased to get away, and assumed that deceased had been guilty of some crime and should be arrested. The court held that under the facts of the case negligence on the part of the company as a matter of law was not established, and that the death of the plaintiff's husband could not be said to be the proximate result of the company's failure to deliver the message of warning.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Simms, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 32, 69 S. W. 464, in an action by the person to whom a despatch was sent calling her to the deathbed of her mother, reversed a judgment against the company, upon the ground that the evidence showed no negligence on its part in transmitting and delivering the despatch.

The telegraph company is not liable in damages to the person to whom a death message is addressed in care of another, for a delay in delivering it to the person in whose care it is sent, where it was agreed that such person was merely named for the purpose of enabling the company at the terminal office to ascertain the real address of the principal, which was known to be outside of the free delivery limits of the office, and for which a special delivery fee was charged, but neither paid nor tendered.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bryant, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 442, 80 S. W. 406.

When the addressee of a telegram announcing the death of her son resides outside of the free delivery limits of the terminal office, and no contract is made for the delivery of the despatch beyond such limits, and when such despatch merely announces the death, no sufficient case is made against the telegraph company of negligence in delaying the delivery, and no notice to it can be implied that the addressee would and could have attended the funeral at another and different place from that which the telegram was sent. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ayers, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 627, 93 S. W. 199.

XII. The quantum of damages.

There are numerous decisions in which a judgment recovered against a telegraph company by a person to whom a telegram was sent, and not delivered, or delayed in delivery, through the negligence of the company to the plaintiff's damage, has been reversed or reduced because the court of review deemed the amount of recovery too large. Every such case, of course, recognizes and upholds the plaintiff's right to maintain the action and to recover some damages, more or less, from the company. In the cases of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Weniski, 84 Ark. 457, 106 S. W. 486; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cain, 14 Ind. App. 115, 42 N. E. 655; and Newport News & M. Valley R. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Tenn. 694, 22 S. W. 737, judgments against telegraph companies in favor of persons to whom telegrams were sent and negligently delayed in delivery were reversed for awarding excessive damages.

In Bowers v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 N. C. 504, 47 S. E. 597, the person to whom a business telegram was addressed had recovered a judgment against the telegraph company for its negligence in delivering the despatch, but the judgment was reversed upon the ground that it included damages for mental suffering and distress, not recoverable in such a case.

The only controversy in the case of Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 143 N. C. 147, 55 S. E. 435, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 476, brought by the recipient of a telegram negligently delayed in delivery, related to the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and a new trial was ordered because damages not recoverable had been allowed.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a woman who had been prevented by the negligent delay in delivering a despatch announcing the death and time of funeral of her sister, from attending the funeral, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Thompson, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 609, 45 S. W. 429, upon the ground that the verdict included damages for both mental and physical suffering, and there was no testimony in the record of any physical injury.

v. Frith, 105 Tenn. 167, 58 S. W. 118, was over the amount of damages recoverable against the telegraph company for its gross and inexcusable negligence in delivering to the plaintiff a telegram announcing the sudden death of his child at a distant but accessible place, and the court reduced the amount of the verdict nearly one half, but affirmed the judgment for the reduced amount.

A recovery by the person to whom a despatch was sent announcing the serious illness of his wife's father, and which was delayed so that death occurred before he could be reached, was affirmed, after striking out certain improper items of damage, and a rehearing was denied, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jobe, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 403, 409, 25 S. W. 168, 1036.

A judgment against a telegraph company awarding damages to a married woman for the failure promptly to deliver a second despatch announcing the death of her brother from a contagious disease, where she had, in response to an earlier message, journeyed to the place of her brother's death, was modified by striking out certain items of damage claimed, and affirmed as to the balance, and a motion for a rehearing was denied, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Murray, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 207, 68 S. W. 549.

Upon a second trial in the case of Arkansas & L. R. Co. v. Stroude, 77 Ark. 109, 113 Am. St. Rep. 130, 91 S. W. 18, the judgment recovered on the first trial having been reversed for error in instructing the jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict of the jury assessing his damages at $500, upon which judgment was entered by the court for the amount of the verdict plus interest from the date of the despatch, and upon a second appeal, 82 Ark. 117, 100 S. W. 760, that judgment was modified by striking out the allowance of interest, and in other respects was affirmed.

XIII. Errors in the conduct of trials.

The right of persons to whom telegrams are addressed, and not delivered, or inexcusably delayed in delivery, to maintain actions for damages against the telegraph company, has been recognized in a great number of cases in the United States, in which, however, the judgments against the telegraph companies have been reversed either for deficiencies in the pleadings, errors in the reception or exclusion of evidence, or in the instructions of the trial courts to the juries.

A judgment recovered by the person to whom a telegram was addressed, against a telegraph company, for failure promptly to deliver the despatch, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McNair, 120 Ala. 99, 23 So. 801, for error on the part of the trial court in omitting to charge, upon request, upon the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, the general right of the plaintiff to recover, if not contributorily negligent, being conceded.

A judgment in favor of a person to whom a telegram was sent, against the telegraph company, for failure to deliver the message, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Prevatt, 149 Ala. 617, 43 So. 106, for the refusal of the trial court to charge certain propositions as requested by the defendant company. The controversy was not over the right of an addressee of a telegram to recover, but whether the relation of the plaintiff in the particular case entitled him to recover for mental suffering, and whether or not the action was barred under one of the conditions printed upon the back of the message. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Heathcoat, 149 Ala. 623, 43 So. 117.

In Arkansas & L. R. Co. v. Stroude, 77 Ark. 109, 113 Am. St. Rep. 130, 91 S. W. 18, the action was brought by a husband against a railroad company operating a telegraph line, for wanton and negligent delay in delivering a despatch sent him by a relative announcing the mortal illness of his wife, and grounded upon a statute (act of March 7, 1903, Kirby's Dig. § 7947) enacted by the legislature of Arkansas after the decision of the court in Peay v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 Ark. 538, 39 L.R.A. 463, 43 S. W. 965, authorizing recoveries to be had in such actions for mental anguish and suffering unaccompanied by bodily injury or pecuniary loss. The question as to the right of the person to whom a telegram was addressed to recover damages on account of delay in delivering it was not debated, but a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed for errors of the trial court in instructing the jury.

A judgment recovered against a telegraph company by the person to whom a telegram was addressed and unreasonably delayed in delivery was reversed in Hendershot v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 106 Iowa, 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 313, 76 N. E. 828, for error of the trial court in instructing the jury. The despatch announced the dangerous illness of a valuable horse in charge of the plaintiff's agent, and called for the attendance of the plaintiff and a skilled veterinary surgeon. In consequence of the delay in delivery of the despatch, the ailment of the horse had gained headway, so that in spite of the treatment he died; and the action was brought to recover its value. The right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, and the delay of the telegraph company to deliver the despatch, were not disputed. The contest was over the question as to whether the delay was the proximate cause of the death of the horse.

Errors in the instruction of the trial court to the jury upon the question of damages brought about a reversal of a judgment in favor of the persons to whom a telegram announcing a shipment of live stock was addressed and delayed in delivery, against the telegraph company, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lehman, 106 Md. 318, 67 Atl. 241, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 736.

The person to whom a telegram was addressed, but not delivered, was defeated in his action, in Macpherson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 20 Jones & S. 232, because he had failed to allege payment or tender of the toll for transmitting the despatch, or a waiver of it in the contract between the parties.

Error in the admission of evidence was the ground of a reversal of a judgment recovered against a telegraph company, by a husband to whom a despatch was sent announcing the serious illness of his wife, in Hamrick v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 140 N. C. 151, 52 S. E. 232.

A judgment against a telegraph company upon a second trial, after a reversal at first because of errors in the charge of the trial judge, in favor of the person to whom a telegram was addressed announcing the death of his father, was affirmed in Harrison v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 75 C. S. 267, 55 S. E. 450.

The contest made by the telegraph company in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waller, 96 Tex. 589, 97 Am. St. Rep. 936, 74 S. W. 751, against its liability to the plaintiff for negligent failure to deliver a message addressed to him announcing that his mother was dying, was entirely over the question of the admissibility of testimony concerning the requests and inquiries of the dying woman for the presence of the plaintiff, her son, and the court held this evidence inadmissible, and accordingly reversed the judgment.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lovett, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 84, 58 S. W. 204, reversed a judgment recovered by a man to whom a telegram had been sent announcing the very serious illness and expected death of his child, upon the ground that, by the testimony and charge to the jury, there had erroneously been included in the damages the mental suffering of his wife on account of his absence when the child died.

The court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waller, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 84 S. W. 695, after affirming a judgment in favor of the person to whom a message was addressed announcing the mortal illness of his mother, and which did not reach him in time to enable him to be present with his mother during the last hours of her life, on a rehearing reversed the judgment, and remanded the case for a new trial, upon the ground that testimony showing the efforts made by the company's messenger to deliver the despatch had been erroneously excluded.

A judgment against a telegraph company for negligent delay in delivering a message to a sister announcing the fatal shooting of her brother was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Campbell, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 204, 91 S. W. 312, for error on the part of the trial court in instructing the jury upon conflicting testimony respecting the time when the company received the message for transmission.

A judgment against a telegraph company recovered by a father for damages suffered by him because of his inability to reach the bedside of his dying child prior to its death, due to the negligent delay of the company in delivering the message, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. De-Andrea, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 395, 100 S. W. 977, for prejudicial error on the part of the trial court in giving its instructions to the jury.

The right of a person to whom a telegram was sent announcing the dangerous illness of her sister, to maintain an action against the telegraph company for damages for failure promptly to deliver the message, was conceded in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Neel (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 661, but the judgment in her favor was reversed on account of error in the trial court in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by the company.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of a husband to whom a message had been sent announcing the mortal illness of his wife, and so long delayed in delivery that he was unable to be present and talk with her before she died, was reversed in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stacy (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 100, upon the ground that, inasmuch as the evidence showed a lapse of the dying woman into unconsciousness, it was error on the part of the court to refuse a request to charge that if she was conscious when her husband arrived, he was not entitled to recover damages.

The person to whom a telegram was addressed asking a question as to the number of cattle he had, and which message was obviously a business one, was held in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Williford, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 574, 22 S. W. 244, entitled to maintain an action against the telegraph company for damages consequent upon inexcusable delay in delivering the despatch; but the judgment in his favor was reversed for error in the admission of proof of certain items of damage which the court held were not recoverable.

A judgment against a telegraph company in favor of the person to whom the despatch was addressed, for negligent failure seasonably to deliver a message announcing the mortal illness of his mother, was reversed in Hellams v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12, upon the ground of error in the instructions of the trial court to the jury.

In Mott v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 142 N. C. 532, 55 S. E. 363, a judgment against the company in favor of the recipient of a despatch negligently delayed in delivery was affirmed. The company's brief in that case relied for reversal solely upon exceptions to the trial judge's charge, in which the court held there was no error.

XIV. Conclusion.

It is indisputable that anybody may maintain an action upon a contract he has made, either in person or by an agent, to recover damages from the other contracting party, upon the latter's breach of it. A contract accurately to transmit and diligently to deliver a telegram affords no exception to this rule. The conclusion therefore is incontrovertible that when a contractual relation existed arising directly or indirectly between the telegram company and the person to whom by its agency a telegram was sent, both in England and the United States, such person, if he has sustained a legal damage by the negligence of the company either in failing to deliver the message to him or inexcusably delaying to do so promptly, may maintain suit against the company to recover such damage, provided it was the proximate result of the company's conduct, and was contemplated at the inception as a probable consequence of a breach of the contract to transmit and deliver the despatch. The English courts and those which follow them decline to go any further. The principle that one for whose express benefit others have knowingly and intentionally made a contract may recover from the party in default damages that he may suffer by its breach has obtained the widest possible acceptance in English and American jurisprudence. It may be asserted with confidence that such principle applies to a contract between the sender of a telegram and the telegraph company he employs to transmit and deliver the message, and will support an action by the person addressed, if he comes fairly and clearly within the principle.

The doctrine is well established and widely approved in the United States that a public service corporation, holding a public franchise, organized for private profit and operating a virtual monopoly in its field, is charged with the duty to serve the public, and is liable to whosoever of the public may suffer damage in consequence of its neglect or violation of that duty. That doctrine has been invoked and held to sustain the right of action of a person to whom a telegram has been sent, against a telegraph company which has failed in its obligation faithfully and diligently to transmit and deliver the message. It is difficult to see any logical ground upon which a telegraph company should be made an exception among public service corporations, and be immune from the consequences of its negligence in the stated circumstances.

The question of the nature of the damages for which the addressee may recover is one not falling within the purview of this note. It is a question free from difficulty when the damages are merely pecuniary losses of business transactions, easily ascertainable and referable to the delay in delivering the telegram. In every such case the delay being proved and being inexcusable, the loss being definite and attributable to such delay, and the suit being technically correct in form and conduct, judgment follows. When, however, sentiment alone is involved, and the injury done, though real, is intangible, the courts are hopelessly divided over the right to maintain the action. In several states the legislature with more or less success has endeavored to confer or make certain the right of action by statute. It is not needful to add aught to the very many citations above of cases in point upon this branch of the subject. J. B. G.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

JESSIE E. THOMPSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

CHARLES N. THOMPSON.

(218 U. S. 611, 54 L. ed. 1180, 31 Sup. Ct.
Rep. 111.)Husband and wife — actions between — assault.

The common-law relation between husband and wife was not so far modified as to give the wife a right of action to recover damages from her husband for an assault and battery committed by him upon her person by a statute authorizing married women "to sue separately for the recovery, security, or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried."

(Mr. Justice Harlan, Mr. Justice Holmes, and Mr. Justice Hughes dissent.)

(December 12, 1910.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court dismissing an action brought to recover damages for an assault and battery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Right of wife to sue husband for personal tort.

The earlier cases on this question are gathered in a note to Strom v. Strom, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 191. Since the date of that note, aside from THOMPSON v. THOMPSON, but few cases of importance have been found.

A case of recent date is Sykes v. Speer (Tex. Civ. App.) 112 S. W. 422, where it was held, following Nickerson v. Nickerson, 65 Tex. 281, that a wife cannot sue her husband for torts committed against her person while the marriage relation existed. The court said: "The reason for this holding is that there is no liability, not merely that the wife is incapable of maintaining an action against her husband; for even if she should be divorced on the next day after the injuries were inflicted, and even if the result of the injuries should be perpetuated long after the time of their infliction and after her rights as a feme sole had been fully restored, still she would not be allowed a recovery for such injuries. The adjudications which sustain this view place their holdings upon public policy, which refuses to permit any liability for such conduct on the part of the husband committed under such conditions. While the law may and does provide for a criminal prosecution for such violence toward the wife, still there can be no civil liability. It would seem to the writer that if a husband can be held responsible criminally for an unjustifiable assault upon one whom the law has placed under his care and protection, and who has for his sake surrendered so many of her civil rights and given up the legal status which she otherwise might sustain, certainly the same considerations of policy would permit her to recover compensation for damages which his brutality may have inflicted upon her, when sought in a proceeding after the dissolution of the marriage relation. But the holdings of the courts which we are compelled to follow have adjudged otherwise, and our duty is plain."

held that a woman who is in domestic service, and who, because of her husband's malicious prosecution and false imprisonment of her, loses her situation, has no right of action for damages against him therefor, since such action cannot be regarded in any sense as an action for the protection and security of property.

That in Scotland a husband or a wife cannot sue the other for slander seems, according to Butterworth's Digest, vol. 2, p. 163, to have been held in Young v. Young (1903) 5 F. 330—Ct. of Sess.

Another case which may be added here, although also not strictly within the scope of this note, is Decker v. Keddy, 79 C. C. A. 305, 148 Fed. 681, holding that a wife, whether divorced or not, cannot maintain an action for damages against her husband for his failure to supply her during the married relation with the necessities of life. The court said: "It is true that the statutes of Alaska, as do those of many of the states, remove certain disabilities which at common law attend the wife during her coverture, and declare that neither the husband nor the wife shall have an interest in the property of the other, provide that should either obtain the possession of the property of the other the latter may maintain an action therefor in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were unmarried, and make further provision that neither shall be liable for the other's debts. Such statutes do not mean that the husband is answerable to the wife in damages for failure to supply her with the necessities of life, or for any other act or failure of duty connected with or arising from the marital relation, and it has never been so held. Such a right of action, it is enough to say, has not been conferred by the statutes of Alaska, is wholly at variance with the theory of the marital relation, and is unknown to English or American jurisprudence."

The husband's right to sue wife for personal tort is discussed in a note to Peters v. Peters, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 699.

For right of wife to sue husband on contract, see note to Mathewson v. Mathewson, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 611.

G. V.

Mr. William M. Lewin, for plaintiff in error:

Prior to the enactment of the District of Columbia Code, it was essentially and in its nature a tort for a man to assault his wife. The effect of the provisions of the Code with respect to her right to sue is to remove a common-law obstacle to the remedy.

Stewart v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 168 U. S. 445, 42 L. ed. 537, 538, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105.

These provisions will be literally construed, for it is the duty of every state to provide, in the administration of justice, for the redress of private wrongs; if there be a civil right, there must be a legal remedy.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Humes, 115 U. S. 512, 521, 29 L. ed. 463, 466, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110; Bank of United States v. Owens, 2 Pet. 537, 539, 7 L. ed. 511, 512.

And protection against tort is as necessary as the enforcement of contract.

Wills v. Jones, 13 App. D. C. 497.

As redress cannot be obtained in equity, because of the essential character of the case, the remedy must be by a suit at law.

Van Norden v. Morton, 99 U. S. 378, 380, 25 L. ed. 453, 454.

The reasoning of the New York case upon which the court of appeals relies has long since been repudiated.

A change in phraseology creates a presumption of a change in intent; and no word of the change should be held insignificant.

Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 190, 49 L. ed. 147, 152, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9; Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 115, 116, 25 L. ed. 783, 784.

And now she may sue him, even in tort; for that construction will be followed which commends itself to the judgment of the court.

Messrs. A. E. L. Leckie, Creed M. Fulton, Joseph W. Cox, and John A. Kratz, Jr., for defendant in error:

Statutes enabling the wife to sue and be sued as a feme sole do not authorize either husband or wife to bring an action against the other.

In some of the states, actions are allowed by the wife against the husband in cases of wrongs done her property, but it is believed that in most such instances where such actions have been allowed they are expressly authorized by the statute.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a single question, which is involved in the construction of the statutes governing the District of Columbia. That question is, Under that statute may a wife bring an action to recover damages for an assault and battery upon her person by the husband?

The declaration of the plaintiff is in the ordinary form, and in seven counts charges divers assaults upon her person by her husband, the defendant, for which the wife seeks to recover damages in the sum of $70,000. An issue of law being made by demurrer to the defendant's pleas, the supreme court of the District of Columbia held that such action would not lie under the statute. Upon writ of error to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, the judgment of the supreme court was affirmed. 31 App. D. C. 557, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 879.

At the common law the husband and wife were regarded as one,—the legal existence of the wife during coverture being merged in that of the husband; and, generally speaking, the wife was incapable of making contracts, or acquiring property, or disposing of the same without her husband's consent. They could not enter into contracts with each other, nor were they liable for torts committed by one against the other. In pursuance of a more liberal policy in favor of the wife, statutes have been passed in many of the states looking to the relief of a married woman from the disabilities imposed upon her as a feme covert by the common law. Under these laws she has been empowered to control and dispose of her own property free from the constraint of the husband, in many instances to carry on trade and business, and to deal with third persons as though she were a single woman. The wife has further been enabled by the passage of such statutes to sue for trespass upon her rights in property, and to protect the security of her person against the wrongs and assaults of others.

It is unnecessary to review these statutes in detail. Their obvious purpose is, in some respects, to treat the wife as a feme sole, and to a large extent to alter the common-law theory of the unity of husband and wife. These statutes, passed in pursuance of the general policy of emancipation of the wife from the husband's control, differ in terms, and are to be construed with a view to effectuate the legislative purpose which led to their enactment.

It is insisted that the Code of the District of Columbia has gone so far in the direction of modifying the common-law relation of husband and wife as to give to her an action against him for torts committed by him upon her person or property. The answer to this contention depends upon a construction of § 1155 of the District of Columbia Code. [31 Stat. at L. 1374, chap. 854.] That section provides:

"Sec. 1155. Power of wife to trade and to sue and be sued.—Married women shall have power to engage in any business, and to contract, whether engaged in business or not, and to sue separately upon their contracts, and also to sue separately for the recovery, security, or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried; contracts may also be made with them, and they may also be sued separately upon their contracts, whether made before or during marriage, and for wrongs independent of contract, committed by them before or during their marriage, as fully as if they were unmarried; and upon judgments recovered against them execution may be issued as if they were unmarried; nor shall any husband be liable upon any contract made by his wife in her own name and upon her own responsibility, nor for any tort committed separately by her out of his presence, without his participation or sanction: Provided, That no married woman shall have power to make any contract as surety or guarantor, or as accommodation drawer, acceptor, maker, or indorser."

In construing a statute the courts are to have in mind the old law and the change intended to be effected by the passage of the new. Reading this section, it is apparent that its purposes, among others, were to enable a married woman to engage in business and to make contracts free from the intervention or control of the husband, and to maintain actions separately for the recovery, security, and protection of her property. At the common law, with certain exceptions, not necessary to notice in this connection, the wife could not maintain an action at law except she be joined by her husband. Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 589, 16 L. ed. 228, 228. For injuries suffered by the wife in her person or property, such as would give rise to a cause of action in favor of a feme sole, a suit could be instituted only in the joint name of herself and husband. 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 472, and cases cited in the note.

By this District of Columbia statute the common law was changed, and, in view of the additional rights conferred upon married women in § 1155 and other sections of the Code, she is given the right to sue separately for redress of wrongs concerning the same. That this was the purpose of the statute, when attention is given to the very question under consideration, is apparent from the consideration of its terms. Married woman are authorized to sue separately for "the recovery, security, or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried." That is, the limitation upon her right of action imposed in the requirement of the common law that the husband should join her was removed by the statute, and she was permitted to recover separately for such torts, as freely as if she were still unmarried. The statute was not intended to give a right of action as against the husband, but to allow the wife, in her own name, to maintain actions of tort which, at common law, must be brought in the joint names of herself and husband.

This construction we think is obvious from a reading of the statute in the light of the purpose sought to be accomplished. It gives a reasonable effect to the terms used, and accomplishes, as we believe, the legislative intent, which is the primary object of all construction of statutes.

It is suggested that the liberal construction insisted for in behalf of the plaintiff in error in this case might well be given, in view of the legislative intent to provide remedies for grievous wrongs to the wife; and an instance is suggested in the wrong to a wife rendered unable to follow the avocation of a seamstress by a cruel assault which might destroy the use of hand or arm; and the justice is suggested of giving a remedy to an artist who might be maimed and suffer great pecuniary damages as the result of injuries inflicted by a brutal husband.

Apart from the consideration that the perpetration of such atrocious wrongs affords adequate grounds for relief under the statutes of divorce and alimony, this construction would, at the same time, open the doors of the courts to accusations of all sorts of one spouse against the other, and bring into public notice complaints for assault, slander, and libel, and alleged injuries to property of the one or the other, by husband against wife, or wife against husband. Whether the exercise of such jurisdiction would be promotive of the public welfare and domestic harmony is at least a debatable question. The possible evils of such legislation might well make the lawmaking power hesitate to enact it. But these and kindred considerations are addressed to the legislative, not the judicial, branch of the government. In cases like the present, interpretation of the law is the only function of the courts.

An examination of this class of legislation will show that it has gone much further in the direction of giving rights to the wife in the management and control of her separate property than it has in giving rights of action directly against the husband. In no act called to our attention has the right of the wife been carried to the extent of opening the courts to complaints of the character of the one here involved.

It must be presumed that the legislators who enacted this statute were familiar with the long-established policy of the common law, and were not unmindful of the radical changes in the policy of centuries which such legislation as is here suggested would bring about. Conceding it to be within the power of the legislature to make this alteration in the law, if it saw fit to do so, nevertheless such radical and far-reaching changes should only be wrought by language so clear and plain as to be unmistakable evidence of the legislative intention. Had it been the legislative purpose not only to permit the wife to bring suits free from her husband's participation and control, but to bring actions against him also for injuries to person or property as though they were strangers, thus emphasizing and publishing differences which otherwise might not be serious, it would have been easy to have expressed that intent in terms of irresistible clearness.

We can but regard this case as another of many attempts which have failed, to obtain by construction radical and far-reaching changes in the policy of the common law, not declared in the terms of the legislation under consideration.

Some of the cases of that character are: Bandfield v. Bandfield, 117 Mich. 80, 40 L.R.A. 757, 72 Am. St. Rep. 550, 75 N. W. 287; Abbott v. Abbott, 67 Me. 304, 24 Am. Rep. 27; Schultz v. Schultz, 89 N. Y. 644; Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641; Peters v. Peters, 42 Iowa, 182.

Nor is the wife left without remedy for such wrongs. She may resort to the criminal courts, which, it is to be presumed, will inflict punishment commensurate with the offense committed. She may sue for divorce or separation and for alimony. The court, in protecting her rights and awarding relief in such cases, may consider, and, so far as possible, redress, her wrongs and protect her rights.

She may resort to the chancery court for the protection of her separate property rights. 21 How. 582, 590. Whether the wife alone may now bring actions against the husband to protect her separate property, such as are cognizable in a suit in equity when brought through the medium of a next friend (21 How. supra), is a question not made or decided in this case.

We do not believe it was the intention of Congress, in the enactment of the District of Columbia Code, to revolutionize the law governing the relation of husband and wife as between themselves. We think the construction we have given the statute is in harmony with its language, and is the only one consistent with its purpose.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia will be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting:

This is an action by a wife against her husband to recover damages for assault and battery. The declaration contains seven counts. The first, second, and third charge assault by the husband upon the wife on three several days. The remaining counts charge assaults by him upon her on different days named,—she being at the time pregnant, as the husband then well knew.

The defendant filed two pleas,—the first that he was not guilty, the second that, at the time of the causes of action mentioned, the plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife, and living together as such.

The plaintiff demurred to the second plea, and the demurrer was overruled. She stood by the demurrer, and the action was dismissed.

The action is based upon §§ 1151 and 1155 of the Code of the District [31 Stat. at L. 1373, 1374, chap. 854], which are as follows:

"Sec. 1151. All the property, real, personal, and mixed, belonging to a woman at the time of her marriage, and all such property which she may acquire or receive after her marriage from any person whomsoever, by purchase, gift, grant, devise, bequest, descent, in the course of distribution, by her own skill, labor, or personal exertions, or as proceeds of a judgment at law or decree in equity, or in any other manner, shall be her own property as absolutely as if she were unmarried, and shall be protected from the debts of the husband, and shall not in any way be liable for the payment thereof: Provided, That no acquisition of property passing to the wife from the husband after coverture shall be valid if the same has been made or granted to her in prejudice of the rights of his subsisting creditors."

"Sec. 1155. Married women shall have power to engage in any business, and to contract, whether engaged in business or not, and to sue separately upon their contracts, and also to sue separately for the recovery, security, or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried; contracts may also be made with them, and they may also be sued separately upon their contracts, whether made before or during marriage, and for wrongs independent of contract, committed by them before or during their marriage, as fully as if they were unmarried; and upon judgments recovered against them execution may be issued as if they were unmarried; nor shall any husband be liable upon any contract made by his wife in her own name and upon her own responsibility, nor for any tort committed separately by her out of his presence without his participation or sanction: Provided, That no married woman shall have power to make any contract as surety or as guarantor, or as accommodation drawer, acceptor, maker, or indorser."

The court below held that these provisions did not authorize an action for tort committed by the husband against the wife.

In my opinion these statutory provisions properly construed, embrace such a case as the present one. If the words used by Congress lead to such a result, and if, as suggested, that result be undesirable on grounds of public policy, it is not within the functions of the court to ward off the dangers feared or the evils threatened simply by a judicial construction that will defeat the plainly expressed will of the legislative department. With the mere policy, expediency, or justice of legislation the courts, in our system of government, have no rightful concern. Their duty is only to declare what the law is, not what, in their judgment, it ought to be, leaving the responsibility for legislation where it exclusively belongs; that is, with the legislative department, so long as it keeps within constitutional limits. Now, there is not here, as I think, any room whatever for mere construction, so explicit are the words of Congress. Let us follow the clauses of the statute in their order. The statute enables the married woman to take, as her own, property of any kind, no matter how acquired by her, as well as the avails of her skill, labor, or personal exertions, "as absolutely as if she were unmarried." It then confers upon married women the power to engage in any business, no matter what, and to enter into contracts, whether engaged in business or not, and to sue separately upon those contracts. If the statute stopped here, there would be ground for holding that it did not authorize this suit. But the statute goes much farther. It proceeds to authorize married women "also" to sue separately for the recovery, security, or protection of their property; still more, they may sue separately "for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried." No discrimination is made, in either case, between the persons charged with committing the tort. No exception is made in reference to the husband, if he happens to be the party charged with transgressing the rights conferred upon the wife by the statute. In other words, Congress, by these statutory provisions, destroys the unity of the marriage association as it had previously existed. It makes a radical change in the relations of man and wife as those relations were at common law in this District. In respect of business and property, the married woman is given absolute control; in respect of the recovery, security, and protection of her property, she may sue separately in tort, as if she were unmarried; and in respect of herself, that is, of her person, she may sue separately as fully and freely as if she were unmarried, "for torts committed against her." So the statute expressly reads. But my brethren think that, notwithstanding the destruction by the statute of the unity of the married relation, it could not have been intended to open the doors of the courts to accusations of all sorts by husband and wife against each other; and therefore they are moved to add, by construction, to the provision that married women may "sue separately . . . for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried," these words: "Provided, however, that the wife shall not be entitled, in any case, to sue her husband separately for a tort committed against her person." If the husband violently takes possession of his wife's property and withholds it from her, she may, under the statute, sue him, separately, for its recovery. But such a civil action will be one in tort. If he injures or destroys her property, she may, under the statute, sue him, separately, for damages. That action would also be one in tort. If these propositions are disputed, what becomes of the words in the statute to the effect that she may "sue separately for the recovery, security, and protection" of her property? But if they are conceded,—as I think they must be,—then Congress, under the construction now placed by the court on the statute, is put in the anomalous position of allowing a married woman to sue her husband separately, in tort, for the recovery of her property, but denying her the right or privilege to sue him separately, in tort, for damages arising from his brutal assaults upon her person. I will not assume that Congress intended to bring about any such result. I cannot believe that it intended to permit the wife to sue the husband separately, in tort, for the recovery, including damages for the detention, of her property, and at the same time deny her the right to sue him, separately, for a tort committed against her person.

I repeat that with the policy, wisdom, or justice of the legislation in question this court can have no rightful concern. It must take the law as it has been established by competent legislative authority. It cannot, in any legal sense, make law, but only declare what the law is, as established by competent authority.

My brethren feel constrained to say that the present case illustrates the attempt, often made, to effect radical changes in the common law by mere construction. On the contrary, the judgment just rendered will have, as I think, the effect to defeat the clearly expressed will of the legislature by a construction of its words that cannot be reconciled with their ordinary meaning.

I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court, and am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Hughes concur in this dissent.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

RUTH MASON, Appt.,

v.

JOHN A. YEARWOOD and Wife, Respts.

(58 Wash. 276, 108 Pac. 608.)

Water — appropriation — springs.

1. Where the doctrine of riparian rights prevails the water of springs appearing on land which has passed out of government ownership is not subject to appropriation.

Same — right of owner.

2. The owner of land on which a new spring breaks out may make such use of the water as he pleases, notwithstanding it

Note. — Right to water of new spring.

Aside from MASON v. YEARWOOD, but one other case has been found in which was in issue the right to the water of a new spring, that is, one which did not exist from time immemorial. The case referred to is Vanderwork v. Hewes (N. M.) 110 Pac. 567. In this case seepage water or spring water appeared on certain land, from some unknown source, at a place where there had been no seepage or spring water for at least five years previous; the spring continued to flow in various quantities, until a portion was permitted to flow on adjacent property; about this time a stranger filed an application in the office of the territorial engineer for a permit to appropriate the water, claiming it to be subject to appropriation under a statute, one section of which granted the territorial engineer supervision of the apportionment of the water in the territory according to the licenses issued by him and his predecessors and the adjudications of the court, and another section of which provided that in case of seepage water from any constructed works, the owner of the works should have the Same — prescriptive right.

3. One who uses water flowing from springs on another's land, through a ditch constructed to connect it with his own land, for a period sufficient to secure an easement in the land of another, has a prescriptive right to such flow.

Same — increased flow.

4. One who has secured by prescription the right to the water flowing from another's spring has no right to an increase in the flow of the spring beyond that to which his prescriptive right attached.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Kittitas County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the diversion of water. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. O. Felkner for appellant.
Messrs. Hovey & Hale for respondents.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to enjoin the diversion of water. From the record it is gathered that the appellant, who was plaintiff below, owns land situated in sections 12 and 13 in township 18 N., of range 17 E., of the Willamette meridian; that the respondents own land in section 11 in the same township and range. To the south of the respondents' land, and in the same section, is first right to the use thereof, but that if the owner should not file an application to the territorial engineer within a year after the completion of the works, or the appearance on the surface of such seepage water, any party might make an application therefor. The court, after holding the first-named section of the statute could not be held to relate to waters held in private ownership or by prior appropriation, but must be held to relate to public and unappropriated waters within the territory, and that the term "constructed works," in the other section, could have no application to seepage or spring water arising on land from an unknown source, continued: "The appellant, under his permit from the territorial engineer, claims all of the water which reaches the lands of Dean in this way, notwithstanding Dean, with the consent of Hewes, has constructed a ditch or ditches to receive and conduct any surplus water which may reach his land, and claims the right to its use upon 50 acres of his land, and he has undoubtedly the better right to it as a prior appropriator as between himself and Vanderwork. It would be doing violence to the act of 1907 to hold that the territorial engineer was empowered by it to authorize another applicant to go upon lands held in private ownership, construct land belonging to one Haywood. In 1879 one Alanson T. Mason filed a homestead application for the lands now owned by the appellant, together with that owned by Haywood, and thereafter procured title to the same under the homestead laws of the United States. The appellant and Haywood have obtained their titles through mesne conveyances from Alanson T. Mason. The land owned by the respondents was first settled upon prior to 1880. The claim passed from one to another until it reached one Pardee, who settled thereon in March 1884, and in due time obtained title thereto from the government. The respondents derive their title through him. The lands mentioned have a general slope to the east and southeast, and are arid in the sense that they require irrigation to produce crops. Some time in the year 1882 or 1883 springs broke out on the southwest corner of the land now owned by the respondents, which caused a swamp to form immediately below and surrounding them, which drained down through a draw extending across the land now owned by Haywood, but which belonged to Alanson T. Mason, onto the land now owned by the appellant. In 1884 Mason caused a ditch to be dug through this draw to a point on his own land immediately below the swamp formed by the springs, through which he took the water from the swamp across the Haywood land to the land now owned by the appellant, where he put it to a beneficial use. This ditch he and his successors in interest have maintained until the present time. In ditches and appropriate seepage water or waters from snows, rain, or springs, not traceable to or forming a stream or water course, or from constructed works, as the limitations contained in §§ 1 and 53, defining the waters over which the engineer has been given jurisdiction, plainly indicate. In our opinion, therefore, if any surplus water exists after Hewes has appropriated to a beneficial use all he desires, and is permitted to enter the lands of Dean, he has a perfect right to appropriate it also to a beneficial use; but the rights of Dean are subject to the prior right of Hewes to apply all of the water to a beneficial use on his lands. As to the water in controversy in this case, any surplus which may in future exist beyond the necessities of Hewes and Dean would not be subject to appropriation and distribution under chapter 49, Laws 1907, but, if subject to appropriation at all without the consent of Hewes and Dean, it would be governed by the general law of prior appropriation which is applicable to the arid lands of the West.

G. V.

1890 or 1891 the respondent dug a small ditch leading from the springs to his house, and took water therefrom for stock and domestic purposes. In 1902 the respondents, for the purpose of draining the swamp formed by the springs, constructed a ditch on the east side of the swamp, conveying the water to their south line, where it entered a ditch constructed on the Haywood land. Subsequently the appellant connected this with her own ditch, and from that time until the spring of the year 1908 the water therefrom continually flowed down onto her premises, where she used it for purposes of irrigation. On the last date mentioned the respondents constructed a new ditch from this latter ditch eastward on their own land, which had the effect of diverting a considerable part of the water from the springs away from the appellant's ditch. It is to restrain this diversion that the present action is prosecuted.

At the trial there was evidence tending to show that the springs which give rise to the marsh or swamp on the respondents' lands had no existence prior to the year 1882, or, if they flowed at all, it was only for a short time in the spring of the year, when the snow of the winter was melting; that what is now swamp and marsh land was then dry, so that it could be ridden or driven over at any season of the year. In fact witnesses testified to cutting hay thereon with a mower as early as the month of June. It was given in evidence also that the springs began to be active only after the owners of the lands to the west and above the springs began to irrigate their lands, and the flow increased as irrigation increased, and that this increase has been continuous; there being much more water flowing from the springs now than did flow therefrom even a few years ago. It appears also that the swamp itself is constantly increasing in size, being much larger now than it was even ten years ago. It does appear, however, that for more than twenty-five years a continuous stream has flowed from the springs into the swamp and from the swamp into the drainage and irrigating ditches of the appellant, and from there to her lands, where it has been used continuously for the purposes of irrigation. Moreover, it appears that all of the water coming from the springs, except the small quantity taken by the respondent in 1901, which he uses for domestic and household purposes, has been so used, and that its use was without interruption until the respondents made the diversion which gave rise to this action.

The appellant, on this appeal, makes three principal contentions. She contends, first, that she is entitled to the water from these springs in virtue of a prior appropriation; second, that she is a riparian proprietor on the stream that flows from the springs and is entitled as such to have the same flow onto her lands as it was wont to flow in a state of nature, without waste or unnecessary diminution by the land proprietors on the stream above her land; and, third, that she is entitled to the water by prescription, since she has had the open and notorious possession and use of the same for a period of time longer than the time of the statute of limitations, all the while claiming the right to such possession and use adversely against all the world.

The trial judge, passing on the contentions made in the court below, held that neither the first nor second was maintainable under the evidence, and we think his conclusions in that regard were just. As we held in Nesalhou v. Walker, 45 Wash. 621, 88 Pac. 1032, the common-law doctrine of riparian rights prevails in this state, and that where rights to lands across which a stream of water flows are acquired or initiated prior to any appropriation of the waters of the stream, the rights of the riparian proprietors are determined by the rules of the common law relating to riparian proprietors, and not by any rule of prior appropriation. The same rules would apply to springs, whether existing from time immemorial or of new creation. They could only be appropriated if existing or appearing on land to which no title has been acquired from the government, or initiated looking to such acquirement. So, in this case it seems to us clear that the appellant's predecessor in interest made no appropriation of the waters of these springs until long after initiatory steps had been taken by the respondents' grantors to acquire title to the land on which they appeared. Such being the case, the respondent is entitled to hold them and claim the waters therein as against any claim of prior appropriation.

The contention that the appellant can enjoin a diversion of the water, on the ground that she is a riparian proprietor on the stream flowing from the marsh, is also without foundation. While one may have riparian rights in a stream even though its source be a spring upon the land of another (Hollett v. Davis, 54 Wash. 326, 103 Pac. 423; Miller v. Wheeler, 54 Wash. 429, 23 L. R.A.(N.S.) 1065, 103 Pac. 641), yet it must be a stream that was wont to flow from time immemorial. The owner of land upon which a new spring breaks out may make such use of the waters as he pleases, notwithstanding it would, if unmolested, cause a stream to flow across another's land. Any other rule would make his estate involuntarily servient to a use to which it was not subject when he acquired it.

The third contention is not discussed in the written opinion filed by the trial judge, and we are not advised as to the reasons which prompted him to deny relief on that ground. It has seemed to us that the appellant can justly claim a right by prescription to a portion of the flow from these springs. It is clear from the evidence that the appellant and her predecessors in interest have appropriated and used the waters flowing from the springs, with the exception of that before mentioned, which the respondents have diverted for domestic uses, for a period of nearly twenty-five years. While there is no direct statute governing the matter, the courts generally hold that an easement is acquired in the lands of another by an adverse user for the period of the statute of limitations. Wasmund v. Harm, 36 Wash. 170, 78 Pac. 777; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 110, 5 L. ed. 410. So, in this case the appellant is entitled to the continuous use of so much of the waters flowing from these springs as she has had the continuous adverse use of for a period of ten years immediately preceding the time the respondents diverted it. This does not mean all of the water flowing through her flumes at the time of the diversion, but a quantity equal to the quantity that was wont to flow thereon ten years prior to that time. Since the spring has materially increased in size and flow during the last ten years, the respondents are entitled to check it if they may, or appropriate to their own use the increase of flow. Their state in their lands needs stand servient only to the easement they are estopped to dispute from lapse of time. They are not estopped to interfere with the increase of flow occurring within the ten-year period, for otherwise their whole estate might become servient to this particular use.

The appellant cites Dickey v. Maddux, 48 Wash. 411, 93 Pac. 1090, to the point that a right to a use of waters arising from springs on the land of another cannot be acquired by adverse use, but this point was not decided in that case. It was the opinion of the writer that the question was there presented, and should have been met and determined, but the court determined the question on other grounds. The doctrine that prescriptive rights in the use of waters flowing across or arising on the land of another may be acquired by adverse user has been repeatedly recognized, if it has not been expressly decided, by this court. Rigney v. Tacoma Light & Water Co. 9 Wash. 576, 26 L.R.A. 425, 38 Pac. 147; Spring Hill Irrig. Co. v. Lake Irrig. Co. 42 Wash. 379, 85 Pac. 6; Matheson v. Ward, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

24 Wash. 407, 85 Am. St. Rep. 955, 64 Pac. 520; Hollett v. Davis, supra.

The record, however, is not sufficiently complete to enable us to direct the proper judgment to be entered. While it shows that the respondent in 1908 diverted a considerable proportion of the waters then flowing from the springs, probably greater than he was entitled to as of right, it fails to show what the excess was. This could only be determined by ascertaining the quantity of water flowing into the appellant's ditches and flumes at a time ten years prior to the time of the diversion, and subtracting that quantity from the quantity now flowing from the springs; but there is nothing in the evidence that enables us to do this, as the appellant seemingly tried her case on the theory that she was entitled to all of the waters flowing from the springs. This was, of course, the fault of the appellant, but we do not think that she should, because thereof, lose her right to recover such proportion of the water as is legally her due. Nor do we think the respondents should be obligated to bear the burden of the cost of the trial of the cause or its appeal to this court. The judgment of the court will be, therefore, that the judgment appealed from stand affirmed, but without prejudice to the right of the appellant to bring a new action for the ascertainment of the quantity of water she is entitled to by prescription, and to perpetually enjoin the respondents from interfering therewith. No costs will be allowed either party in this court.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Second Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, dismissing the petition in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph Sollinger for appellant.

Mr. Clayton B. Blakey, with Mr. Huston Quin, for appellee:

In matters pertaining to the public health, safety, and comfort, the municipality acts in its public or governmental capacity.

Owensboro v. Com. 105 Ky. 344, 44 L.R.A. 202, 49 S. W. 320; Having v. Covington, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1617, 78 S. W. 431; Twyman v. Frankfort, 117 Ky. 518, 64 L.R.A. 572, 78 S. W. 446, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 622; Schwalk v. Louisville (Columbia Finance T. Co. v. Louisville) 135 Ky. 570, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 88, 122 S. W. 800; Jones, Neg. Mun. Corp. § 30; Parker & W. Public Health & Safety, § 161; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 295.

The fact that the sprinkling of the city streets is under the jurisdiction of the board of public works does not alter the general rule as to the municipality's nonliability.

Thomp. Neg. § 5824, and note 31 to § 5823.

The flushing and sprinkling of the city streets is a public necessity,—a duty pertaining to the public health,—and within the exercise of a purely governmental function; and for the negligence of an employee in performing said services the municipality is not liable; especially where no compensation or remuneration is charged or received by the city in the performance of said services.

note in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094; and for the liability of a municipality for injuries inflicted by its servant while engaged in removing ashes or garbage, see note in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1005.

Few cases within the scope of this note have been found, and they show the same conflict in results as appears in the cases in the earlier note. As there stated, however, and as appears in KIPPES v. LOUISVILLE, the liability of the municipality depends, in each case, upon whether the work in which the employee was engaged at the time is a public duty undertaken by the city in the exercise of its governmental functions, for the benefit of its people and the public generally, or a service performed by the municipality for private or corporate purposes, as distinct from its duty to the public generally.

Thus, in Conelly v. Nashville, 100 Tenn. 262, 46 S. W. 565, the court said: "The authorities recognize the difference between governmental duties, or those duties the municipality owes the public, and corporate or ministerial duties, in the discharge of which the individual citizen is interested. For any injury consequent upon the negligence of the municipal agent in discharging duties of the first class, the corporation is not liable; but it is otherwise as to the result of neglect in the performance of duties of the second class."

And in Denver v. Maurer, 47 Colo. 209, 135 Am. St. Rep. 210, 106 Pac. 875, the court said: "The authorities agree that two classes of general duties are imposed upon a municipal corporation. One is governmental, and the municipality is not liable for negligence of employees occurring in the performance thereof. The other is private and corporate, and the municipality is liable for negligence of employees occurring in the performance thereof."

But as said in KIPPES v. LOUISVILLE: "It must be admitted that many of the distinctions that this court as well as other courts of last resort have made between what are designated the public and private powers, duties, and liabilities of municipal corporations, are difficult to understand." On this distinction, in general, between public and private functions of a municipality, as affecting liability for negligence of its agents, see the note in 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665.

In Conelly v. Nashville, supra, it was held that a municipal corporation is not liable for the negligence of the driver of a street sprinkling cart in its service, in colliding with a buggy, causing the overturning thereof and injury to the occupant, as the employee is in such case engaged in the performance of a governmental, and not a mere ministerial, duty. The court said: "The right or power of the corporation of Nashville to sprinkle its streets does not rest, as was argued at the bar, upon subsec. 9 of § 17 of its charter, which authorizes the city 'to make appropriations to open, alter, abolish, widen, extend, . . . clean, and keep in repair, streets,' etc., but rather upon subsec. 7 of § 17, which provides that the corporate authorities may 'make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants, and to prevent and remove nuisances.' An ordinance of the city directing the sprinkling of the streets in pursuance of this charter provision is one that is sanitary in its character, passed in view of the health and comfort of the general public. While engaged in doing work under such an ordinance, the municipality is discharging a governmental duty, and is not responsible for the carelessness of the agent or agencies so employed."

But in Denver v. Maurer, supra, where the plaintiff was injured through the negli-

Maydwell v. Louisville, 116 Ky. 885, 63 L.R.A. 655, 105 Am. St. Rep. 245, 76 S. W. 1091; Conelly v. Nashville, 100 Tenn. 262, 46 S. W. 565.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, who was the plaintiff below, averred, in a petition filed by her against the appellee to recover damages for personal injuries, that she was injured by the negligence and carelessness of the agents and employees of the city, who were at the time engaged in flushing the streets with a hose that was in such an unsafe and defective condition that it burst and threw water upon her, thereby causing her to contract a severe cold that impaired her health.

In the third paragraph of its answer the appellee city alleged that the flusher referred to in the petition, and the other street flushers owned and operated by it, were used for the promotion and preservation of the health of the people of the city, and were necessary for this purpose, as well as for the comfort and safety of the general public; that at the time of the accident complained of the employees of the city, or one of its departments, in charge of the flusher, were engaged in flushing the streets of the city, and that for this service the city did not receive or charge any remuneration or profit, but did the work solely for the promotion of the health, safety, and comfort of the inhabitants of the city and the general public; and that in using the flusher it was exercising a governmental function of the city. To this paragraph a demurrer was interposed, and overruled. Thereupon the plaintiff, properly conceiving that the facts set up in this paragraph, if it presented a defense, as the lower court ruled it did, would defeat a recovery, elected to stand by her demurrer, and the petition was dismissed.

It will thus be seen that the only question presented is whether or not the flush-gence of employees of the municipality while engaged in flushing a storm sewer, the city was held liable, the court saying: "The authorities are practically agreed in placing certain general duties in the class that is governmental, and among those is the general duty of the preservation of the public health. . . . There is considerable conflict among the authorities when it comes to the application of the general rule to specific cases. . . . To the ordinary mind this storm sewer formed a part of the improvement of the street and pertained primarily to the care of the street. Obviously, as the water flowed into the catch basin, it would carry with it refuse from the street, some of which would remain. At other times refuse would be blown, or otherwise forced, through the opening into the basin. This refuse would remain to breed disease and noxious odors, if not removed. One more act was necessary to keep the street in a reasonably fit and suitable condition for use, and that act was the flushing of the storm sewer to remove this menace to the health and comfort of the people. How, in reason, can the act of flushing that sewer, under these circumstances, be anything more than a detail in the performance of the general duty of the city to care for its streets? . . . When the city, acting in its private corporate character, by means of that sewer, created on its streets a condition that menaced the health and comfort of the community, no authorities need be cited to show that it was its private corporate duty to remove that condition from its streets. It follows, therefore, that the flushing of that sewer, though done to preserve health and comfort, was not done primarily in the performance of the governmental duty relating to the preservation of health, but was done in the discharge of the general duty of caring for the streets."

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Barree v. Cape Girardeau, 132 Mo. App. 182, 112 S. W. 724, where a street commissioner of a city, who was also a special policeman, while engaged as agent of the city in making and superintending repairs on a street by hauling and spreading gravel thereon, outside of and up to the rails of a street railway, assaulted the plaintiff, who was rightfully operating a car on the street, and was at the time engaged in removing from the rails gravel which, in being dumped on the street, had been permitted to cover the rails in places, so as to make it dangerous to drive the car over it, to which removal the street commissioner objected, the municipality was held liable for injuries resulting from the assault, as its agent, while engaged in repairing the street, was in the performance of an act for the private benefit of the city, and could not at the same time act as a police officer in the discharge of a function for the good of the public, especially as the occasion did not demand or require a rightful exercise of such agent's powers as a policeman.

And in Burke v. South Omaha, 79 Neb. 793, 113 N. W. 241, it is held that where cities are granted special privileges for the benefit of their inhabitants in the control of the streets within their corporate limits, and it is their statutory duty to keep such streets in repair and safe for travel, for which purpose they have all necessary powers and authority from the state, such duty is a corporate duty of the municipality, and it is liable to an employee engaged in the repair of one of its streets for an injury resulting from the negligence of the foreman in charge of the work, through which the employee, by the action of an uncontrollable and vicious team, was thrown into a deep washout which was being filled.

ing the streets of the city was a public duty, undertaken by the city in the exercise of its governmental functions, for the benefit of its people and the public generally, or a service performed by the municipality for private or corporate purposes, as distinct from its duty to the public generally. It must be admitted that many of the distinctions that this court, as well as other courts of last resort, have made between what are designated the public and private powers, duties, and liabilities of municipal corporations, are difficult to understand. Nevertheless the line of demarcation has been drawn with more or less precision, and it is generally ruled that service similar in purpose and effect to that the city was performing when the appellant was injured falls within what are called the public or governmental duties of a city. In fact, we have expressly held that sprinkling the streets of a city is essential to the health, comfort, and safety of its inhabitants, as well as the public generally, who use its streets. Putting the service the agents of the city, or one of its departments, were performing at the time the plaintiff was injured, upon the ground mentioned, the decision of the lower court is supported by a number of opinions delivered by this court, as well as the weight of authority in other jurisdictions. Having v. Covington, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1617, 78 S. W. 431; Twyman v. Frankfort, 117 Ky. 518, 64 L.R.A. 572, 78 S. W. 446, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 622; Park Comrs. v. Prinz, reported in 127 Ky. 470, 105 S. W. 948 (but cited by counsel for appellee as being in 32 Ky. L. Rep. 359); Maywell v. Louisville, reported in 116 Ky. 885, 63 L.R.A. 655, 105 Am. St. 245, 76 S. W. 1091 (but cited by counsel for appellee as being in 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1062); Conelly v. Nashville, 100 Tenn. 262, 46 S. W. 565.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

ROBERT S. POLLET, Bankrupt, Appt.,
v.
JULIUS COSEL.

(103 C. C. A. 68, 179 Fed. 488.)

Bankruptcy — dismissal of proceeding — effect on right to discharge.

The dismissal of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy for laches on the part of the bankrupt in prosecuting the proceedings will prevent his discharge in subsequent proceedings from debts which could have been proved in the former one.

ceedings from debts which could have been proved in the former one.

(May 18, 1910.)

APPEAL by a bankrupt from an order of the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, refusing him a full discharge. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Colt, Putnam, and Lowell, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Marvin M. Taylor for appellant.

Mr. Nathan B. L. Cosel, for appellee:

The dismissal of the bankrupt's petition for a discharge, for want of prosecution, in the former proceeding, is in substance and effect a judgment denying the discharge.

Remington, Bankr. art. 2436; Re Weintraub, 13 Am. Bankr. Rep. 711; Re Wolff, Note. — Binding effect of judgment refusing discharge in bankruptcy.

This question was discussed in Bluthenthal v. Jones, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 629, and the note thereto appended. The cases there cited seem to mark a settlement of the question, for the later cases do little more than follow them without discussion.

Thus the court in Re Kuller (Second Circuit) 93 C. C. A. 671, 168 Fed. 1021, 22 Am. Bankr. Rep. 289, merely followed without discussion its decision on a former appeal of the case (80 C. C. A. 508, 151 Fed. 12, cited in the earlier note) where it held that the refusal to discharge in one proceeding rendered the question of the right to discharge res judicata as to those debts provable therein, and that in a subsequent proceeding which included the same debts, it was binding, but that the bankrupt was not included as to new debts, at least where a reasonable time had elapsed since the original proceedings.

Where the application in the original proceeding is made in time, but the order denying it is not entered, an appeal from an order in a subsequent proceeding, involving the same indebtedness, in which a discharge is denied upon the ground that the original order is res judicata will not be determined until the bankrupt has had an opportunity to enter the original order and appeal from it. Re Elkind (Second Circuit) 99 C. C. A. 86, 175 Fed. 64, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 166.

It will be noted that in POLLER v. COSEL the application for a discharge was expressly denied. On first thought there would seem to be a different question involved where there is no order expressly denying a discharge, but the right thereto has lapsed through failure to make timely application for it. However, the courts invariably apply the same rules in the latter circumstance as those which govern the Kuller Case.

Thus it is held that a bankrupt who has failed to apply for his discharge within the time prescribed in the bankruptcy act cannot thereafter, by filing a second petition,

The proper procedure for a creditor to take in order to protect his rights is by opposing the bankrupt's application for a discharge in his second proceeding. Otherwise the debt is discharged fully and completely, and the rights of the creditor are lost.

Bluthenthal v. Jones, 208 U. S. 64, 52 L. ed. 390, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 51 Fla. 396, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 629, 120 Am. St. Rep. 181, 41 So. 533; Remington, Bankr. art. 2080.

Putnam, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an appeal by a bankrupt against an order of the district court in bankruptcy giving him only a qualified discharge. The bankruptcy proceedings in the present case were commenced by a petition filed in the district of Massachusetts on August 6, 1908. The bankrupt petitioned for discharge, and the creditor, now the appellee, duly filed his specification of objections thereto, setting out the proceedings in a previous bankruptcy where he had been a creditor. The result was a judgment giving a limited discharge, the limitation being covered by the following words: "Excepting also such debts as were provable in certain proceedings in bankruptcy in the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, wherein on May 18, 1905, said Robert S. Pollet was duly adjudged a bankrupt."

This exception reserved from this discharge the debt of the appellee, as the same was not only provable in the prior proceedings described, but was therein duly proved.

obtain a discharge from the debts which were provable in the original proceedings. Re Silverman (Second Circuit) 85 C. C. A. 224, 157 Fed. 675, 19 Am. Bankr. Rep. 460; Re Levenstein (D. C. Conn.) 180 Fed. 957, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 822.

So, it is held that a judgment perfected against a bankrupt subsequently to the expiration of the time during which he was entitled, but failed, to apply for a discharge, cannot be made the basis of subsequent proceedings, where it is founded upon a debt provable in the original proceeding. Re Schnabel (D. C. E. D. N. Y.) 166 Fed. 383, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 22; Re Kuffler, supra.

By proving their claims in the subsequent proceedings, creditors whose claims were provable in the original proceedings are not estopped to contest the discharge. Re Elby (D. C. N. D. Iowa) 157 Fed. 935, 19 Am. Bankr. Rep. 734.

The courts adopt the view that the failure to apply for the discharge, and the approval of the record of the proceedings without granting a discharge, are in effect a judgment by default in favor of his then existing creditors that the bankrupt was not entitled to a discharge; and that such judgment is res judicata in subsequent proceedings. Re Bramlett (D. C. N. D. Ga.) 161 Fed. 588, 20 Am. Bankr. Rep. 402; Re Pullinan (D. C. E. D. Tenn.) 171 Fed. 595, 22 Am. Bankr. Rep. 513; Re Stone (D. C. Or.) 172 Fed. 947, 23 Am. Bankr. Rep. 24 (it appeared in this case that the failure to apply for a discharge was due to the neglect of the bankrupt's attorney, but no stress was laid upon this fact). On the application of the rule res judicata it is said in Re Von Borries (D. C. E. D. Wis.) 168 Fed. 718, 21 Am. Bankr. Rep. 849: "At first blush it would seem that the doctrine of res judicata cannot logically be applied in a case where no application for a discharge had been made by the bankrupt, and therefore no opportunity furnished for judicial consideration; but a broader view of the scheme embodied in the present act seems to remove the difficulty. A voluntary petition under the act of 1898 (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 1, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418) is virtually a bill in equity, praying, first, a distribution of assets; second, a discharge of the bankrupt. In the instant case there were no assets for distribution, and therefore the sole scope and purpose of the petition was to secure such discharge. The jurisdiction to award a discharge rested upon the petition, while the formal motion for a discharge had no other function than to fix a time for the exercise of such jurisdiction. The same statute that confers the power to grant a discharge limits its exercise to a period of one year, unless by special order such period is enlarged for six months. At the end of the eighteen months the jurisdiction of the court has lapsed. . . . Therefore reason and authority seem to concur that as to the parties who were before the district court for the northern district of Illinois on the original petition, the question of a discharge was practically and conclusively settled when the statutory period had expired, and cannot now be considered or reviewed in this court, and as to such claims the petition must be denied."

Debts incurred subsequently to the filing of the petition in the original proceedings in which there was no motion for a discharge may be discharged in subsequent proceedings. Ibid.

And in case new creditors are listed in the second proceeding, the court should in its order of discharge expressly except all debts provable in the first proceeding. Re Pullinan, supra.

L. A. W.

The present appeal arose out of this limitation.

In the prior proceedings the discharge was not in form refused, but the petition therefor was dismissed on the ground that the bankrupt had failed to prosecute, and to appear for examination; laches being apparently specifically assigned.

We are of the opinion that the judgment of the district court appealed from was correct; and, aside from our own conclusions in the matter, we should feel called on to sustain it in accordance with our practice of following the courts of appeals in other circuits.

At the outset we note the fact that § 14 of the bankruptcy statute of 1898 (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 550, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3427) provides that "Any person, may, after the expiration of one month, and within the next twelve months subsequent to being adjudged a bankrupt, file an application for a discharge." It also provides that, if it appears that the bankrupt was unavoidably prevented from filing his application within twelve months, "it may be filed within, but not after, the expiration of the next six months." Here is a positive limitation of eighteen months given by statute within which an application for a discharge may be made. If the position of the bankrupt in this case is correct, it amounts to a repeal of this statutory limitation. The fact that it is by indirection, instead of by a delayed application in the original proceeding, is immaterial, because in the indirect form the result would be quite as effectual to the defeat of the clear letter and intention of the statute as if otherwise accomplished. However, we do not let the case rest on this proposition, because the authorities to which we will refer are conclusive on more general grounds.

The bankrupt relies on Bluthenthal v. Jones, 208 U. S. 64, 66, 52 L. ed. 390, 392, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, decided on January 6, 1908. There is nothing in it which helps him. It contains a declaration which is, of course, so far as this case is concerned, a dictum, but which is positively opposed to the appellant. There the creditor, who was the same creditor in both the first and second bankruptcy proceedings, failed to appear in the second proceeding to object to the discharge, as otherwise the creditor has done here. Therefore in the second proceeding there was a clean discharge. This was offered as a discharge in the state court against the creditor, and was held to be efficient. The Supreme Court sustained the judgment of the state court, but solely on the ground, to put it briefly, that there must be at least plea in legal proceedings. The opinion, however, used the following phraseology: "Undoubtedly, as in all other judicial proceedings, an adjudication refusing a discharge in bankruptcy finally determines, for all time and in all courts, between those parties or privies to it, the facts upon which the refusal is based."

This as the expression of the learned judge who wrote the opinion, and of the other judges who concurred therein, would be sufficient to bar the appellant here, if there had been an adjudication on the prior proceeding, or anything beyond a mere dismissal. Where there is only a mere dismissal for want of prosecution, it is so often held that parties are not fully estopped thereby that the language we have quoted does not necessarily apply here. Nevertheless, the questions we have here, in one form or another, have been before circuit courts of appeals in other circuits three times: First, in Re Fiegenbaum, in the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, decided on February 25, 1903, 57 C. C. A. 409; 121 Fed. 69; second, in Kuntz v. Young, in the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, decided on July 28, 1904, 65 C. C. A. 477, 131 Fed. 719; and, third, again in the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit in Re Kuffler, 80 C. C. A. 508, 151 Fed. 12, decided January 7, 1907. In the first case a discharge had been refused. In the second and third cases the petition for a discharge had been dismissed for want of prosecution, the same as here. And yet the same result was reached practically in each case, all in support of the judgment of the district court now appealed from. In the last case the precise form of discharge which was granted here was approved in advance. Therefore, both on principle and on authority, we accept the conclusions of the district court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed, and the appellee recovers his costs of appeal.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN
v.

PETER KEMPPAINEN.

(— Mich. —, 128 N. W. 183.)

Abatement — bastardy proceeding — death pending appeal.

A bastardy proceeding abates upon the death of the defendant, although it occurs pending a proceeding by him to review an adverse judgment.

(November 11, 1910.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Houghton County to review a judgment denying a motion for a new trial in a bastardy proceeding. Proceeding annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Kilskila and P. H. O'Brien for defendant.

Mr. William J. MacDonald for the People.

McAlvay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was adjudged to be the father of an illegitimate child, before the circuit court for the county of Houghton, and to stand charged with its maintenance until it arrived at the age of fourteen years. The order and judgment provided for the payment of money, the furnishing of a bond, and other details usual in such cases, and, in default of compliance therewith, he to be committed to jail until such bond was given. A motion for a new trial was denied, and the case was removed by defendant to this court for review upon writ of certiorari. Sixty days after the return to the writ was made to this court, there was filed a notice to the prosecuting attorney of the suggestion of the death of the defendant upon the record of the court in this cause, which notice further states: "And it is hereby ordered that Andrew Bram be and is hereby substituted as defendant in said cause, instead of Peter Kemppainen, deceased." The intention, without doubt, was to suggest of record

Note. — Abatement of bastardy proceedings by death.

The question as here annotated includes three classes of cases; namely, those in which the defendant died before final judgment; those which involve the effect of death of the complainant pendente lite; and those in which the reputed bastard child was born dead or died after birth, but before final judgment. The various classes will be taken up in the order mentioned, and any general discussion deemed necessary will be found under the particular subdivision relating thereto.

Death of defendant.

The few decisions discussing the effect of the death of the defendant in bastardy proceedings, while not all reaching the same conclusion as does PEOPLE v. KEMPPAINEN, may, with one exception, be considered as laying down rules in accordance with the principles therein announced.

Thus, in Clements v. Durham, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 100, cited in PEOPLE v. KEMPPAINEN, it was held that proceedings in bastardy cannot, in the absence of statute so providing, be instituted against the personal representatives of the putative father, in order to subject his estate to the maintenance of the child. And McKenzie v. Lombard, 85 Me. 224, 27 Atl. 110, which is sufficiently set out in the KEMPPAINEN CASE, is to the same effect.

But in Indiana, as is stated in PEOPLE v. KEMPPAINEN, the right of action was held in State ex rel. Wilson v. Williams, 8 Ind. 191, to survive generally the death of the putative father, under the bastardy act of 1852, § 22, which provides that "in case of the death of the putative father of such child, either before or after the commencement of prosecution . . . the right of action shall survive and may be prosecuted against the personal representatives of the deceased with like effect as if such father were living, except that no arrest of such personal representatives shall take place or bond be required." And the right to institute bastardy proceedings against the administrator of the estate of the deceased putative father under this statute was recognized, or at least unquestioned, in State ex rel. Shoemaker v. Han, 23 Ind. 539.

In Monohan v. Oke, 1 Ont. App. Rep. 208, a right of action under Consol. Stat. Upper Can. chap. 77, § 4, giving a right of action against the father of an illegitimate child for necessities furnished it during his lifetime, was held to survive the death of the putative father, and to lie against his representative.

Death of complainant.

In most jurisdictions which have decided the question, the death of the complainant is held, unless the letter of the statute permits a continuance or revival, to abate the action, although, in some instances, this is due to the wording of the statutes involved, which must be strictly construed in favor of the reputed father, for the reason that, at common law, the duty to support a bastard child was cast wholly upon the mother.

In R. v. Armitage, L. R. 7 Q. B. 773, it was held that a bastardy order could not issue in a proceeding instituted by the mother, where she died before the hearing, under a statute providing that the justices shall hear the evidence of the mother and such other evidence as she may produce, and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony, to their satisfaction, they may adjudge the defendant to be the putative father of the bastard child. This decision was upon the ground that, under the statute, it was necessary that the mother be called as a witness, especially as it allowed no one else to take proceedings against the supposed father.

In State v. Sullivan, 12 R. I. 212, where the statute authorized the overseer of the poor to bring bastardy complaints, it was held that the death of such complaining officer pending the proceedings, and before the trial, required the abatement of the complaint. It was also held that the new overseer could not revive the proceedings, as the statute did not provide therefor.

the death of defendant, with permission to Bram to defend as his legal representative, and it will be so treated by this court.

The question of the effect of the defendant's death upon this action is not discussed in the briefs. To a suggestion to the attorney general that a brief upon the question would be received, a reply has been returned that he had no desire to be heard. The question presented is whether the right of action under chapter 153, Comp. Laws, survived. In the investigation of the authorities in the United States, we find two cases where practically the exact question was involved under proceedings provided by statutes similar to chapter 153, Comp. Laws 1897; both holding that bastardy proceedings abate upon the death of the defendant. McKenzie v. Lombard, 85 Me. 224, 27 Atl. 110; Clements v.

Durham, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 100. In the Maine case, the death occurred during the pendency of the proceedings, but before trial. That court said: "No judgment is sought for or obtainable against property. The process, though held to be a civil proceeding, is criminal in form, and is an extraordinary means to compel a father to assist in the support of his illegitimate child, or suffer imprisonment as a penalty for his neglect to do so. There is no fitness in the proceeding that would adapt itself to the principle of survivorship. If the pending action survives, then the cause of action would survive as well, and the process could be originally instituted against the administrator of the deceased. . . . The incongruities that would beset such a proceeding would be obvious enough. It would be a strange sight to see

And in Rolline v. Chalmers, 49 Vt. 515, it was held that a complaint for bastardy does not survive the death of the prosecutrix, and that the town could not prosecute after her death, where no statute provided for such procedure.

In Dodge County v. Kemnitz, 28 Neb. 224, 44 N. W. 184, where the mother of an illegitimate child instituted proceedings against the putative father, but died before trial, it was held that the action abated as in any case of the death of a sole party to an action pendente lite. However, upon motion of the county attorney, the action was revived in the name of the county as plaintiff, under a statute providing that where a woman has a bastard child, and neglects to bring a suit for its maintenance, or brings a suit and fails to prosecute it to final judgment, the county commissioners may bring suit in behalf of the county, against the putative father, and may take up and prosecute a suit begun by the mother of the child.

And in Colby v. Storrs, cited in R. R. v. J. M. 3 N. H. 141, where the complainant died at the time the child was born, the town was permitted to prosecute and the defendant found chargeable. It does not appear from the case as here cited whether or not there was a statute permitting the town to revive the action.

But in People v. Nixon, 45 Ill. 353, it was held that the death of the mother does not abate a bastardy proceeding, the court saying: "The object is to compel the putative father to secure the public, as well as the mother, against liability for the support of the child, by a proceeding in the name of the people. The mother is not a party to the record, although allowed to control the suit, and made liable for the costs, in case the defendant is discharged. The mother not being a party, there is no technical reason for the abatement of the suit, and its prosecution may be more important to the public than if the mother had not died." And People v. Smith, 17 Ill. App. 597, is to the same effect. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Death of child.

The weight of authority undoubtedly is to the effect that the prosecution of the reputed father of a bastard child born alive does not abate under the bastardy acts by the death of the child pending the prosecution. Hauskins v. People, 82 Ill. 193, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 178; Malson v. State, 75 Ind. 143; Smith v. Lint, 37 Me. 546; Meredith v. Wall, 96 Mass. 155; Hanisky v. Kennedy, 37 Neb. 618, 56 N. W. 208; People ex rel. Moore v. Beehler, 63 Hun. 42, 17 N. Y. Supp. 418; State v. Beatty, 66 N. C. 648; Hinton v. Dickinson, 19 Ohio St. 583; Jerde v. State, 36 Wis. 170.

These decisions have been based upon various grounds, as is shown by the following abstracts:

Thus, in Smith v. Lint, supra, where the object of the bastardy act was to compel the putative father to aid in supporting his illicit offspring, the court, in holding that the death of the child pending the complaint, but before trial, did not abate the proceeding, said: "The expenses for the maintenance of an illegitimate child commence at its birth. They include what may be necessary for its support and comfort. The liability of the father is coextensive with that of the mother, and relates to the past as well as the future. The order of court, charging him with maintenance, embraces expenses which have been, as well as those which may be, incurred. The death of the child relieves the father from future support, but furnishes no discharge as to the past."

And in People ex rel. Moore v. Beehler, supra, it was said that it would be a miscarriage of justice if the defendant, by fleeing from justice and remaining out of the jurisdiction of the court until his offspring died, could thereby thwart the purpose of a statute enacted to compel the father of a bastard to indemnify the town for the expenses incurred for its support and burial.

And in Hauskins v. People, supra, where an administrator arrested, required to give a bond, be put on trial, and perhaps imprisoned for an act of bastardy committed by the party officially represented by him." The reasoning of the North Carolina case is along the same lines. In that case the proceedings were instituted against the representatives of the deceased putative father, being in fact the suppositious case used by the court in McKenzie v. Lombard, above quoted, but a better illustration, as there were two representatives who were proceeded against.

Such a right of action would not survive at the common law. "The true test was whether the injury on which the cause of action was based affected property rights, or affected the person alone. In the former case the cause of action survived, while in the latter it abated." 21 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 313, and cases there cited. There is no statute in Michigan which provides for such survival. In our investigation, we have found in one state (Indiana) by statute such right of action survives, "with like effect as if such father were living, except that no arrest of such personal representatives shall take place, or bond be required." See State ex rel. Wilson v. Williams, 8 Ind. 191. In the absence of a statute, we find no authority holding that the right of action in this case would survive. Upon the death of defendant it abated, and these proceedings, and the order and judgment brought here for review by reason thereof, became of no force and effect.

A judgment will be entered accordingly.

it was urged that after the death of the child, the state no longer had an interest in the prosecution of the action, the court said: "The statute required the defendant to pay a certain amount, for a certain number of years, for the purpose of supporting the child. The fact that the money had not been collected for the time the child had lived did not, upon the death of the child, abate the action, or in any manner release the defendant from his liability for the support during the life of the child."

In Meredith v. Wall, supra, where the bastardy act expressly provided for indemnity from all "charges that have accrued" for the maintenance of the child, as well as those which may be incurred in the future, it was held that a complaint for the support of a bastard child during its life may be commenced and maintained after its death.

So, the death of the reputed bastard child, pending the proceedings, and after issue joined, gives the defendant no right to demand a dismissal, as the death of the child does not show that the proceeding was wrongfully instituted. In such case the death of the child would be proper matter for a plea quis darrein continuance. Satterwhite v. State, 32 Ala. 578.

And proceedings against the father of a bastard child born alive do not abate by the death of the child pending the prosecution, under a statute providing that, upon conviction by a jury, the defendant shall stand charged with the maintenance of such child, the term "maintenance" being construed to include the necessary expenses incident to the birth of the child, such as the employment of nurse, midwife, and physician, and a decent burial of the child. Hanisky v. Kennedy, supra.

Where the child is stillborn, different rules seem to apply; but the cases are conflicting, since each depends to a great extent on the construction to be given the particular statute or statutes involved.

Thus, where the sole object and purpose of the remedy offered by the bastardy act is the maintenance of the child, an action commenced before delivery abates upon delivery of a dead fetus or embryo child. Helfer v. Nelson, 7 Ohio C. C. 203.

And in State v. Beatty, 61 Iowa, 307, 16 N. W. 149, it was held that a bastardy proceeding begun before the delivery of the child abated upon the birth of a dead child, under a statute the only penalty for breach of which was the charging of the accused with the maintenance of the child. See also State ex rel. Hawk v. Harris, 112 Iowa, 589, 84 N. W. 681.

And in New York, bastardy proceedings begun before the birth of the child abate, under § 806 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, except as to costs, where the child is stillborn. Burnham v. Tyrone, 112 App. Div. 769, 98 N. Y. Supp. 600.

In State v. Addington, 143 N. C. 683, 57 S. E. 398, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 314, where the bastardy statutes provide for an allowance to the mother as well as for a bond of indemnity to the state, it was held that upon the delivery of a stillborn child, the action should abate as to the giving of the bond to the state, but that the mother was entitled to reimbursement for expenses consequent upon the defendant's unlawful act.

In Indiana, where it is provided by statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 997) that the death of a bastard child shall not be cause of abatement or bar to any prosecution for bastardy, if the prosecution is commenced before the birth of the child, its death in utero and subsequent birth before judgment will not abate the action. Robinson v. State, 128 Ind. 397, 27 N. E. 250. And the same is true where the delivery of a stillborn child occurs after the verdict. Evans v. State, 58 Ind. 587. But if the prosecution is commenced after the birth of the reputed bastard child, the action should be abated upon proof that the prosecutrix was delivered of a stillborn child, for in such case the action is construed as for the benefit of the child, and the birth of a child having an existence separate and apart from the prosecutrix must be shown. Canfield v. State, 56 Ind. 168. This distinction is expressly recognized in Robinson v. State, supra.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PROVIDENCE-WASHINGTON INSURANCE COMPANY

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.

(247 Ill. 84, 93 N. E. 134.)

Telegraph — care required.

1. A telegraph company must use a high degree of care and skill in the correct and prompt transmission of messages.

Proximate cause — failure to transmit telegram — canceling insurance.

2. Failure to deliver a telegram from an insurance company, canceling a policy, which prevents the cancellation of the policy before the insured property is destroyed by fire, is the proximate cause of the loss to the insurance company.

Telegraph — cancellation of insurance policy — failure to deliver — liability.

3. The tender by an insurer of a telegram at a transmission office, addressed to a place only a comparatively short distance away, directing the cancellation of an insurance policy, is sufficient notice of the importance of the message to charge the company with liability, in case it fails to deliver the message, for the amount which the insurer is compelled to pay because of destruction of the property after the policy would have been canceled had the message been delivered, but before the cancellation could be otherwise effected.

Damages — failure to cancel insurance — amount of loss.

4. The damages for which a telegraph company from the failure of a telegraph from an insurer, canceling a policy, so that the property is destroyed before the policy is canceled, is liable, are the amount which the insurer is compelled to pay for the loss, and not merely the difference between the reasonable value of carrying the risk for the additional time and the amount of unearned premium on the policy.

(October 28, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court of Chicago, in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted from nondelivery of a telegram. Affirmed.

Note. — The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the question of the proximate cause of loss to an insurance company from the failure of a telegraph company to deliver a message canceling a fire insurance policy before the insured property burned, as an extensive search has failed to disclose any other case involving that specific point.

Statement by Farmer, J.:

This action was brought by appellee, against appellant, to recover damages alleged to have resulted to the appellee from a breach of appellant's contract to deliver a message. Appellee had written a policy of insurance on a paper mill in Newark, Ohio, belonging at the time to Frank B. Silk. The property subsequently passed to the Newark Paper Company, and on January 2, 1902, the policy was, by the consent of appellee, assigned to the Newark Paper Company. The policy contained a clause authorizing its cancellation at any time, upon the request of the insured, or by the insurer, upon giving five days' notice of the cancellation. April 29, 1902, between 11 and 12 o'clock in the morning, F. W. Ransom, state agent of appellee, delivered to appellant's agent at Van Wert, Ohio, for transmission to M. J. Reese, appellee's local agent in Newark, Ohio, the following message:

Van Wert, Ohio, April 30, 1902.

M. J. Reese, Agt.,

Providence-Washington Ins. Co.

Regret must cancel paper-mill line. Daily was passed inadvertently.

F. W. Ransom.

This telegram was never delivered to appellee's agent at Newark, Ohio, but was sent to New York city, and delivered to appellee's agent there, finally reaching its manager at Chicago through the mails. On May 2, 1902, Mr. Reese, appellee's agent at Newark, Ohio, received instructions by mail to cancel the policy on the Newark Paper Company's property, and the paper company claimed the right to the five days' notice provided for in the policy. Before the expiration of the five days, the property was burned, and the paper company sued appellee, and recovered a judgment for $1,036.04, which was afterwards compromised, and $1,200 paid by appellee in full satisfaction of the judgment. This action was brought to recover the $1,200 and interest from the time of its payment. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and a judgment rendered in favor of appellee for $1,365. The appellate court for the first district affirmed that judgment, and granted a certificate of importance, upon which the case is brought to this court for review.

Messrs. George H. Fearons and Francis Raymond Stark, with Messrs. West, Eckhart, & Taylor, for appellant:

The liability of one who has failed to fulfil his contract is limited to such damages as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time the contract was made, as the probable result of the breach of it.

Damages, to be recoverable, must be the direct and proximate result of the alleged negligence or breach of contract. A person who has broken his contract is liable for only those consequences which he might reasonably be supposed to have foreseen and expected as the probable result of such breach.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant contends (1) that its failure to deliver the message was not the proximate cause of the damage sustained by appellee; that the fire was the proximate cause, and, although the failure to transmit and deliver the message to appellee prevented the cancelation of the policy before the fire occurred, such failure is too remote to charge appellant with liability for the loss appellee sustained on account of the fire; (2) the breach of contract to deliver the message not being the proximate cause of the injury, the damages to be recovered are such, only, as, according to the usual course of things result from the breach; that the fire could not have been foreseen by or in the reasonable contemplation of the parties to the contract as a probable result of the breach; (3) that the damages not arising in the usual and due course of things as a probable result of the failure to deliver the message, but out of circumstances peculiar to the special case they are not recoverable, unless the special circumstances were known, or may necessarily be supposed to have been known, to appellant at the time it accepted the message.

In support of the contention that the failure to deliver the message could not in any sense be considered as the proximate cause of the injury, appellant relies upon Morrison v. Davis, 20 Pa. 171, 57 Am. Dec. 695, Denny v. New York C. R. Co. 13 Gray, 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645, Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106, and other cases from other jurisdictions. The Morrison Case and the Denny Case were referred to and commented upon in Wald v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 162 Ill. 545, 35 L.R.A. 356, 53 Am. St. Rep. 332, 44 N. E. 888. The rule announced in those cases is that where, on account of the delay of the carrier in transporting goods delivered to it, they were destroyed or damaged by floods beyond the power of the carrier's control, the proximate cause of the injury is the flood, and the carrier is not liable. The rule announced by those cases was relied upon in this court in the Wald Case. In that case Wald bought a ticket over the defendant company's railroad from Cincinnati to New York City, by the limited express, and checked his baggage for transportation on the same train. The railroad company negligently failed to put the baggage on that train, but sent it on a later train, and it was destroyed by the Johnstown flood. The limited express upon which Wald rode, and which should have carried his baggage, reached its destination in safety. This court refused to follow the rule announced in the Morrison and Denny Cases, and said: "A loss or injury is due to the act of God when it is occasioned exclusively by natural causes, such as could not be prevented by human care, skill, and foresight; and where property committed to a common carrier is brought by the negligence of the carrier under the operation of natural causes that work its destruction, or is by the negligence of the carrier exposed to such cause of loss, the carrier is responsible." The court quoted and approved the statement of the rule made by the supreme court of Missouri in Wolf v. American Exp. Co. 43 Mo. 421, 97 Am. Dec. 406, in the following language: "The act of God which excuses the carrier must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but the better opinion is that it must be the sole cause; and where the loss is caused by the act of God, if the negligence of the carrier mingles with it as an active and co-operative cause, he is still responsible." Many authorities are cited, holding this to be the rule.

Appellant says the Wald Case dealt with the rule as applicable to common carriers, and that a telegraph company is not a common carrier. So, also, were the courts dealing with common carriers in the Morrison Case and the Denny Case, cited by appellant. While the weight of authority is that telegraph companies are not common carriers, and therefore insurers of the correct and prompt transmission and delivery of messages, it is held that they exercise a quasi public employment, with duties analogous to those of common carriers and are required to use a high degree of care and skill in the correct and prompt transmission of messages. Tyler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 60 Ill. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 38. The principle of the rule in the Wald Case has been applied by this court in other cases not involving common carriers and loss resulting from the act of God. Rock Falls v. Wells, 169 Ill. 224, 48 N. E. 440; Heuren v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 236 Ill. 620, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1110, 127 Am. St. Rep. 309, 86 N. E. 611; Joliet v. Shufeldt, 144 Ill. 403, 18 L.R.A. 750, 36 Am. St. Rep. 453, 32 N. E. 969.

In support of the second and third propositions of appellant's defense, it relies chiefly upon Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502; but we are of opinion the facts of this case bring it within the rule of Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Lathrop, 131 Ill. 575, 7 L.R.A. 474, 19 Am. St. Rep. 55, 23 N. E. 583. The message sent by appellee to its agent related to an important business transaction. It disclosed the nature of the business to be the cancellation of insurance on paper-mill property. Appellant's agent could not have been ignorant of the fact that the prompt delivery of the message was an important matter. The mere fact that the telegraph was resorted to, instead of the mails, between points in the same state no farther apart than the cities from which and to which it was sent, was sufficient to inform the agent of appellant that it was important to appellee's rights that the message be delivered with all reasonable speed, and that if this was not done it was liable to result in injury to appellee. Appellant had all the information necessary to charge it with damages resulting directly from a failure to deliver the message, and under the rule announced in the cases in this state, the appellee's loss is deemed to be the direct result of the negligence of appellant in failing to transmit and deliver to the sendee the message. That appellant was negligent is conceded; and its counsel in their brief assume that if the appellant had performed its duty, the message would have been delivered early in the afternoon of the day it was sent; that the insurance would have been terminated before the fire occurred; and that appellee would have sustained no loss by reason of the fire.

Considering the loss of appellee as the direct result of the negligence of appellant, which we think must be done, under the decisions in this state, the liability would be the amount of the loss sustained by appellee, and not, as contended by appellant, the difference between the reasonable value of carrying the risk for the additoinal number of days and the amount of the unearned premium on the policy. In the Lathrop Case the court said (page 586, 131 Ill.): "We think the reasonable rule, and one well sustained by authority, is that where a message, as written, read in the light of well-known usage in commercial correspondence, reasonably informs the operator that the message is one of business importance, and discloses the transaction so far as is necessary to accomplish the purpose for which it is sent, the company should be held liable for all the direct damages resulting from a negligent failure to transmit it, as written, within a reasonable time, unless such negligence is in some way excused." Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, was relied upon by the telegraph company in that case as requiring the application of a different rule. In the opinion of the court in the Lathrop Case a large number of cases are cited and commented upon, and while the decision is criticized and sought to be distinguished by appellant, in our opinion we could not adopt the rule insisted upon by it without overruling the Lathrop Case, and we are not convinced that we would be justified in doing this.

In our opinion, appellant was liable for appellee's loss, and the judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF AGNES J. STINSON, Deceased.

ANNIE J. STROUD et al., Appts.

(228 Pa. 475, 77 Atl. 807.)

Will — signature — end of will.

A signature at the end of testator's disposition of his property complies with a statute requiring signatures at the end of the will, and a signature is therefore sufficient, although the writing in logical order proceeds from the first to the third page and then back to the second, so that the signature is upon the second rather than the third page.
30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

(July 1, 1910.)

APPEAL by Annie J. Stroud et al. from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Montgomery County dismissing an appeal from a decision of the register of wills admitting a testamentary writing to probate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Morris Yeakle and James Gay Gordon, for appellants:

The circumstances of the present will, its condition, the double manner of reading its pages, and the total absence of evidence as to the testatrix's intention or the time of writing the third page, make it impossible for the court to include the third page of the document in the will, except by exercising a mere arbitrary guess.

Baker's Appeal, 107 Pa. 381, 52 Am. Rep. 478.

The doctrine of "incorporation by reference" has no application to the present case.

Note. — When will deemed to have been signed or subscribed at the end.

The early cases upon this question are dealt with in the note to Sears v. Sears, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353, and the supplemental note thereto, accompanying Mader v. Apple, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 515.

But one case has been disclosed which has considered the question since the writing of the latter note.

In Re De Hart, 67 Misc. 13, 122 N. Y. Supp. 220, the requirement that the will shall be subscribed by the testator at the end was held sufficiently to be complied with in the case of a holographic will, where the testatrix wrote her name and date in the body of the attestation clause, which immediately followed, and was a part of the same paragraph as, the clause appointing the executrix, thus: "The above written instrument was subscribed by Mary A. De Hart, March 10th . . ." (the remainder of the paragraph being a continuation of the usual attestation clause, and followed by the signature of the witnesses).

As to whether writing name in body of a will is a signature thereto, see note to Meads v. Earle, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 63.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The requirement of the act of April 8. 1833 (P. L. 249), is that "every will shall be in writing, and unless the person making the same shall be prevented by the extremity of his last sickness, shall be signed by him at the end thereof." The question raised on this appeal is whether the paper which was admitted to probate by the register of wills of Montgomery county, as the last will and testament of Agnes J. Stinson, had been signed by her at the end thereof. On appeal to the orphans' court of the county from the action of the register, the president judge of the orphans' court of Berks county, specially presiding, held, in a well-30 L.R.A. (N.S.) considered opinion, that the will had been so signed. The document admitted to probate consists of a single sheet of legal cap paper, folded in the middle in the usual way along the short dimension, making four pages of equal size. There is no writing on the fourth page. The writing in issue appears upon the first, second, and third pages of the paper. The document is holographic, and the signature of Agnes J. Stinson appears about the middle of the second page, following the usual in testimonium clause, and to the left of her signature are those of two subscribing witnesses.

The learned counsel who, in the court below, represented the appellant from the decree of the register, admitted, with characteristic candor, that the testatrix, after writing the first page, proceeded to the third, then wrote last what appears on the top of the second page, and, after the completed expression of her testamentary intention, signed her name. Application was made to the court below for a rehearing, on the ground that counsel had no authority, either from the appellant from the decree of the register, or from any other contestant of the will, to make such admission, and on this appeal it is one of the grounds of complaint. No testimony of any kind was offered as to the order in which the pages of the will were written at the time the testatrix signed it. Both the attesting witnesses were dead, and counsel for the present appellants admit that the issue which they raise "must be determined wholly by an inspection of the alleged will itself." Our inspection of the document has satisfied us that the testatrix, after having written the first page, skipped the second, proceeded to the third, and, having reached the bottom of it, returned to the second, and, when she had completed the disposition of her estate, at about the middle of that page, signed her name there in the presence of two witnesses. The admission of counsel, complained of by the appellants, is therefore wholly eliminated from the case. The question before us, reduced to one of great simplicity, is whether the end of a will is, as counsel for appellants contend, "the physical end of the writing, the point which is spatially farthest removed from the beginning," or is the logical end of the testator's disposition of his property, wherever that end manifestly appears on the paper.

A will is the legal declaration of a man's intention, which he wills to be performed after his death. Such declaration must, under our wills act, be in writing and signed at the end thereof by the testator, unless prevented by an absolute inability. His written declaration is his animus testandi. When it is fully expressed, his will is finished, and the end of it reached. It is there that his signature must appear as evidence that it is his will. What he regards as the end of his will, and what must manifestly be regarded as the end of it, from an inspection and reading of the writing, is the end of it under the statute, which contains nothing about the spatial or physical end of it. The will before us, admittedly written by the testatrix herself, bears upon its face the unmistakable sequence which she intended to give to her writing. She started on the first page, and when she reached the bottom of it, turning the paper over, skipped to the third, and there continued her writing, at the top of which, on the first line, the unbroken disposition of her property is continued. When the bottom of that page was reached, she turned to the second, and, on the first line of it, continued in clear words the clause relating to the provisions on the third page for the Women's Christian Association of Norristown. She then proceeded to appoint her executors, and, having done so, reached the end of her will, and there signed her name. From the beginning of the first page, continuing on the third, and ending on the second, there is connected internal sense, containing a clear expression of testamentary intention, and the only conclusion to be reached from an inspection of the writing is that the testatrix signed her name at the place which she regarded as the end of her will. She signed her name at the end of her written act, which she intended to be her will; and, as it clearly so appears from the paper itself, her execution of it is not to be declared invalid because she failed to follow the sequence of the pages. The sequence of her will is unbroken from the first line on the first page to the place where she signed her name on the second, which was the end.

While no one of our cases where the question in which the 6th section of the act of 1833 was passed upon is precisely like the one now before us, Baker's Appeal, 107 Pa. 381, 52 Am. Rep. 478, is similar to it, and what was there said is here controlling. In that case a will was written on the first and third pages of a sheet of paper, and signed at the end of the third page. In a devise to A., written on the third page, numbered "4th," certain words describing the property devised were erased, and the words "see next page" were there interlined. On the fourth page of the same sheet of paper was written an unsigned clause, numbered "4th," making a bequest to A., and also additional bequests to other beneficiaries. The scrivener who drew the will testified that the erasure and interlineation were made by him by testator's direction, and he identified the writing on the fourth page as the subject of the said reference in the will, and as having been written by him at the testator's direction prior to the signing by the latter. In holding that the writing on the fourth page was to be read into the will as constituting the fourth clause thereof, and that the entire instrument, with said clause incorporated therein, should be admitted to probate as the testator's will, we said: "Thus, the general principle has been clearly established that a will is to be read in such order of pages or paragraphs as the testator manifestly intended, and the coherence and adaptation of the parts clearly require. In writing a will upon the pages of foolscap paper, a testator may or may not conform to the order of the consecutive pages of the folio. There is no law which binds him in this respect. He may begin upon the fourth page of the folio, and conclude upon the first, or he may commence upon the first, continue upon the third, and conclude upon the second. In whatever order of pages it may be written, however, it is to be read, as in Wikoff's Appeal, 15 Pa. 281, 53 Am. Dec. 597, according to their internal sense, their coherence or adaptation of parts. The order of connection, however, must manifestly appear upon the face of the will. It cannot be established by extrinsic proof. Whilst, therefore, the end of the writing in point of space may in most cases be taken as the end of the disposition, it does not follow that in all cases the signature must, of necessity, be there written, if it be written at the end of the will according to such connection and arrangement of the pages or sheets as the obviously inherent sense of the instrument requires."

To the same effect is the following from what was said by Mitchell, Ch. J., in Swire's Estate, 225 Pa. 188, 73 Atl. 1110: "The statute requires that a will shall be in writing, and signed by the testator 'at the end thereof.' The end meant by this provision is the logical end of the language used, which shows that the testamentary purpose has been fully expressed. The position of the signature with regard to the bottom or end of the page is only evidence on the question whether the testator has completed the expression of his intention. Prima facie that is the natural place for the signature to be placed to show the full expression of the testator's wishes, and therefore is presumptively the right place for it; but it is only evidence, and must give way to evidence of a different intent. . . . In the present case the connected sense of the text is entirely clear, though it does not follow the usual order of arrangement. But it does not deviate from it more than many letters written in the style of the present day, where the writing jumps from the first to the third page, and then back to the second. The full substance of the testatrix's intent and its expression are there, and the signature is at what she intended and regarded as the end of her will. Where that is manifest, the continuity of sense, and not the mere position on the page, must determine the statutory 'end thereof,' as the place for the signature."

The requirement of the English acts is similar to that of our act of 1833, as to where a will is to be signed. In Coomb's Goods, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 302, a will filled the first and third pages of a sheet of foolscap paper, leaving no room at the bottom of the third page for the signatures of the testator and the attesting witnesses. These were written on the second page, and it was held that the will was duly executed under Stat. 1 & 15 Vict., which require wills to be signed "at the foot or end" thereof. In Wotton's Goods, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 159, a testatrix procured the form of a will lithographed on the first side of a sheet of foolscap paper, and wrote her will on the second and third pages of it, ending near the bottom of the third. The fourth was blank. She signed her name in the presence of witnesses at the foot of the lithographed form, on the first page, and it was held that the will was signed at the foot or end thereof, as required by the acts; Sir J. Hannen saying: "The true way to look at the transaction seems to be that, as the will was begun on the second and continued on the third side of the paper, these must be taken to be the first and second pages of the will, and so we are brought round to what, under ordinary circumstances, would be called the first page, but which, upon these facts, must be treated as the last page of the will, as I hold it was when executed."

It is urged by the learned counsel for appellants that their contention, that the end of a will is the physical end of the writing,—the point spatially farthest removed from the beginning,—has been sustained by the New York court of appeals in Re Andrews, 102 N. Y. 1, 48 L.R.A. 662, 76 Am. St. Rep. 294, 56 N. E. 529. But that case differed in very important particulars from this. There the will was written upon a printed blank, folded in the middle so as to make four consecutive pages, with the attestation clause at the top of the second page. At that point it was signed by the testator and the subscribing witnesses, and the first two pages made a complete will. The third page contained other and complete dispositions of property, in no manner connected with what appeared on the first and second pages, except that the third page was numbered "2d page" and the second page "3d page." In addition, the will was not in the handwriting of the testatrix, but in that of a person to whom the bulk of the estate was given as the residuary beneficiary. The case cannot be regarded as authority at all for the question now before us, which was properly disposed of by the court below; and its decree is affirmed, at appellants' costs.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

LING SU FAN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(218 U. S. 302, 54 L. ed. 1049, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21.)

Appeal — questions reviewable on writ of error — review of facts.

1. Assignments of error which challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction cannot be considered by the Federal Supreme Court on a writ of error to the supreme court of the Philippine Islands, to review a judgment affirming such conviction, where it is not contended that there was no evidence of guilt, since only errors of law can be considered upon a writ of error.

Constitutional law — due process of law — prohibiting exportation of Philippine coin — police power.

2. The owner of Philippine silver coin is not deprived of his property therein without due process of law, contrary to the act of July 1, 1902, by the prohibition against the exportation of such coin from the Philippine Islands, under penalty of forfeiture and fine or imprisonment, which is made by Philippine law No. 1411, enacted by the Philippine Commission in the exercise of the power under the act of Congress of March 2, 1903 (32 Stat. at L. 952, chap. 980, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 893), § 6, to adopt such measures as are deemed proper, not inconsistent with the organic act, to maintain the parity between gold and silver pesos, but such statute is within the limits of the police power.

ing Philippine silver coins from the Philippine Islands in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. M. Vale, with Messrs. Marlon Butler and Lional D. Hargis, for plaintiff in error:

To justify the state in interposing its authority in behalf of the public, first, it must appear that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require the interference; and second, that the means are reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals.

Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133-143, 38 L. ed. 385-391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499.

The effect of the inhibition to export pesos from the Philippine Islands is to legislate the difference in exchange out of the pocket of the owner of the pesos, and into that of the money broker.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 235, 41 L. ed. 984, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581.

Assistant Attorney General Fowler, for defendant in error:

There is nothing in the act prohibiting the exportation of the silver pesos coined by the Philippine government, which is inconsistent with any clause contained in the act of July 1, 1902, and especially with the due process of law clause.

Patterson v. The Eudora, 190 U. S. 169, 174, 176, 47 L. ed. 1002, 1006, 1007, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 821; Frisbie v. United States, 157 U. S. 160, 165, 39 L. ed. 657, 658, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 586; United States v. Holliday, 3 Wall. 407, 18 L. ed. 182; United States v. 43 Gallons of Whiskey, 93 U. S. 188, 23 L. ed. 846; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 493, 48 L. ed. 525, 534, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349.

Mr. Justice Lurton delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error has been convicted of the offense of "exporting from the Philippine Islands Philippine silver coin," in violation of Philippine law No. 1411, being §§ 1998 and 1999, Compiled Acts of the Philippine Commission, title 3, chapter 194, Sections 1 and 2 of law No. 1411 read as follows:

"Section 1. The exportation from the Philippine Islands of Philippine silver coins, coined by authority of the act of Congress approved March 2d, 1903 [32 Stat. at L. 952, chap. 980, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 893], or the bullion made by melting or otherwise mutilating such coins, is hereby prohibited, and any of the aforementioned silver coins or bullion which is exported, or of which the exportation is attempted subsequent to the passage of this act, and contrary to its provisions, shall be liable to forfeiture, under due process of law, and one third of the sum or value of the bullion so forfeited shall be payable to the person upon whose information, given to the proper authorities, the seizure of the money or bullion so forfeited is made, and the other two thirds shall be payable to the Philippine government, and accrue to the gold standard fund. Provided, that the prohibition herein contained shall not apply to sums of P. 25 or less, carried by passengers leaving the Philippine Islands.

"Section 2. The exportation or attempt to export Philippine silver coin or bullion made from such coins from the Philippine Islands, contrary to law, is hereby declared to be a criminal offense, punishable, in addition to the forfeiture of the said coins or bullion, as above provided, by a fine not to exceed P. 10,000, or by imprisonment for a period not to exceed one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

We may pass over the assignments of error which challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction, inasmuch as it is not contended that there was no evidence. This is a writ of error, and upon such a writ the error to be considered must be confined to error of law.

The substantial question is as to whether a law which prohibits the exportation of Philippine silver coin from the Philippine Islands is a law which deprives the owner of his property in such coins without due process of law, in violation of that prohibition of the organic act of July 1, 1902, which provides that "no law shall be enacted in said islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." 32 Stat. at L. 692, chap. 1369. The authority for the law is found in the act of Congress of July 1, 1902, §§ 76 et seq., 32 Stat. at L. 691, 710, chap. 1369, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 890, which authorizes the Philippine government to establish a mint in the city of Manila for coinage purposes and to enact laws for its operation, and for the striking of certain coins. By the later act of Congress of March 2, 1903 (chap. 980, 32 Stat. at L. 952, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 893), it was provided that the gold peso, consisting of 12.9 grains of gold, nine tenths fine, should be the unit of value in the islands. The second section of that act provided as follows:

"That in addition to the coinage authorized for use in the Philippine Islands by the act of July first, nineteen hundred and two, entitled, 'An Act Temporarily to Provide for the Administration of the Affairs of Civil Government in the Philippine Islands, and for Other Purposes,' the government of the Philippine Islands is authorized to coin to an amount not exceeding seventy-five million pesos, for use in said islands, a silver coin of the denomination of one peso, and of the weight of four hundred and sixteen grains, and the standard of said silver coins shall be such that of one thousand parts, by weight, nine hundred shall be of pure metal and one hundred of alloy, and the alloy shall be of copper."

Section 6 of the same act of March 2, 1903, provided:

"That the coinage authorized by this act shall be subject to the conditions and limitations of the provisions of the act of July first, nineteen hundred and two, entitled, 'An Act Temporarily to Provide for the Administration of the Affairs of Civil Government in the Philippine Islands, and for Other Purposes,' except as herein otherwise provided; and the government of the Philippine Islands may adopt such measures as it may deem proper, not inconsistent with said act of July first, nineteen hundred and two, to maintain the value of the silver Philippine peso at the rate of one gold peso."

In a subsequent part of the same section, the issuance of certificates of indebtedness, bearing interest, was authorized as a specific measure for maintaining the parity between the silver and gold peso.

The law of the Philippine Commission, above set out, under which the conviction of the plaintiff in error was secured, must rest upon the provision of § 6, above set out, as a means of maintaining "the value of the silver peso at the rate of one gold peso." Passing by any consideration of the wisdom of such a law prohibiting the exportation of the Philippine Islands silver pesos as not relevant to the question of power, a substantial reason for such a law is indicated by the fact that the bullion value of such coin in Hong Kong was some 9 per cent greater than its face value. The law was therefore adapted to keep the silver pesos in circulation as a medium of exchange in the islands and at a parity with the gold peso of Philippine mintage.

The power to "coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," is a prerogative of sovereignty and a power exclusively vested in the Congress of the United States. The power which the government of the Philippine Islands has in respect to a local coinage is derived from the express act of Congress. Along with the power to strike gold and silver pesos for local circulation in the islands was granted the power to provide such measures as that government should "deem proper," not inconsistent with the organic law of July 1, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1902, necessary to maintain the parity between the gold and silver pesos. Although the Philippine act cannot, therefore, be said to overstep the wide legislative discretion in respect of measures to preserve a parity between the gold and silver pesos, yet it is said that if the particular measure resorted to be one which operates to deprive the owner of silver pesos of the difference between their bullion and coin value, he has had his property taken from him without compensation, and, in its wider sense, without that due process of law guaranteed by the fundamental act of July, 1902.

Conceding the title of the owner of such coins, yet there is attached to such ownership those limitations which public policy may require by reason of their quality as a legal tender and as a medium of exchange. These limitations are due to the fact that public law gives to such coinage a value which does not attach as a mere consequence of intrinsic value. Their quality as a legal tender is an attribute of law aside from their bullion value. They bear, therefore, the impress of sovereign power which fixes value and authorizes their use in exchange. As an incident, government may punish defacement and mutilation, and constitute any such act, when fraudulently done, a misdemeanor. Rev. Stat. §§ 5189, 5459, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3484, 3684.

However unwise a law may be, aimed at the exportation of such coins, in the face of the axioms against obstructing the free flow of commerce, there can be no serious doubt but that the power to coin money includes the power to prevent its outflow from the country of its origin. To justify the exercise of such power it is only necessary that it shall appear that the means are reasonably adapted to conserve the general public interest, and are not an arbitrary interference with private rights of contract or property. The law here in question is plainly within the limits of the police power, and not an arbitrary or unreasonable interference with private rights. If a local coinage was demanded by the general interest of the Philippine Islands, legislation reasonably adequate to maintain such coinage at home as a medium of exchange is not a violation of private right, forbidden by the organic law. Obviously, if the Philippine government had power to prohibit the exportation or melting of Philippine silver pesos, it had the power to make the violation of the prohibition a misdemeanor. The proceedings for the enforcement of the law included the ordinary process in criminal cases lawful in the islands, and not forbidden by the act of July, 1902.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

DELIA MOFFITT et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

M. J. KELLY, County Treasurer.

Constitutional law — impairing contract obligations — inheritance tax.

1. The enactment of a state statute subjecting to an inheritance tax the rights of a surviving wife in the community property does not violate the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, even if such rights, as they existed when the marriage was celebrated, are contractual, so that they may not be essentially changed or modified by subsequent legislation without impairing contract obligations.

Error to state court — scope of review — statutory construction.

2. Whether or not the rights of a surviving wife in the community property as they existed when the marriage was celebrated were correctly subjected to a state inheritance tax law subsequently enacted cannot be reviewed by the Federal Supreme Court when determining, on writ of error to a state court, the validity of such statute under the contract clause of the Federal Constitution.

Same — question of local law.

3. The nature and character of the rights of the surviving wife in the community property are peculiarly local questions, not open to review by the Federal Supreme Court when determining, on a writ of error to a state court, whether the imposition of an inheritance tax under the state laws denies to the wife the equal protection of the laws.

(November 28, 1910.)

ERROR to the California Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County subjecting the rights of a surviving wife in the community property to an inheritance tax. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice White:

James Moffitt was married in California in the year 1863, and there resided with his wife until his death, on October 25, 1906. He left a large amount of property, all of which formed part of the community which existed between himself and his wife. By a will, duly admitted to probate, Moffitt disposed of all his estate to his wife and children in the same proportions as if he had died intestate.

The probate court held that "the interest of the widow in the community property of herself and her deceased husband" was subject to be taxed under a law of California of 1905, which taxed all property passing by will or in case of intestacy from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same. A tax of $20,684.57 was thereupon assessed as against Mrs. Moffitt's one-half interest in the estate, and an order was entered directing payment of the tax by the executors. An appeal was taken to the supreme court of California. The single question presented by the appeal, as stated in the opinion of the supreme court, was "whether the surviving wife's share of the community property is subject to this inheritance tax." The question was answered in the affirmative. In an opinion denying an application for a rehearing, the court also adversely disposed of the contention that the enforcement of the tax would violate the contract clause or the equal protection and due process clauses of the Constitution of the United States: 153 Cal. 359, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 207, 95 Pac. 653, 1025. The case was then brought to this court.

Mr. Justice White, delivered the opinion of the court:

While the plaintiffs in error rely on both the contract clause and the equal protection clause of the Constitution, the latter contention is in substance but an incident, and the former is the fundamental proposition counted on to procure a reversal. We come, however, separately to consider the two contentions.

1. The alleged violation of the contract clause.—Considered merely subjectively, the contention is that the rights vested in the wife as a partner in the community existing by virtue of the constitution and laws of the state of California governing at the time of the marriage were contractual rights of such a character that they could not be essentially changed or modified by subsequent legislation without impairing the obligations of the contract, and thereby violating the Constitution of the United States. But even although this theoretical proposition be fully conceded, for the sake of the argument, it is apparent that it is here a mere abstraction, and is therefore irrelevant to the case to be decided. We say this because there is no assertion of the giving effect to any law enacted subsequent to the contracting of the marriage which purports to essentially modify the rights of the wife in and to the community, as those rights existed at the time the marriage was celebrated. This is so because the state law the enforcement of which it is asserted will impair the obligation of the contract is merely a law imposing a tax. It is evident, therefore, when the contention is concretely considered, it involves but a single proposition; that is, that the state of California could not, without violating the Constitution of the United States, impose a tax on the share of the wife in the community property on the occasion of the cessation by the death of the husband of his dominion and control over the common property, and the consequent complete vesting in enjoyment of such share in the wife. But, in every conceivable aspect, this proposition must rest upon one or both of two theories: either that the nature and character of the right or interest were such that the state could not tax it without violating the Constitution of the United States, or that, if it could be generically taxed without violating that instrument, for some particular reason the otherwise valid state power of taxation could not be exerted without violating the Constitution of the United States. The first conception is at once disposed of by saying that it is elementary that the Constitution of the United States does not, generally speaking, control the power of the states to select and classify subjects of taxation, and hence, even although the wife's right in the community property was a vested right which could not be impaired by subsequent legislation, it was nevertheless within the power of the state, without violating the Constitution of the United States, in selecting objects of taxation, to select the vesting in complete possession and enjoyment by wives of their shares in community property, consequent upon the death of their husbands, and the resulting cessation of their power to control the same and enjoy the fruits thereof. And this also disposes of the second conception, since, if the state had the power, so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, to select the vesting of such right to possession and enjoyment as a subject of taxation, clearly the mere fact that the wife had a pre-existing right to the property created no exemption from taxation if the selection for taxation would be otherwise legal. It follows, therefore, that the mere statement of the contention demonstrates the mistaken conception upon which, in the nature of things, it rests.

It is said, however, that the reasoning just stated, while it may be abstractly sound, is here inapplicable, because the thing complained of in this case is that the state of California has imposed an inheritance tax upon the share of the wife in the community, and thereby taxed her as an heir to her husband, when, if the laws existing at the time of the celebration of the marriage be properly construed, and be held to be contractual, she took her share of the property on her husband's death, not as an heir to property of which he was the owner, but by virtue of a right of ownership vested in her prior to the death of the husband, although the right to possess and enjoy such property was deferred, and arose only on his death. But, for the purpose of enforcing the Constitution of the United States, we are not concerned with the mere designation affixed to the tax which the court below upheld, or whether the thing or subject taxed may or may not have been mistakenly brought within the state taxing law. We say so because, in determining whether the imposition of the tax complained of violated the Constitution of the United States, we are solely confined to considering whether the state had the lawful power, without violating the Constitution of the United States, to levy a tax upon the subject or thing taxed. This being true, as it clearly results from what we have said that the vesting of the wife's right of possession and enjoyment, arising upon the death of her husband, was subject to be taxed by the state, so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, it follows that whether the tax imposed was designated or levied as an inheritance tax or any other is a matter with which we have no concern. To make this, if possible, clearer by an illustration, we say that our view just expressed as to the operation and effect of the Constitution of the United States upon the tax in question would not be in the slightest degree changed, although it were to be hypothetically conceded that, on an analysis of the Constitution and laws of California concerning the community between husband and wife, in force at the time of the marriage of the Moffitts, we should conclude that the nature and character of the rights of the wife in the community property, if correctly interpreted, were such that, on the death of the husband, the share coming to the wife would not be liable to taxation under a taxing law like the one under consideration. This would be the case, because, as there was state power to tax, so far as the Constitution of the United States was concerned, the question whether or not the wife's interest under the circumstances was correctly subjected to the tax was a purely state question, not involving any violation of the Constitution of the United States, and which therefore we have no right to review. The controlling effect of the reasoning which we have just stated was pointed out, and the mistaken conception upon which the contentions of the plaintiffs in error rest was indicated, in Castillo v. McConico, 168 U. S. 674, 683, 42 L. ed. 622, 625, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2. The contention pressed in argument as to the equal protection of the law clause substantially denies the right of the state to impose any tax on the share of the wife in the community property, resulting from the termination of the community by the death of the husband, or in substance assumes that we have the right to review the action of the state court in deciding that the tax law which it enforced was applicable. We say this because the entire argument proceeds upon the contention that, as the share of the wife in the community property was a vested interest during the life of the husband, it could not, on the death of the husband, be taxed differently from any other property,—viz., according to value,—without violating the Constitution of California, and creating an inequality repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. But this merely rests upon the mistaken conception previously disposed of, since the nature and character of the right of the wife in the community for the purpose of taxation was peculiarly a local question, which we have no power to review.
Affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE JENKINS

v.

HAWKEYE COMMERCIAL MEN'S ASSOCIATION, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 124 N. W. 199.)

Pleading — amendment — consent.

1. In the absence of an answer, a petition may be amended without leave.

Venue — transfer — action for insurance.

2. Where, by a statute, an action upon an insurance policy is maintainable in the county where the loss occurred, the insurer

Note. — May death or injury from substance taken internally be deemed to have been caused by external means.

The principal governing the decision in the above case, that death or bodily injury accidentally occasioned by a substance taken internally is caused by external means, is well established, as but one case (as will hereafter appear) can be found which in any manner questions this proposition. In view of this unanimity of opinion, it is sufficient merely to cite the cases enunciating this rule of law, showing parenthetically the means of the death or bodily injury giving rise to the actions. Bayless v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 14 Blatchf. 143, Fed. Cas. No. 1,138 (taking larger dose of opium than prescribed); Miller v. Fidelity & C. Co. 97 Fed. 836 ("swallowing certain hard, pointed, and resistant substances of food"); Fidelity & C. Co. v. Loewenstein, 46 L.R.A. 450, 38 C. C. A. 29, 97 Fed. 17 (unconsciously and unintentionally inhaling illuminating gas while asleep); Healey v.

has no right to a transfer of the cause to the county where its principal office is located, although the action might have been brought there in the first instance.

Insurance — accident — external means — blood poisoning.

3. Death from blood poisoning due to perforation of the rectum by a bone, presumably swallowed with food, is caused by external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of those terms in an insurance policy.

Appeal — immaterial error — pleadings.

4. Erroneous rulings on the pleadings will not require reversal where, on the merits, judgment was entered for the right party.

Supp. 230 ("accidentally and involuntarily breathing" illuminating gas while asleep); Bailey v. Interstate Casualty Co. 8 App. Div. 127, 40 N. Y. Supp. 513, affirmed without opinion in 158 N. St. Rep. 618, 22 Atl. 871 (inhalation of deadly gas in a well into which the assured descended).

Upon the same principle, in Driskell v. United States Health & Acci. Ins. Co. 117 Mo. App. 362, 93 S. W. 880, the court declared that the death of the assured, resulting from the chance injection of scalding water into his ear, was "certainly" accidental, violent, and external.

Same — notice — sufficiency.

5. A requirement of an accident insurance policy that claimant must give affirmative proof in writing of the death, and of its being the proximate result of external and accidental means, is satisfied if the beneficiary makes a prima facie showing that the death had occurred, and had resulted from the causes stated.

(January 11, 1910.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the District Court for Dubuque County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to require defendant to levy certain assessments, and to pay the amount thereof on a certain benefit certificate. Affirmed.

Fed. 685, in which it appeared that the death of the assured in an accident policy resulted from poison taken under the mistaken belief that it was a harmless medicine, it was stated that such death was an accident, and there could be a recovery upon the policy had it not been for the exception of death from poison, contained therein.

It will be noticed that the liability of an insurer in an accident policy for injuries resulting from substances taken internally is not within the scope of this note, except so far as it turns upon the specific question whether or not such means are external. Attention, however, may be called to the following cases, in which recovery was allowed for death caused by the inhaling of illuminating gas while asleep, under policies insuring against death through external, violent, and accidental means, though the question here discussed was not raised: Lowenstein v. Fidelity & C. Co. 88 Fed. 474; Fidelity & C. Co. v. Waterman, 161 Ill. 632, 32 L.R.A. 654, 44 N. E. 283; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Avers, 217 Ill. 390, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 168, 75 N. E. 506, affirming 119 Ill. App. 402; United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52, 3 S. E. 805.

Nor was this question discussed in Modern Woodmen v. Lawson, 110 Va. 81, 135 Am. St. Rep. 927, 65 S. E. 509, in which recovery was allowed under an accident policy for death occasioned by drinking wood alcohol by mistake for grain alcohol.

The only case to question the principle of law established by the foregoing cases is Hill v. Hartford Acci. Ins. Co. 22 Hun. 187, in which it was held that death resulting from the drinking of a poisonous mixture by mistake for water was not effected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of an accident policy; but this decision is no longer of any authority whatever, since it was specifically disapproved in Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra.

As to liability on accident policy for sickness or death caused by blood poisoning, see note to Cary v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 926.

As to liability under accident policy for death or injury caused by medical treatment, see note to Gardner v. United Surety Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1004, J. A. C.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

Action in equity to require defendant to levy an assessment on its members and pay the proceeds thereof to plaintiff, as beneficiary named in a certificate of insurance. Decree was entered as prayed. The defendant appeals.

Messrs. Bradford & Johnson for appellant.

Messrs. Hurd, Lenahan, & Kiesel for appellee.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 20, 1906, George Jenkins became a member of the Hawkeye Commercial Men's Association. This entitled him, in event of being injured "through external violent, and accidental means," to certain specified benefits. If the bodily injuries so received "resulted in death within twenty-six weeks from said accident, the beneficiary named in his application for membership, or his heirs, if no beneficiary is named therein, shall be paid the proceeds of one assessment of $2 upon each member in good standing, but in no case shall such payment exceed the sum of $5,000." He died August 26, 1907, and the defendant having refused to levy an assessment or make any provision for the payment of the indemnity, this action to enforce compliance with the articles and by-laws of the association was begun in the district court of Dubuque county, April 22, 1908. As no answer had been filed, the plaintiff had the right to amend his petition without leave; and having done so, the court rightly considered the petition as amended in passing on the motion for change of venue. Kay v. Pruden, 101 Iowa, 60, 69 N. W. 1137. And as the loss occurred in Dubuque county, the action was maintainable there, and the application to transfer the cause to Marshall county, the location of defendant's main office, was rightly overruled. See § 3499, Code; Prader v. National Acci. Asso. 95 Iowa, 149, 63 N. W. 601; Matt v. Iowa Mut. Aid Asso. 81 Iowa, 135, 25 Am. St. Rep. 483, 46 N. W. 857. See Grimes v. Northwestern Legion of Honor, 97 Iowa, 315, 64 N. W. 806, 66 N. W. 183.

2. The assured was sixty-one years of age, and in good health. He first complained of a severe pain in the rectum at about 7 o'clock in the morning of April 22, 1906, when at his son's residence in Chicago, Illinois, saying that something must have lodged there. He cleansed his hand, and, putting vaseline on his finger, inserted it in the rectum and withdrew therefrom the rib of a fish, 1½ inches in length, and as large as a darning needle, tapering toward the end. Upon extracting his finger, it and the bone were bloody. He was a traveling passenger agent, and left on business about an hour later, though still complaining of pain, which his appearance indicated. He reached Dubuque the following day, and, on examination, Dr. Greene discovered a laceration of about three eighths of an inch in length inside of the rectum, and through the mucous membrane. Dropping a bit of absorbent cotton in a solution of equal parts of chloride hydrate, tincture of iodine, and carbolic acid, he touched the wound with it, and advised the patient that he saw no cause for apprehension of serious danger, but that he should not move about more than necessary. Deceased returned the next day, complained that he had been obliged to attend to some business, was suffering pain, and asked for something to relieve him. This was given, with directions, and with advice to remain at home. The day following, the physician found him in a high fever, unable to pass urine, with the parts surrounding the anus swollen, and suffering great pain. Two days later Dr. Lewis was called in consultation, and both physicians testified on the trial that death resulted from blood poisoning due to infection from the fish bone or deceased's finger in removing it. Conceding the facts to be as recited, defendants contends that they do not show death to have been the result "of external, violent, and accidental means." It is to be kept in mind that the means, not the injury, must have been of the nature stated.

In Healy v. Mutual Acci. Asso. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L.R.A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52, death by poison accidentally taken was held to be by violent and external means, and a like conclusion was reached in Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L.R.A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, 20 N. E. 347, where the assured died from the accidental inhalation of illuminating gas. In American Acci. Co. v. Reigart, 94 Ky. 547, 21 L.R.A. 651, 42 Am. St. Rep. 374, 23 S. W. 191, while the assured was eating, a piece of meat lodged in the wind pipe, causing death, and this was held to be through violent and external means. In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Hudgins (Tex. Civ. App.) 72 S. W. 1047, the assured ate two raw oysters before discovering they were unsound, and his death was caused by these lodging in the upper part of the intestines, inflaming the mucous membrane, and causing the same to enlarge and obstruct the passage. The eating was held to be accidental, the court quoting with approval from 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 249: "Where, however, the effect is not the natural and probable consequence of the means which produce it,—an effect which does not ordinarily follow, and cannot be reasonably anticipated from the use of the means, or an effect which the actor did not intend to produce, and which he cannot be charged with a design of producing,—it is produced by accidental means.” See definitions collected in Carnes v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 106 Iowa, 281, 68 Am. St. Rep. 306, 76 N. W. 683. In Miller v. Fidelity & C. Co. (C. C.) 97 Fed. 836, the assured swallowed “certain hard, pointed, and resistant substances of wood,” which so perforated the intestinal canal, the tissue of which had been weakened by illness, as to cause death; and the court declared these “to have been external, violent, and accidental means, for they originated outside of the body, and were accidentally violent, although the accidental effect took place within. The insurance is not, by the first clause quoted, limited to an external effect, nor to one beginning at the surface. The accidental operation of external means may be wholly internal.” These decisions and others which might be cited are sufficient warrant for a like decision in the case at bar. They proceed on the theory that the design of this provision of the policy is to guard the insurer against a liability upon a fraudulent claim of the insured for indemnity for bodily injuries of which the only evidence might be the word of the person, and that, as the terms of the policy are to be construed most strongly against the insurer, the means coming from outside the body, though the injury be internal, should be regarded as external. There was no evidence of how the fish bone came to be in the rectum, and therefore it is presumed that it reached there in the ordinary course of nature as other excretions, through the alimentary canal. If it was likely to cause injury, then, as the assured is presumed to have given heed to the instincts of self-preservation, it is not to be inferred that he swallowed the bone voluntarily. See Stephenson v. Bankers' Life Asso. 108 Iowa, 641, 79 N. W. 459; Tackman v. Brotherhood of American Yeoman, 132 Iowa, 64, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 974, 106 N. W. 350. But, regardless, of whether, in eating fish, he may have carelessly swallowed the bone and all, it is to be said that indigestible materials ordinarily pass out of the system without injury or inconvenience. That this bone caught in the rectum and inflicted the wound was so out of the ordinary course of things as to constitute an accident. The effect was one which does not ordinarily follow, could not reasonably have been anticipated, and cannot be charged to have resulted from design. Manifestly, then, it was within the well-recognized definitions of accident. Nor is this conclusion obviated by the circumstance that death resulted from septicemia, or blood poisoning. Without the accidental 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) wound by the fish bone, blood poisoning would not have ensued, and therefore that disease was incidental to the wound. Central Acci. Ins. Co. v. Rembe, 220 Ill. 151, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 933, 110 Am. St. Rep. 235, 77 N. E. 123, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 155; Martin v. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. 151 N. Y. 94, 45 N. E. 379; Western Commercial Travelers' Asso. v. Smith, 29 C. A. 223, 56 U. S. App. 393, 85 Fed. 401; Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 165 Ind. 317, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 422, 112 Am. St. Rep. 232, 75 N. E. 262, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 551; Cary v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 127 Wis. 67, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 926, 115 Am. St. Rep. 997, 106 N. W. 1055, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 484.

3. Our conclusion on the merits of the case obviates the necessity of reviewing the rulings on the motion to strike portions of the answer, and on the demurrer to other portions thereof; for, were any of these found to be erroneous, they could not have been prejudicial. That the notice and proofs of loss were furnished in time appears from Connell v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 139 Iowa, 444, 116 N. W. 820, and the affidavits furnished defendant constituted affirmative proof in writing of the death, and of its being the proximate result of external and accidental means.” By affirmative proof is meant such evidence of the truth of the matters asserted as tends to establish them, and this regardless of the character of the evidence offered. The clause exacting such proof as a condition precedent merely required the matters mentioned to be shown affirmatively; that is, that the beneficiary make a prima facie showing that death had occurred and had resulted as stated. This was done.

Affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

J. J. SMITH LUMBER COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

SCOTT COUNTY GARBAGE REDUCING & FUEL COMPANY et al.

STROHBEHN & PICKLUM, Interveners, Appts.

MUELLER LUMBER COMPANY,
Garnishee.

(— Iowa, —, 128 N. W. 389.)

Garnishment — failure to notify principal — effect on garnishee.

1. Failure to give notice of a garnishment proceeding to the principal does not entitle the garnishee to a discharge or dismissal of the proceeding, under a statute providing that no judgment shall be entered against the garnishee until notice has been given to the principal defendant.

Sale — rescission — insolvency of buyer.

2. Mere insolvency of the buyer at the time of a sale of chattels is not ground for rescission on the part of the seller.

Set-off — purchase price — garnishment.

3. One who, after selling chattels to an insolvent, seizes and sells them to another, may, upon being garnished for their value by a judgment creditor of the buyer, set off against the claim his account against the buyer for the unpaid purchase price.

(November 17, 1910.)

APPEAL by the plaintiff and interveners from an order of the District Court for Scott County, discharging the garnishee in a garnishment proceeding in which the Mueller Lumber Co. was garnished on a judgment held by plaintiff against the Scott County Garbage Reducing & Fuel Co. et al. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Helmick & Boudinot, William Theophilus, and Henry Thuenen, for appellants:

The title to the lumber sold and delivered to the principal defendant by the garnishee passed to such principal defendant, and the garnishee had no further right to it or claim upon it.

Warder v. Hoover, 51 Iowa, 491, 1 N. W. 795; Franklin Sugar Ref. Co. v. Collier, 89 Iowa, 69, 56 N. W. 279; Bentley v. Snyder, 101 Iowa, 8, 69 N. W. 1023; Kramer v. Messner, 101 Iowa, 88, 69 N. W. 1142.

Creditors may follow property or its value in the hands of third parties.

Risser & Co. v. Rathburn, 71 Iowa, 113, 32 N. W. 198; Thomas v. McDonald, 102 Iowa, 564, 71 N. W. 572.

The liability of a garnishee to the execution creditor may be greater than his liability to the principal defendant.

Kenosha Stove Co. v. Shedd, 82 Iowa, 540, 48 N. W. 933; Citizens' State Bank v. Council Bluffs Fuel Co. 89 Iowa, 618, 57 N. W. 444; Thomas v. McDonald, supra; Jordan v. Crickett, 123 Iowa, 576, 99 N. W. 163; Swett v. Brown, 5 Pick. 178; Allen v. Hall, 5 Met. 263.

Note. — Right of one garnished in respect of property wrongfully taken from the debtor, to set off his own claim against the latter.

Aside from J. J. SMITH LUMBER CO. v. SCOTT COUNTY GARBAGE REDUCING & FUEL CO., the only case found upon this question is Allen v. Hall, 5 Met. 263, which is sufficiently set out in the former. Cases where the wrongful possession of the property was obtained by the garnishee by a conveyance, fraudulent as against other creditors, involve distinctive questions, and have not been included, since they would be of little or no value in determining the question here under discussion. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Alfred C. Mueller, for Mueller Lumber Company, appellee:

The court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this cause of action, as the record fails to show that any notice of garnishment proceedings was served upon the principal defendant.

Code of Iowa, Supplement, § 3947; Diltz v. Chambers, 2 G. Greene, 479; Hodges v. Hodges, 6 Iowa, 78, 71 Am. Dec. 388; Hakes v. Shupe, 27 Iowa, 465; Williams v. Williams, 61 Iowa, 612, 16 N. W. 718; Wise v. Rothschild, 67 Iowa, 84, 24 N. W. 603; Schaller v. Marker, 136 Iowa, 575, 114 N. W. 43.

The plaintiff in garnishment proceedings stands in the shoes of the original defendant, and the garnishee is not to be placed in a worse condition than if the defendant himself were enforcing his claim.

Smith v. Clarke, 9 Iowa, 244; Thomas v. Hillhouse, 17 Iowa, 67; Fairfield v. McNary, 37 Iowa, 75; Des Moines Cotton Mill Co. v. Cooper, 93 Iowa, 654, 61 N. W. 1084; Streeter v. Gleason, 120 Iowa, 703, 95 N. W. 242.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and interveners obtained their several judgments against the defendants the Scott County Garbage Reducing & Fuel Company on September 15, 1908. On the same day executions were issued which were levied immediately by garnishing the Mueller Lumber Company. The garnishee appeared and denied all liability. Issue was taken upon such denial, a jury waived, and the case tried to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts: "The parties admit that the garnishee sold and delivered to the Scott County Garbage Reducing & Fuel Company lumber to the amount of $806.03, which lumber was received and accepted by said garbage company on July 20, 1906; that thereafter, on July 28, 1906, said garnishee, Mueller Lumber Company, went upon the property of said defendant garbage company, and hauled away lumber formerly by it delivered, lumber to the amount of $678.34, without the consent or permission or knowledge of the defendant garbage company, and without any legal process, and the account of the said garbage company was credited to that amount. Said lumber has since been commingled with other lumber and sold by the Mueller Lumber Company, and been converted by the Mueller Lumber Company to its own use. It is further stipulated that there has been ordered in this cause heretofore that the sheriff collect all the assets of said defendant garbage company, and that the same be applied in the order as provided in said decree, of record page 505, in Record 47. It is further agreed that the said decree of distribution of assets that may be collected may be modified in that $30 of Strohbehn & Picklum shall take precedence of Smith Lumber Company. That at the time the Mueller Lumber Company hauled away said lumber, the Scott County Garbage Reducing & Fuel Company, the principal defendant in said case, was insolvent, and such taking and appropriation of the said lumber was never ratified by the said garbage company."

The trial resulted in an order finding no indebtedness from the garnishee to the principal debtor, dismissing the garnishment, and discharging the garnishee. We are asked on this record to reverse the judgment on the theory that, according to the agreed statement of facts, garnishee was a wrongdoer in taking the property of the principal debtor, and that it either holds the property so taken, or the proceeds thereof, for the principal debtor, and that it cannot offset its claim for the purchase price against its liability to the principal debtor in this proceeding, but, being a wrongdoer, must respond to the judgment creditor. Appellee disputes this proposition, claims that the garnishee has the right to rescind the sale of the goods to the principal debtor on the ground of fraud; that it did rescind, and is entitled to hold the goods and the proceeds. It also says that, in any event, as the principal debtor is also indebted to it in a larger sum than the value of the property taken, plaintiff and intervenor acquired nothing by their garnishment. It further claims that no notice has been served upon the principal debtor, and that for this reason neither the district nor this court has any jurisdiction of the garnishment proceedings.

1. We shall first dispose of the jurisdictional question. Section 3947 of the Code Supplement of 1907, provides that no judgment shall be entered in the garnishment proceedings "until the principal defendant shall have had ten days' notice of the garnishment proceedings." Under this provision it is clear, of course, that without notice to the principal defendant no judgment can be entered against the garnishee; but it is equally clear, we think, that lack of such notice is no reason for discharging the garnishee or dismissing the proceedings. In other words, the notice is not jurisdictional in the sense that the proceedings are void, or nugatory until such notice is given. The garnishee cannot ordinarily obtain a discharge because no notice is given to the principal defendant. He may insist, however, that no judgment can properly be rendered against him until such notice is given. This proposition does not seem to have been raised in the district court, and there is really nothing in the record to show whether or not such notice was given. None of the cases relied upon by appellee upon this proposition are in point. See Schaller v. Marker, 136 Iowa, 575, 114 N. W. 43. As supporting our conclusion, see Iowa Business Men's Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Fitch, 142 Iowa, 329, 120 N. W. 694.

2. The general rule as to garnishment is that the plaintiff in garnishment stands in the shoes of the original defendant, and that he can have no greater rights than the judgment defendant, and the garnishee is not to be placed in any worse condition than if the defendant himself were enforcing his claim. Streeter v. Gleason, 120 Iowa, 703, 95 N. W. 242; Des Moines Cotton Mill Co. v. Cooper, 93 Iowa, 654, 61 N. W. 1084; Smith v. Clarke, 9 Iowa, 244, and cases cited. To this general rule there are some exceptions, as Kenosha Stove Co. v. Shedd, 82 Iowa, 540, 48 N. W. 933; Citizens' State Bank v. Council Bluffs Fuel Co. 89 Iowa, 618, 57 N. W. 444; Thomas v. McDonald, 102 Iowa, 564, 71 N. W. 572; Jordan v. Crickett, 123 Iowa, 576, 99 N. W. 163. In the Citizens' State Bank Case, supra, it is said: "Now, while it is the general rule that the garnishee's liability to the defendant is the measure of his liability to a creditor of the defendant, yet such rule is by no means universal. The law is that, when the garnishee holds property of the defendant under a fraudulent transfer or arrangement, the right of the plaintiff to hold the garnishee liable is not limited to the defendant's right against the garnishee." In the Kenosha Stove Case, supra, the court used this language: "As between Shedd, Billings, and Bixby, they could not allege that the transaction was fraudulent, and Shedd cannot shield himself from liability by pleading his own fraud. He would not be permitted to hold property on the ground that he committed larceny to acquire it; nor will he be permitted to escape liability in this case on the ground of his fraudulent acts in concert with Billings and Bixby." And in the Thomas Case, supra, we said: "She [garnishee] received the money, his property, ostensibly to satisfy the judgment; and the law will not permit him to recover anything she may have received in carrying out their common design to cheat his creditors. But the creditors may follow his property,—and money is property, even when in the hands of third parties,—and insist upon its proper application to the satisfaction of his debts."

Appellants rely chiefly, however, upon a rule announced in Allen v. Hall, 5 Met. 263. In that case "A attached the goods of B, his debtor, and caused them to be sold at auction on the writ, without conforming to the provisions of . . .

[the law], and himself became the purchaser of the goods, and took them into his possession. Held, in a process of foreign attachment [garnishment] in which A was summoned as trustee [garnishee] of B, that he could not set off the debt due to him from B against the value of said goods, but that he was chargeable as trustee [garnishee] of B to the amount of the value of the goods." Chief Justice Shaw wrote the opinion in that case, and, among other things, said:

"The great question, then, the only question, is whether he owes the principal debt or anything; and, if it appears that he does, he is held liable to pay it to his creditor's creditor, instead of paying it to the creditor himself. It is unnecessary here to consider the various questions which may arise, as to the nature of such debts, whether absolute, or contingent, and the nature of such contingency; whether, if uncertain at the time, it can be made certain at a future time, by sales, collections of money, or other proceedings, showing that, in point of fact, the trustee was a debtor to the principal at the time of the attachment. In such cases, although the facts are subsequently disclosed, and the accounts subsequently adjusted, in order to charge the trustee, the result must show that the trustee was a debtor to the principal at the time of the attachment. This distinction between the two classes of cases will go far to show in what cases the trustee may or may not set off such claims as he may have against the principal debtor, and to reconcile what may, without discrimination, be deemed to be conflicting authorities. On the provision in which the trustee is charged as a debtor, it is very obvious that, as he is a mere third party, called in to pay his debt in a manner different from that in which he was bound to pay it, and in which his own rights are not drawn into controversy, he ought not to be placed in a worse situation than he would be if he were called to make the settlement with his creditor. The balance only, after all just allowances, is the sum for which he ought to be held. He shall therefore have the benefit of a set-off, legal or equitable, in his own right, or in the right of those with whom he is privy, and in whose favor the debt claimed to be due from the trustee could, in his hands, be made available by way of set-off in any of the modes provided by law. Hathaway v. Russell, 16 Mass. 473; Picquet v. Swan, 4 Mason, 443, Fed. Cas. No. 11,133.

"But where the trustee has goods in his custody, the property of the principal defendant, and in their nature liable to be attached by the process of law, the question whether the trustee has any right to set off claims of his own must depend upon the fact whether he has any lien, legal or 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

equitable, upon such goods, or any right, as against the owner, as whose property they are attached, by contract, by custom, or otherwise, to hold the goods, or to retain the possession of them, in security of some debt or claim of his own. If the party who is summoned as trustee has a mere naked possession of the goods, without any special property or lien; if the principal debtor is the owner and has a present right of possession, so that he might lawfully take them out of the custody, or authorize another to take them out of the custody, of the present holder,—they would be liable to be attached as the property of the general owner, by an officer, under the common process of attachment, if he could have access to them, and no right of the trustee would be violated. But if the officer cannot have access to the goods, so as to take them into custody, if they are secreted by the trustee, or if the trustee sets up pretended claims and rights of possession, so that the creditor and officer cannot safely take them out of the custody of the trustee and require the answer and disclosure of the trustee, as to the grounds of his claim to the property or possession, then he may be summoned as trustee; and if it shall subsequently appear, on his disclosures, that he had only such naked possession, without any lien or right of possession, then the goods stand charged in his hands, till judgment and execution; and he has no greater right to charge these goods with a debt of his own, by way of set-off, than he would have had if the goods had been taken into custody by the officer at the time of the attachment. This, we think, is the result of the laws on this subject. Allen v. Megguire, 15 Mass. 490; Swett v. Brown, 5 Pick. 178; Brewer v. Pitkin, 11 Pick. 298. . . .

"The respondent obtained the bare custody of the goods, without lawful possession or right of possession. If the respondent could have the goods in security of his original debt against Tufts, or set off that debt, under this process, he would in effect get possession of his debtor's goods, under color of legal process, without conforming to the requisitions of law, and thus avail himself of such unauthorized possession to the same extent as if he had taken and sold the goods on execution, in conformity to law,—which he cannot do."

The distinction pointed out by the learned Chief Justice is clear and should be preserved in the instant case. The agreed statement of facts is meager as to many of the vital propositions. It does, however, negative any thought of fraud in the relations between the judgment debtor and the garnishee. That is to say, there is no showing, either directly or indirectly, by inference, that in what was done between them there was any purpose to cheat or defraud creditors of the judgment defendant. It appears that the garnishee attempted on its motion to rescind the sale of its lumber to the judgment defendant because of the insolvency and fraud of the purchaser. But it does not appear, except by inference, that the purchaser was insolvent when the goods were sold. The sale was made July 20, 1906, and the attempt at rescission was made on the 28th of the same month. The judgment defendant did not consent to the rescission, and never ratified the same. Now, it may be that the claimed rescission was so close to the time of sale that insolvency of the purchaser at the time of sale would be inferred; but mere insolvency of the buyer at the time of sale is not ground for rescission. Houghtaling v. Hills, 59 Iowa, 287, 13 N. W. 305; Oswego Starch Factory v. Lendrum, 57 Iowa, 573, 42 Am. Rep. 53, 10 N. W. 900; American Exp. Co. v. Smith, 57 Iowa, 242, 10 N. W. 655; Franklin Sugar Ref. Co. v. Collier, 89 Iowa, 69, 56 N. W. 279. If coupled with an intent on the part of the purchaser never to pay for the goods, or if the natural and probable result of his act is to defraud the seller, then rescission may be had. P. Cox Shoe Co. v. Adams, 105 Iowa, 402, 75 N. W. 316; Deere v. Morgan, 114 Iowa, 287, 86 N. W. 271; Phelps D. & P. Co. v. Samson, 113 Iowa, 145, 84 N. W. 1051; Seeley v. Seeley-Howe-Le Van Co. 130 Iowa, 626, 114 Am. St. Rep. 452, 105 N. W. 380; Starr Bros. v. Stevenson, 91 Iowa, 684, 60 N. W. 217.

We do not think that the record shows sufficient ground for a rescission of the sale as between the garnishee and the judgment defendant, and, if the garnishee still held the goods, we should have no doubt of the right of plaintiff to charge the garnishee with the goods or their value. But it appears that the garnishee took the goods on July 28, 1906, credited the value thereof to the account of the judgment debtor, commingled the lumber with other goods, and sold and converted the same to its own use. The garnishments in question were run more than two years after the alleged conversion. If the garnishment had not been run, and the judgment debtor had attempted to enforce its claim against the garnishee, it would have brought an action of tort for the conversion of the goods, or, waiving the tort, might have brought action on an implied promise to pay for the same. The goods themselves had been disposed of, and the judgment debtor could not have brought either an action of replevin or of detinue for the recovery of the same. Both the latter actions are for the recovery of personal chattels in specie. In the action of replevin, and doubtless in detinue, the defendant in the action cannot interpose a counterclaim. See Code 1897, § 4164. The reason for this is that it would allow a creditor to forcibly seize the property of his debtor without process, and then plead the indebtedness as an offset to an action to recover it back. Palmer v. Palmer, 90 Iowa, 17, 57 N. W. 645. But one cannot maintain an action of replevin where he shows an actual conversion of the property. Woodling v. Mitchell, 127 Iowa, 262, 103 N. W. 115. Here the agreed statement of facts shows an actual conversion by the garnishee, and that neither the action of replevin nor detinue could have been brought against the garnishee for the recovery of the specific goods. In an action brought for the value of the goods, as in conversion, or upon an implied promise to pay the value thereof, the garnishee, as defendant, might have pleaded by way of set-off its account against the judgment defendant, had he been the plaintiff in the action. Code 1897, § 3570, and cases cited in annotations. As further supporting these views, see Laughlin v. Main, 63 Iowa, 580, 19 N. W. 673; Porter v. Dalhoff, 59 Iowa, 459, 13 N. W. 420.

One other thought in this connection is quite conclusive of plaintiff's rights. In order to charge the garnishee, he must either have actual possession of the judgment debtor's property, or be indebted to the judgment defendant at the time the note of garnishment is served. Code, §§ 3897, 3935; Smalley v. Miller, 71 Iowa, 90, 32 N. W. 187.

It conclusively appears that the garnishee in this case did not have actual possession of the property, and it could only be charged as a debtor of the judgment defendant. If sought to be so charged, the garnishee might interpose its account against the judgment debtor as a set-off or a counterclaim, and, granted that it could do this, it may do the same when it is sought to be held as garnishee. These conclusions render it unnecessary to determine whether a tortfeasor is subject to garnishment; for, conceding that he is, under our liberal provisions as to counterclaim, he could, had he been sued by the judgment debtor, have interposed a counterclaim for the amount owing him by the judgment debtor. Nothing herein decided runs counter to the views expressed by Justice Shaw in the case heretofore cited. In that case the garnishee held actual possession of the property which he had taken wrongfully, and he was unable to show any lien upon the goods. Moreover, in an action for the recovery of the goods, he could not have interposed his account as a counterclaim. So much depends upon the statutes of a given state that cases from other jurisdictions are of little help. The general rule regarding set-off or counterclaim is stated in Shinn on Attachment & Garnishment, § 624, as follows: "The policy of the law is that the garnishee, being an indifferent and sometimes an unwilling party to the litigation between the plaintiff and defendant, shall not be disturbed in his rights. As above stated, he is permitted to interpose all the defenses which he can show against the claim of the principal defendant. The one which he most frequently desires to interpose is a claim of set-off. After much litigation upon the subject, it is now a well-established rule that the garnishee will be allowed to claim in his answer and retain for himself any demand . . . allowed, either by the common law or by statute, had the action been brought by the principal defendant himself, or if the proceedings had been wholly between the principal defendant and himself. . . . The demands which he may deduct from his liability to the defendant are not confined to matters which are technically termed 'set-off.' He is further entitled to show and retain whatever he might have demanded of the defendant by way of 'recoupment' or any like defense arising upon their contract relation, even though it be a penalty arising upon a stipulation in such contract."

These statements are well fortified by the authorities cited in support of the text, among them: Clinton Nat. Bank v. Studemann, 74 Iowa, 104, 37 N. W. 112. See also Drake, Attachm. 7th ed. §§ 689a, 690.

With the distinction in mind between cases where a garnishee has the actual possession of the property of the judgment debtor, and cases where he is sought to be charged as a debtor of the judgment defendant, the case now in hand is not difficult of solution.

The trial court was right in dismissing the writ and discharging the garnishee, and the judgment must be, and it is, affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SOPHIA E. RODERICK

v.

PARKER M. SANBORN.

(106 Me. 159, 76 Atl. 263.)

Fixtures — storm shutters — mortgage.

Storm doors and windows made to fit a house and fastened in place by screws are fixtures which will pass with a mortgage and subsequent deed to the mortgagee, although during certain periods of the year 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

they are removed from their places and stored on the premises.

(November 26, 1909.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Franklin County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to recover the value of certain storm doors and windows which were alleged to have been converted by defendant. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Enoch O. Greenleaf, for plaintiff:

In order to render chattels incident to the real estate and make them fixtures, actual annexation to the freehold, and an adaptation to its purposes, must both unite.

Despatch Line v. Bellamy Mfg. Co. 12 N. H. 205, 37 Am. Dec. 203; Lathrop v. Blake, 23 N. H. 46.

To constitute a fixture, there must be not only an actual annexation to the realty, but it must be the intention of the party to make it a permanent accession to the freehold.

Thompson v. Smith, 111 Iowa, 718. 50

Note. — Storm doors and windows and screens as fixtures.

In Harrison v. Smith, 19 N. S. 516, double windows put in place by a tenant, and screwed on, were held to have become part of the realty, and damages were allowed the owner for their removal by the tenant's successor claiming under a bill of sale.

What appears to be the only other case as to storm windows differs in its conclusion, but the conflict is to be accounted for probably in the difference as to the manner of annexation. Thus, in Peck v. Batchelder, 40 Vt. 233, 94 Am. Dec. 392, the question arose between vendor and vendee as to whether certain double windows passed upon a sale of the house to which they belonged. The windows were made for the house, fitted to its window casings, and set in place, where they remained for a short time, but they were never nailed or fastened in, and no preparations had been made to fasten them to the house, the original frames and casings not having been constructed for double windows. The decision in favor of the vendor was upon the ground that the very manner in which the windows were put in and temporarily used negatived any intention that they should become a part of the realty.

The question as to storm doors and windows seems quite closely analogous to that with respect to screen doors and windows. Upon this question there is some conflict of authority, due perhaps to some extent to differences in the facts.

Window screens used in summer residences during the summer have been held fixtures as between mortgagee of realty and purchaser of personality. Cunningham v.

L.R.A. 780, 82 Am. St. Rep. 541, 83 N. W. 789; Fuller-Warren Co. v. Harter, 110 Wis. 80, 53 L.R.A. 603, 84 Am. St. Rep. 867, 85 N. W. 698; Kimball v. Grand Lodge, 131 Mass. 59; McFarlane v. Foley, 27 Ind. App. 484, 87 Am. St. Rep. 264, 60 N. E. 357; Ottumwa Woolen Mill Co. v. Hawley, 44 Iowa, 57, 24 Am. Rep. 719; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 42 Kan. 23, 4 L.R.A. 284, 16 Am. St. Rep. 471, 21 Pac. 809.

The fact that plaintiff had used the windows on the house is of no consequence, for it makes no difference whether they were ever on the house, if they were not so at time of sale.

Mr. George W. Gower, for defendant: There can be no severance unless by the owner of the fee.

It is not necessary that a thing be constantly affixed to realty.

The circumstances, object, mode, etc., must be considered.

Seaboard Realty Co. 67 N. J. Eq. 210, 58 Atl. 819.

And "mosquito transoms" and window screens, each being fitted to its particular window and shoved up and down on grooves, have been held to be fixtures passing with the sale of a hotel. Fratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 132, 41 Am. Rep. 251.

So, window and door screens manufactured for a particular house, though not physically attached or screwed, but simply fastened by buttons, have been held "appurtenances," within a statute giving a mechanics' lien for material or labor in the construction of a building or appurtenances. E. M. Fish Co. v. Young, 127 Wis. 149, 106 N. W. 795.

In Hook v. Bolton, 199 Mass. 244, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 699, 127 Am. St. Rep. 487, 85 N. E. 175, the question whether window screens and doors were fixtures passing under a mortgage on a dwelling house was held to be for the jury, the criterion being whether it was the intention that they should become part of the building and be used with it, to promote the object for which it was erected or to which it has been devoted, without any intention that they should be taken out and used elsewhere, unless by reason of some unexpected change in the use of the building itself.

There is a presumption that the annexations are permanent.

Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 4 Met. 314, 38 Am. Dec. 368; Arnold v. Crowder, 81 Ill. 56, 25 Am. Rep. 260.

The burden is on plaintiff to prove that the doors and windows were not fixtures.

6 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. p. 4710, § 2890 and citations; Peck v. Batchelder, 40 Vt. 233, 94 Am. Dec. 392.

The storm doors and windows were fixtures.

Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th pp. 24, 25; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law p. 50; Farrar v. Stackpole, 6 Me. 154, 19 Am. Bishop, 11 N. Y. 125, 62 Am. Dec. 68.

But screen doors and windows were held in Hall v. Law Guarantee & Trust Soc. 22 Wash. 305, 79 Am. St. Rep. 935, 60 Pac. 643, not to be fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee.

And in Durkee v. Powell, 75 App. Div. 176, 77 N. Y. Supp. 368, the court held that, even assuming that window and door screens are not property which in their own nature determine their legal character, yet the screens in dispute should be deemed personal property as between the parties, it appearing that prior to the foreclosure sale the purchaser at that sale had bargained for them as personality.

And a storm house attached by screws and nails was held in Bernheimer v. Adams, 70 App. Div. 120, 75 N. Y. Supp. 93 (affirmed in 175 N. Y. 472, 67 N. E. 1080) to be an ordinary trade fixture removable by a tenant.

And among the articles in a saloon declared in Webber v. Franklin Brewing Co. 123 App. Div. 465, 108 N. Y. Supp. 251 (affirmed on opinion below in 198 N. Y. 509, 92 N. E. 1106) to be trade fixtures, were screens and summer doors.

Ordinary doors, blinds, and shutters do not possess the same distinctive features as screens, storm doors, and windows, and are not included within this note. W. A. S.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trover to recover the value of certain outside windows and outside doors, commonly known as "storm windows" and "storm doors," alleged to have been converted by the defendant. The plaintiff claims them as her own personal property, and the defendant claims that they passed to him by virtue of a mortgage and final deed to him from the plaintiff. The case is reported upon the agreed statement, in which it appears that the plaintiff's husband purchased the premises in question in 1904, and conveyed them to his wife in 1908, in which sale the doors and windows were included, but not mentioned in the deed. The title to the real estate is not further involved. That part of the agreed statement pertinent to the issue is as follows:

"Said Joseph A. and Sophia E. Roderick immediately took possession of the premises, with the intention of making it their home, and lived thereon until on or about October 8, 1908.

"Said Joseph, with the purpose of making the place more comfortable for use, procured the outside windows and doors to be made for the house and especially fitted to it; the doors and windows being prepared in the usual manner for fastening to the house by means of screws passing through hinges on the doors and into the frame of the door casing, and by means of screws passing through the double window frames and into the window casings of the house. Each window frame was fitted to a particular window casing on the building, and the window casings were numbered consecutively from one upwards, and the double windows were numbered to correspond, so that it might be readily determined to which window casing each outside or double window was designed to be attached and used.

"Said outside doors and windows were attached by means of screws as aforesaid, and used on the house during each winter that it was occupied by said Roderick, and up to October 8, 1908. In the spring of each year they were removed and stored in the stable on the premises, where they remained until attached to the house the next winter, when they would be replaced in their respective places on the building until the following spring."

It also appears that in February, 1907, when the plaintiff mortgaged the premises to the defendant, the doors and windows were then actually attached to the house, and that in October 1908, when the plaintiff conveyed the premises to the defendant by warranty deed, the doors and windows were then upon the premises in the stable chamber.

The only question involved is whether the windows and doors under this statement of facts became a part of the realty, so that the title vested in the defendant under his deed of the premises, or remained personal property, the title to which did not pass with the deed.

Whatever the early understanding, it is well settled now that whether a chattel has become a part of the realty is a mixed question of law and fact. In the case before us the facts are admitted, and from these facts is to be inferred the legal character of these doors and windows. It is now generally conceded that the old tests of physical character of annexation are discarded, and the modern trend of authority is adverse to any arbitrary or fixed rule by which it may be determined whether a chattel is or is not a fixture. It is now, however, held that a chattel is not merged in the realty unless, in the language of Hayford v. Wentworth, 97 Me. 347, 54 Atl. 940: (1) It is physically annexed, at least by juxtaposition, to the realty or some appurtenances thereof; (2) it is adapted to and usable with that part of the realty to which it is annexed; and (3) it was annexed with the intention on the part of the person making the annexation to make it a permanent accession to the realty. See also 19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1036. In order to meet the first of these conditions, it is not necessary that the chattel should be physically fastened to the realty at all times. There may be constructive, as well as actual, annexation. It was said in Farrar v. Stackpole, 6 Me. 154, 19 Am. Dec. 201: "Although the being fastened or fixed to the freehold is the leading principle in many of the cases in regard to fixtures, it has not been the only one. Windows, doors, and window shutters are often hung, but not fastened, to a building; yet they are properly part of the real estate, and pass with it, because it is not the mere fixing or fastening which is regarded, but the use, nature, and intention." The controversy in this case was whether a chain used in a sawmill passed with a deed of the mill as a part of the realty. It was decided in the affirmative, although the chain was not necessarily fastened to any part of the mill. "The civil law allows movable property to be made immovable by destination. Corresponding to this is the annexation by intention of the recent common law. Where such annexation is allowed, it is sufficient that the owner intends to make the chattel a part of the realty. It is not necessary to use force. It is enough to exercise the will. If this is duly manifested, the article is dedicated to the realty, and its status as personality has ceased. These two methods of annexation are sometimes called actual and constructive annexation." [19 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1039.] In the note under the section is cited the English rule. "In the leading English case it is said that what constitutes annexation sufficient to make the chattel a part of the realty must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances as indicating the intention, viz., the degree of annexation and the object of annexation." A reference to the statement of facts leaves little doubt that the manner in which the doors and windows were actually and intended to be fastened to the house for use satisfies the degree and kind of annexation required by the law.

To establish the requirements of the second condition, it is necessary to show that the doors and windows were adapted to and used with that part of the realty to which they were annexed. Discussion upon this proposition would be superfluous. The agreed statement is conclusive. It conceded that "said Joseph, with the purpose of making the place more comfortable for use, procured outside windows and doors to be made for the house and specially fitted to it." The rest of the paragraph emphasizes the proof of adaptability, but this is sufficient.

The third and most important element to be established tending to prove that a chattel has been merged into a fixture is the intention with which the party provided its use. This principle has been very recently stated in Portland v. New England Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 103 Me. 240, 68 Atl. 1040, in this language: "The intention with which an article is annexed to the freehold has come to be recognized as the cardinal rule and most important criterion by which to determine its character as a fixture, and the attendant facts and circumstances are chiefly valuable as evidence of such intention. 'This controlling intention is not the initial intention at the time of procuring the article in question, nor the secret intention with which it is affixed, but the intention which the law deduces from all the circumstances of the annexation.'" The same idea is stated in Hayford v. Wentworth, supra, in this language: "As to the intention, of course, it is not the unrevealed, secret intention that controls. It is the intention indicated by the proven facts and circumstances, including the relation, the conduct, and language of the parties,—the intention that should be inferred from all these." We think the inference from the agreed facts is conclusive upon this point. Joseph A. Roderick, who procured the windows and doors, with his wife, "took possession of the premises with the intention of making it their home," and lived there over four years, using these windows and doors as they were designed to be used during the whole period. They were "made for the house and especially fitted to it." "Each window frame was fitted to a particular window casing on the building, and the window casings were numbered consecutively." They were procured "with the purpose of making the place more comfortable for use." A chattel need not be absolutely necessary to the completeness of the dwelling house if obviously adapted and intended to be used with it. Bainway v. Cobb, 99 Mass. 457. The last phrase quoted from the agreed statement seems to bring the case within the doctrine of Bainway v. Cobb. The ordinary meaning of the language of this statement shows that these doors and windows were obtained for the house, and not for the occupants; to make the place more comfortable for use, not for A, or B, but for anyone who might have occasion to occupy it.

We cannot avoid the conclusion that these doors and windows were procured for permanent use with the house, added to the value of its use, and inured to the benefit of the estate.

Judgment for the defendant.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

H. P. HOOD & SONS, Incorporated,
v.

MARYLAND CASUALTY COMPANY.

(206 Mass. 223, 92 N. E. 329.)

Indemnity Insurance — sickness of employee — glanders.

Injury to an employee from glanders contracted from horses which his duties required him to handle is within a policy insuring the employer against liability for the loss imposed by law upon the insured for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by an employee while on duty within the premises of the assured in the operation of his trade or business.

Note. — Injuries covered by employers' indemnity policy.

In Cashman v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 187 Mass. 188, 72 N. E. 957, it was held that a stevedore insured against liability for accident to his employees while engaged in the business of a stevedore was entitled to recovery for damages for injury to an

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after judgment in plaintiff's favor of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an employer's indemnity policy. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Whipple, Sears, & Ogden for plaintiff.

Mr. M. O. Garner for defendant.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant issued to the plaintiff corporation a policy insuring it "against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the employee caused by a defect in a runway on a wharf belonging to a coal company, which the assured, in a contract with the owner to unload the coal coming to it there, had agreed to keep in repair so long as he was engaged in the business of unloading coal at that place.

In Fuller Bros. Toll Lumber & Box Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 94 Mo. App. 490, 68 S. W. 222, a policy indemnifying a wooden-box manufacturer against liability for damages on account of bodily injuries to his employees while on duty within his factory, resulting from the operation of the trade or business described in a schedule which was made a part of the contract of insurance, was held to cover damages for injury to an employee caused by the fall of an elevator while he was performing the duties of his employment at the factory, though the elevator was not mentioned in the schedule.

In Columbia Paper Stock Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 104 Mo. App. 157, 78 S. W. 320, kidney disease contracted by an employee by the handling of infected rags and paper in the ordinary course of her employer's business was held to be an injury "accidentally suffered" within the meaning of an employer's liability policy.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Bright, 24 Ohio C. C. 441, it was held that injuries to an employee of one insured as a "contracting carpenter," received while employed upon a brick hoisting apparatus leased and operated jointly by his employer and another for carrying up the materials used by each, was covered by the insurance, where it appeared that he continued to receive his wages from his employer only, and that the hoisting apparatus was a necessary and usual part of the business of a contracting carpenter.

In Fidelity & C. Co. v. Lone Oak Cotton Oil & Gin Co. 35 Tex. Civ. App. 260, 80 S. W. 541, it was held that an injury to a carpenter in the regular employ of a cotton oil and gin company, received while removing some scaffolding required to be taken down after the factory had been constructed and was being operated, was within a policy to indemnify such company against loss from liability for damages on account of assured for damages on account of bodily injuries or death accidentally suffered while this policy is in force, by any employee . . . of the assured while on duty within the factory, shop, or yard described in the schedule . . . in and during the operation of the trade or business described in the schedule." While the policy was in force one Jeremiah Barry, who was employed by the plaintiff as a hostler in its stables at Charlestown, had the care of horses which were afterwards found to have been suffering from glanders and were killed, and Barry was directed to assist in cleaning up the stalls. No notice was given to him that the horses suffered or had suffered from glanders. Glanders is an infectious disease, and subsequently Barry bodily injuries to any of its employees within the factory, shop, or yards in and during the operation of the trade or business of the assured.

In Hoven v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. (Hoven v. West Superior Iron & Steel Co.) 93 Wis. 201, 32 L.R.A. 388, 67 N. W. 46, it was held that an injury to a workman in an iron and steel works caused by the fall of a girder, which was being raised by an independent crew building an addition to the works, was within a policy of indemnity against claims for compensation for injuries in "all operations connected with the business of iron and steel works."

In Andrus v. Maryland Casualty Co. 91 Minn. 358, 98 N. W. 200, under a policy indemnifying the assured for damages for injuries to persons in or about a certain building owned by him, but which excepted loss from liability for injuries suffered by any persons engaged in making additions to or alterations in any building, or any loss from liability for injuries suffered by any person before the premises had been fully completed ready for occupancy, it was held that such exception did not cover injuries to an employee while operating an elevator in such building which was being constructed to replace an old building and which was not altogether completed when the employee sustained his injury, where at the time of the execution of the contract of insurance the insurer had notice that the building was not fully completed.

In Fidelity & C. Co. v. Phoenix Mfg. Co. 40 C. C. A. 614, 100 Fed. 604, in which the contract of insurance described the assured's business as that of "manufacturers and erectors of machinery, show cases, and office fixtures, and general woodwork," and indemnified the assured against losses from liability for injuries to its employees in the occupations mentioned, it was held in an action on the policy to recover for damages paid for injuries received by certain carpenters in the employ of the insured, who were engaged in tearing down an old building preparatory to the erection of a new one, that it was proper to submit to the jury the question whether the men injured was attacked by it and brought an action against the plaintiff for negligently putting him to work on the horses and thereby exposing him to the disease. Judgment was rendered in his favor for $1,512, which the plaintiff paid in full. The present action is brought to recover the amount so paid, with the costs and expenses of suit. The defendant was duly notified by the plaintiff of the bringing of the action against it, and was requested, as provided in the policy, to take upon itself the defense of this suit, but it declined to do so on the ground that the cause of action did not come within the terms of the policy. The case was heard by a judge of the superior court without a jury, on stipulations by the parties as to the facts and the evidence. It was agreed that the damages assessed in Barry's favor were fair and reasonable, and it was also agreed that if the judge found that the defendant was liable he should add to the $1,512 such sum as he found to be reasonable and proper and necessarily disbursed by the plaintiff in the action of Barry against it. The judge found for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,474.68. The defendant asked the judge to make certain rulings and findings which the judge refused to make, and the defendant excepted thereto and to the findings and rulings that were made. The case comes here on report. If the rulings and findings are correct, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff; otherwise for the defendant.

The policy is entitled "Manufacturers' Employers' Liability Policy." The contract which it contains is one of indemnity, in which the defendant engages to make good to the plaintiff any loss or damage which it may sustain by reason of its liability to its employees for bodily injuries accidentally suffered by them while engaged in doing the work which they were employed to do. It is a kind of insurance that has grown out of modern industrial and business conditions, and it is intended to afford full protection to employers in all cases where their employees have accidentally received bodily injuries for which they are liable. It also accomplishes the economic result with which, however, we have nothing to do, of distributing more or less widely some of the loss or damage which were at the time of the injury engaged in one of the occupations covered by the policy of insurance, and whether the term "general woodwork" was commonly understood to include the work upon which the injured employees were engaged.

On the other hand, in B. Roth Tool Co. v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 88 C. C. A. 569, 161 Fed. 709, it was held, under a policy warranting that no explosives should be used on the assured's premises, that there could be no recovery for a loss resulting from injuries to an employee of the assured resulting from the explosion of a large metal tube filled with various metals and materials of an explosive nature when exposed to the heat of a furnace on assured's premises.

In Home Mixture Guano Co. v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. 176 Fed. 600, under an employer's liability policy covering injuries to employees engaged in "ordinary repairs," and excepting injuries to employees occurring in the "construction, demolition, or extraordinary repairs to any structure, building, or plant," it was held that the assured could not recover for damages on account of injuries suffered by one of his employees while engaged in rebuilding a portion of assured's factory, which had been destroyed by fire.

In People's Ice Co. v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 161 Mass. 122, 36 N. E. 754, under a contract of liability insurance in which it was warranted that the insured's business was that of ice dealers, and that the operations carried on by its employees were cutting and handling ice, and that the machinery in use was such as was necessary in cutting ice, it was held that injuries received by employees by the fall of an ice house which, in a season in which there could be no cutting of ice, was in process of construction by the assured for the purpose of storing ice, were not covered by the policy.

In Wollman v. Fidelity & C. Co. 87 Mo. App. 677, under an employers' indemnity policy which described the assured's business as that of "wholesale dry goods and stock of merchandise," and stated that the machinery used was that usual to such buildings, it was held injuries to an employee engaged in running machinery for polishing rusted cutlery, put in the building after the issuance of the policy, were not within its scope.

In Kelley v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 97 Mo. App. 623, 71 S. W. 711, it was held that liability for injuries due to the individual negligence of a member of a partnership when not engaged in the partnership business was not covered by a policy of insurance indemnifying the partnership against loss for injuries to its employees from the negligence of the partnership.

In East Carolina R. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 145 N. C. 114, 58 S. E. 906, under an indemnity policy excepting loss from liability for injuries "to or caused by any person unless his wages are included in the estimated wages named in the schedule," it was held that, to recover for a loss for injuries to an employee caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, it was necessary for the assured to show that both of the servants, the injurer and the injured, were on the pay roll, and that therefore there could be no recovery for damages on account of injuries to an employee due to the negligence of the president and general manager, who was at the time running as falls on those engaged in industrial occupations. It is to be noted that the policy does not contain the words "violent and external" in addition to the word "accidental," as is the case in many if not most accident policies. The insurance is liability insurance so called, and not insurance against accidents. The liability insured against is that "imposed by law upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries or death accidentally suffered . . . by any employee." Although the policy contains many conditions, there is no limitation or exception in regard to the kind or nature or cause of the accidents out of which the liability insured against may rise. The fact that the accident may have been occasioned through negligence on the part of the insured is, therefore, immaterial. Though instructions to that effect were requested and refused, and exceptions were taken to such refusal, they have not been argued; the defendant being apparently content with the instructions given in regard to that matter. The question then is whether the amount which the plaintiff was compelled to pay Barry was paid "for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered" by him within the meaning of the policy. It is plain that Barry suffered bodily injury in consequence of becoming infected with glanders; as much so as if he had had a leg or an arm broken by a kick from a vicious horse. Indeed it is possible that the bodily injury caused by glanders was greater and more lasting than that caused by a broken leg or arm would have been. It is plain, also, that he suffered the injury "within the factory, shop, or yard described in the schedule," and "during the operation of the trade or business described in the schedule." Was the injury brought about accidentally, within the fair scope and meaning of the policy, or was it the result of a disease contracted while in the employ of the plaintiff, but for which the defendant is not liable? It is clear, we think, that the infection which caused the disease from which Barry suffered was due to accident. It was in the nature of an accident that he was set to work upon or cleaning up after horses that had glanders, and it was in the nature of an accident that he became engineman, and whose wages were not included in the estimated wages in the schedule.

In Frank Unnewehr Co. v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 99 C. C. A. 490, 176 Fed. 16, the policy in suit provided that it should not cover loss for liability for injuries suffered by "any person employed in violation of law as to age," and it appeared that it was provided by statute that no child was to be employed "at employment whereby its life or limb is in danger." It was held that there could be no recovery on the part of the assured for injuries to a child caused by his attempting to stop a saw in the neighborhood of which he worked, though the employment of the child did not involve the operating or assisting in operating the saw itself.

In Chicago-Coulterville Coal Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 130 Fed. 957, it was held under an indemnity policy exempting the insurer from liability for any loss for injuries to the assured's employees occasioned by the failure of the insured to observe any statute affecting the safety of persons, that there could be no recovery for damages for injuries to a miner in the employ of the assured, resulting from the latter's wilful failure to maintain an open passageway around the landing place at the bottom of the shaft, as required by statute, though the policy of insurance contained a preceding general statement that the insured was indemnified against loss from statutory liability to its employees.

The case last reviewed was followed in Royle Min. Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 126 Mo. App. 104, 103 S. W. 1098, and the same conclusion reached under identical provisions of a similar policy.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Tozer v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. 94 Minn. 478, 103 N. W. 509, and Goodwillie v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 108 Wis. 207, 84 N. W. 164, it was held under an exception in an employers' liability policy that it did not cover any loss from liability for injuries to any child employed by the assured contrary to law, that there could be no liability on the part of the insurer even though the injury was not the proximate result of the illegal employment.

It may be well to note here that in Tozer v. Ocean Acci. & Guarantee Corp. and Royle Min. Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. supra, the assured recovered upon the ground that the insurer was estopped from denying its liability under its contract, because, after having been informed of all the facts, it voluntarily assumed control of and conducted the defense to the suit against the assured.

So, in Glens Falls Portland Cement Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 162 N. Y. 399, 56 N. E. 897, affirming 11 App. Div. 411, 42 N. Y. Supp. 285, under a contract of insurance in which the assured stipulated to conduct all its business and maintain all its premises to which the insurance applied in strict compliance with all statutes, ordinances, and by-laws providing for the safety of persons, the insurer was held to be estopped from setting up the defense that the set screw which caused the accident to the insured's employee was not guarded as required by law where, in accordance with its contract, it had conducted the defense in the action for the injury down to the eve of trial; and had then withdrawn, leaving the assured no reasonable opportunity to prepare a defense to the action. J. A. C.

infected with the disease. The language used by Mathew L. J., in Higgins v. Campbell & Harrison [1904] 1 K. B. 328, 337, where the judgment of the court of appeals was sustained by the House of Lords (Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. 230, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 137), though there was a vigorous dissent by Lord Robertson, is appropriate here. "It was an accident that the workman, in dealing with the wool, was brought in contact with that which might infect him with this disease of anthrax, and it was a further accident that the disease attacked him." If the disease was the result of an accident, then we do not see why it does not follow that the bodily injury which Barry suffered as the result of the disease was not accidentally suffered, nor why the case does not come within the terms of the policy. The language is "bodily injuries accidentally suffered." It hardly could be broader. The intention is, as has been said, to afford full protection and indemnity to the assured. Any accident that causes bodily injury in any way is included. Bodily injury is more commonly associated perhaps with physical force of some sort, but, in the absence of anything in the policy limiting it to that, we do not see how or why it can or should be so restricted. A liability growing out of an accident which results in infecting the workman with a loathsome and dangerous disease and thereby causes him great and perhaps lasting physical injury would seem to be as much within the spirit and intent of the contract as if the injury had been caused by a blow or some other equally obvious manifestation of force. As was said by Lord Halsbury in Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. 230, 233, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 137, the anthrax case, "when some affection of our physical frame is in any way induced by an accident, we must be on our guard that we are not misled by medical phrases to alter the proper application of the phrase 'accident causing injury,' because the injury inflicted by accident sets up a condition of things which medical men describe as disease."

The construction which we are inclined to give to the policy accords with the great weight of authority in similar cases, and rests, we think, on sound principles. Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 156 Mass. 351, 17 L.R.A. 753, 30 N. E. 1013; Hughes v. Clover, C. & Co. [1909] 2 K. B. 798, affirmed by the House of Lords in [1910] A. C. 242; Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. The defendant relies on Bacon v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. (Stedman v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso.) 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L.R.A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748, 25 N. E. 399. The deceased in that case died from malignant pustule. It did not appear how the disease was contracted, though from what is said in the dissenting opinion it might perhaps be inferred that it was contended that it was caused by the bacilli of anthrax coming from the car loads of hides which frequently passed the station where the deceased was employed, and from the cattle which were slaughtered in large numbers in the vicinity. The certificate, however, expressly provided that the benefits under it should not extend "to any bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible sign, nor to any bodily injury happening directly or indirectly in consequence of disease; nor to any death or disability which may be caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease existing prior or subsequent to the date of this certificate." What the deceased was insured against were "bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means." The form of the certificate or policy is enough, we think, to distinguish that case from this.

In accordance with the report the entry will be—

Judgment for the plaintiff.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

JOHN H. MENUT, Appt.,

v.

BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD.

(— Mass. —, 92 N. E. 1032.)

Railroad — duty to fence — protection against fall from abutting property.

The statutory duty of a railroad company to fence its tracks does not extend to the erection of a fence to prevent one who, while at work on adjoining property, falls from a structure, from passing over the boundary line onto its right of way, to his injury.

(November 22, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Essex County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Plaintiff alleged that while lawfully working on premises adjoining defendant's right of way, he was thrown from a pile of lumber, and in falling, fell over a stone wall, and was severely injured, "owing to negligence of defendant, its servants or agents, in failing to erect and maintain a fence on said premises, which said fence, if erected and maintained, would have caught said plaintiff as he fell from the pile of lumber, and prevented his falling over the stone wall to the ground below."

The other facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. M. Schwarzenberg and E. F. Schwarzenberg, for appellant:

An action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained while lawfully employed upon another's premises adjoining the defendant's railroad, caused by the defendant's failure to erect and maintain a fence on the side of the railroad opposite said premises, in accordance with the provisions of § 120, chap. 111, of the Revised Laws, then in force, can be maintained.

Messrs. Henry F. Hurlburt and Damon E. Hall, for appellee:

The object of Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 120,

Note. — Duty of railroad company to fence tracks against persons.

As to the duty of a railroad company to fence its right of way, in general, see note in 5 L.R.A. 737.

The duty of a railroad company to fence its tracks against children is considered in the note to New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Price, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1103, and this note is accordingly limited to cases involving the duty as against adults.

It seems evident that an ordinary railroad fence would hardly constitute a barrier to an adult person about to enter voluntarily upon a railroad right of way, and that the want of a fence along the tracks could hardly be said to be a contributing cause of an injury to an ordinary adult person wilfully trespassing upon the right of way. Thus, in Lehey v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Robt. 204, holding that a statute requiring railroad companies to fence in their road is inapplicable to a freight depot, and that the failure of a railroad company to inclose such a depot cannot affect its liability for the death of a trespasser, killed by the movement of cars there, the court said: "The decedent was not killed in consequence of the want of such fence. The same rule is not to be applied to him as to dumb animals, who stray on uninclosed tracks, and get killed."

The cases involving the duty of a railroad company to fence its tracks against an adult are therefore comparatively few, and most of them arise where, as in MENUT v. BOSTON & M. R. Co. the person accidentally falls upon the right of way, or where he unwittingly passes thereon, or is thrown or carried thereon in some way, against his will, under such circumstances that, if the tracks had been fenced, the particular injury would not have been inflicted. But under such circumstances it seems to be uniformly held that railroad companies are under no duty to maintain fences.

Thus, in King v. Central R. Co. 107 Ga. 754, 33 S. E. 839, it is held that a railroad company owes no duty to the public to place a fence or guard rail along its road, where the tracks are in a cut on one side of which is a brick wall, with its top on a level with and extending along a public street, running parallel with the right of way, to prevent a stranger attempting to cross the tracks in the night, and not knowing of the cut and wall, from falling from the latter and onto the right of way, to his injury.

So, in the absence of statute, a railroad company is under no duty to fence in or place guards along a cut or excavation through which its track runs, with a highway running parallel with and alongside of the cut, to prevent one driving along the highway from being thrown, with his horse and buggy, from the road and down into the cut, to his injury. Collier v. Georgia R. Co. 76 Ga. 611.

And in the absence of a statutory requirement, the fact that a railroad is not fenced does not make the railroad company liable for injuries to a person driving along a highway parallel with the track, whose horse drew him against a train as it passed. Reynolds v. Great Northern R. Co. 29 L.R.A. 695, 16 C. C. A. 435, 32 U. S. App. 577, 69 Fed. 808.

is "to prevent the entrance of cattle upon the road," and not to prevent men from falling from adjoining property onto the railroad location, and the only persons entitled to the protection of this statute are "adjoining owners."

Byrnes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 181 Mass. 322, 63 N. E. 897; Gerry v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 194 Mass. 35, 79 N. E. 783; New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Price, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1103, 86 C. C. A. 502, 159 Fed. 330.

The statute was intended and has always been held to be for the protection of cattle, and not of persons, and the present plaintiff cannot take advantage of it to recover for personal injuries.

Braleley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, having no cause of action at common law, seeks to hold the defendant in damages for personal injuries caused by a failure to comply with Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 120, now Acts 1906, chap. 463, pt. 2, § 103, that "every railroad corporation shall erect and maintain suitable fences, with convenient bars, gates, or openings therein, upon both sides of the entire length of its railroad, except at the crossings of a public way, or in places where the convenient use of the road would be thereby obstructed, and except at places where, and so long as, it is expressly exempted from the duty of so doing by the board of railroad commissioners. . . . The corporation shall also construct and maintain sufficient barriers, where it is necessary and practicable to do so, to prevent the entrance of cattle upon the railroad. A corporation which unreasonably neglects to comply with the provisions of this . . . section shall, for every such neglect, forfeit not more than $200 for every month during which the neglect continues, and the supreme judicial court shall have jurisdiction in equity to compel the corporation to comply with such provisions, and, upon such neglect, to restrain and prohibit it from crossing a highway or town way, or from using any land, until such provisions shall have been complied with." Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 90, 93; Thayer v. Arnold, 4 Met. 589; Eames v. Salem & L. R. Co. 98 Mass. 560, 96 Am. Dec. 676; Baxter v. B. & W. R. Corp. 102 Mass. 383; Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335. It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant failed to fence, and if this had been done he would not have been injured, but he must go further, and show that the requirement of the statute was enacted for his benefit. The inquiry, therefore, is whether it was the defendant's duty to erect and maintain at the place of the accident by a failure to comply with Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 120, now Acts 1906, chap. 463, pt. 2, § 103, that "every railroad corporation shall erect and maintain suitable fences, with convenient bars, gates, or openings therein, upon both sides of the entire length of its railroad, except at the crossings of a public way, or in places where the convenient use of the road would be thereby obstructed, and except at places where, and so long as, it is expressly exempted from the duty of so doing by the board of railroad commissioners. . . . A corporation which unreasonably neglects to comply with the provisions of this . . . section shall, for every such neglect, forfeit not more than $200 for every month during which the neglect continues, and the supreme judicial court shall have jurisdiction in equity to compel the corporation to comply with such provisions, and, upon such neglect, to restrain and prohibit it from crossing a highway or town way, or from using any land, until such provisions shall have been complied with." Rust v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335. It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant failed to fence, and if this had been done he would not have been injured, but he must go further, and show that the requirement of the statute was enacted for his benefit. The inquiry, therefore, is whether it was the defendant's duty to erect and maintain at the place of the accident

In Wabash R. Co. v. Gaull, 116 Ill. App. 443, it was held that a railroad company is under no common-law duty to fence its right of way; and that its statutory duty does not extend to the erection of a fence to prevent injury to one by reason of his horses running away as he was driving along a highway parallel with and adjoining the railroad, and, in the absence of a fence there, running upon and along the railroad track to an embankment across a ravine, and there throwing or rolling themselves, the wagon, and the driver down the embankment, whereby the driver was killed.

Where a public highway is so constructed that it terminates 20 feet from a previously existing railway cut, through which the railway company's tracks run, and the intervening land is a foot higher than the crown of the highway at its terminal, and rises higher toward the cut, which is 5 feet in depth below the crown of the highway,—the railroad company owning a 5-foot strip next to the cut, and the remainder of the intervening 20 feet being an unused strip owned by a third person,—the railroad company is under no duty to fence the cut to prevent one ignorant of the locality, and using the highway on a dark night, from driving his horse and buggy through the highway, and up over the intermediate land, and into the cut, to his injury. Daneck v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 59 N. J. L. 415, 59 Am. St. Rep. 613, 37 Atl. 59.

And a statute imposing upon railroad companies the duty of erecting and maintaining fences on the sides of their roads, but expressly enacting that no corporation shall be required to fence the sides of its road, except where necessary to prevent cattle, etc., from getting on the track from lands adjoining the same, has no application to fences to prevent one going along a highway on a dark night from falling into a deep cut or excavation made across the highway in constructing a railroad. Ditchett v. Spuyten Duyvil & P. M. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 425.

a fence sufficient to have intercepted the plaintiff's fall, and prevented his injuries. If this is established, the further averments of its negligence are admitted by the demurrer. The language imposing the duty does not define its scope, and to ascertain the proper construction, the statute must be read with the provisions of the original enactments from which it has been derived. The earlier acts of incorporation contain some provisions for adapting the railroad, at the expense of the corporation, to the grade of intersecting highways, which must be raised or lowered to meet the change in level, and Stat. 1833, chap. 187, 1834, chap. 137, and Stat. 1835, chap. 148, provided for the assessment of damages if the location was acquired by eminent domain, and that at grade crossings certain precautions should be taken for the safety of travelers on highways. But no attempt at a general system of statutory law for the construction and operation of railroads appears until the Rev. Stat. 1836, chap. 39; Sp. Laws Mass. 1829, chaps. 93-95; Stat. 1830, chap. 4; Stat. 1831, chaps. 55, 134, 139, 152; Stat. 1832, chaps. 49, 80, 97; Stat. 1833, chaps. 109, 116; Stat. 1835, chap. 111. The revision, however, did not require either party to fence, although, under the general powers of the county commissioners, by whom damages were assessed, they could direct that, instead of an award in money to the landowner for the cost, as in the taking of land for a highway, the corporation should provide and maintain the necessary fences. First Parish v. Plymouth, 8 Cush. 475; Morss v. Boston & M. R. Co. 2 Cush. 536; Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Old Colony R. Corp. 12 Cush. 605, 608, 609; Baxter v. Boston & W. R. Corp. supra. If money damages were awarded, and the land remained unfenced, besides incurring the danger of injury to his cattle, for which he would have no remedy, the landowner also might be held liable to suit if, passing to the track, they caused the derailment of trains. Lyons v. Merrick, 105 Mass. 71, 76; Lovett v. Salem & S. D. R. Co. 9 Allen, 557, 562. But if either party was dissatisfied, and applied for a jury, the order was vacated; and as the verdict might not require the erection of fences, the corporation could not be compelled to act, and the landowner must provide them.

It was to guard against such results in the future, as well as to furnish a remedy "to any owner of land heretofore taken," that Stat. 1841, chap. 125, was passed. The corporation, in addition to the pecuniary damages assessed upon it, was now required "to construct and maintain such embankments, drains, culverts, walls, fences, or other structures as said commissioners shall judge reasonable for the security and benefit of such landowners. And in their order therefor the commissioners shall prescribe the time within which and the manner how such structure shall be made or repaired, which order it shall not be competent for a jury to alter or reverse." Boston & P. R. Corp. v. Doherty, 154 Mass. 314, 28 N. E. 277. By § 4, the commissioners were authorized, on "the application of any owner of land heretofore taken," or of the selectmen of the town through which the railroad passed, to require suitable fences to be made and maintained by the corporation, "as well for the benefit and security of such landowner as of travelers on such railroad," unless the landowner already had received in the assessment of damages full compensation, or had agreed to make and maintain such fence; yet no right is conferred upon the corporation or the commissioners to compel him to fence, although compensated for the outlay, or where the land having been obtained by purchase, the price paid was presumed to include the cost of fencing by the grantor. Morss v. Boston & M. R. Co. supra; Stearns v. Old Colony & F. River R. Corp. 1 Allen, 493. But as the corporation was not required to act unless ordered by the commissioners, and the landowner, content with the compensation received, could remain quiescent, while passengers might be exposed to great peril during transportation on a partially or wholly unfenced track. Stat. 1846, chap. 271, § 3, to do away with this serious danger, directed, under a penalty provided by § 4, that "every railroad corporation shall erect and maintain suitable fences with convenient bars, gates, or openings therein, at such places as may reasonably be required, upon both sides of the entire length of any railroad which they may hereafter construct, except at the crossings of any turnpike, highway, or other way, or in places where the convenient use of the railroad would be obstructed thereby, and shall also construct and maintain sufficient barriers at such places as may be necessary, where it is practical to do so, to prevent the entrance of cattle upon the railroad." See Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Old Colony R. Corp. 12 Cush. 605, 609. The duty thus imposed was subsequently made enforceable in equity by this court under Stat. 1855, chap. 350, and these statutes having been consolidated in Gen. Stat. 1860, chap. 63, §§ 40 to 43, and Acts 1874, chap. 372, §§ 83, 84, have been uniformly construed, where the road was built prior to April 17, 1841, as requiring the owner to fence if his damages, or the price paid to him, where the acquisition was by purchase, included the cost of fencing; and where the road was constructed after May 16, 1846, the corporation fenced the entire length of the railroad on both sides, except in places where a fence would obstruct the convenient use of the railroad, or at crossings where the general public had a right of way. Morss v. Boston & M. R. Co. and Stearns v. Old Colony & F. River R. Corp. supra; Boston & A. R. Co. v. Briggs, 132 Mass. 24. The exemption, however, was repealed by Stat. 1879, chap. 205, which finally put upon the corporation the absolute and sole duty of maintaining the fence, and where by either law or contract this burden before had been placed on the adjoining landowner, the corporation was required thereafter to erect such fences, or to keep them in repair if they had been erected, and could recover the reasonable cost in an action of contract, or by a lien upon the land for the labor and materials.

Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 112, § 115, and Rev. Laws, chap. 111, § 120, are re-enactments of these provisions, which, from the first to the last enactment, prescribe neither the dimensions, material, nor mode of construction, except as may be inferred from the words that it shall be a "suitable fence." It is common observation that a railroad often runs through extensive tracts of woodland and unimproved lands, and as a fence which there might be sufficient to comply with the statute would be wholly insufficient between coterminous owners of lands under cultivation, Eames v. Salem & L. R. Co. 98 Mass. 560, 565, 96 Am. Dec. 676, decided, that the fence defined in Gen. Stat. chap. 25, § 1, now Rev. Laws, chap. 33, § 1, was not the standard of requirement. The "security and benefit" of the landowner and "of travelers upon such railroad" having been the words of the statute of 1841, there would seem to be no reasonable ground to question that, under the original act and subsequent statutes, which indicate no change of purpose, a fence sufficient to turn the cattle of those whose lands adjoined the road was all that the legislature intended. The railroad company also, in the operation of its trains, has the right to the exclusive use of its tracks, and is under no obligation to anticipate the intrusion of cattle which may have passed unlawfully to the location, even where there has been a neglect to fence, or the fence may be insufficient to restrain them; and if injured or destroyed, the corporation is not responsible to the owner, unless gross negligence at common law is shown. Eames v. Salem & L. R. Co. 98 Mass. 560, 96 Am. Dec. 676; Maynard v. Boston & M. R. Co. 115 Mass. 458, 15 Am. Rep. 119; McDonnell v. Pittsfield & N. A. R. Corp. 115 Mass. 564; Darling v. Boston & A. R. Co. 121 Mass. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

118; Towne v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 124 Mass. 101, 104; Taft v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. 167 Mass. 297, 32 N. E. 168. The case of Browne v. Providence, H. & F. R. Co. 12 Gray, 55, 71 Am. Dec. 736, did not arise under our statute, but, as pointed out in Eames v. Salem & L. R. Co. 98 Mass. 560, 564, 96 Am. Dec. 676, rested on the construction of a statute of Connecticut, under which suit had been brought in our courts. See Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78. This doctrine has been applied to persons, and no distinction has been made in suits for personal injuries by adults or by plaintiffs of tender years, who have passed or strayed to the tracks through openings in the fence on the side of the railroad which were not shown to have been necessary for its convenient operation, or for crossings to accommodate the public ways, or a place which, by implication, the public had been invited to use. Wright v. Boston & M. R. Co. 129 Mass. 440; Morrissey v. Eastern R. Co. 126 Mass. 377, 380, 30 Am. Rep. 686; Wright v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 296, 7 N. E. 866; Chenery v. Fitchburg R. Co. 160 Mass. 211, 213, 22 L.R.A. 575, 35 N. E. 554. See McCarty v. Fitchburg R. Co. 154 Mass. 17, 27 N. E. 773. And since Acts 1853, chap. 414, § 4, it has been a misdemeanor for any person without right, knowingly to stand or walk on a railroad track. If the erection and maintenance of a fence was also designed for the protection of the public generally, and the failure to fence was the proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiffs were not barred, and as proof of their due care, or of those responsible for his conduct where the plaintiff appears to have been unable to care for himself, would have been all that was necessary to have established the defendant's liability, they should have been permitted to recover. But it is evident from these decisions, that the railroad was not required to assume that trespassers might be on the track, or to fence for their protection, and we never have adopted the view that, if a trespasser is a child of immature age, or so young as to be incapable of caring for himself, the company is called upon to anticipate and discover his presence, although, when discovered, he cannot be injured wilfully, or treated with a reckless disregard for his safety. Anternoit v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 193 Mass. 542, 79 N. E. 789. Compare Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 109 Ind. 179, 58 Am. Rep. 387, 6 N. E. 310, 10 N. E. 70.

The plaintiff, however, urges that the demurrer should be overruled and the judgment reversed, because in a few jurisdictions statutes primarily enacted for purposes similar to our own, even if in some instances varying in terms, have been judicially defined as including protection from personal injuries which might be caused to children of tender years who wandered upon the track through the neglect of the corporation to fence. Keyser v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 56 Mich. 559, 56 Am. Rep. 405, 23 N. W. 311; Isabel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 475, 484; Schmidt v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 23 Wis. 186, 99 Am. Dec. 158; Rosse v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 68 Minn. 216, 37 L.R.A. 591, 64 Am. St. Rep. 472, 71 N. W. 20; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Grablin, 38 Neb. 90, 56 N. W. 796, 57 N. W. 522. See further, Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Reesman, 23 L.R.A. 768, 9 C. C. A. 20, 19 U. S. App. 596, 60 Fed. 370, Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 28 L. ed. 410, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369, and Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619. But even in the distinction the decisions are not harmonious. Some of them are favorably commented upon by Brown, J., in delivering the opinion of a majority of the court in New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Price, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1103, 86 C. C. A. 502, 159 Fed. 330, where a boy six and one half years old ran onto the defendant's unfenced track, receiving injuries from which he died after a period of conscious suffering. The decision turned upon whether our statute required the road to fence against the plaintiff's intestate, and the construction adopted by this court in Byrnes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 181 Mass. 322, 63 N. E. 897, was followed, and recovery was denied. A child six years old went upon the unfenced track of the defendant, in Bischof v. Illinois Southern R. Co. 232 Ill. 446, 83 N. E. 948, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 185, and was killed; but after a review by Cartwright, J., of many of the cases upon which the plaintiff at bar relies, the court held that, under a statute requiring the corporation to erect and maintain a fence sufficient to prevent cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, and other stock from getting on the railroad, the company was not responsible for the death of the plaintiff. It also has been decided in other jurisdictions that statutes requiring the corporation to fence against live stock should not be construed as requiring it to fence for the protection of persons, whether infants or adults; and where fencing is held as designed for the benefit of the general public, it would seem there is no obligation to provide for the safety of those capable of taking care of themselves, and of realizing the peril of being on a railroad track. Allen v. Boston & M. R. Co. 87 Me. 326, 32 Atl. 963; Russell v. Maine C. R. Co. 100 Me. 406, 61 Atl. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

899; Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 53 Conn. 461, 473, 4 Atl. 106; Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 95 Pa. 398, 40 Am. Rep. 664; Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Bradford, 20 Ind. App. 348, 87 Am. St. Rep. 252, 49 N. E. 388; Cornwall v. Sullivan R. Co. 28 N. H. 165, 166; Delphia v. Rutland R. Co. 76 Vt. 84, 56 Atl. 279; Schreiner v. Great Northern R. Co. 86 Minn. 245, 247, 58 L.R.A. 75, 90 N. W. 400; Co-hoon v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 169, 173, 57 N. W. 727; Ditchett v. Spuyten-Duyvil & P. M. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 425; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Liidtte, 69 Ohio St. 384, 69 N. E. 653; Carper v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 35 L.R.A. 135, 23 C. C. A. 669, 42 U. S. App. 282, 78 Fed. 94. If the building and maintenance of a "suitable fence," which, under certain conditions, formerly devolved upon the landowner, meant a structure sufficient to protect his cattle, and to prevent their intrusion upon the location, no adequate reason has been suggested by the plaintiff why a different construction should be adopted when this duty is imposed solely upon the corporation, and the obligation so extended as to include a structure sufficient to protect the landholder or occupier, or their servants, when on the premises, from inadvertently passing or falling upon the track. It was so decided in principle in the case of Byrnes v. Boston & M. R. Co. 181 Mass. 322, 63 N. E. 897, which was followed with approval in Gerry v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 194 Mass. 35, 38, 79 N. E. 783.

We are not satisfied that these recent cases, to say nothing of those which preceded them, should be overruled, and a radical departure entered upon from that which has been deemed to be the true application and construction of these statutes. If the agricultural conditions which prevailed when the development of our railroad law began, and for some time afterwards, have very largely changed, and the statutory regulations relating to the operation of railroads should be made more rigorous where the population has become increasingly urban and more dense, by imposing additional safeguards by the erection of barriers, or prescribing what shall constitute a lawful fence, for the personal safety of those who may live on estates adjoining, or in proximity to the line, or use the public ways contiguous and parallel to it, the change should come by further legislation.

The plaintiff having failed to allege any breach of duty by the defendant which it owed to his employer, or to him, the first ground of demurrer was well taken, and the second need not be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

DANIEL C. LEWIS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COM-PANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 181 Fed. 433.)

Insurance —return of premiums — pleading.

1. The return of the premiums paid cannot be secured in an action praying damages for failure to make a loan on an insurance policy, as provided in the contract, and it is immaterial that the complaint contains language indicating an intention on plaintiff's part to repudiate the contract, if it also shows that the insurer had no such intent.

Same — refusal to lend money.

2. Breach by an insurance company of its contract to lend money on a policy does not justify the insured in treating the contract as rescinded, and suing for a return of the premiums paid.

Same — noncompliance with contract — effect.

3. The holder of an insurance policy which contains a provision for loans upon the policy does not make a case for rescission of the contract for failure to grant a loan, where he does not allow time between the making of his demand and the bringing of the suit for the application to reach the home office and the reply to be returned, and he does not execute the loan agreement which the policy makes a condition precedent to the granting of a loan.

(October 3, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure to make a loan on a policy of life insurance, in accordance with a provision thereof agreeing to do so. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lanning, Circuit Judge, and Bradford and Archbald, District Judges.

Note. — Breach of agreement of insurer to make loan on policy as justifying rescission and recovery of premiums by insured.

But two decisions (New York L. Ins. Co. v. Pope, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 485, 68 S. W. 851, and Key v. National L. Ins. Co. 107 Iowa, 446, 78 N. W. 68) seem to have involved the question as above stated, and these, while arriving at opposite conclusions, are distinguishable and reconcilable with the holding announced in LEWIS v. NEW YORK L. INS. CO., provided the true criterion of a breach which warrants rescission is whether 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ann. Cas. 37.

The right of rescission carries with it the right to recover premiums paid.

Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pottker; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Garmany; American L. Ins. Co. v. McAden; Supreme Lodge A. L. H. v. Black,—supra.

Mr. Arthur G. Dickson, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff below was not entitled to recover as upon a rescission of the entire contract, because his suit was for damages for breach of contract, and not for money had and received, namely, the premiums paid by him.

the failure to perform defeats the object of the contract or merely goes to a subsidiary part of it which can be compensated in damages. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Pope, supra, which directly supports LEWIS v. NEW YORK L. INS. CO., was a suit for a rescission of a contract of life insurance in which recovery of all premiums paid, and interest and damages in addition, was sought upon refusal of the insurer to make a loan in accordance with a stipulation in the policy, which, between the sixth and tenth year, allowed a loan, not to exceed $212 at any one time, the policy being for $2,000. From this it will be seen that here,

The insured, who has enjoyed the protection of a policy, cannot recover the premiums paid by him, as upon rescission, because the company has given him something of value, for which it is entitled to compensation, even though it has been guilty of a breach of the principal contract.

Scrivener (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 705; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Heidel, 8 Lea, 488.

Archbald, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was insured in the defendant company for $30,800 on the ordinary life 20-year standard accumulation plan, by a policy bearing date July 12, 1904, and containing a provision for a cash loan, the right to which, as he claims, he was not permitted to enjoy. And the company, according to this, having broken their contract, this action was brought to recover the damages. The clause of the policy which was relied on is as follows: "The insured may obtain cash loans on the sole security of this policy, on written request, at any time after it has been in force two full years, if premiums are duly paid to the anniversary of the insurance next succeeding the date after the loan may be obtained. The insured shall pledge this policy and its accumulations as collateral security for such loans, in accordance with the terms contained in the company's then-existing form of policy loan agreement. The amount of loan available at any time is stated in the table on the second page, and includes loans then unpaid. Interest will be at the rate of five (5) per cent per annum, payable in advance to the next anniversary, and annually in advance on that date and thereafter."

as in the LEWIS CASE, the obtaining of insurance, and not the privilege of a loan, was the object of the contract. The court refused to adjudge the return of the premiums, holding that the insured was only entitled to damages, the measure of which was said to be the difference between the interest at which the defendant agreed to furnish the money, and the rate, not exceeding the legal rate, at which a loan could have been obtained elsewhere; at least, in the absence of an averment that the money was desired for a specific use, known to the defendant, and that it could not have been obtained elsewhere. On the other hand, the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

policy holder in Key v. National L. Ins. Co. supra, on refusal of a loan, was allowed to rescind and recover the premiums, on the ground that the taking out of the insurance was but an incident, whereas the making of the loan was the principal subject-matter of the agreement, it having been expressly agreed that the policy was not to be accepted unless the loan could be secured. Thus it will be seen that the latter decision may, as is stated in the LEWIS CASE, be distinguished therefrom on the ground that the breach defeated the real object of the contract, going directly to the consideration.

G. J. C.

By the table which is there referred to, the insured, after four years, was entitled to borrow $1,940; and in part availing himself of this, on March 18, 1908, the plaintiff had secured $1,300, which was all that he required at the time, but was $640 less than he was privileged to borrow. A year later, however, the last of May, 1909, not being satisfied with the policy because of the deferred dividend arrangement, he made up his mind to change; but, there being no provision in the policy for a cash surrender value, he decided to realize on it, by borrowing up to the limit, and then letting the policy lapse; and he accordingly applied to the company through the agency at Philadelphia for a further loan upon it. The representatives of the company, to whom he applied, being made aware of his purpose, endeavored to dissuade him, and suggested without success that he take a new form of policy, with regard to which there were some negotiations. The policy, on account of the existing loan, being in the possession of the company in New York, the additional amount to which he was entitled was not known to him, and in the course of his interviews with the Philadelphia agents he was advised that, on July 12, 1909, after the payment of his next premium, amounting to $960, he would be entitled to a loan of $2,556, or $1,256 more than he then had; it being stated to him that until then the policy had no further loanable value. Having obtained a copy of the policy, however, he discovered that this was not so, and that he had been entitled all along to $1,940, or $640 more than he had received, and he thereupon made a demand by letter, July 7, for this further accommodation. But on July 9, two days later, having obtained no reply, and there being but three days until the next premium was due, he began this action. At the trial the plaintiff, upon this showing, was allowed a verdict of $640, the difference between the loan which he had and $1,940, the amount which he had a right to. Not content with this, however, he claimed the full amount of the premiums paid, on the basis that there was a breach of the policy, which justified a rescission and authorized a recovery of everything that had been paid under it. And this being denied him, the case is brought here for consideration.

The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, declares for damages for a breach of the agreement to loan him the amount he was entitled to, which affirms the contract, and not for the premiums paid, which repudiates it; the one cause of action being distinctly different from the other. American Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Shultz, 82 Pa. 46. This appears by the ad damnum clause, where, in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

conclusion, it is declared: "Wherefore the plaintiff claims damages from the defendant in the sum of $6,000, at which sum the plaintiff estimates the damages which he has suffered by reason of the wilful failure and refusal on the part of the defendant company to comply with the terms of the policy aforesaid."

It is true that, leading up to this, after setting out the facts substantially as they are given above, it is averred that, receiving no further reply from the company to his written request for a loan on July 7, he notified them on July 9, through his counsel, that he treated their refusal to make the loan as a breach of the entire contract, and that he was not willing, in consequence, to continue paying the premiums; which, so far as it goes, may seem to be a repudiation of the policy. But it is also further averred that, as he believes, it was the sole purpose of the company, in declining the loan and prolonging negotiations, to induce him to renew the policy, by paying the premium to come due July 12, which negatives any intent on the part of the company to abrogate the policy, or no longer be bound by it, and, on the contrary, expressly affirms their desire to keep on with it, in confirmation of which it is stated that the plaintiff was assured by the representatives of the company, at Philadelphia, that, upon payment of the next annual premium, he would be entitled to a loan of $2,556, or $1,256 more than he then had; the only difference between the parties thus being that he claimed the right to $640 more at once, before the next premium was due, and that the company did not immediately fall in with this. And the damages claimed, on the strength of these averments, being those sustained by the refusal of the company to make the additional loan, whatever might otherwise have been made out of the facts stated, the action cannot be regarded as proceeding for anything outside of that. These damages consisted in the difference between the loan which the plaintiff had obtained, and the loan which, by the terms of the policy, he was entitled to, which the company, in disregard of their agreement, refused to allow him, amounting to $640, the judgment which he recovered. And having thus got all that he declared for, there was no error in holding him down to it.

But not to decide the case on a question of pleading, and assuming that the liability of the company for the premiums paid, based on a rescission of the policy, was open for determination, the plaintiff shows no cause of action beyond that which was allowed him. The right to rescind and recover the premiums paid was not justified by the refusal of the company to loan the additional amount named in the policy. The right to rescind is an extreme right, and it is not every breach of contract that warrants its exercise. It exists, however, where the contract is entire, and either in time or manner of performance is broken by either party from the outstart. Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12; Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455; Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366, 7 N. E. 304. But where the contract, if divisible, or even if indivisible, is made up of several distinct and similar acts, to be separately and successively performed, the right to rescind, according to some of the authorities, depends on whether the conduct of the party in default is such as evinces an intent to abandon the contract, or no longer be bound by its terms. Mersey Steel & I. Co. v. Naylor, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 434, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 504; Blackburn v. Reilly, 47 N. J. L. 290, 54 Am. Rep. 159, 1 Atl. 27; Harding v. York Knitting Mills (C. C.) 142 Fed. 228. But never does the failure to perform afford ground for rescission, unless it be such as to defeat the object of the contract, and not simply go to a subsidiary part of it, which can be fully compensated in damages. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 635, 650; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 644. As is said in Weintz v. Hafner, 78 Ill. 27: "For partial derelictions and noncompliances in matters not necessarily of first importance to the accomplishment of the object of the contract, the party injured must still seek his remedy upon the stipulations of the contract itself."

Or, as it is put in Elgin v. Joslyn, 136 Ill. 525, 26 N. E. 1090: "A slight or partial neglect to observe some of the terms or conditions of a contract will not justify a rescission or abandonment."

It is only where the breach goes to that which is vital that this course is open. But, if that be so, the plaintiff had no right to throw up the policy and sue for the premiums simply because the company failed to honor, offhand, the additional loan required of them. The refusal, under the circumstances, cannot be said to have evinced an intent not to be bound by or live up to the terms of the contract, if that is the criterion. Indeed, it is a question whether, rightly considered, there was a refusal at all; the plaintiff not having given time for it. And much less can it be said that, the company having broken one part of the contract, there was no assurance that they would regard the rest of it, which magnifies the breach out of all proportion to its real significance. The fact is that the agreement for a loan was merely subsidiary to the main purpose of the policy, which was to insure the plaintiff for the benefit of the party designated; the right to a progressive loan as the policy aged being an accommodation altogether secondary and subordinate,—valuable, no doubt, but not vital.

It certainly was no more important than the right, under certain conditions, to a paid-up policy; and yet it has been held, in numerous cases, that the breach of this provision does not entitle the insured to recover the premiums paid, as upon a rescission. Watts v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 16 Blatchf. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 17,294; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baker, 85 Ill. 410; Rumbold v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 7 Mo. App. 71; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. McHugh, 7 Neb. 66; Nashville L. Ins. Co. v. Mathews, 8 Lea, 499. And the same ruling was made with regard to the refusal to permit a change of the beneficiary. Harris v. Scrivener (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 705. And the failure to return a part of the premiums, as agreed in the policy. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Heidel, 8 Lea, 488. It is true that, in each of these cases, the action was for damages for a breach of the contract, and not in terms for the premiums. But it was held in each, which is the significant thing, that the premiums were not a measure of the damages.

The case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Pope, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 485, 68 S. W. 851, is also in point, the suit there being for a rescission and a recovery of the premiums, on the ground that there had been a refusal of a loan by the company, in violation of the policy; but it was held that the plaintiff was only entitled to damages. It is true that, in Key v. National L. Ins. Co. 107 Iowa, 446, 78 N. W. 68, the policy holder, on the refusal of a loan, was allowed to rescind and recover the premiums. But, as an inducement to take out the policy, there had been an express agreement in that case to make a loan on certain personal property, with the policy as collateral; and this being the inducement which moved the plaintiff to insure, the refusal went directly to the consideration. The case is thus to be distinguished from the ordinary one, where, as here, the agreement for a loan is merely an incident; the opportunity afforded by it not being the moving cause for taking out the policy. And, except as so distinguished, the case does not meet with our approval.

It is urged, however, that this court, in Supreme Council A. L. H. v. Black, 59 C. C. A. 414, 123 Fed. 650, sustained the right to rescind and recover back the premiums where there has been a breach of the insurance contract. But the attempt there was to cut down the policy, by an amendment of the by-laws, from $5,000 to $2,000; the company deciding that this was the highest amount for which thereafter a policy should issue. This, as was said of a similar attempt in Becker v. Berlin Ben. Soc. 144 Pa. 232, 27 Am. St. Rep. 624, 22 Atl. 699, was a repudiation, pure and simple, there being an entire abrogation of the existing policy, and the substitution of another and very different one; the amount of insurance being reduced over one half from that on which the insured had been paying premiums. Going as this did to the root of the contract, the insured was not obliged to submit, but had the right, as it was held, to rescind and sue for what he had paid on it. It is not at all like the present case, where, if there was any breach, it was merely of a minor feature.

But, assuming that the plaintiff, for the refusal of a loan, was entitled to rescind, he did not, in our judgment, put matters in shape to do so. The written request for the loan, which was required by the policy, was not made until July 7, and was not received by the company, at the home office in New York, where the policy was in pledge for the existing loan of $1,300, until the day following; and before a reply, in the reasonable course of events, could be made to it, the plaintiff, the next morning, July 9, appeared at the branch office in Philadelphia, where he had filed his request, and peremptorily demanded his money. And, upon being advised that no reply had as yet been received, he went off and at once brought suit, charging the company with having broken the agreement. But, according to the terms of the policy, in order to lay grounds for a loan, the plaintiff had not only to make a written request, as he did, but he had also to sign a loan agreement, pledging the policy, and obligating himself, as therein provided. He may have been dependent on the company for the form of this agreement; but, without waiting or asking for that, two days after his request was made, the present suit was instituted. The right to a loan was not like money in the bank, to be demanded over the counter. Not only were there certain formalities to be observed, as just stated, but, the question of a loan having to be referred to the officers of the company in New York, the representatives in the Philadelphia office having apparently no authority over it, a reasonable time had necessarily to elapse, after the request was sent in, before a response could be expected, and until it had passed, which certainly was not the case when suit was brought, it cannot be said that the company was in default, or that the agreement had been broken.

It is true that the plaintiff began moving for a loan the latter part of May, and had been told, as we have seen, by the representatives of the company at Philadelphia, that he was not entitled to any more than he had secured until after the payment of the next premium. But the facts show that he did not rest on this. Nor is it to be treated the same as if, after due application, there had been an express denial by the company. Having procured a copy of the policy on June 29, and consulted with his counsel, it was plainly to be seen that he was entitled to $640 above what he had borrowed, and he accordingly made demand for it. But he still waited eight days, until July 7, after he had returned from his vacation; and if he had the right to put the matter off in this way, for his own convenience, he cannot blame the company for the predicament in which he found himself by reason of the time for his next premium having meantime run against him. And neither had he a right to hold the company as for a breach, two days after he made his demand, because of there being only three days left to the life of his policy.

It is urged, as bearing on the right to rescind and recover the premiums, that there was no offer by the plaintiff, either before suit or afterwards, to repay the $1,300 which he had borrowed; also, that there was no offer to adjust or make allowance for the protection which he had enjoyed during the period for which the policy had been carried. This was exacted in Lovell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 28 L. ed. 423, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390. But the necessity for it was denied by this court in Supreme Council A. L. H. v. Black, supra. And not being essential to the case, we do not undertake to dispose of it. Without regard to anything that is so suggested, it is clear, for the reasons already given, that the plaintiff got all that he was entitled to in the $640 which he recovered.

The judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

TEXAS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, NY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

J. M. ZUMWALT.

(— Tex. —, 132 S. W. 113.)

Master — relief department — charity — malpractice of physician.

A railroad company which retains from the wages of each employee a small amount, with the aggregate of which it employs a physician to treat employees when ill or injured, is not liable to an employee for the malpractice of the physician, if it uses orinary care in his selection, and is not promoting any interests of its own in the transaction, since it will be regarded as merely administering a charity.

(November 30, 1910.)

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the District Court for Bosque County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a physician employed by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. Kibler and Cureton & Cureton, for plaintiff in error:

A railway company cannot be held liable for the negligence of the physicians it furnishes, except upon the ground of want of proper care in selecting or retaining them.

Note. — Liability for negligence of attendants furnished by relief department toward which employees contribute.

The only cases included are those decided since the preparation of the note on the same point, appended to Phillips v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1167.

In accord with the weight of authority as disclosed in the earlier note, it is held in Wells v. Ferry-Baker Lumber Co. 57 Wash. 658, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 426, 107 Pac. 869, that an employer who retains from the wages of his employees a certain amount with which to pay for the services of a surgeon, if they are injured, discharges his full obligation when he selects a competent surgeon to attend a particular injury, and cannot be held responsible for such surgeon's negligence.

So, it is held in Barden v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 152 N. C. 318, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 67 S. E. 971, that a relief department supported by the mutual contributions of a railroad company and its employees, and maintained for the sole purpose of giving relief to the latter, is a charity, in the administration of which the only duty devolving upon the company is to use reasonable care in the selection of physicians and surgeons who are reasonably competent; and that, having exercised this duty, the company is not responsible for their want of skill. In arriving at the conclusion that this constituted a charity, the court holds void a regulation providing that the acceptance of benefits shall operate as a release of claims against the company for damages "growing out of said injury."

On the other hand, it was held in Texas & P. Coal Co. v. McVain (Tex. Civ. App.) 124 S. W. 202, that where there was a contract whereby the employer, in consideration of the monthly deductions from the servants' wages, undertook to furnish them medical treatment, the former was liable for 3C L.R.A.(N.S.)

the negligence of physicians supplied by it in discharge of the undertaking, notwithstanding no profit accrued to the employer from the fund. It was further held that this liability could not be avoided upon the theory that the plaintiff was a member of a labor union in whose hands the matter of employing a physician wholly rested; that the defendant merely distributed the fund; and that its services were rendered without compensation, and at the request of the employees, who selected the physicians that treated them,—where it did not appear that the union had anything to do with the selection of the second physician who attended the plaintiff, and whose attendance began a few days after the injury occurred, and extended over several months, and that this and every other injured employee had his choice of one of three physicians employed by the defendant, and if one other than these three should be chosen, the employee forfeited his right to resort to the fund.

Attention is also directed to Carroll v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 120 S. W. 1079, holding that where a surgeon in charge of a hospital maintained by a railroad company for its employees has no authority to bind the company by his promise to notify a mother of any unfavorable change in the condition of her son, a patient and an employee, the company cannot be held responsible to her for the surgeon's negligent failure so to notify her, at least where the only damages claimed are for mental anguish.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by the defendant in error against the railroad company to recover damages for the loss of an eye, which was claimed to have been caused by the negligence of Dr. Samuel Webb. There is no controversy as to the facts of this case, and they may be briefly stated as follows:

The railroad company entered into a contract with Dr. Webb in terms as follows:

The State of Texas, County of McLennan.

This memorandum of agreement made and entered into on this day by and between S. Webb, Jr., party of the first part, and the Texas Central Railroad Company, party of the second part, witnesseth: The party of the first part hereby agrees to act as chief surgeon of party of the second part, and as such to establish and maintain at Walnut Springs, Texas, an adequate and suitable hospital at his own expense and cost, for the treatment of all employees of the party of the second part, who are entitled to hospital privileges as hereinafter provided, and to furnish all instruments, devices, and appliances, and all medicines and other necessities (including board and lodging while patients are at the hospital), for the proper treatment of all such employees, who are entitled to hospital privileges under this contract or the rules and regulations of the party of the second part governing in such matters. (2) It is understood that none but white employees shall be entitled to the hospital privileges herein mentioned, and that no employee shall be treated under the terms hereof for any venereal disease, and that no person suffering from contagious disease shall be admitted to the hospital of the party of the first part. (3) As consideration to party of first part for the performance of the foregoing covenants and agreements, party of the second part agrees to collect from all of its white employees, except its general officers, the sum of 50 cents per month as hospital fees, and to deliver to the party of the first part as compensation for his services, etc., the amount thus collected at the end of each month. (4) It is understood and agreed that no hospital fee shall be collected by party of the second part from any employee remaining in its service for a period of less than one week. (5) It is further agreed and understood that local surgeons shall be appointed by party of the first part at all important towns on line of party of the second part, and that such local surgeons may be called by party of the second part or its authority to treat in cases of emergency any employee entitled to hospital privileges hereunder, and the fees of such local surgeons for such services shall be deducted by the party of the second part from the hospital fund hereinbefore provided for. (6) As part compensation to all local surgeons appointed hereunder, party of the second part agrees to furnish to them annual transportation over its line of road, without cost to the party of the first part. (7) This contract shall continue in force for a term of five years from the date hereof, subject, however, to be terminated by either party hereto, by giving written notice of sixty days to the other party of his intention so to do. In testimony whereof witness the signatures of the Texas Central Railroad Company, acting by and through C. Hamilton, its vice president and general manager, and my hand, at Waco, Texas, on this the 1st day of January, 1907.

Dr. Webb was a competent surgeon and physician. Dr. Webb established the hospital provided for in the contract at Walnut Springs, at which place Zumwalt was engaged as a boiler maker in the employ of the railroad company. In the course of his work, a particle of iron struck in the ball of one of his eyes, and he went to Dr. Webb to have it removed. Dr. Webb removed the piece of iron from his eye, but it is claimed that he acted negligently in using an instrument which was not disin-fectured or sterilized, and that the eye became infected, and it became necessary to remove the ball. It is unnecessary to set out the facts with regard to Dr. Webb's negligence, for that question is not before us. The case is presented to this court upon the assumption that Dr. Webb was negligent in the manner in which he performed the operation. The question that we have to deal with is, Was the railroad company liable for the negligence of Dr. Webb? On the trial the district court charged the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which was done, and upon appeal to the court of civil appeals that judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. This court granted a writ of error upon the ground of conflict with Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Hanway (Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 695.

It was the custom of the railroad company each month to deduct 50 cents from the wages due to each employee, which constituted a fund to be applied to the procurement of medical attention and care for any of such employees who might be injured or become sick during his employment with the company. When Zumwalt was employed by the railroad company, he understood this custom of the company, and expected it to reserve 50 cents out of his monthly wages for the purpose of providing medical treatment in case he should become sick or receive an injury. The company did reserve from Zumwalt's wages for each and every month up to the time of his injury 50 cents, which went into the hospital fund. Under the contract, which is copied above, the railroad company monthly turned over to Dr. Webb the full amount received by it from its employees by means of the deduction before stated. There is no evidence to show whether this was sufficient to pay the expenses of the hospital which Dr. Webb established at Walnut Springs or not. It does appear from the contract that Dr. Webb undertook to furnish, for the sum collected, medical attention and proper care to all persons entitled to participate in the fund. The railroad company claims that it was administering a charity, in the performance of which it received from its employees the fund provided by the tax levied, and paid it over to Dr. Webb, who was in charge of the hospital. Therefore it is not liable for the injury resulting from his negligence.

If the fund distributed was such that it was constituted a charity, and the railroad company had no purpose to be served in connection with its own business by administering the fund, then it was only required in administering the trust, to use ordinary care in the selection of Dr. Webb as the means by which to carry out the scheme inaugurated. Union P. R. Co. v. Artist, 23 L.R.A. 581, 9 C. C. A. 14, 19 U. S. App. 612, 60 Fed. 365; Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 643, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553. If, however, the railroad company originated the scheme with a view to promote its own business, and undertook the duty of dispensing the fund to accomplish a purpose of its own, it would be liable for the negligence of Dr. Webb, because, under these circumstances, the hospital would be the business of the railroad company, and Dr. Webb would be its agent. The effect of the evidence is that the railroad company inaugurated the plan to accumulate a fund with which to care for such of its employees as might be injured or be sick during such employment, and that fact suggests that it may have had a purpose of its own, but there is nothing in the evidence to indicate what that purpose was, and liability cannot be based upon vague speculation. The fund did not become the property of the company, but it was held by it in trust for the contributing employees. There being no method of executing the trust specified, the company was charged with the duty of administering it in such manner as would best accomplish the end for which it was accumulated; that is, to provide for the care of the sick and injured employees who should come within the terms of the trust. From the standpoint of the contributing employees, the fund constituted a charity, because it was raised by them to be expended for the benefit of persons entitled thereto, who would receive it without cost to them. It may then with propriety be said that the railroad company was charged with dispensing a charity fund, and if it made the contract with Dr. Webb as a means of executing the trust reposed in it,—that is, to give relief to the sick and injured employees coming within the class entitled to receive it without cost to them,—it was engaged in dispensing a charity, and, under such circumstances, Dr. Webb would not be the agent of the company, nor would he be performing or transacting a business of the company. Therefore it would not be liable for his negligence in the discharge of his duty as surgeon.

Although the fund was accumulated in the treasury of the company for charitable purposes, and the company was charged with the duty of dispensing it for such purpose, yet, if in fact the contract with Dr. Webb was made by the company in order to promote its own interest by the administration of the trust fund, and it had that effect, he was the agent of the company, and it should be held liable for his negligence. Upon the face of the contract, it appears to provide the most practical method by which the trust fund could be applied to the purposes for which it was accumulated. The contract was made with a physician who was required to do those things which the sick and injured would need to have done for them, and the entire fund received by the railroad company was devoted to execution of the contract and the accomplishing of the purpose to which it was intended to be devoted. The contract did not require Dr. Webb to do anything for the railroad company in connection with the discharge of his duties, nor, indeed, does it appear from the terms of that instrument or the attending circumstances that, by the performance of it, the business of the railroad company was in any manner affected, or that Dr. Webb, in the discharge of his duties, was in any manner serving the railroad. In order to hold the railroad company liable under such circumstances, it must be shown in some way, or it must appear from the facts and circumstances, that in truth and in fact the railroad company used the trust fund by means of the contract to its own advantage. We find nothing in the facts found by the court of civil appeals which would indicate that any business of the company could be promoted, hindered, or delayed either by having the hospital or by its nonexistence. It is true that the company reserved the right to terminate the contract, but that was eminently proper, so that, in case Dr. Webb failed to carry out the good purpose of the parties, another arrangement could be made. All that has been done by the company is consistent with a desire to faithfully carry out the purpose of its employees in creating the fund. We cannot attribute to the company motives not indicated by its acts nor proved by the evidence.

The honorable Court of Civil Appeals erred in reversing the judgment of the District Court. It is ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

SOCIÉTÉ NOUVELLE D'ARMEMENT,
Appt.,
v.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP COMPANY,
Claimant, of the Santa Rita.

(100 C. C. A. 360, 176 Fed. 890.)

Proximate cause — burning of vessel — negligent disposition of oil.

The act of an oil-burning vessel lying at a wharf which is oil soaked and laden with inflammable material, in discharging a quantity of fuel oil into the water, which floats under the wharf and becomes matted with particles of inflammable rubbish and débris on the water, is the proximate cause of injury to another vessel at the wharf by the burning of the oil and a portion of the wharf, although the oil is ignited by an independent, innocent act of a stranger, such as throwing a lighted cigar or burning coal into the water.
30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

(February 28, 1910.)

Note. — Discharging oil into stream or bay as proximate cause of fire resulting therefrom.

The decision in SOCIÉTÉ NOUVELLE D'ARMEMENT v. UNITED STATES S. S. Co., holding that the discharge by a steamer of fuel oil into the bay, where it was carried by the wind and tide under a wharf, and with other débris formed a mat, was the proximate cause of damage to another vessel by fire resulting from the accidental igniting of the débris, seems sound under the facts of that case.

Few cases have considered the question of the discharge of oil into streams or bays as the proximate cause of fires resulting therefrom, and no case involving facts like those of the above case has been found.

In Kuhn v. Jewett, 32 N. J. Eq. 647, where oil tank cars had been negligently left standing on a grade, so that they descended and collided with a locomotive, throwing some of the cars from the track, and igniting the oil, which flowed down a stream and set fire to the plaintiff's building, the defendant was held liable. The court said: "Although water is almost universally used as a means to extinguish fire, and it seems, at first blush, to be absurd to say that it can be used for the purpose of extending it, yet it is true, as a matter of fact, that as an agency for the transmission of burning oil, it is just as certain and effectual in its operations as the wind in carrying flame or a spark, or combustible matter in spreading a fire. In keeping up the continuity between cause and effect, it may be just as certain and effectual in its operation as any other material force. In this instance, it carried the consequences of the defendant's negligence to the petitioner's property, with almost as much certainty and directness as if the burning oil had descended upon it in obedience to the law of gravitation. This view is in conflict with that pronounced by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653,—a case which, in its facts, is substantially the counterpart of the one in hand. The water of a running stream was there held to be an intervening agency sufficiently independent and powerful to constitute a new force, without which the injury might not have happened; and it was therefore held that it caused a sufficient break in the chain of causation to relieve APPEAL by libellant from a judgment of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon libellant's vessel, which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gilbert and Morrow, Circuit Judges, and Hunt, District Judge.

Mr. William Denman, for appellant:

The Santa Rita's violation of the statute to protect vessels from fire is admittedly the sine qua non of the loss, and she is liable in damages for the consequences.

the defendant from liability. The capacity and adaptability of a running stream as an agency for the transmission of burning oil, and its similitude to other material forces as a means of communicating this species of fire, does not seem to have been considered by the court; at least, no allusion is made to it."

In the case of Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra, just referred to by the court, through the negligence of defendants' engineer an oil train ran into an obstruction which had fallen upon the track, and a portion of the train was derailed in such a way that the oil ignited and was carried down a stream upon which plaintiff's house was situated, by reason of which his house was burned. In holding that no recovery could be had, the court said: "The probable consequences of the collision, such as the engineer would have a right to expect, would be the throwing of the engine and a portion of the train off the track. Was he to anticipate the bursting of the oil tanks; the oil taking fire; the burning oil running into and being carried down the stream; and the sudden rising of the waters of the stream, by means of which, in part, at least, the burning oil set fire to the plaintiff's building? Hunt, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The Société Nouvelle d'Armement, a corporation of France, brought this libel against the American steamer Santa Rita, to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon the Boieldieu, a three-masted steel bark belonging to the libellant. The lower court found that the alleged negligent act of the defendant was not a proximate, but remote, cause of the injury. The libellant sued out this appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant.

The material uncontroverted facts are substantially as follows: The Santa Rita, an oil-burning steam vessel, 450 feet long, was moored to the north side of a wharf at Oakland, California. The British ship Whitlieburn and the libellant's bark Boieldieu were moored on the south side of the same wharf, and directly opposite the Santa Rita. The wharf was 90 feet wide, built on piles driven into the bottom of the harbor. Between 4 and 5 o'clock on the afternoon of March 11, 1907, a fire broke out, partially consuming the wharf and greatly injuring the Boieldieu.

The libellant alleges that this fire was caused by the negligence of the Santa Rita in pumping into the bay or allowing to drip from her docks therein large quantities of volatile fuel oil, which collected under the wharf in the alleyway formed by the vessels and the wharf, and that, as the tide started to come in, this mass of oil, held and matted together by particles of inflammable rubbish and débris, moved partially out from under the wharf and surrounded the Boieldieu. The libellant further contends that, while the Boieldieu was thus surrounded by this highly combustible oil mat, a spark from an engine on the wharf, or a live coal from the fuel box of the donkey engine, or a burning cigar, was thrown from the wharf into this oily mass, igniting it, and causing the conflagration which damaged the wharf and the Boieldieu.

The court found, among other things, that oil of a highly combustible nature was discharged from the Santa Rita, and collected in the water under the wharf and around the Boieldieu. There is ample evidence to support this conclusion. Much of the evidence offered by the defendant relating to this finding is that of men who testify that they did not pump any oil overboard or see any thus pumped.

On the other hand, the libellant supports its contention by the testimony of those who saw the oil thrown into the bay, and, in fact, were actors in putting it there. The Lakme, 55 C. C. A. 466, 118 Fed. 972. The decision of this question of fact depends upon the veracity of the libellant's witnesses; and who is better fitted to judge of their credibility than the court before whom they appeared? The surrounding facts and circumstances also point strongly to the probability that the oil which burned on the water around the Boieldieu came from the Santa Rita. We believe the finding of the lower court was correct.

The court further found that this mat of oil was ignited by the heat or flame from the burning wharf; taking the view that, in some unexplained manner, the wharf caught fire, and that the fire was communicated to the oil which lay on the water in close proximity thereto, and that the injury to the Boieldieu was caused jointly by the burning of the wharf and by the burning of the oily mass on the water. The finding that the fire originated on the wharf is vigorously assailed. The libellant contends that the oil ignited first, and that the flame spread from the oil to the wharf. We regard the defendant's contention that no oil whatever burned on the water as plainly against the evidence, and without merit. There is no reasonable doubt that the wharf burned, and some oil on the water burned; and the further question now arises: Where did the fire originate? On the wharf, or in the oil?

There is no evidence tending to show.

that any particular act started the conflagration; nor do the circumstances of themselves point to any probability by which the court may safely be guided to one view or the other. There were several oil-burning locomotives, a donkey engine, and twenty or twenty-five men on the wharf at the time of the fire. The wharf itself was more or less oil-soaked in spots, and there were several car loads of hay or other inflammable material thereon. The men were smoking. It is not at all improbable that one of them carelessly let drop a burning match near the hay, thus starting the fire. Or, an engine may have dropped some fire or sparks on the oil-soaked planks of the wharf, and so caused the fire. On the other hand, the presence of active engines and smoking men might lead equally as well to the conclusion that the fire started in the oil on the water. It is well established that this matted mass of fresh oil was very inflammable, even though floating. A burning cigar stub, or a live spark thrown from an engine, falling on a chip or other more or less solid material in the oil, would furnish a rational explanation of the origin of the fire.

The natural probabilities in favor of the different theories being equal, it is necessary to weigh and examine carefully the testimony of the eyewitnesses, in order to arrive at as just and right a conclusion as is possible under the circumstances. Fortunately, there is little real conflict in the testimony of those who saw the fire as to where it started. One of defendant's witnesses says positively that it started on the wharf, and the others say that it looked to them as if it started there. But those who were in a position to see where it started—who were south of the line of cars—testify directly and unequivocally that the fire started on the water, and that they saw it there before any was visible on the wharf proper. Whether on the water or on the wharf, it is undeniable that it started either to the south of the cars or in the cars themselves. The witnesses of libellant who testified on the point were in such a position that a fire in either of the places above named would have been easily discernible by them, while the defendant's witnesses were so situated that they could not have seen a fire on the water near the Boieldieu unless the flames mounted very high, and even then they were so far off that they might easily have been mistaken about the exact position of the conflagration. After a careful consideration of all the testimony, we are of opinion that the finding of the lower court, to the effect that the fire originated on the wharf, was clearly against the weight of the evidence, and cannot stand.

In our examination of the evidence, which has led us to the conclusion that the learned judge of the lower court erred in his finding upon this point, we observe that libellant's principal witnesses, who gave direct evidence, thereon, testified by depositions. Upon this matter, therefore, the trial judge had not the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses. His position, to arrive at a true result, was scarcely better than ours. Hence the rule that, when oral testimony is evidently the basis of a finding, or the written testimony relates to matters as to which the trial court is better able to reach a satisfactory conclusion than the appellate court, the finding will be adhered to, does not apply with the same force.

The court, after finding the facts as hereinbefore recited, made the further finding that the negligence of the Santa Rita in discharging oil into the bay could not be regarded as the efficient or proximate cause of the injury to the Boieldieu. The court said: "The burning of the wharf was entirely disconnected, and unrelated to the original act of the Santa Rita in discharging the oil, and was not caused by any person connected with that vessel, and whose actions were subject to her control. Unless, therefore, the burning of the wharf and the consequent ignition of the oil were matters which ought to have been reasonably anticipated as probable,—that is, more likely to occur than otherwise,—the burning of the wharf must be found to be the efficient cause of the damage to the Boieldieu. Was the burning of the wharf and the ignition of the oil something more likely to occur than not,—something that a person of ordinary prudence would have thought to be probable? The result has shown that such a fire, the ignition of oil thereby, and the consequent damage to the Boieldieu, were matters which might occur,—events which any person of ordinary judgment would have known to be possible. But the question is not whether a person of ordinary prudence would have known that such results were possible, but whether they would have been regarded by him as probable,—something likely to occur, and therefore to be guarded against by not discharging fuel oil into the bay. It seems to me this question must receive a negative answer. A man of extreme caution might have anticipated the result; but one of ordinary prudence and foresight would not have thought, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, that fuel oil, if discharged into the waters of the bay, with its tides and winds, would probably be set on fire, by the accidental or negligent burning of the wharf, or by live coals thrown into the bay, and coming in contact with the oil." [173 Fed. 413.]

We cannot give our assent to this view of the case. The respondent ship, being an oil-burning one, was charged with knowledge of the inflammable quality of fresh oil, even on water, and was also charged with knowledge of the probable effects of ordinary winds and tides in carrying the oil to where it might do great injury. The respondent cannot, therefore, be heard to say that she did not know fresh oil on water was inflammable, or that she had no reason to believe that the oil which she put into the harbor would be driven by the winds and tide under the dock and in among the shipping. It ought to have been known that the presence of a large quantity of fresh oil of a very combustible nature was a menace and danger while lying in an exposed position around a busy wharf. It ought reasonably to have been anticipated by those in charge of the Santa Rita that such a mass of oil, floating under the wharf and around the shipping, was likely to be ignited in some manner through the numerous and patent sources of fire which were near by. What would be more natural than for a man about the shipping to throw his lighted cigar stub into the bay, or for an engineer on the wharf to dump his live coals into the water? Certainly, one not having any reason to believe that the water was covered with an inflammable sheet could not be held to be negligent in thus throwing his burning coals or lighted cigar into the harbor. Indeed, a careful man, anxious to avoid all risks of fire, would select the water as the natural and seemingly proper place to put them. Surely, the defendant was charged with notice that men rightfully do these things, and that the doing of them where large masses of inflammable oil are floating about would probably produce a conflagration.

There is no infallible rule by which one can distinguish between a proximate and a remote cause. Justice Moody, for the Supreme Court, has recently said: "Few questions have more frequently come before the courts than that whether a particular mischief was the result of a particular default. It would not be useful to examine the numerous decisions in which this question has received consideration, for no case exactly resembles another, and slight differences of fact may be of great importance. The rules of law are reasonably well settled, however difficult they may be of application to the varied affairs of life." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256, the court said: "Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? It is admitted that the rule is difficult of application, but it is generally held that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attendant circumstances."

Tried by the above rule, it appears to us that the negligent act of the Santa Rita in pouring oil into the bay was the proximate cause of the injury to the Boieldieu. The injury flowed directly from the negligent act. The result of the act is not incompatible with what one would expect. The question is not whether such an act would produce a conflagration in the majority of cases, but whether it has a decided and natural tendency to produce such a result.

One of the most valuable tests to apply to determine whether a negligent act is the proximate or remote cause of an injury is to determine whether a responsible human agency has intervened between the fact accomplished and its alleged cause. "If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered too remote." Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. ed. 65; Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 166 U. S. 521, 41 L. ed. 1101, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 661.

In this case another force or power had not intervened. The throwing of the lighted cigar or burning coal into the bay cannot be said to be another force, or to break the causal chain. These acts were innocent, yet probable, and as natural as were the acts of the shopkeepers in throwing around the squib, in the famous "squib case" (Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892), although we recognize that the causal connection that existed in the squib case between the original act and the intermediate acts is not found in the present instance.

We are of opinion that the injury to the Boieldieu was the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act of the Santa Rita, and ought to have been anticipated, in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The circumstances which must be considered are the highly combustible nature of the oil, the condition of the tide and wind, the proximity of the wharf and shipping, the inflammable condition of the oil-soaked wharf, and the many chances of accidental ignition to which the oil was exposed. Without doubt, the natural and probable consequence of covering water with oil might not, under different circumstances, have had a natural tendency to produce any injury. If the oil had been dumped into the middle of the bay, far from any ship or wharf; if the wind and tide had been different; if the wharf had been fireproof; if the oil had been less inflammable; if the chances of fires had been much less,—we might have reached a different conclusion. But, considering all the facts and circumstances, we must conclude that the injury done by the floating oil ought to have been foreseen, and that therefore the placing of it on the water was the proximate cause of the injury inflicted by its ignition. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, supra; Aetna F. Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 24 L. ed. 395; Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, supra; McGill v. Michigan S. S. Co. 75 C. C. A. 518, 144 Fed. 788.

The libellant placed great reliance on § 374 $\frac{1}{2}$ of the Penal Code of California, as affecting the question of proximate cause and the burden of proof in relation thereto. That is a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for anyone to discharge petroleum or certain other substances into the waters of a navigable bay or river of the state. In arriving at our conclusion, we have not taken this statute into consideration, because, under the facts, we believe liability exists irrespective of the statute.

The decree of the District Court, dismissing the libel, with complainant's costs, is reversed.

It is further ordered that the District Court enter a decree in favor of libellant in the usual and proper form.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

S. DANA LINCOLN, Appt.,
v.

NATIONAL METROPOLITAN BANK,
Intervener.

(35 App. D. C. 362.)

Bank — renewal note — release of collateral.

A bank which, in order to remove an overdue note from its books, takes the note of a third person for its amount, with such note as collateral thereto, releases, in favor of attaching creditors of the maker, its lien on property which had been assigned to it as collateral for the overdue note, at least where it permits assigned funds to pass through its hands into those of the maker of the note for a long period of time, without any attempt to apply them to the satisfaction of the note.

(May 27, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court entered upon a directed verdict for intervener in an attachment proceeding. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Percival M. Brown and Walter B. Guy for appellant.

Messrs. Ralston, Siddons, & Richardson and Walter D. Davidge for appellee.

Van Orsdel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause came here on appeal from the judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in an attachment proceeding. It appears that on September 11, 1906, the appellant, S. Dana Lincoln, trad-

Note. — Loss of collateral by treating note secured as itself collateral for a new note for the same debt.

While the decision in LINCOLN v. NATIONAL METROPOLITAN BANK would seem to be proper on the facts as they appear in that case, the circumstances involved are so peculiar as to make it doubtful if it could be considered authority for the general proposition that collateral security for a note would be lost by treating the note as collateral for another note. It is admitted that the assignment or transfer of a note usually carries with it security for its payment. This is also the result where a pledgor renews the note given to evidence the debt which the pledge secures. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 871.

And even a novation of a debt evidenced by a note, by the substitution of a new note, has been held not to discharge a lien held under the first note, as long as any part of the original debt can be traced into the new note. Kausler v. Ford, 47 Miss. 289.

It was held in Ensley Lumber Co. v. Lewis, 121 Ala. 94, 25 So. 729, that the indorsement of conditional sale notes as collateral for a loan does not pass legal title to the property for which they were given. In that case, however, the vendor had paid the debt for which the purchase money notes were pledged as collateral, and received them back, and was attempting to enforce his rights against a subsequent mortgagee of the property.

The only cases found involving the effect of the pledge of a note as collateral security for another note, upon collateral pledged ing as National Motar Company, hereafter referred to as plaintiff, brought suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the Southern Construction Company, a corporation, for the sum of $968.57, for material furnished it in constructing a building in this city for the National Metropolitan Bank, appellee, hereafter, for convenience, referred to as the bank. At the same time a writ of attachment was issued, which was returned on February 6, 1907, showing that certain credits belonging to the Southern Construction Company had been attached in the hands of the Thompson-Starrett Company, garnishee.

On March 12th the Thompson-Starrett Company answered that in December, 1905, it had contracted with the Southern Construction Company to furnish and erect all the fireproofing necessary in the construction of the National Metropolitan Bank Building. It is alleged in the answer that subsequently the Southern Construction Company failed, and the Thompson-Starrett Company was compelled to complete the work, and that there was left in its hands the sum of $1,029.60, which was claimed by a number of parties, among whom was the defendant bank, which claimed a right to it under an alleged assignment of any and all payments that might become due the Southern Construction Company under its contract.

The plaintiff joined issue on the answer of the garnishee, and shortly thereafter the garnishee paid into the registry of the court below the sum of $1,029.60, the amount admitted to be in its possession. Before the cause came on for trial, the bank, by leave of the court, filed an intervening petition, in which it set up its claim to the fund, alleging, among other things, as follows:

"2. That heretofore, to wit, on the 17th day of February, 1906, the defendant, Southern Construction Company, gave an order upon the Thompson-Starrett Company, a party herein, directing it to pay over to this intervener any and all payments as they might become due according to the contract of the Southern Construction Company with the Thompson-Starrett Company, for work to be done on the National Metropolitan Citizens Bank Building, and that such order was forthwith duly accepted by the Thompson-Starrett Company, and that such order and acceptance thereof at once communicated to this intervener, and that, relying upon such order and acceptance, the said bank did, on or about the 19th day of February, 1906, loan to said Southern Construction Company the sum of two thousand (2,000) dollars, taking its note therefor, and holding said duly accepted order as collateral. That thereafter, and prior to the filing of the attachment in this case, there became due to the Southern Construction Company by the Thompson-Starrett Company, because of the work upon the building of the intervener, a large sum, to wit, the sum of twelve hundred (1,200) dollars, which sum, or so much thereof as the Thompson-Starrett Company admits to have been due by it to the Southern Construction Company, has been paid into the registry of this court, attachment having been served herein upon the Thompson-Starrett Company before said payment could be made.

"That at and before the time of the service of said attachment, there was and still is due to the said bank, the intervener, herein, by the Southern Construction Company as balance of the aforementioned loan of two thousand (2,000) the sum of twelve hundred (1,200) dollars, for which it gave, as a renewal of the aforesaid note for thousand (2,000) dollars, its note to the National Metropolitan Bank dated August 14, 1906, payable sixty days after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per centum per annum until paid, the original note of two thousand (2,000) dollars having theretofore been reduced by the payment of interest and eight hundred (800) dollars on acto secure the first note, hold that the pledge of the note carries with it the collateral security.

Thus, in Eddy v. Fogg, 192 Mass. 543, 78 N. E. 549, where one borrowing money from a bank gave his note, and, as collateral thereto, indorsed to the bank the note of a third party, which was secured by collateral, it appears that he notified the bank that the note was so secured, but it does not appear that the collateral was actually assigned with the note. The court said that it was clear that the borrower could pledge the note to the bank, and that the security passed with it to the pledgee, who could collect the note by suit thereon or sale of the collateral, or both.

And in Mechanics' Bldg. Asso. v. Ferguson, 29 La. Ann. 548, it appeared that F. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

borrowed from P., and executed notes, and at the same time delivered to P., in pledge and as security, two notes of G., which were secured by mortgage. Later, G., being about to execute a mortgage to plaintiff on the same property, procured from F. a waiver of precedence of the first mortgage and an agreement that plaintiff's mortgage should prime F's. But the court held that the waiver of F. was invalid as to P., and that the latter was entitled to priority in the mortgage property to the extent of his loan to F.

It is to be noticed, however, that in these cases the notes were pledged to secure new and different debts, not the ones for which they were originally given, as was the case in LINCOLN v. NATIONAL METROPOLITAN BANK.

count of the principal thereof, out of funds paid to the said intervening bank by the Thompson-Starrett Company, pursuant to and in reliance upon the aforementioned assignment of February 17, 1906."

On trial, the jury was instructed to return a verdict for the defendant, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the cause comes here on appeal.

*A number of assignments are made of error alleged to have occurred in the course of the trial, which, we think, need not be considered. For the purposes of this appeal, it is only necessary to consider the assignment charging error in granting the peremptory instruction of the defendant directing a verdict in its favor. The order or assignment upon which defendant asserts its right to the fund in question consists of the following letter:

Baltimore, February 17, 1906.

Messrs. Thompson-Starrett Co.,

14th and G. Streets N. W.,

Washington, District of Columbia.

Gentlemen:—

We hereby authorize you to pay over to the National Metropolitan Citizens Bank any and all payments as they may become due according to our contract with you for work to be done on the National Metropolitan Citizens Bank Building.

Very truly yours,

[Seal.] Southern Construction Company,
Warfield Ward, President.

J. Hurst Purnell, Sec. & Treas.

Accepted by

Thompson-Starrett Company,

B. C. Dickinson, Mgr.

Two days prior to the giving of this order, a letter was written by the Southern Construction Company to the president of the bank, which is to some extent explanatory of their transactions. It is as follows:

February 15, 1906.

Mr. E. S. Parker, President

National Metropolitan Citizens Bank,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Dear Sir:—

Confirming the conversation the writer had with you this morning, we beg to make application for a loan of $2,000. We have at present $6,000 worth of hollow tile fireproofing stored in Washington, which is to be used in fireproofing your new building. We are willing to assign this material over to you, and likewise any payment which will be due us from the Thompson-Starrett Company on our erection of the work. This loan to be placed to our credit in your bank, and to be subject to our check.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We would be very glad to have an answer from you by Saturday, February 17th.

Respectfully submitted,

Southern Construction Company,
Warfield Ward, President.

The validity of this assignment is vigorously assailed by counsel for plaintiff. We think it unnecessary, however, to consider this point, since, conceding for the purposes of this appeal that the assignment is valid, a question upon which we express no opinion, it is apparent that at the date of the attachment the loan for which it had been taken by the bank as security had been satisfied, at least, to the extent of preventing the bank from claiming a lien on the fund in question superior to that acquired by the attaching creditor. It appears that the bank applied the last payment received from the Thompson-Starrett Company, amounting to $885.50, to the reduction of the original loan, and took a new note on August 14, 1906, for the sum of $1,200, surrendering the original note. The new note reads as follows:

$1,200.

Washington, District of Columbia,
August 14, 1906.

Sixty days after date we promise to pay to the order of ourselves twelve hundred dollars at National Metropolitan Bank, Washington, District of Columbia.

Southern Construction Company,
Warfield Ward, President.

J. Hurst Purnell, Sec.-Tr.

Value received.

No. —.

Due Oct. 15th.

The note was indorsed on the back as follows:

"J. Hurst Purnell,
Warfield Ward,
Southern Construction Company,
Warfield Ward, President,
J. Hurst Purnell, Sec. Tr.
410 Cont. Bldg., Balto., Md."

This note was allowed to become long overdue. The bank, on July 15, 1907, took the personal note of J. Hurst Purnell for the sum of $1,200, and took the note of the construction company as collateral security for the payment of the personal note. The Purnell note reads, in part, as follows:

$1,200. Washington, D. C., July 15, 1907.

On demand, for value received, I promise to pay to the National Metropolitan Bank of Washington, or order, at office of said bank in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, twelve hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, having deposited with said bank, as collateral security for the payment of this note, and also as collateral for all other present and future demands, of any and all kind, of the said bank against the undersigned, due or not due, the following property, viz.:

Note Southern Construction Company for $1,200 dated August 14, 1906, for sixty days, and indorsed by Warfield Ward and J. Hurst Purnell, and do hereby authorize the said bank, on the nonperformance of this promise, or the nonpayment of any of the demands aforesaid, or failure to furnish further security as hereafter agreed, to sell the whole or any part of said collaterals or substitutes therefor or additions thereto, at any broker's board or public or private sale, at the option of the said bank, without notice, etc.

The Purnell note, by this transaction, became the primary evidence of indebtedness. The bank could not recover on both notes. Neither could it select which one it might treat as the primary security. It had placed itself in a position where it could only dispose of the construction company note as collateral in the event of its failure to recover on the Purnell note,—a contingency which never happened. The law does not favor uncertainties. The bank cannot treat Purnell as its debtor on its books, and thereby, for the purpose of inspection, remove overdue paper from its books, and at the same time claim the protection here sought in the courts. The auditor for the bank attempted to explain the reason for the taking of the Purnell note as follows: "This note was given to keep an overdue note of the Southern Construction Company off the books, balance of $1,200 due on the Southern Construction Company, note, and the note was taken from Mr. Purnell with that Southern Construction note as collateral in order to keep the paper alive, take the overdue paper off the books." On the strength of this testimony it is claimed that the bank never surrendered possession of the construction company note. Its officer at the trial did not so testify. His evidence is that the note "had never been out of the bank." This, however, is of little importance, since the taking of the Purnell note and the transfer of the construction company note to the position of collateral security constituted in law a constructive delivery of the construction company note to Purnell, and a change of possession. The transaction must be treated as a novation, whereby the bank surrendered its security under the assignment from the construction company, and accepted the primary obligation of Purnell, secured by the construction company note, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which Purnell put up as collateral. The title to the construction company note passed to Purnell, and with it all right of the bank to assert its lien against the fund here in question became extinguished.

It is claimed by counsel for defendant that the assignment was general in its terms, and nothing short of the satisfaction of the debt to the bank would satisfy the object and purpose of the assignment. Without discussing the validity of the assignment, it is sufficient to call attention to the fact that counsel overlook the difficulty which confronts them, that the debt of the construction company to the bank has been satisfied. The Purnell note accomplished this. The power of the bank to take money due the construction company from the Thompson-Starrett Company no longer existed. That right did not pass to Purnell by the delivery of the construction company note, and could not, therefore, pass back when the note was put up with the bank as collateral for the payment of a different obligation. The title to the note still remained in Purnell, subject to be forfeited to the bank for failure to pay his own note. We are unable to discover any theory upon which the defendant can claim a lien upon the fund in question superior to that acquired by plaintiff under the writ of attachment.

We are not unmindful of the rule that the assignment or transfer of a note usually carries with it the security for its payment. This is especially true in the case of mortgages, deeds of trust, and instruments executed and of record as security for the payment of the notes or bonds of indebtedness. But we think the present alleged assignment does not come within that class of securities. Here the letter of the construction company to the Thompson-Starrett Company was an order for it to pay any balance due it to the bank. It is obvious that the Thompson-Starrett Company would not have been justified in paying this money to a third party upon the order of the bank. The test of the validity of the assignment lies in the power of the bank to enforce its claim against the Thompson-Starrett Company over the objection of the construction company, and the further right of the Thompson-Starrett Company to comply with its conditions and at the same time escape liability to the construction company.

In arriving at the right of the bank to lay claim to the fund in question under the assignment, it is beside the case that no objection is being made by the construction company. The legal test to be applied is whether such objection could be made. With this situation presented, it can hardly be claimed that the bank, under a personal assignment, which, in effect, furnished a mere cloak through which it passed to the construction company over $10,000, without applying any part of this sum to the liquidation of the $2,000 loan, could assert a lien superior to that of the attaching creditor. During the time that these transactions were being carried on between the bank and the construction company, the note was repeatedly renewed.

Referring to these transactions in detail, the witness Purnell, secretary and treasurer of the construction company, testified on cross-examination as follows: "On cross-examination the attention of the witness was called to the fact that the alleged assignment to the bank was dated February 19, 1906, and the checks offered in evidence, aggregating over $11,000, were all paid to the bank after that date; the witness was asked whether the bank received money from the Thompson-Starrett Company after that, and witness replied that the checks were all made out for the account of the Southern Construction Company; in all instances except one, the bank gave the Southern Construction Company credit for the full amount of these checks, until August 10, 1906, the date of the last check, for $885, when the Southern Construction Company asked the bank to renew the note for $2,000, and the bank refused to do this, but said that it would take a new note for $1,200, and thus the $2,000 note was reduced to $1,200. Witness was asked what authority he had to tell the bank how to apply the money received on these checks from the Thompson-Starrett Company, and replied that when the bank notified them that it had received a check for work which the Southern Construction Company had done the previous month, Mr. Ward and witness came over to see the bank and asked it to continue the loan for $2,000, and to let them have the check, and at their request, the bank would let them have the check; that they never received a cent from the Thompson-Starrett Company after the assignment was given to the bank; that they got that $885 in August by its being deducted from the $2,000 note; that the bank turned the amount of the said checks received by the bank after the date of the assignment over to them without collateral security; and that there was always margin enough for the protection of the bank."

Though there is no evidence of fraudulent intent on the part of the bank, and none can be reasonably inferred from the record, yet it must be remembered that the building was being erected for it; the material furnished by plaintiff went into it, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the bank must have known of the existence of dealings between plaintiff and the construction company. While these facts do not in themselves determine the nature or legal effect of the assignment in question, or whether it would follow the transfer of the note to Purnell, and, as collateral, back to the bank, yet they are important in ascertaining the intent of the parties at the time the assignment was made. If the assignment was for the sole purpose, as appears from the record, and as we must assume, to secure the loan of $2,000 from the bank to the construction company, the bank should have promptly applied the funds coming into its hands to that purpose. This it did not do. It violated the intent the parties presumably had in making the assignment, and thereby prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff, who was ignorant of the existing relations between the bank and the construction company when it extended credit to the latter. Assuming again the validity of this assignment, a matter not free from doubt, it cannot be held that it was within the contemplation of the parties that it should extend further than to authorize the bank to hold out sufficient of the funds coming into its hands to satisfy the loan. This it failed to do when ample opportunity was afforded. It elected to accept other security, and, by so doing, forfeited further claim upon the fund in question.

The judgment is reversed, with costs, and remanded, with instructions to proceed in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied.

SEPARATE appeals by defendants from orders of the District Court for Ward County overruling demurrers to the complaint in an action brought to enforce an alleged mechanics' lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson & Schull, with Mr. F. B. Lambert, for appellants:

Where materials are sold to a contract-lien will attach, see the note in 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 831.

This note is confined strictly to cases coming within the foregoing title, to the exclusion of cases in which adjoining lots were owned by the same person, or in which separate buildings were erected upon adjoining lots owned in severalty. The cases excluded rest upon considerations which have a distinctiveness not accorded them in the indiscriminate citation of cases in briefs and opinions; for if one building covers lots of several owners, there would seem to be the greater room for dispute as to the propriety of maintaining a several lien against one lot and the part of the building thereon; whereas, if separate buildings are erected upon the separate lots, the greater doubt concerns the propriety of maintaining a joint lien.

That there may be a joint lien in circumstances coming within the scope of this note is established by STOLTZE v. HURD, and other cases of the same kind.

It is held that the owners in severalty of contiguous city or platted lots may, by their acts, connect them so as to constitute one lot within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law. Miller v. Shepard, 50 Minn. 268, 52 N. W. 894; Menzel v. Tubbs, 51 Minn. 364, 17 L.R.A. 815, 53 N. W. 653, 1017; Deegan v. Kilpatrick, 54 App. Div. 371, 66 N. Y. Supp. 628.

Such lots have been held to be so joined by the construction on them of a building by the owner of one lot, with the knowledge and consent of the other. Menzel v. Tubbs, 51 Minn. 364, 17 L.R.A. 815, 53 N. W. 653, 1017.

So, where each of the owners in severalty of two adjoining lots conveyed to a third person, and retained the legal title in trust as security for the purchase money, and consented to the erection by the grantee of an entire structure across both lots, and further consented that a materialman might furnish material for such building, it was held that, inasmuch as the equitable title to both lots vested in the grantee, together with possession, and the materials went into the improvement of both lots as one 30 L.R.A. or for use in a building situated upon two contiguous lots owned in severalty by different owners, and the contract between the contractor and the owners is a joint contract, a joint lien must be filed covering both properties.

Fullerton v. Leonard, 3 S. D. 118, 52 N. W. 325.

The contract entered into by the lienor is the basis of the lien, and if the contract under which the work is done and the material furnished is joint, the lien must be joint or not at all.

piece of land, the right to file a lien attached thereto. Miller v. Schmitt, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1077.

In Deegan v. Kilpatrick, 54 App. Div. 371, 66 N. Y. Supp. 628, upholding a lien against adjoining lots owned in severalty, for excavation work performed under an entire contract into which the lot owners jointly entered,—the court said: "The appellants contend that inasmuch as they did not jointly have title to the entire premises upon which the lien is sought to be enforced, a single lien cannot be acquired upon the entire plot, but that if the plaintiffs have a lien at all, it is a separate one upon each lot, and that inasmuch as the contract provided that payment for the work was to be made by the yard, the plaintiffs were in a position to determine just how many yards of rock and earth were taken from each lot, and, therefore, they should have filed separate liens against the owners of each lot for the work done for him. But the contract does not so provide. On the contrary, the provisions of it are that the defendants jointly obligate themselves to pay for the work done, irrespective of the question of the title. The two lots are contiguous and by the contract were treated as one parcel. The defendants had the right to thus treat them, and the plaintiffs had an equal right to treat them in the same manner, so far as it became necessary to file a notice of lien, or to enforce the same for the purpose of obtaining what the defendants had agreed to pay. This being so, it follows that they had the right to acquire a lien upon the two lots for the work performed, and for that purpose could treat the two lots as one parcel."

And it was held in Miller v. Shepard, 50 Minn. 268, 52 N. W. 894, that two adjoining lots owned in severalty could be treated as one lot for the purposes of enforcing a single claim for a lien for labor and materials furnished for a building occupying a part of each lot, under a joint contract entered into by the several owners. But it was held that the lienors could sever their claims so as to obtain judgment against each lot, provided they could show what proportion of the material went into the part of the building situated on each lot. It should be stated that the evidence failed to show a basis for apportionment.

In holding that the lien can be severed and asserted against one parcel, the foregoing case departs from STOLTZE v. HURD, and seems to accord with the weight of authority. It should be noted that the question is not as to enforceability of the claim as affected by failure or inability to apportion the work and labor between the parcels, but as to whether, assuming that such apportionment has been, or can be, made, the nature of the contract, or of the improvement, or of both, is such as to require the lien to be enforced jointly, or, at least, to render it unenforceable severally against the parcels.

It was held in Kinney v. Mathias, 81 Minn. 64, 83 N. W. 497, that where one contracted separately with the owners of two adjoining lots, to construct a building upon each, and it was subsequently agreed among all the parties that such buildings were to be erected at the same time and as one structure, a lien for an unpaid balance due for labor and materials could be enforced against one of the lots to the extent of the proportion of the materials used in the structure on that lot, and provided that proportion was shown. Here the court expressly follows Miller v. Shepard, and in this case, as in that, there was a failure to establish the proportion of materials used in the building.

So, it was held in Hannon v. Logan, 14 Mo. App. 33, that a lien was enforceable against one lot and its improvement for the amount of labor and materials shown to have been expended thereon, although the improvement comprised two houses under one roof, situated on lots of separate owners, and the labor and materials were furnished for both for an entire sum.

And in Booth v. Booth, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 294, 1 Ont. Week. Rep. 49, where, under contract with adjoining owners, repairs were made for an entire sum upon separate buildings included under one roof, a lien could be 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

enforced against each lot for labor and materials furnished for the building on that lot. The court said: It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to whether the respondent would have been entitled to a lien under the act on both the lands of his wife and of his mother for the whole of the agreed price, for the only claim which is made is to a lien on the lands of the wife for the price of the work done on her part of the building and for the materials furnished in respect of it. It was, however, contended that the effect of the bargain, it having been for the whole work at one price, and not at separate prices in respect of each building, is that even such a lien as is claimed was not created. I am unable to agree with this view. Had it been impossible to distinguish between the work done and materials furnished on the wife's building and those for the building of the mother, there, possibly, might have been a difficulty in the respondent's way; but I see no reason why, if it be practicable to do this, and a fortiori where, as appears to have been done in this case, a separate account had been kept, the lien may not attach to the land of each owner for the price of the work performed and materials furnished on his part of the building. I see no reason for giving to the act such a narrow construction as would leave outside the beneficial provisions of it one who, under such circumstances, has performed work or furnished materials for the construction or repair of a building."

So, it was held in Edwards v. Edwards, 24 Ohio St. 402, that where one house was built upon adjoining lots, under one contract entered into by the owners in severalty and their husbands, the building having been erected so as to give each owner a separate domicile situated on her separate estate, the builder might enforce a lien against each of the lots for the labor and materials thereon expended.

In Perkins v. Boyd, 37 Colo. 265, 86 Pac. 1045, where, under contract with the husband as his wife's agent, a building and retaining wall were built upon a lot owned by the wife, and a strip of an adjoining lot

Mr. C. Aurland, for respondent:

Plaintiff was entitled to a single lien on both of the lots and buildings.

If plaintiff had a right to a lien on both lots he had a right to such a lien on one of them. The greater contains the less.

Meixell v. Griest, 1 Kan. App. 145, 40 Pac. 1070; Reilly v. Williams, supra.

The plaintiff had a right to waive his lien on a part of the property on which he could rightly claim a lien, and hold the balance.

Carmody, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by plaintiff to foreclose an alleged mechanics' lien. The complaint alleges: That the defendant J. A. Roell is the owner of lot 20, in block 7, of the town site of Minot, in Ward county, North Dakota. That one A. S. Blakey is the owner of lot 21, in said block 7, that said lots are adjoining, and that the defendant Roell and the said Blakey entered into a joint contract with the defendant Hurd for the construction and erection by him, the said H. A. Hurd, for them, upon the said lots 20 and 21, of a three-story brick and stone building. That in pursuance of said contract the defendant Hurd did erect and construct on said lots a three-story brick and stone building. That on or about the 17th day of April, 1907, plaintiff entered into a contract for the sale to the defendant Hurd of certain building material to be by him used in the construction of said building. That plaintiff did furnish defendant Hurd building material of the value of $5,740.48. That prior to the completion of said building the plaintiff duly notified the said A. S. Blakey and the said J. A. Roell, and each of them, that he had furnished said materials to defendant Hurd as aforesaid. That on or about the 10th day of January, 1908, at the request of the defendant Hurd and the said A. S. Blakey, and with the consent of the defendant J. A. Roell, and in consideration of the payment to him of the sum of $3,000 by the said A. S. Blakey, the plaintiff waived his lien upon the said lot 21 and the part of the building thereon standing. That on the 12th day of March, 1908, he filed in the office of the clerk of the district court in and for Ward county a duly verified claim, for the purpose of securing and perfecting a lien for the balance of the moneys due him for the materials so furnished on said lot 20 and the building thereon standing. That subsequently $407 was paid by defendant Hurd to this plaintiff. That on the 14th day of July 1908, for the purpose of further perfecting his lien, he filed, as supplementary and amendatory to the lien statement filed on March 12th, his supplementary and amendatory claim therefor. That the whole of said lot 20 is required for the convenient use and occupation of said building. That the defendants, and each of them, owned by the wife and husband jointly,—it was held that the materialman who had filed his statement of lien against the wife's lot was entitled to have his entire debt out of that lot; the court saying that if the statement had included the other lot, the lien would have extended to both lots for all labor and materials furnished.

In Ballou v. Black, 17 Neb. 389, 23 N. W. 3, s. c. on subsequent appeal 21 Neb. 131, 31 N. W. 673, where a church and an individual owning adjoining lots made a contract for the construction of a block of buildings thereon, locating the same so that the parts adapted to the uses of the several owners should be upon their respective lots, and providing for payment by the one in certain agreed proportions, it appearing that the materials furnished were not designated for 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

any part of the building, but were used indiscriminately upon either part,—the court said that while the contract might be a several contract as between the parties to it, yet the liability for labor and material was a joint liability. The conclusion of the court was that the arrangement between the parties, and the practice under it, furnished a rule by which the court would be governed in apportioning and adjusting the lien for material between the lots.

It was held in Swift v. Calnan, 102 Iowa, 206, 37 L.R.A. 462, 63 Am. St. Rep. 443, 71 N. W. 233, that no mechanic's lien could be had for one half the expense of a party wall, which the party who built it was entitled to recover from his neighbor upon the latter's use and appropriation of the wall.

claim to have some interest in, or lien or encumbrance upon the said premises, which, if any there be, the plaintiff alleges are subsequent and subject to his lien. That there is due and owing the plaintiff from the defendant Hurd the sum of $2,224.40. Plaintiff asks judgment for that amount, for the foreclosure of his lien, that the rights and interests of the defendants, and each of them, in said premises be determined, if any they have, and the same be decreed to be subject and subsequent to the lien of the plaintiff, for the sale of the said lot 20 and the building thereon standing, and for a deficiency judgment against the defendant Hurd.

To this complaint defendant Hurd interposed the following demurrer: "Comes now the defendant H. A. Hurd, and demurs to the complaint of the plaintiff herein on the ground that two causes of action have been improperly united in said complaint; and demurs to the complaint on the further ground that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant; and on the further ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action." The defendants J. A. Roell, Margaret Roell, and the Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Company demurred to the complaint, as follows: "(1) That there is a defect of parties defendant; (2) that several causes of action have been improperly united; (3) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Both of these demurrers were overruled. From the orders overruling said demurrers, separate appeals were taken to this court, which appeals were submitted together. Defendants assign as error the overruling of the demurrers.

Section 6238, Rev. Codes 1905, reads as follows: "If labor is done or materials furnished under a single contract for several buildings, erections, or improvements, the person furnishing the same shall be entitled to a lien therefor as follows: 1. If such buildings, erections, or improvements are upon a single farm, tract, or lot, upon all such buildings, erections, and improvements and the farm, tract, or lot upon which the same are situated. 2. If such buildings, erections, or improvements are upon separate farms, tracts, or lots, upon all such buildings, erections, and improvements and the farms, tracts, or lots upon which the same are situated; but upon the foreclosure of such lien the court may, in the cases provided for in this subdivision, apportion the amount of the claim among the several farms, tracts, or lots in proportion to the enhanced value of the same produced by means of such labor or materials, if such apportionment is necessary to protect the rights of third persons."

The doctrine is well settled that, where one seeks to avail himself of the benefits of a purely statutory right, he must bring himself fairly within its provisions by complying with its terms. A mechanics' lien is a creature of the statute, and every step prescribed by the statute must be shown to have been substantially followed, or it does not exist. Mark Paine Lumber Co. v. Douglas County Improv. Co. 94 Wis. 322, 68 N. W. 1013; Rosholt v. Corlett, 106 Wis. 474, 82 N. W. 305; Caylor v. Thorn, 125 Ind. 201, 25 N. E. 217; Robbins v. Blevins, 109 Mass. 219; Berry v. McAdams, 93 Tex. 431, 55 S. W. 1112; Neeley v. Searight, 113 Ind. 316, 15 N. E. 598; Schulenburg v. Bascom, 38 Mo. 188; Clark v. Edwards, 119 N. C. 115, 25 S. E. 794; Shafer v. Archbold, 116 Ind. 29, 18 N. E. 56; North Dakota Lumber Co. v. Bulger (N. D.) 125 N. W. 883.

There was but a single joint contract made by defendant Hurd with the owners of the lots for the construction of a building upon both lots. The plaintiff sold the building material to defendant Hurd under one contract for both buildings. The contract entered into by the lienor is the basis of the lien, and, if the contract under which the work is done and the material furnished is joint, "the lien must be joint or not at all." Sergeant v. Denby, 87 Va. 206, 12 S. E. 402. The United States Supreme Court, in Phillips v. Gilbert, 101 U. S. 721, 25 L. ed. 833, in an appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in which the act of Congress passed February 2, 1859 (act Feb. 2, 1859, chap. 17, § 1, 11 Stat. at L. 376), providing that any person who should by virtue of a contract with the owner of any building perform labor or furnish materials for the construction or repair thereof, should, upon filing the proper notice, have a lien upon the building and the lot upon which it was situated, where such a lien was claimed for materials furnished and work done upon a row of brick buildings upon different lots, under a joint contract therefor with the owner,—held that, such contract being joint, the lien must be joint. The opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley contains: "The contract was one, and related to the row as an entirety, and not to the particular buildings separately. The whole row was a building within the meaning of the law, from having been united by the parties in one contract, as one general piece of work." The supreme court of South Dakota, in Fuller- ton v. Leonard, 3 S. D. 118, 52 N. W. 325, uses the following language: "It is the contract with the owners which is to govern the question before us. There was no separate contract with the several owners for the building of each house or the barn, nor was there, as disclosed from the complaint, a separate account for each building to be kept. But the contract was joint, and was for the entire work, and the contract with the subcontractor with the plaintiff was of the same nature. The material was to be furnished for all the buildings for the sum specified, and not for each separately. It seems clear, then, that as between the contractors and the owners the buildings must be considered as one piece of work, and that the right to a joint lien can be maintained against all the buildings. The lien must have its foundation in the contract, and if the contract be joint the lien must be joint, or not at all."

The lien must follow the contract, and no valid lien can be had against one particular lot or building. The plaintiff was entitled to a joint lien upon the building and both lots, but is not entitled to a separate lien upon one lot and the portion of the building situated thereon. See § 6238, Rev. Codes 1905. If further authority is necessary, the following cases are in point: Phillips v. Gilbert, supra; Holland v. Cunniff, 96 Mo. App. 67, 69 S. W. 737; Lehmer v. Horton, 67 Neb. 574, 93 N. W. 964, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 683; Seattle Lumber Co. v. Sweeney, 33 Wash. 691, 74 Pac. 1001; Phillips v. Salmon River Min. & Development Co. 9 Idaho, 149, 72 Pac. 886; Bowman Lumber Co. v. Newton, 72 Iowa, 90, 33 N. W. 377; Childs v. Anderson, 128 Mass. 108; Premier Steel Co. v. McElwaine-Richards Co. 144 Ind. 619, 43 N. E. 878; Willamette Mills Co. v. Shea, 24 Or. 40, 32 Pac. 762; Batchelder v. Rand, 117 Mass. 176; Eisenbeis v. Wakeman, 3 Wash. 534, 28 Pac. 923.

The fact that the complaint alleges that at the request of the defendant Hurd and said A. S. Blakey, and with the consent of the defendant J. A. Roell, and in consideration of the payment to him of the sum of $3,000 by the said A. S. Blakey, the plaintiff waived his lien upon the said lot 21, and the part of the said building thereon standing, does not help the plaintiff. No agreement or consent by Hurd, Blakey, or Roell is binding on the other defendants, who the plaintiff alleges claim some interest in the property.

The plaintiff not having any lien to foreclose, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The orders appealed from are reversed, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and the District Court is directed to enter orders sustaining each of said demurrers.

All concur, except Morgan, Ch. J., not participating.

v.

S. A. ROBERTSON et al.

and

NEW AMSTERDAM CASUALTY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Tenn. —, 131 S. W. 864.)

Indemnity Insurance — Liability to injured employee.

One agreeing to indemnify an employer against liability for damages on account of bodily injuries to an employee through his negligence, by a policy providing that no action shall lie against the insurer as respects any loss under the policy unless it shall be brought by the assured himself, for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a final judgment, and binding the insurer to defend any action brought by an injured employee against the assured, or settle the same, is not liable to the injured servant for the amount of a judgment recovered by him, although the employer has become insolvent, and the insurer assumed the defense of the action, and excluded the employer from participating therein.

A PPEAL by the defendant Casualty Company from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County overruling a demurrer to a bill filed to reach certain funds claimed to be owing defendants Robertson

Note. — The question of an injured employee's right to reach the fund under an employers' liability policy is discussed in the note to Allen v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 958.

Inasmuch as the question of the injured employee's right to follow the fund depends upon whether or not the insurance becomes due and payable before the assured has paid the loss, attention may be called to the note appended to Kennedy v. Fidelity & C. Co. 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, upon the question of giving a promissory note as a loss or damage within the condition of a contract of indemnity, and to the subsequent cases, involving that question, of Seattle & S. F. R. & Nav. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 50 Wash. 44, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 121, 126 Am. St. Rep. 886, 96 Pac. 509, and Stenbom v. Brown-Corliss Engine Co. 137 Wis. 564, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 956, 119 N. W. 308.

et al. on an employers' indemnity policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lucky, Fowler, & Andrews, for appellant Casualty Company:

The insurance company does not owe the assured under an indemnity policy until he has paid a final judgment rendered against him in favor of an employee for an injury covered by the policy.

Finley v. United States Casualty Co. 113 Tenn. 592, 83 S. W. 2, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 962; Frye v. Bath Gas & Electric Co. 97 Me. 241, 59 L.R.A. 444, 94 Am. St. Rep. 500, 54 Atl. 395.

Messrs. Pickle, Turner, & Kennerly for appellees.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants, in part as owners and in part as lienors, are interested in a judgment for $5,000, rendered against Robertson & Hobbs for a fatal injury received by an employee while in their service, as a result of their actionable negligence. This judgment has not been paid, and, on account of the insolvency of the judgment debtors, cannot be collected out of them. At the time of the injury Robertson & Hobbs were carrying an employers' indemnity policy, issued to them by the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, which covered the injury that constituted the original cause of action, to the extent of $5,000. The present bill is filed against these parties and the Casualty Company, in which, after making all necessary allegations of fact, the complainants ask a decree against all the parties defendant, and especially against the Casualty Company, upon the policy referred to. While conceding by its demurrer the averments of fact made in the bill, the company denies, as a conclusion of law, all privity with the complainants, or any liability to them by reason of the issuance of the policy for the injury or death of the employee in question.

The introductory provision of the policy is as follows: "In consideration of $150 premium, . . . the New Amsterdam Casualty Company . . . does hereby agree to indemnify Robertson & Hobbs . . . for the term of twelve months . . . against loss from common law or statutory liability for damages on account of bodily injuries, fatal or nonfatal, accidentally suffered by any employee or employees of the assured while on duty, . . . caused by the negligence of the assured, . . . and against the expense of defending any suit for such damages."

After limiting the liability of the company "from an accident resulting in injuries to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or in the death of one person" to $5,000, under the head of "General Agreements" the following provisions or conditions were made:

"(1) The assured, upon the occurrence of an accident, shall give notice in writing within five days of the event causing the injury, with full particulars thereof, to the home office of the company at New York city, or its duly authorized agent. He shall give like notice, with full particulars, of any claim which may be made on account of such accident.

"(2) If thereafter any suit is brought against the assured to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by this policy, immediate notice thereof shall be given to the company, and the company shall defend such suit in the name and on behalf of the assured, or settle the same.

"(3) The assured shall not settle any claim except at his own costs, nor incur any expense, nor interfere in any negotiations for settlement, or in any legal proceeding, without the consent of the company, previously given in writing. . . . The assured, when requested by the company, shall aid in securing information and evidence, and in effecting settlements, and in case the company calls for the attendance of any employee or employees, as witnesses at inquests and in suits, the assured will secure his or their attendance, making no charge for his or their loss of time.

"(7) No action shall lie against the company as respects any loss under this policy, unless it shall be brought by the assured himself, to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a final judgment after trial of the issue."

We had occasion in Finley v. United States Casualty Co. 113 Tenn. 592, 83 S. W. 2, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 962, to consider a policy in all material respects like the one at bar. We there recognized the distinction made by the authorities between a policy insuring an employer against liability and one agreeing to indemnify the assured "against loss from liability for damages," and it was held that the policy then in question was of the latter character, and further, that the amount of the insurance provided for in the policy did not become available until the payment of the loss by the assured, and could not be impounded by an employee and appropriated by him to an unsatisfied judgment against his employer.

We are entirely satisfied with the conclusions announced in that opinion, and it is necessarily controlling here, unless the two cases can be materially distinguished. This, it is insisted by counsel for complainants, they have succeeded in doing. The facts relied upon as radically distinguishing this from the earlier case and relieving complainants from its authority are that upon the occurrence of the accident and notice thereof the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, conceding that it fell within the terms of the policy, "undertook and assumed exclusive control of negotiations for settlement and of the defense of the suit" instituted by the injured employee, and "conducted the same in the name of Robertson & Hobbs, who were excluded from all participation therein, except as agents and assistants of" the defendant company. It is upon these facts, as well as under the terms of the policy, the contention is made by the complainants that the insurance company became the real defendant in that case, and that thus the benefit of the policy and liability of the company "inured" to them, and entitles them to a decree in this cause.

It is true, in the Finley Case, that the indemnity company did not interfere in any way with the suit which the injured employee brought against the master, but, to the contrary, denied liability for the injury; yet, pending the suit, it did pay the employer $50 in compromise and settlement of all claim under the policy. After the judgment obtained therein by the injured employee, he sought by a bill in equity to hold the Casualty Company liable for the amount of his recovery on two grounds: First, that the policy taken out by the employer, upon the injury sustained by him, inured at once to his benefit; and, second, if mistaken in this, then he had a right to impound the alleged debt in the hands of the company, and subject it to his judgment, because the compromise, mentioned above, was in fraud of his claim.

These two grounds for recovery were challenged as unsound by a demurrer, which was sustained by the chancellor, whose decree was afterwards affirmed by the court of civil appeals. On being brought into this court by certiorari, after consideration, the decree of the latter court was in all things affirmed; this court holding that, under the contract, there was no privity between the injured employee and the parties to the indemnity policy, that this contract was one between the company and the assured, and alone for his benefit.

If it be true, then, that the injured servant is not in privity with the parties to the contract, but that it is solely made for the benefit of the master, and, as is provided in the seventh of the general agreements, set out above, that no action will lie against the company for any loss, unless brought by the assured "to reimburse him for a loss 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

actually sustained and paid by him," it is difficult to see how the indemnity company in the present case so changed its relations to the parties and the contract that it became operated with and obligated to pay the unsatisfied judgment of the employee, because, for its better protection, it saw proper to avail itself of the terms of the general agreement No. 3, by defending the action in which that judgment was obtained.

To combat this view, and avoid the force of the holding in Finley v. United States Casualty Co., it is insisted that under the policy, when properly construed, in assuming the defense of the case against Robertson & Hobbs, the defendant company had placed itself under obligation to pay the judgment then recovered; and the counsel of complainants rely on Sanders v. Frankfort M. Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. 72 N. H. 485, 101 Am. St. Rep. 688, 57 Atl. 653, in support of their insistence.

The court delivering the opinion in that case is of recognized ability, and its decisions are entitled to great respect; but to accept its construction of the policy there involved would be to overrule Finley v. United States Casualty Co. supra, for the two cases cannot stand together. It is true, as has been stated, that in the latter case the indemnity company did not take part in the defense of the servant's suit against the master, or exercise any control over the master in resisting it, while in the Sanders Case the reverse was true; yet to hold, with that court, that the insurer, after taking control of the proceeding against the assured, who is insolvent, cannot be discharged of liability except by payment of the indemnity, or a settlement of the plaintiff's claim reduced to judgment, would be counter to our holding that in such a policy there is no privity between the servant and the parties to the contract, that the fund provided for indemnity is not a trust fund, and the loss contemplated is that which the master sustains by the satisfaction of the judgment obtained against him.

It will be found, on examination of the opinion of the supreme court of New Hampshire, that the conclusion therein announced rests largely on that portion of § 2 of the general agreements, where, on receiving immediate notice of a suit brought against the assured to recover damages on account of an accident covered by the policy, the company undertakes "to defend against such proceeding, in the name and on behalf of the assured, or settle the same, at its own cost."

To the word "defend," used in the section, is given the broad meaning "to protect, to secure against attack,—in short, to successfully defend," and then holding that, under this section, when the company undertook a defense, it "could only perform its covenant of indemnity by assuming the liability." On this point, it is said, in the course of the opinion, "the engagement is not merely to contest the suit to judgment, but to 'defend against such proceedings,'—meaning necessarily all the proceedings in the suit founded upon the claim for damages against the insured. The judgment is a proceeding in such a suit, as also is the execution. After final judgment, payment is ordinarily the only defense open which will defeat further progress in the proceedings,—the issuance of execution."

So, with this construction (and this was essential to avoid an irreconcilable conflict), it was held that the agreement or condition that "no action shall lie against the company as respects any loss under this policy, unless it shall be brought by the assured himself, to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment, after trial of the issue," was intended to "provide for the cases, if any should arise, where the company contended the claim arose from an accident not covered by the policy."

This court, however, gave a broader scope to this clause in Finley v. United States Casualty Co. supra, and, construing it in connection with §§ 2 and 3 held as follows: "While the company is bound to reimburse the assured for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment recovered against him by an employee, yet, in order to make sure, as far as possible, that there shall be no recovery as a basis on which to subsequently establish a claim, the company reserves the right to defend the litigation, also to supervise any settlement that may be made, and to have a free hand in negotiating settlements of a claim made against the assured. As stated, if these provisions—that is, the second and third general agreements—stood alone, they would furnish strong reasons for construing the contract as one against liability; but, from what has just been stated, it is perceived that they have a proper place in a contract against loss from liability for damages in the way of enabling the company to minimize the loss."

In Connolly v. Bolster, 187 Mass. 266, 72 N. E. 981, is presented a controversy similar in all respects to the one at bar. There the complainant, in bill of equity, with an unsatisfied judgment against the master, rendered in a case where the indemnity company had assumed the defense, relied for his contention as to the liability of the company to him by reason of the terms of its policy on the authority of Sanders v. Frank- fort M. Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. supra. The court, however declined to follow that case, saying, among other things, that the word "defend," as used in the policy, had its natural import, and that it meant there "what it means when counsel are retained to defend an action; and that it is not to be extended beyond that,—to mean to successfully defend." As to the purpose and effect of the second clause, in which the word "defend" occurs, the court said that they are "plain, when taken in connection with the third. It is plainly inserted as an additional obligation and privilege for the protection of the insurance company, on the assumption that it is for the pecuniary interest of the company to be given the conduct of and to defend the action which is to fix its liability, and the amount to be paid when liable, rather than to leave that matter to be dealt with by the several persons injured, respectively. This does not result in the necessity of writing into clause 2 the qualifying words 'until final judgment,' as the plaintiff contends, for when final judgment is rendered ordinarily all defense is at an end. Nothing remains but a writ of review or a writ of error; and if such a proceeding were necessary, it might well be held to be covered by the obligation to defend. But when the defense is ended, and, in spite of the defense, judgment is rendered against the insured, there is nothing to do but pay. Making payment of a judgment against the defendant is no part of a covenant to defend the action. Whether the insurance company is bound to pay the judgment depends upon the terms of its agreement to indemnify the assured against loss; and the eighth clause [corresponding with the seventh clause in this policy] in terms provides that no action shall lie for 'any loss under this policy,' unless brought by the assured 'to reimburse him for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a judgment after trial of the issue.'"

In Allen v. Gilman McN. & Co. (C. C.) 137 Fed. 136, the same ruling is made. As to the opinion in Sanders v. Frankfort M. Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "It is certainly opposed to the weight of authority, and I am not satisfied with the construction of the policy that the court found it necessary to adopt, in order to avoid the force of the provision forbidding suit by the insured until after he has paid the employee's judgment."

We are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusion announced by these two latter courts. The view taken by them of a policy such as is the one at bar, we think is entirely sound. It is in accord with the general conclusion reached by this court in Finley v. United States Casualty Co. supra.

We have examined the cases referred to by counsel for complainant in Kennedy v. Fidelity & C. Co. 100 Minn. 1, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 478, 117. Am. St. Rep. 658, 110 N. W. 97, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 673, and Nesson v. United States Casualty Co. 201 Mass. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 71, 131 Am. St. Rep. 390, 87 N. E. 191, and find that they have no bearing on the questions raised. It follows that the action of the chancellor in overruling the demurrer to this bill must be reversed, and the bill is dismissed.

Premature; conditions precedent.

1. A formal disaffirmance by an insane person, or by someone acting in his behalf, of a void deed which had been executed by him to one who had knowledge of the insanity, and who gave no substantial consideration, is not a condition precedent to the bringing of an action by a devisee under the prior valid will of the grantor, to set aside such deed as a cloud on title, which was alleged to have passed under the will, although there was ample time for such action between the execution of the deed and the grantor's death. Bethany Hospital Co. v. Philippi, 30: 194, 107 Pac. 530, 82 Kan. 64.

2. An objection that an action by a devisee under a will to set aside a deed of the testator, which was alleged to have procured while he was of unsound mind, was premature, because brought before the will was probated, because immaterial upon the trial upon an amended and supplemental petition filed after the probate of the will. Bethany Hospital Co. v. Philippi, 30: 194, 107 Pac. 530, 82 Kan. 64.

3. The right of action against a title abstractor under a statute providing that persons engaged in making of abstracts shall give bond conditioned for the payment of all damages that may accrue to any person by reason of any incompleteness, imperfections, or error in any abstract furnished by them, accrues at the time the abstract is delivered, and not when the error is discovered and the damages resulting therefrom have been paid. Walker v. Bowman, 30: 642, 111 Pac. 319, — Okla. —.

Joinder.

4. Claims for the benefit of the widow and next of kin of one killed by another's wrongful act, and for the benefit of his estate, may be joined in one action to hold the one responsible for the wrong liable for the damages. Tillar v. Reynolds, 30: 1043, 131 S. W. 969, — Ark. —.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

Effect of death pending, to abate proceeding, see Abatement and Revival.

Sequestering books pending appeal from contempt order for refusing to produce them, see Constitutional Law, 3.

As to bill of review, see Review.

Right to appeal.

1. The installation by a gas company of a single meter in an apartment house, and the connection of the building with its mains, after the dismissal of a petition for mandamus to compel it to install a meter in each apartment, is not a termination of the controversy, which will destroy the jurisdiction of the appellate court. State ex rel. Hullett v. Seattle Lighting Co. 30: 492, 110 Pac. 799, — Wash. —.

Jurisdiction of United States Supreme Court.

2. The nature and character of the rights of the surviving wife in the community property are peculiarly local questions, not open to review by the Federal Supreme Court when determining, on a writ of error to a state court, whether the imposition of an inheritance tax under the state laws denies to the wife the equal protection of the laws. Moffitt v. Kelly, 30: 1179, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 79, 218 U. S. 400, 54 L. ed. 1086.

3. Whether or not the rights of a surviving wife in the community property as they existed when the marriage was celebrated were correctly subjected to a state inheritance tax law subsequently enacted cannot be reviewed by the Federal Supreme Court when determining, on writ of error to a state court, the validity of such statute under the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. Moffitt v. Kelly, 30: 1179, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 79, 218 U. S. 400, 54 L. ed. 1086.

Transfer of cause; effect; time.

4. The pendency of an appeal from an order committing officers of a corporation for contempt in disobeying an order directing them to turn over the corporate books to a receiver will not prevent the nisi prius court from sequestering the corporate property. Manning v. Mercantile Securities Co. 30: 725, 90 N. E. 238, 242 Ill. 584.

5. Where after the entry of a judgment and the denial of a motion for new trial, the successful party causes a new judgment to be entered its date is that from which to reckon the time allowed for appeal. Jemo v. Tourist Hotel Co. 30: 926, 104 Pac. 820, 55 Wash. 595.

Record on appeal.

6. The rule that alleged errors which require an examination of all the facts cannot be reviewed unless the case-made avers that it contains all the evidence introduced at the trial is complied with by a statement in a case-made, preceding the evidence, to the effect that "the following evidence was introduced, same being all the evidence introduced by both parties at the trial." American Steel & W. Co. v. Coover, 30: 787, 111 Pac. 217, — Okla. —.

7. Cross assignments of error will not be considered where appellees ask an affirmation of the judgment, which can be done without considering them. Baldwin v. Moroney, 30: 761, 91 N. E. 3, 173 Ind. 574.

8. All points relied upon for reversal on appeal must be properly made in the brief or they will be deemed waived; and it is not sufficient to assert in general terms that a ruling of the trial court is wrong, but a fair effort must be made to prove that it is wrong, or the point will not be considered as having been made. Allison v. Bryan, 30: 146, 109 Pac. 934, — Okla. —.

Objections and exceptions; raising questions in lower court.

9. An objection that a decree of adoption entered by a probate court cannot be set aside on the facts entitles one appealing from a subsequent decree attempting to set it aside, to raise the question whether or not petitioner is entitled on all the facts to any relief, and to raise objections not specified as objections to the decree, where under such an appeal the case is heard de novo in the appellate court. Phillips v. Chase, 30: 159, 89 N. E. 1049, 203 Mass. 556.

10. The question of ratification of a decree of adoption procured by fraud, or of laches and the statute of limitations, cannot be raised on appeal from a subsequent decree of the probate court setting aside the former one, where no objections to the decree on those grounds were filed on appeal, although upon such an appeal the case is heard de novo in the appellate court. Phillips v. Chase, 30: 159, 89 N. E. 1049, 203 Mass. 556.

Presumptions.

11. The appellate court will, when the record recites that the parties came and submitted the cause to the court for trial, without the intervention of a jury, presume that a jury trial was expressly waived. Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan, 30: 85, 87 N. E. 215, — Ind. —.

What reviewable generally.

Scope of review on writ of error from Federal supreme court to state court, see supra, 2, 3.

12. The appellate court will not, under a statute requiring it to weigh the evidence in equity cases, do so where the testimony is oral, and there is a substantial conflict in it. Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan, 30: 85, 87 N. E. 215, — Ind. —.

Objections as to which party is estopped.

13. One who consents to a trial of a cause by the court without a jury cannot insist on appeal that it was, because of that fact, tried on a wrong theory, to his injury. Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan, 30: 85, 87 N. E. 215, — Ind. —.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Discretionary matters.

14. There is no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit the filing of a bill to review a decree settling the credits to be allowed on a note given to a bank for money loaned to settle with the maker's creditors, because of newly discovered evidence consisting of items delivered to the bank for credit, but not credited, where the items were known to petitioner, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have been discovered, before the rendition of the decree, and which were merely overlooked or forgotten. Smith v. Rucker, 30: 1030, 129 S. W. 1079, — Ark. —.

Questions not raised below.

15. A judgment cannot be affirmed on a theory not presented in the pleading and proofs. Woodson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 30: 931, 123 S. W. 820, 224 Mo. 685.

16. A garnishee cannot plead the statute of limitations to a recovery of a claim against him for the first time in the appellate court. Tiger v. Rogers Cotton Cleaner & Gin Co. 30: 694, 130 S. W. 585, — Ark. —.

17. Relators cannot on appeal raise the objection for the first time that an affidavit of defense in a mandamus proceeding should not have been treated as a pleading, where it was in fact an answer in all but name. State ex rel. Hallett v. Seattle Lighting Co. 30: 492, 110 Pac. 799, — Wash. —.

18. Metropolitan Street R. Co.* 30: 931, 123 S. W. 820, 224 Mo. 685.

Review of facts.

19. Assignments of error which challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction cannot be considered by the Federal Supreme Court on a writ of error to the supreme court of the Philippine Islands, to review a judgment affirming such conviction, where it is not contended that there was no evidence of guilt, since only errors of law can be considered upon a writ of error. Ling Su Fan v. United States, 30: 1176, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 21, 218 U. S. 302, 54 L. ed. 1049.

20. The findings of the trial court in an action to recover possession of a quantity of grain which had been sold, but not actually delivered, that the title passed to the vendee, will not be disturbed on appeal unless against the clear weight of evidence, since the question is one of fact, as it depends on the intent of the parties to the transaction. Seldomridge v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 30: 337, 127 N. W. 871, — Neb. —.

Grounds for reversal.

21. It is reversible error for a state corporation commission which has directed the amendment of an original affidavit charging a violation of one of its orders, to proceed with the trial over the objection of the defendant, upon the theory that the affidavit has been amended so as to charge a violation of a different order, where such amendment has never been made nor verified. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 30: 137, 107 Pac. 929, — Okla. —.

22. Erroneous rulings on the pleadings will not require reversal where, on the merits, judgment was entered for the right party. Jenkins v. Hawkeye Commercial Men's Asso. 30: 1181, 124 N. W. 199, — Iowa, —.

23. It is not reversible error to permit a witness in an action by a servant to hold his master liable for personal injuries, who testifies as to measurements taken immediately after the accident, to state that he was a member of a committee whose duty it was to investigate the circumstances of accidents, and that he took the measurements in making such examination. Duffey v. Consolidated Block Coal Co. 30: 1067, 124 N. W. 609, — Iowa, —.

25. The admission of immaterial evidence will not require a reversal if it is nonprejudicial. Duffey v. Consolidated Block Coal Co. 30: 1067, 124 N. W. 609, — Iowa, —.

26. It is not reversible error to refuse to permit questions to be put to a witness on recross-examination, where no excuse is given why they were not asked upon the cross-examination, where the witness has been finished with once and recalled, and the party offering him has finished with him. Duffey v. Consolidated Block Coal Co. 30: 1067, 124 N. W. 609, — Iowa, —.

27. Refusal to strike out a part of the evidence of a certain witness as not the best evidence is harmless error where, had it been stricken out, other evidence sufficient to justify the judgment would have remained. McGregor v. Harm, 30: 649, 125 N. W. 885, — N. D. —.

28. It is not prejudicial error to refuse an instruction which is not within the issues presented by the pleadings. Dardanelle Pontoon Bridge & Turnp. Co. v. Croom, 30: 360, 129 S. W. 280, — Ark. —.

29. A statement by the state's attorney when summing up a criminal case to the jury, to the effect that to the knowledge of the presiding judge one of the number had been fixed, based not upon facts in evidence, but upon the judge's statement to him that he had seen the juror and a relative of the accused in conversation under suspicious circumstances, an objection to which the judge overrules, is reversible error. Turpin v. Commonwealth, 30: 794, 130 S. W. 1086, — Ky. —. (Annotated)

30. Permitting the jury in a homicide case to take a dying declaration which had been reduced to writing and introduced in evidence, to their room, under the erroneous belief that it was within the terms 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of a statute providing what papers shall be allowed to be so taken, is reversible error. Territory v. Eagle, 30: 391, 110 Pac. 862, — N. M. —.

31. Under the principle of de minimis non curat lex refusal to direct a verdict for 39 cents, although erroneous, does not constitute ground for reversal, where no question of costs is involved. McGregor v. Harm, 30: 649, 125 N. W. 885, — N. D. —.

32. A relator is not entitled to reversal of a decree refusing a mandamus, for the purpose of avoiding costs, because it did not award that portion of the relief demanded to which he was entitled, where he rejected respondent's offer to furnish such portion. State ex rel. Hallett v. Seattle Lighting Co. 30: 492, 110 Pac. 799, — Wash. —.

Effect of decision; subsequent proceedings.

33. A plaintiff whose judgment is reversed on appeal after consideration of the law and the facts is not entitled to the benefit of a statute permitting the institution of a new suit within a year in case of a nonsuit or a reversal of a judgment in his favor, where the appellate court is authorized to award a new trial, reverse, or affirm, since the reversal referred to in the statute must be held to mean one in which the merits of the cause have not been adjudicated. Strottman v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 30: 377, 128 S. W. 187, 228 Mo. 154. (Annotated)

Assets: avoiding transfers.

1. The proviso in § 70 of the bankruptcy act, that when a bankrupt shall have an insurance policy with a cash surrender value payable to himself or his estate, he may, under certain circumstances, pay such value to the trustee and retain the policy, does not interfere with the operation of the provision in the section that the trustee shall be vested by operation of law with any property which the bankrupt could by any means have transferred, and therefore a policy the beneficiary in which may be changed by the bankrupt at pleasure will pass to the trustee. Re Orear, 30: 990, 178 Fed. 632, 102 C. C. A. 78. (Annotated)

2. Unpaid subscriptions to the stock of a corporation constitute assets in the hands of its trustee in bankruptcy, even though the stock has been transferred from the possession of the original subscribers. Perkins v. Cowles, 30: 283, 108 Pac. 711, 157 Cal. 625.

Co. v. Coover*, 30: 787, 111 Pac. 217, — Okla. —. (Annotated)

4. Acceptance by one who has transmitted a mortgage to an insolvent banker for 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

collection, of a deed to real estate and notes of strangers in satisfaction of the proceeds of the mortgage, which the banker transmitted with instructions to accept the same upon hearing that the bank had closed its doors, amounts to treating the transaction as an indebtedness, and terminates the trust relation, where the banker dissipates the proceeds of the collection and closes the bank without funds into which the proceeds can be traced; and the owner of the mortgage is therefore not entitled to a preference over other creditors, but may be required to surrender his security to the banker's trustee in bankruptcy, who is appointed within four months thereafter. Atherton v. Green, 30: 1053, 179 Fed. 806, 103 C. C. A. 298. (Annotated)

C. A. —.

Meadows*, 30: 1, 123 S. W. 868, 225 Mo. 1. Claims against estate; distribution.

8. Louisville Trust Co.* 30: 1011, 181 Fed. 10, — C. C. A. —.

9. P., where checks similar in form to that paid had never been issued by S. 1. The validity of an attempted marriage between citizens of one of the United States must be determined by its laws, where it takes place in Germany, whose law provides that the contraction of a marriage, even if only one of the parties is a German, is determined, in respect of each of the parties, by the laws of the country of which he or she is subject; and that the same rule applies to an alien who contracts a marriage within the Empire, although the statute also provides that the form of a marriage concluded within the Empire is determined exclusively by the German law, since the latter provision must be held to apply to the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

celebration of the marriage in Germany between German subjects. Re Lando, 30: 940, 127 N. W. 1125, — Minn. —.

W. 1125, — Minn. —.

Moran*, 30: 898, 123 N. W. 202, — Iowa, —.

5. A debtor who, after contracting in the state of his residence, where his creditor continues to reside, takes up his residence in another state, may, when suit is brought there on the contract, set up its statute of limitations, although the action is not barred by the statute of the state where the contract was made. *Staples v. A rule of a state corporation commission providing that ten days' free storage shall be allowed by railroad companies on less than car-load shipments when destined to consignees living at interior points 5 miles or more from the railroad station is within the meaning of a constitutional provision giving the commission paramount authority to prescribe the rates, charges, and classifications of transportation companies, and therefore renders inoperative a general act of the legislature, attempting to regulate the same subject-matter. *St. Louis & S. 2. The act of a church judicatory which has authority to amend its Confession of Faith and constitution so as to make them conform to those of another ecclesiastical society, in effecting a union with such other society rather than a specific amendment of the Confession and constitution, is one of policy or expediency rather than of power or authority, and therefore cannot be questioned by the civil courts. *Ramsey v. 1. The wife, when sued for divorce on the ground of wilful and continued desertion, may, under a statute providing that in all cases the party sued may plead in defense the conduct of the party suing, and the jury may, on examination of the whole case, refuse a divorce, set up as a defense thereto, adulterous acts of the husband which occurred subsequent to other adulterous acts on his part which had been condoned by her. Davis v. Davis, 30: 73, 68 S. E. 594, 134 Ga. 804.

Davis*, 30: 73, 68 S. E. 594, 134 Ga. 804. (Annotated)

4. The jury is not prevented from granting alimony to a wife against whom a divorce is granted under a statute providing that in all suits for divorce the jury may provide permanent alimony for the wife, by a statutory provision that, if the jury find in favor of the wife, they shall also, in providing permanent alimony for her, specify what amount the minor children should be entitled to for their support, and that they may do that if, from any legal cause, the wife may not be entitled to permanent alimony, and the children are not in the same category, since such provision does not mean that in no event can alimony be awarded unless the wife shall obtain a divorce. *Davis v. 10. Knowledge of the dangerous condition of a highway imposes a duty upon a traveler to exercise such care as the circumstances demand. Solberg v. Schlosser, 30: 1111, 127 N. W. 91, — N. D. —

11. It is not negligence, as a matter of law, for a person to drive upon a dangerous or defective highway, knowing it to be such, unless the dangerous or defective condition is such that a person of ordinary prudence would not attempt to drive over it. Solberg v. Schlosser, 30: 1111, 127 N. W. 91, — N. D. —

Notice.

12. A statute providing that cities shall be absolutely exempt from liability for injuries caused by defects in their public ways unless actual notice in writing of the defect shall have been filed with the city clerk at least five days before the occurrence of the injury complained of does not apply to defects caused by the city itself in negligently constructing a sewer in one of its streets. Updike v. Omaha, 30: 589, 127 N. W. 229, — Neb. —.

2. 1. Upon the death of the parent to which a child was awarded by a decree of divorce, the other parent becomes entitled to its custody, unless, in a contest thereof, it is shown that such parent is disqualified, or the interests of the child require some other disposition of its person. Wilson v. Mitchell, 30: 507, 111 Pac. 21, — Colo. — 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

2. That a divorce was granted against the mother of a child for wrongdoing is not conclusive against her right to the custody of the child many years afterwards, where the father is dead, and she has remarried, has a good home and social standing, and there is not the slightest intimation or suspicion of wrongdoing subsequent to the divorce. Wilson v. Mitchell, 30: 507, 111 Pac. 21, — Colo. —

3. That the grandparents of a child in whose custody it was placed have acquired an affection for it and it for them is not sufficient reason for refusal to return it to the custody of its mother, who surrendered possession of it merely for the benefit of its health, and always manifested her interest in and love for it, and contributed to its support. Wilson v. Mitchell, 30: 507, 111 Pac. 21, — Colo. —

4. The mere fact that a mother intends, if she secures possession of her son, to take him to England for residence, is not sufficient to cause the courts to deny her the right to such possession as against the claims of its grandparents, with whom it had been placed by its father, who has since deceased. Wilson v. Mitchell, 30: 507, 111 Pac. 21, — Colo. —

5. Foreign corporations.

1. Merely recognizing existing insurance policies and receiving the premiums on them at its office in another state and adjusting claims which accrue does not constitute doing business within a state by an insurance company after its asserted withdrawal therefrom, so as to continue in force its designation of the insurance commissioner as its agent to receive service of process. Hunter v. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. 30: 677, 76 N. E. 1072, 184 N. Y. 136.

2. The receipt by a foreign insurance company at its home office of premiums upon policies theretofore issued, together with four isolated acts extending over a period of three years, consisting in re-writing an existing policy, sending a check in payment of a policy, to be delivered upon receipt of certain unpaid assessments, and two adjustments within the state of claims which have accrued, do not constitute doing business within the state after the company's asserted withdrawal therefrom in good faith, so as to preclude it from revoking its designation of the state insurance commissioner as its agent to receive service of process. Hunter v. Mutual Reserve L. Ins. Co. 30: 686, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127, 218 U. S. 573, 54 L. ed. 1155.

Renewal of policy.

3. Mere delay in rejecting a receipt for renewal of an accident insurance policy does not amount to an acceptance which will continue the policy in force. Richmond v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 30: 954, 130 S. W. 790, — Tenn. —.

4. An accident insurance policy is not in force where a renewal receipt is mailed by the agent, held by the insured a couple of weeks, and returned with a notice to discontinue, although the agents do not accept the discontinuance, but write assured that they will hold the receipt for him and give him credit for the premium, where he dies before the letter reaches him; and it is immaterial that both parties think that the policy is in force until the discontinuance is accepted. Richmond v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 30: 954, 130 S. W. 790, — Tenn. —.

Rescission.

5. Breach by an insurance company of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

its contract to lend money on a policy does not justify the insured in treating the contract as rescinded, and suing for a return of the premiums paid. Lewis v. New York L. Ins. Co. 30: 1202, 181 Fed. 433, — C. C. A. —. (Annotated)

6. The holder of an insurance policy which contains a provision for loans upon the policy does not make a case for rescission of the contract for failure to grant a loan, where he does not allow time between the making of his demand and the bringing of the suit for the application to reach the home office and the reply to be returned, and he does not execute the loan agreement which the policy makes a condition precedent to the granting of a loan. Lewis v. New York L. Ins. Co. 30: 1202, 181 Fed. 433, — C. C. A. —.

7. A form of policy of fire insurance, although prescribed by law, is, when issued by the insurance company, none the less a contract, and is to be construed as such; and while the fact that it is a standard form may affect a question of pure waiver, it does not abrogate the doctrine of estoppel, especially where it is provided by statute that policies in the standard form shall be subject to the same rules of construction as to their effect, or the waiver of any of their provisions, as if the form thereof had not been prescribed. Leisen v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 30: 539, 127 N. W. 837, — N. D. —.

8. An insurance company whose agent was expressly informed, at the time of the execution of a fire policy, of the true interest of the insured in the property, and who carelessly and negligently, without the connivance of the assured, stated in the policy that the insured was the owner in fee simple, which was not true, and collected and retained the premium, is estopped to deny liability in an action on the policy, although it provided that the entire policy should be void if the interest of the insured was not truly stated therein, or if his interest was other than sole and unconditional ownership, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed on the policy, and also that no officer or agent should have power to waive any of the provisions or condition of the policy, and that no officer or agent should be deemed to have waived any such provisions or conditions unless such waiver was written upon or attached to the policy. Leisen v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 30: 539, 127 N. W. 837, — N. D. —.

9. Restrictions in a policy of fire insurance limiting the power of agents to waive conditions except in a certain manner do not apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract, where the agent, with full knowledge of the facts, issues the policy and collects the premium, and the insured has acted in good faith. Leisen v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 30: 539, 127 N. W. 837, — N. D. —.

Notice; proofs of loss.

10. A requirement of an accident insurance policy that claimant must give affirmative proof in writing of the death, and of its being the proximate result of external and accidental means, is satisfied if the beneficiary makes a prima facie showing that the death had occurred, and had resulted from the causes stated. Jenkins v. Commercial Men's Asso. 30: 1181, 124 N. W. 199, — Iowa, —.

Risks and causes of loss, injury, and death.

Guaranty policies.

12. One who undertakes to indemnify a manufacturer against loss from liability imposed by law for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by any person not employed by the assured, while at or about the work of the assured, and to defend any suit brought to enforce a claim for damages on account of an accident covered by the policy, is not liable for the costs and counsel fees and the amount paid in compromise of a suit brought by a boy injured while trespassing upon its property for the purpose of gaining a view of the interior of a theater on the adjoining property, under circumstances absolving the assured from liability for the injury. Henderson Lighting & P. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. 30: 1105, 69 S. E. 234, 153 N. C. 275. (Annotated)

13. One agreeing to indemnify an employer against liability for damages on account of bodily injuries to an employee through his negligence, by a policy providing that no action shall lie against the insurer as respects any loss under the policy unless it shall be brought by the assured himself, for loss actually sustained and paid by him in satisfaction of a final judgment, and binding the insurer to defend any action brought by an injured employee against the assured, or settle the same, is not liable to the injured servant for the amount of a judgment recovered by him, although the employer has become insolvent, and the insurer assumed the defense of the action, and excluded the employer from participating therein. Cayard v. Robertson, 30: 1224, 131 S. W. 864, — Tenn. —.

14. Injury to an employee from glanders contracted from horses which his duties required him to handle is within a policy insuring the employer against liability for the loss imposed by law upon the insured for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by an employee while on duty within the premises of the assured in the operation of his trade or business. *H. Disobedience of rules, see infra, 20.

17. A servant who is injured by having a piece of heavy machinery negligently moved without warning while he is underneath the framework on which it rests, for the purpose of blocking it up, is not guilty of contributory negligence for not adopting a safer method of performing the task, where there was nothing in the machine itself or its position suggestive of danger, as he had a right to assume that it would not be moved until he had reached a position of safety, or, at least, that it would not be moved without notice to him. Fliege v. Kansas City W. R. Co. 30: 734, 107 Pac. 555, 82 Kan. 147.

18. A nineteen-year-old employee of at least ordinary intelligence and experience, and accustomed to working in a sawmill, who, when directed by a foreman where to find another employee, from whom he had been ordered to get a tool, chose a way provided only for those engaged in using or repairing the machinery, when there was another ordinarily used way of getting to the place, which was known to him, and which he could have safely used, and, in returning 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the same way, passed over a rapidly revolving shaft, stepping so close thereto that his trousers caught in a set screw that projected less than one half inch from a safety collar on the shaft, is guilty of contributory negligence sufficient to preclude recovery for personal injuries caused by such catching of his clothes, since, in taking the course pursued, the taking of risks and the existence of dangers must have been obvious, even though he had not been warned as to the dangers of the place, and could not have seen the projecting set screw. German American Lumber Co. v. Hannah, 30: 882, 53 So. 516, — Fla. —

21. The mere fact that a device for diverting sawed lumber from the live rolls, which bear it away from the saw to be ready for another machine, has become out of repair so that it may fail to operate, does not render the master liable for injury to the operator of the latter machine by the sticking of a plank and its being hit by a following one, if the master has stationed men in proper places to aid the device in handling the lumber and to prevent the planks from interfering with each other, the performance of whose duties would have prevented the accident. Carlson v. Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. 30: 267, 97 Pac. 501, 50 Wash. 490.

22. The mere fact that a device furnished by a master may be insufficient of itself to perform a certain service does not render him liable to a servant injured by its failure to do so, if he furnishes another servant to assist the device, and such assistance makes the device perfectly safe, so that the injury is caused by the failure of the fellow servant to perform his duty. Carlson v. Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. 30: 267, 97 Pac. 501, 50 Wash. 490. (Annotated)

Who are fellow servants.

2. An oil and gas lease giving the lessee the right for the period of ten years to explore for oil and gas, and providing that, if a well is not completed on the leased premises within three months from the date of the lease, the lessee shall pay the lessor, in advance, a quarterly cash rental for each additional three months the completion of a well is delayed, is an executory contract, and vests no title in the lessee to the oil and gas in place. *Smith v. Contracts by which a corporation which buys up and consolidates all but a small percentage of the ice manufacturing plants of the city, in order to control the market and suppress competition, requires stockholders of the absorbed plants to refrain from re-engaging in the business for a period of ten years, are void as a restraint of trade, and are within a statute declaring guilty of conspiracy any corporation or individual which shall enter into any contract having for its object the limiting of the quantity of any commodity to be produced, and cannot be enforced by a corporation organized to take over the business, property, and contracts of the one which effected the consolidation. Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Rohrman, 30: 973, 128 S. W. 599, 138 Ky. 530.

2. That no effort is made to control, fix, or raise the price of the product of certain plants which have been bought in by one concern to control the market and suppress competition, does not render enforceable a contract by which holders of stock in such concern agreed not to enter into the business within the city for a series of years. *Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. 1. The keeping by a printer of a quantity of nitric acid in carboys upon his premises, for use in his business, is not such a nuisance as to render him liable for injuries to a fireman, summoned to extinguish a fire which seems to have started in the room where it is kept, through the breathing of the acid fumes. *Lunt v. (N.S.)

highway unsafe for public travel, and that plaintiff, while attempting to drive along such highway, and while exercising due care, was thrown from his wagon by reason of such uneven condition and injured, states a cause of action for violation of a duty not to render the highway dangerous, and not for breach of the contract to construct the ditch, so as to prevent recovery of damages for the injuries on the ground that the plaintiff, not being a privy to the contract, could not recover for the injuries if they had arisen from a breach. Solberg v. Schlosser, 30: 1111, 127 N. W. 91, — N. D. —.

12. A master must plead assumption of risk to be entitled to present such defense to the jury, in an action by his servant to hold him responsible for personal injuries, where he relies on assumption of risk in its true sense, which refers to risks arising out of negligence of the master which are known to, and the danger of which is appreciated by, the servant. Duffey v. Consolidated Block Coal Co. 30: 1067, 124 N. W. 609, — Iowa, —.

13. A mere allegation that the injuries for which a servant is suing his master were such as he assumed the risk of in his employment amounts to no more than a general denial, and does not raise the question of assumption of risk of the employer's negligence. *Duffey v. 14. The allegation that a quarry is undeveloped does not conflict with another that it is of great value, so as to make demurrable a bill to annul a conveyance of the property secured by fraud. Crompton v. Beedle, 30: 748, 75 Atl. 331, 83 Vt. 287.

15. A special demurrer on the ground that the allegation in a complaint against a carrier for failure to stop its train at a particular flag station and receive plaintiff as a passenger, that plaintiff, in accordance with the rules of the company and the custom, flagged the train and tried to bring it to a stop for the purpose of boarding it, failed to specify in what way the train was flagged, or what custom or rule of the company was violated, was properly overruled, as the allegation was tantamount to saying that it was the habit of the defendant to stop such train at the particular station whenever signaled, but that it failed to do so when flagged by plaintiff. Southern R. Co. v. Wallis, 30: 401, 66 S. E. 370, 133 Ga. 553.

16. A special demurrer on the grounds that the allegation in a complaint against a carrier for failure to stop its train at a flag station and receive plaintiff, a physician, as a passenger, that plaintiff was not well, and on account of his physical condition, and to keep from driving in the cold and bad weather, had gone on a train to the flag station to see his patients, was irrelevant, was properly overruled, as the allegation was but matter of inducement, introductory to the narrative of the cause of action. Southern R. Co. v. Wallis, 30: 401, 66 S. E. 370, 133 Ga. 553.

17. The overruling of a special demurrer to the allegation in a complaint against a carrier for failure to stop its train at a particular flag station and receive plaintiff as a passenger, that plaintiff was left at the station without means of conveyance to get home, that it was just at night, that the weather was cold and bad and the roads muddy, and that plaintiff had to walk home, a distance of 7 miles, whereby he was made sick, was not error, as such averments were proper to be considered in estimating the damages, if, under the allegations, plaintiff was entitled to recover. Southern R. Co. v. Wallis, 30: 401, 66 S. E. 370, 133 Ga. 553.

18. The question of the right to a jury trial cannot be raised by a demurrer to the complaint, which merely raises the question whether or not it states a cause of action, or by objection to the introduction of evidence. Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan, 30: 85, 87 N. E. 215, — Ind.

19. The filing of a general demurrer to a declaration is equivalent to pleading to the merits of the case. Cowart v. W. E. Caldwell Co. 30: 720, 68 S. E. 500, 134 Ga. 544.

PLEDGE AND COLLATERAL SECURITY.

1. A pledge of property which is not sufficient to effect a lien because of non-delivery cannot be charged with an equitable lien as against creditors of the pledgeor, by the fact that there was an intent to pledge, and that a certificate in the form of a warehouse certificate was given covering the property. Fourth Street Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 30: 552, 172 Fed. 177, 96 C. C. A. 629.

2. No pledge valid as against creditors can be effected by the issuance and delivery 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of certificates similar to those issued by warehousemen, which purport to cover property retained in possession of the pledgeor, with nothing outside of the certificates to indicate the rights of the certificate holders to it. Fourth Street Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 30: 552, 172 Fed. 177, 96 C. C. A. 629. (Annotated)

3. A bank which, in order to remove an overdue note from its books, takes the note of a third person for its amount, with such note as collateral thereto, releases, in favor of attaching creditors of the maker, its lien on property which had been assigned to it as collateral for the overdue note, at least where it permits assigned funds to pass through its hands into those of the maker of the note for a long period of time, without any attempt to apply them to the satisfaction of the note. Lincoln v. National Metropolitan Bank, 30: 1215, 35 App. D. C. 362. (Annotated)

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Specific performance of a contract for the purchase of real estate will not be decreed where a reasonable though a debatable doubt concerning the title exists, and to compel performance might visit litigation upon the purchaser in regard to the title, notwithstanding it might be declared good in an action at law. *Van Riper v. 2. A statute providing for the revocation of the license of a physician who advertises special ability to treat or cure chronic and incurable cases is not void for uncertainty. State Medical Board v. McCrary, 30: 783, 130 S. W. 544, — Ark. —.

W. 1125, — Minn. —.

6. Ballots which by statute are required to be "securely sealed in a stout paper or muslin envelop or bag" are not invalid because preserved in a paper envelop with the end merely turned back and sewed down, so as to prevent their being counted on an election contest, where it appears that the ballots produced in court were the identical ballots cast by the electors, and that they are in the identical condition that they were in when placed in the envelop by the election officers, as the statute is not mandatory. Newhouse v. Alexander, 30: 602, 110 Pac. 1121, — Okla. —.

(Annotated)

7. Ballots not indorsed with the initials of the poll clerks, as required by a statute providing that in such case they shall not be counted, but shall be designated as mutilated, and preserved separate from the ballots counted, are invalid and should not be counted on an election contest, as the statute, having been enacted to prevent fraudulent voting, is mandatory. Newhouse v. Alexander, 30: 602, 110 Pac. 1121, — Okla. —.

8. Ballots are not invalidated by the failure of the county clerk to preserve them "in some secure and safe place," as required by law, but should be counted in an election 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contest, where it appears that they are the identical ballots voted, and that they have not been tampered with in any way since the election, as the statutory requirement is not mandatory. Newhouse v. Alexander, 30: 602, 110 Pac. 1121, — Okla. —.

1. An amusement that is not per se unlawful or criminal, and is not in itself immoral or dangerous, or detrimental to the public health, will not be included within the provisions of a statute prohibiting certain specified public amusements and other like and similar amusements on Sunday, unless the same is forbidden by the statute, either by direct terms or by clear implication. Re Hull, 30: 465, 110 Pac. 256, 18 Idaho, 475.

(Annotated)

2. A "scenic railway" is not "any such place of public amusement" as a "merry-go-round," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping open on Sunday of "any theater, playhouse, dance house, race track, merry-go-round, circus or show, concert saloon, billiard or pool room, bowling alley, variety hall, or any such place of public amusement." Re Hull, 30: 465, 110 Pac. 256, 18 Idaho, 475.

3. The term "shows," as used in a statute prohibiting "all shooting, fishing, playing, horse racing, gaming, and other public sports, exercises, and shows" on Sunday, under the rule of ejusdem generis refers to out-of-door sports, and therefore does not include a moving-picture exhibition, conducted within a building on a public street, although the public were admitted thereto upon payment of a certain fee by each applicant for admission. State v. Chamberlain, 30: 335, 127 N. W. 444, — Minn. —.

4. A statute making it a misdemeanor to run freight or excursion trains on Sunday, but expressly exempting regular trains carrying mail or passengers, is an expression of public policy as to the legality of running the excepted trains on Sunday, and a legislative construction that the running of mail and passenger trains is within the exception of a statute making it a misdemeanor for any person to pursue his business on Sunday, if not a work of necessity or of charity. *Southern R. Equality; uniformity.

1. Stockholders of a bank are not denied constitutional privileges and immunities, uniformity of taxation, or the equal protection of the laws, by a statute allowing a deduction, in fixing the value of its capital stock for taxation, of only the assessed value of real estate held by it, rather than the amount invested in real estate, although it results in the taxation of the real estate to its full value, while such property is assessed to others at only a fraction of its value, if the statute provides that it shall be assessed at its full value. Smith v. Stephens, 30: 704, 91 N. E. 167, 173 Ind. 564. (Annotated)

Assessment; enforcement.

For public improvements, see Public Improvements.

2. A nonresident corporation doing business within the state is not within the provisions of statutes requiring inhabitants to bring in a list of their property for taxation and barring resident owners of the right to make application for abatement in case of failure to bring in the list. John P. Squire & Co. v. Portland, 30: 576, 76 Atl. 679, 106 Me. 234.

3. If a bank, in making a return of its capital and surplus for taxation, deducts the amount invested in real estate, under a statute providing that the assessed value of its real estate may be deducted from the valuation of its capital stock, it is not entitled to a further deduction of such assessed valuation, such item being eliminated from the account. Smith v. Stephens, 30: 704, 91 N. E. 167, 173 Ind. 564. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

4. In determining the amount of capital and surplus of the stock of a bank for taxation, under a statute permitting the assessed value of real estate held by the bank to be deducted from the valuation of the capital stock, if the amount invested in real estate is deducted by the bank from its capital and surplus in making its return, the tax officers must treat that sum as disposed of in the real estate assessment, and cannot add it to the amount of capital and surplus returned, and deduct from the total merely the actual value at which the real estate was assessed. Smith v. Stephens, 30: 704, 91 N. E. 167, 173 Ind. 564.

1. A prohibition of the issuance of trading stamps unless the articles to be given as a gift or premium shall be definitely described therein and their character and value shall be known to the customer at the time of his purchase of the goods entitling him to the stamps, and the right to the article becomes absolute when the stamp is delivered without the necessity of acquiring other stamps, is invalid as an unreasonable regulation of a legitimate business. State ex rel. Simpson v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co. 30: 966, 126 N. W. 120, 110 Minn. 378.

2. Illegal elements of chance, uncertainty, and contingency do not inhere in a trading stamp business conducted by selling stamps to merchants who, in consideration of their purchase, are given certain advertising, and the redemption of the stamps in specific numbers by giving those presenting them a right to select articles exhibited in a public show room and having the number of stamps necessary to secure them plainly marked on them. *State ex rel. 3. The cause of the settling of the earth in a sewer trench is for the jury where there is evidence tending to show that the trench was improperly filled after the laying of the sewer, and there is also much evidence tending to show that the cavity under the pavement might have resulted from natural causes, and from the action of the water from broken service pipes. Updike v. Omaha, 30: 589, 127 N. W. 229, — Neb. —.

4. Whether the original improper filling of a sewer trench in a street was the proximate cause of the breaking through into a cavity formed under the pavement by the settling of the earth used in filling, of a wagon, to the injury of the driver, some twenty years after such filling, or whether the accident was proximately caused by the natural, unavoidable sinking of the earth, and from the action of the water from broken service pipes, is for the jury, where the evidence is conflicting. Updike v. Omaha, 30: 589, 127 N. W. 229, — Neb. —.

5. When it is shown by evidence that words used in a penal statute are susceptible of two meanings, depending on the state of facts to which they are alleged to be applicable, the court may instruct the jury in the words of the statute, and leave to it the determination of the question whether or not the statute has been violated. Katzman v. Com. 30: 519, 130 S. W. 990, — Ky. —.

6. The sufficiency of the cause for a discharge from service under an existing contract is a question of law for the court, where the facts are undisputed. McGregor v. Harm, 30: 649, 125 N. W. 885, — N. D. —.

7. When a petition for damages for libel is sufficient, and there is evidence of malice in fact in making the publication, the question whether or not the defense of qualified privilege has been made out is for the jury. Tanner v. Stevenson, 30: 200, 128 S. W. 878, 138 Ky. 578.

8. Where the evidence is such that different persons may reasonably reach different conclusions, the question of the negligence of the defendant and of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff is for the jury. Solberg v. Schlosser, 30: 1111, 127 N. W. 91, — N. D. —.

9. The negligence of a street car company in running its car, without warning to its passengers, around a sharp curve at a speed of 20 miles an hour, whereby a passenger riding, because of the crowded condition of the car, and with the consent of the conductor, on the step of the platform, with his back to the street, and holding on to a stanchion with one hand, was thrown to the ground, 10 feet distant from the track, and killed, is for the jury. Trussell v. Morris County T. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 30: 351, 77 Atl. 535, — N. J. —.

10. The contributory negligence of a passenger in riding on the step of the platform of a street car from which, while he was so riding, with his back to the street, and holding on to a stanchion with one hand, he was thrown and killed, while the car was rounding a sharp curve, at high speed, is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that he rode on the step because of the crowded condition of the car, and with the consent of the conductor. Trussell v. Morris County T. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 30: 351, 77 Atl. 535, — N. J. —.

11. The contributory negligence of one injured by the tipping over of his wagon which was loaded in the usual manner with flax straw, 8 feet high, while driving along a public highway, is for the jury, where it appears that he knew of the rough condition of the road, but testified that he could not turn around or avoid it after the discovery of the dangerous condition, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that in driving over it he was attempting to follow the tracks of others who had driven over it about the same time, and that he exercised the greatest care in driving. Solberg v. Schlosser, 30: 1111, 127 N. W. 91, — N. D. —.

12. It cannot be said as matter of law that a telephone company acting as the ordinary man should not, when sending a lineman to straighten an angle pole, which it knows had pulled out of the ground, but with nothing to indicate that fact to the employee, who might have reached the conclusion that it had merely driven its brace into the ground, give him further notice of the danger, than simply to tell him to use a guy rope if the pole leaned badly. Willis v. Plymouth & C. Teleph. Exch. Co. 30: 477, 75 Atl. 877, 75 N. H. 453.

13. Whether or not a druggist, in selling opium without a prescription, used reasonable care to satisfy himself that it was obtained for a legitimate purpose, as required by statute, is a question for the jury. Katzman v. Com. 30: 519, 130 S. W. 990, — Ky. —.

Co. v. New River Lumber Co.* 30: 243, 68 S. E. 637, — S. C. —.

16. The court cannot, in a prosecution for making an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, direct a verdict of guilty, and cause the clerk to enter it, without giving the jury a chance to disobey the instruction, although the court acts upon the theory that the facts proved present the question whether or not in contemplation of law there has been a violation of the statute. People v. Curry, 30: 892, 128 N. W. 213, — Mich. —.

Defective or unmarketable title.

1. In an action to recover back purchase money for the failure of the vendor to comply with an agreement to furnish a marketable title, where the parties whose possible claims may affect the title are not before the court, the question of law upon which the title turns will not be determined, but the title will be deemed unmarketable if the question is one upon which it is apparent that other courts might entertain a different opinion. Williams v. Bricker, 30: 343, 109 Pac. 998, — Kan. —.

2. A title which a reasonably prudent man, familiar with the facts and apprised of the question of law involved, would not accept in the ordinary course of business, or as to which there is a doubt or uncertainty sufficient to form the basis of litigation, is unmarketable, even though the court, on the whole, considers it good. Williams v. Beedle, 30: 748, 75 Atl. 331, 83 Vt. 287.

5. A vendor of a farm may maintain a bill to secure a reconveyance, where he had never seen the property and was ignorant of the fact that it contained valuable deposits of stone, and sold the property at one fifth of its value, upon the representation of the vendee, who desired to secure it for the value of the stone, that he knew the value of the property, and that it was only the amount paid; that the property was inaccessible, and that he desired to secure it for another purpose. Crompton v. Beedle, 30: 748, 75 Atl. 331, 83 Vt. 287.

2. One who has appropriated water for a mill which he uses only a portion of the time cannot sell to another his right to the water during the time he does not use it, as against the rights of one who has made a valid appropriation of the water when not needed by him. Windsor Reservoir & Canal Co. v. Hoffman Milling Co. 30:615, 109 Pac. 422, — Colo. —. (Annotated)

Public water supply.

7. A provision in a contract by a water company to furnish service as efficient as that furnished to another city is modified by the act of the municipality in installing smaller mains which make the rendering of the service of equal efficiency impossible, and the company's duty is to use reasonable care to furnish a service as nearly efficient as that of the other municipality, as the difference in size of mains will permit. Milford v. Bangor R. & Electric Co. 30: 526, 76 Atl. 696, 106 Me. 316.

8. A municipal corporation which has contracted with a water company for a supply of water for the extinguishment of fire may sue in tort to recover damages for negligent breach of the contract, which results in the destruction of property of the municipality. *Milford v. 9. A water company which has contracted with a municipal corporation to furnish sufficient pressure through its hydrants to extinguish fire within reach of them cannot, in case it negligently fails to maintain the necessary pressure, escape liability for the value of municipal property destroyed through such negligence, on the theory that it did not agree to extinguish fire, or to insure property against loss by fire, or that such damages were not in contemplation when the contract was made. Milford v. Bangor R. & Electric Co. 30: 531, 71 Atl. 759, 104 Me. 233.

10. A water company which, in consideration of the payment of a hydrant rental, undertakes to furnish water to a municipality, is not liable for loss of municipal property through its failure to maintain a sufficient pressure to extinguish fires, where its contract does not require it to furnish any particular water pressure, or place it under any obligation with re-

Bangor R. & Electric Co.* 30: 531, 71 Atl. 750, 104 Me. 233.

Signature of testator.

1. A signature at the end of testator's disposition of his property complies with a statute requiring signatures at the end of the will, and a signature is therefore sufficient, although the writing in logical order proceeds from the first to the third page and then back to the second, so that the signature is upon the second rather than the third page. Re Stinson, 30: 1173, 77 Atl. 807, 228 Pa. 475. (Annotated)

Probate; contest.

2. An attempt to assert title to property embraced in testator's will, under an independent title, is within a provision forfeiting the share of one who contests the will, if its success would effectually upset and destroy the whole plan which testator had formed for the disposition of his estate. Moran v. Moran, 30: 898, 123 N. W. 202, — Iowa, —.

in a codicil certain other property to the first taker, subject to the same conditions as stated in the will, the daughter and her issue take under the codicil the same interest that they took under the will,—at least where the will indicates an intention to dispose of all of testator's estate. Lewis v. Payne, 30: 908, 77 Atl. 321, — Md. —.

Nature of estate or interest created.

5. Under a devise in trust to one for life, remainder to his daughter for life, remainder to her children in fee, if she leaves issue, and if she dies without issue to testator's heirs at law, the death of the daughter leaving issue vests the property in such issue, and will destroy all interests of testator's heirs, although such issue dies before the first life tenant. Lewis v. Payne, 30: 908, 77 Atl. 321, — Md. —.

6. An estate created by a devise to one or his heirs after the death of a life tenant, with a provision that, in the event that he shall decease before the life tenant, leaving no heirs, then the estate shall go to another, vests in the first taker, subject to be divested in case he predeceases the life tenant, without leaving heirs. Walker v. Alverson, 30: 115, 68 S. E. 906, — S. C. —.

7. The claim of a widow owning a half interest in the homestead property, under the will of her husband, who owned the other half interest, which gives her a life estate in the whole homestead and in other property, does not amount to an election which will destroy her individual right, if she was ignorant of the fact that loss of her right would result from claiming under the will, where the other party can be placed in substantially the same situation as if no election had been attempted, since her act must be regarded as under misconception of fact. Waggoner v. Waggoner, 30: 644, 68 S. E. 990, — Va. —.

8. A statute requiring a widow to renounce the provisions of her husband's will within a certain time after his death, if at all, has no application to her duty to elect between the will, which attempts to dispose of her individual property and her independent rights in such property. Waggoner v. Waggoner, 30: 644, 68 S. E. 990, — Va. —.

9. Under a will devising by one clause the homestead in which testator had only an undivided moiety, the other moiety belonging to his wife, to her for life, and by other clauses giving the rest of his property to her for life, she is required to elect between her right in the homestead and her rights under the will. Waggoner v. State, 30: 846, 88 N. E. 689, 172 Ind. 357. (Annotated)

Privilege.

2. The mere statement by an officer of a corporation who has been directed to turn its books over to a receiver, that he has been indicted for an offense connected with the management of the corporation, and that the contents of the books may tend to incriminate him, is not sufficient to excuse him from obeying the order of the court, but it is necessary to state facts from which the court can determine that such is the fact. Manning v. Mercantile Securities Co. 30: 725, 90 N. E. 238, 242 Ill. 584.

3. An officer of a corporation cannot refuse to comply with an order of an equity court to turn over its books to a receiver, because they may have a tendency to incriminate him, since in such cases the books go into the custody of the court, and the constitutional protection of witnesses does 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not apply, because the court can protect the officer from the use of the books against him. Manning v. Mercantile Securities Co. 30: 725, 90 N. E. 238, 242 Ill. 584.

C. Laws 1899, chap. 54, continues the authority of the commissioner in force and irrevocable so long as any liability of the company shall remain outstanding in the state. *Hunter v.
